TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, SIR HENRIE MOVNTAGVE, Knight, Lord Baron of Kimbalton, Viscount Mandeuille; And Lord President of his Highnesse most Honourable Priuie Councell, &c.

ANACHARSIS the wise Philosopher (Right Honourable, and my most esteemed Lord) writing to Crœsus the rich King of Lydia, concerning the Maiestie of Historie and Chronologie, wherein the Grecians excelled all other Nations, vsed these Words; Historie, and Chronologie, in their essentiall vnderstanding; Are the Treasure of passed occasions; the patterne of such as are to succeed; the Picture of Mans Life; the Touchstone of our actions; the effecter of our Honor. And as Cicero (ioyning in iudgement with him) affirmeth: That they are the Testimony of Times; the Light of Trueth; the Life of Memorie; the Mistresse of Life, and the Messenger of Venerable Antiquitie.

The reading of Chronicles and Authenticke Histories, doe giue vs an instant sight of such things, as Millions of men haue tried with losse of their Liues, Goods, and Honour; beeing made wisely perspicuous by their perill, and prouoked to loue the vertues of other Men, which else we our selues could neuer attaine vnto.

This great and learned Labour, concerning the very soule of all that formerly hath bin said, or can be any way else enstructed; being yours by long since precedent promise, and more effectually yours by present performance: Aduentureth it selfe into the wide Worlds view, craving no other Shield of safetie, then your Honourable protection, to defend it from the ranckling Tooth of Enuious Detraction, and the snarling reproaches of backe-byting Whisperers, whose crookednesse in iudgement, would gladly make all other mens like theirs, and bark at the Moone, when they haue nothing else to bite at.

Accept it Noble Lord, as I make no doubt but you will: And all my best abilities, while this poore old body of mine hath an houre to breath, is

Your Honors in all dutie,

The French AVTHOVRS Epistle Dedicatorie.

To the most Noble and Learned Lord, Monsieur Maistre NICOLAS LE CLERC, Lord of Franconuille, of Tremblay, of Saint Remy, &c. Counceller to the King in his High Court of Parliament at PARIS.

THe Poet Euripides, being aduised by his Friends, to put forth (for publique view) a Worke written by his owne hand, which they esteemed to be of worth, and to Dedicate the same to Archelaus, King of Macedon; made them this answere.

To a Rich man I must no poore Gift send,
That may my folly iustly reprehend:
Or else suspect thereby, that giuing so,
I begging aske great Bounty to bestow.

Hauing communed with you some yeares past, concerning this Worke, roughly hewne by mine owne hand; you iudged it worthy to see day-light, vnder the Fauour and Name of some Prince, or great Lord. And then, I requited your aduice with those Verses of Euripides. For in mine owne Naturall disposition, I am of a quite contrarie humour to them, that set all to sale, and make a price of their paines. Experience hath alreadie twice resolued mee, that in this Iron Age, the Dedication of painfull Labours to Great Persons, vnder hope of meeting with deserued Recompence; is vainely sayling to the Indies of Peru, and by such a cutting North-west Winde.

Sweating vnder the Armour of Learned Minerua, full Fiue and Twentie, if not Thirtie yeares, trauayling day and night, to choose the fayrest Flowers growing in the Worlds best stored Gardens, and then offering them to Great men: All your recompence will bee but Crimosine Taffata fine tearmes, as thus. Beleeue mee (Sir,) it is an Historie of exceeding great Trauaile: Therein are many curious and costly Recherches: You are a Worthy Man: And you merite much. Like to the Bottle of Simonides, of Grands-Mercys, full of nothing, but Winde and Smoake of the Court.

Est Labor ingratus, quem debita præmia fallunt.

Because Recompence is the Nursing Mother of Arts and Sciences.

The Reigne of Alexander the Great, swarmed with braue Spirits, excelling in Know-

Knowledge and Learning: as also rare Artizans, who indeede (to speake vprightly) were not borne vnder the Reigne of Alexander, but made by Alexander. a Liberal and Magnificent Prince, especially to them that knew any thing. He heaped no mean store of goods on Aristotle, and his Followers: yea, he honoured the memorie of the Greeke Poet Homer, because he had celebrated that of Achilles.

For he knew by sound and setled iudgement, that all that a great Prince could doe, to sauour of Excellencie in his life, was but comparable with clapping the hands and fingers, which maketh no Sound or Hermonie whatsoeuer (the Symbole of a Man dying without Memorie, among the Ægyptians) if in his life time he did no good to them, that could draw him out of the Charnell-house of Obliuion.

Such men are they, as may raise their Tombes and Monuments, vpon a Module and Patterne more excellent a thousand times, then that of Memnon the Æthyopian Prince, which was made with such Artificiall cunning: that his Statue fixed thereon, yeelded a most pleasing Hermonie to heare, at all times, and as often as the Worlds great Eye the Sunne, came and darted his Golden Beames, in at the eyes and mouth of the same Statue.

Princes of the Earth, are as subiect to death, as the poorest and meanest Peazants in the World. Mors Omnibus ex Natura æqualis est: Obliuione apud Posteros, vel Gloria Distinguitur. So speaketh the Noble Historian Tacitus, in the First Booke of his Histories.

Hfter this common passage, and this generall Procession, although they are no more then Skelitons, couered either with Marble or Brasse: yet notwithstanding, they reuiue, and see all the Sunnes golden dayes, onely by the Pennes of Learned and skilfull Writers, who engraue their Memorie with the Instrument of Immortalitie.

.. .. Monumentum Ære perennius,
Regalique situ Pyramidum altius.

But this is to be vnderstood of such, as are truely louers of Arts and Sciences, being bountifull to the maintenance of them: Otherwise, their liues are iustly worth nothing, and their Actions of greatest Fame and report, no more then as the sound and clapping of hands, or fillipping the fingers. Hereupon it was, that the queint and Learned Sapho, emblazoning an ignorant person in generall; made this Epitaph for him, during his life time.

To Graue thou carriest all, thus dead,
Because thou hast not gathered
The Roses on Pieriaes Mount:
That flourish by the Siluer Fount.

The Rose is the Liuery of the Muses, and the Hieroglyphicke of such as loue them: So Plutarke enstructeth vs, in the third Booke of his Table discourse. Whose Memorie shall neuer perish by the Wheele of Time.

Virum laude dignum Musa vetat Mori:

Because that

Ἀμάραντον Μουσῶν τίμιαι ἀμαράντινοι εἰσί.
Th' Immortall Sisters Chaplets in their Bowers;
They wither not, as doe all other Flowers.

To you my Lord it is, that I offer this Worke, and giue it to publique view, vnder the fauour of your liking and allowance. It is a Chaplet or Garland, composed and combined with all kindes of Flowers, gathered in the Gardens of the Kingdomes and Prouinces of the World. To you, who perticularly (among all the Learned men of this Age) that haue a solid and perfect knowledge, of all all whatsoeuer Nature hath produced; euen from the Hisope and the Ant, so farre as to the Cædar of Libanus, and to the Royall Eagle: But more principally, you haue most certaine and vndoubted knowledge, in all things that haue past for excellent and famous, in the Parliament of France, yea, all that concerneth the distribution of Iustice, the chiefest Piller of this Monarchie.

You are the Refuge and Sanctuarie, of all such as make profession of Learning, whom you loue and cherish without any feigning. Whereby plainely appeareth, that it was not without good cause; that your Noble Great Grandfathers (renowned in their times for knowledge and Learning) did beare (as now you doe) in their Armes, the Colour and Liuerie of the Immortall Sisters: D'Argent Clair-& luisant, au Cheuron d'vn Azur Bleu-Cæleste, accompagne de Trois Roses d'vne Riche couleur, Deux en Chef, & Vne en Pointe.

By your singuler humanitie towards mine and me, God hath enabled me with the grace and leisures, to beget and cloath (vnder you) this Infant of my Spirit. And therefore, such as it is, it is yours, and if it can doe any seruice or benefit in publique; the honor is onely due to you. And for so many good turnes and fauours, as I haue already, or can receiue from you: I wish those of Heauen to you, and (my good Lord) desire of God with all my heart, that he will be pleased, to blesse you with perfect health, happie and long life.

At Paris, from your House, this fifteenth day of June, 1619.

Your most humble and deepely obliged Seruant for euer:

THE THEATER OF HONOR AND KNIGHT-HOOD.

CHAP. I.

Of Armes and Blazons, and their Antiquity.

THE Romaines were wont to acknowledge for Noblemen (whom properly they termed Patricians) such as their Fathers and Grandfathers had beene Senators or Knights: Thereby to learne and instruct vs, that there are two meanes, whereby to atchieue and conserue the Title of Nobility: namely, Armes, and Letters or Learning. And from these two professions, are come the titles of Excellence, and Honor of Armes, & Knights of Learning, both in the auncient Romane right, and our owne Annales.

Noblemen by Armes, and likewise by Learning.

For, like as they which managed Armes for seruice of the Prince, did beare their titles of Honour, as Counts, Marquesses, and Dukes, for the Gouernment of Bayliwickes, places on the Frontiers, and intire Prouinces: So in the same manner, such as for their ability and capacitie in Learning, were called to the Princes seruice, and so had continued for the space of two and twenty yeares, in action of the same exercise; such a one obtained the title of Count Palatine, or Count of Learning, and ware the Pearled Circle or Collar, and Guilt spurs. According to the Pragmaticall sanction of the Emperor Theodosius the yonger, the 1. de Professoribus, at the Code Theodosian, dated the Ides of March, in the yeare of Grace, foure hundred, twenty six, and the nineteenth of his reigne.

Lib. de profess. Code Theod.

Now, although that Nobility alone, is so properly called onely by Vertue, according to the truest opinion,

Nobilitas sola est, atque vnica virtus;

And that the Title of Noble doth not appertaine iustly, but to him that hath walked in the pathes of vertue, making himselfe to be famous by his owne industry, according to the remarkeable tract of the Amorous Poet,

Nam Genus & Proauos, & quæ non fecimus ipsi,
Vix ea nostra voco:

Yet notwithstanding, such is the case, that vse or custome hath so much preuailed, that now we call them Noblemen, as are issued or descended from Father and Grandfather, by one of the two forenamed meanes, or else by both of them together. Howbeit, it is much more honorable to be (by one of those means) rather the First, then the last of his Race. As the Orator answered them, who were Noblemen by extraction, but Yeomen or Plebeyans by their depraued liues. Such a one was called a Gentleman of the first Tappe (whose Lance stood at the Hay-stack) in meere contempt.

More Honour for a man to be the first, then last of his race.

Ego cæteris meis maioribus virtute meâ præluxi.

And ordinarily it commeth so to passe, that the Bramble is a Queene, and the Hysope commandeth the Cedars of Libanus. So the Scripture informeth vs, as much to say, that in the Degree of Nobility, the last go before the first.

Descendunt Statua.

It is Vertue alone, which distinguisheth men one from another, and the glorie and honour acquired by our Ancestors, noted in Histories and Authenticke Marbles: but lost, Vertue onely maketh men Noble.

loſt, or rather growne ruſtie by our negligence, through defect of imitating their Vertues, becauſe

Nothing heere beneath is conſtant,
For all things change in an inſtant:
Vnder the circle of the Moone.
One hundred yeares a Banner-Bearer,
Another hundred yeeres a Barrow-driuer.

So ſaith the Ancient French Prouerbe, grounded vpon truth it ſelfe.

All is ſubiect to the Wheele of Time.

Monimenta fatiſcunt,
Mors etiam ſaxis, nominibuſque venit.

To ſerue as the burthen of the ſong, and for a Leſſon (a thouſand times repeated) to the Prince and Ploughman, to the Gentleman and peaſant.

Nobilitas ſola eſt, atque vnica Virtus.

And this degree of Nobilitie, atcheeued by vertue onely, doth both acknowledge and diſtinguiſh it ſelfe by Armes, giuen (as a recompence thereof) by the Prince onely, and Blazoned (according to the naturall diſpoſition and courage of the perſon ennobled) by the King of Armes, to whom the doing thereof onely belongeth, anſwerable to the rules and precepts of the Noble Art of Painting.

The Orders of Knighthood from Antiquity.

For this cauſe it is, that by the Ordinances made from all Antiquity, concerning the Orders of Knight-hood, this Article is alwayes the firſt. That the parties named to enter the Order of Knighthood, muſt ſtand bound by Letters, Titles, Partages, Foundation: and other Acts Publique and Authenticke: whether they be Gentlemen of three Paternall deſcents or races: And whether the Armes which they beare, haue bene borne by their Fathers, Grandfathers, and great Grandfathers. This Ordenance (practiſed in all times) ſhall ſerue vs as the ſubiect, for this our diſcourſe of Armes.

Antiquitie of Armes and Blazons.

From the Creation of the world (which was the firſt Age) Armes and Blazons haue bin in vſe. We will verifie this vndoubted Maxime, by the particularities of each Nation and Prouince, and from Age to Age.

The learned Rabbines do teach vs, that before the Flood, the children of Seth, ſonne to the ſole Monarch of the world the Patriarch Adam, ſeeing that they who were deſcended of Caine, addicted themſelues to all wickedneſſe, which was Idolatry, forgetting the worſhip of one onely God, Creator of Heauen and Earth: they reſtrained their Families within the tearmes of dutie, and perſeuerance in the feare of God. And the ſame was continued ſo ſtill by Enos the ſonne of Seth, famous in the Sacred Hiſtorie for his deuotion. For this cauſe, the children of Caine were called the ſonnes of Men and Gyants: And the other baptized with the name of Angelles, Filij Dei & Angeli qui cœperunt orare in nomine Domini: As in Gen. 4, 26.

Geneſis 4, 26.

Theſe men, to continue their Families in the feare of God, and to withdraw the children of Caine from their Idolatry, yea, to leade and guide them (by the hand as it were) to the worſhip and knowledge of the Almighty: They made vſe to themſelues of Symboles, and of Hieroglyphickes, and by the figures of Animals, Simples, brute beaſtes, and other viſible things, which fall vnder the ſenſe, are ſeene, and touched, both with the finger and the eye, they drew them by degrees to thoſe things which were inuiſible. For there is not any man, how ruſticke or groſſe conceited ſoeuer he be, who both ſeeing and hearing the young birds at the breake of day, to warble (by way of thankeſgiuing) their dumbe praiſes and prayers: Alſo the * Helioſelinum and the * Selenitis, mouing and turning themſelues, to regard and follow the motion of the Sun and Moone with a very ſweete and pleaſing murmure: but he muſt needs confeſſe, that theſe ſecond cauſes are agitated and moued to do thus, by a primary and firſt cauſe, that is to ſay, by one onely God, the Author of all theſe meruailes. The world being a booke laid open, wherein may be read (both in great and leſſer Letters) the admirable effects of his Almighty power.

viſible things inſtructed the knowledge of them inuiſible.

* An Hearbe hauing but one leafe.

* A ſtone, encreaſing & decreaſing as the Moone doeth.

The ſelfeſame exerciſe was (after the Flood) reduced into practiſe, by the good Patriarches Sem and Iaphet, to turne away the children of deteſted Caine from their depraued liues, plunged euen in the gulfe and depth of all Idolatrie. For, by the Arke or Ship made by Noah the Patriarch, they enſtructed them to obſerue the diuine prouidence, as the conſeruator of the whole vniuerſe, who ruled and gouerned all things therein.

The Arke an inſtructer to knowe the worlde Creator.

By

By the repreſentation of a thicke ſpreading Forreſt, they vnderſtood Nature, termed of the Greekes Hyle, and thereby alſo receiued intelligence, that as from forth ſuch a Forreſt, the matter is taken, which ſerueth for the ſtructure of many buildings: euen Nature her ſelfe ſerued as a Nurſerie or fruitfull Orchard, for the generating & yeelding all things whatſoeuer. One of which meanes, our great God made vſe of, for the producting of Elementarie bodies.

How Nature was vnderſtood.

The ſelfeſame diuine Prouidence was likewiſe repreſented, by the painting of a ſcepter, and by one Eye figured thereon: in regard that God ſeeth all, ruleth all, and directeth all, continuing alwayes right, that is to ſay, exempt, at libertie, and free from all humane paſſions and changes.

From notion and knowledge of the Diuinitie, they went on ſtill, and deſcended to inferiour cauſes, which we call Seconds, to induce their Families, to ſhun, deteſt, and abhorre vice, for the embracing of Vertue, and addicting themſelues to all good things. By Simples, Hearbes and Rootes, they gaue inſtruction (euen as if it were by tablature) to gouerne themſelues morally, and the like by other Creatures.

Knowledge of ſecond and inferiour cauſes, and what they vnderſtood by them.

By the Oxe and the Poppie, they deſigned Fertility: By the Pomgranate, the ſociable and coniugall communitie of Man and Wife: By the Oliue, Peace and Tranquility: As alſo their contraries, by the figure of a Horſe, the Symbole of warre, in regard that

hæc armenta minantur.

By the Iuy and the Laurell, euermore beautified with flouriſhing leaues, they vnderſtood the immortall memorie and faire fruits of Vertue: As by the Cypreſſe they acknowledged Death and Obliuion. By the Storke they ſignified Honour, Loue and dutie of Children to their parents. By the Turtle-Doue they meant Chaſtity: As by the Goate, Luſt and Impudicity. The Lyon, power and Command: The Sun, the Yeare: The Moone, the Moneth: The Starres, Night: the Fire, Day: and other ſuch like Figures, as they are made remarkeable by S. Clemens, and S. Cyrille both Alexandrians. And according to their teſtimony, we are taught, that the great Patriarks of the ancient Law, Moyſes, Salomon, and others, made vſe of theſe Figures, to giue knowledge (by them) of ſecond cauſes: by notion whereof, we are exalted to penetrate the heauens, for comming to that of the Diuine Eſſence.

Clemens Alexandrinus & S. Cyrill.

Zonarus, a Greeke Authour, in the firſt booke of his Annales, and the firſt Chapter, hath remarkeably ſet downe (following the doctrine of the Rabbines) that the deſcendants of Noah being multiplyed, and (by conſequent) diuided into Families & Tribes: were knowne by their Armes, and name of the Prince from whom they deſcended. The ſame Rabbines ſay, that the Patriarch Noah gaue for Armes the Lyon (the Symbole of Command and Royaltie) to his eldeſt ſonne Sem, and to Iaphet the youngeſt, whoſe linage was to acquire the title and right of Primogeniture or elderſhippe, aboue his elder brother, and to command ouer the children of Cham, and all the Nations of the earth. According to the propheſie and bleſſing of the holy Patriarke in Geneſis the ninth Chapter. Dilatet Deus Iaphet, & habitet in tabernaculis Sem ſitque Chanaam ſeruus eius. Sem and Iaphet bare then for Armes, L'Eſcu d'azur vne Lyon rampant d'Or.

Zonar. in Annal. Lib. 1. ca. 1.

That in their imitation, Cham (and his ſonne Chanaan, plunged in, and addicted to all wickedneſſe) tooke for his Armes, L'Eſcu de Synople vne Leopard Argente, tauele & mouchete de Sable.

That Iſmael the ſonne of Hagar the ſeruant of Abraham, tooke the ſame Armes: Auec la leurre verde en ſes accouſtrements. Which alſo was held by his deſcendants, with the naturall fiercenеſſe and crueltie of the Leopard.

The Armes of Cham and his race.

The ſelfeſame Rabbines, expounding the nine and fortie Chapter of Geneſis, where the Patriarke Iaacob lying on the bed of death, gaue his bleſſing to the two Children, Heads and Princes of the twelue Tribes, and linages of Iſrael. There (they ſay) that he gaue them for Armes and deuiſes, that which the naturall inclination of each perſon, ſeemed beſt to ſignifie, Armes which their children and deſcendants retained and kept carefully. As much they ſay vpon Exodus and Deuteronomy, and that Moyſes willing to enter the promiſed land of Canaan, which God had giuen them to conquer, and to demand backe from the deſcendants of Cham, becauſe the poſſeſſors held it by no valuable title, Torquem ab iniecta poſſeſſoribus: That he cauſed the children of Iſrael to aſſemble by Tribes, Bands, Enſignes, and Banners, which hee diuided into foure Battalions, or foure Corps d'Armées.

Gen. 49, 8, 9.

The 4 battalions of the tribes of Israel

The Banner of the Tribe of Iuda, which marched in the head of the Hoast, and w the Collonell, had vnder it the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon, holding to the East p The hoast of Reuben encamped themselues South, being followed by the Tribes of meon and Gad. Towards the West, marched those of Ephraim, with the Tribes of M nasses and Beniamin, the very least of all. And to the North, the Tribes of Dan, and Nepthaly. In the midst of these foure Battallions, marched the Priests and Leuites, bearing the Arke of the Couenant, and the Sacred vessels.

Each of these foure heads, or principall Conducters, Iuda, Ruben, Ephraim and Dan had a Colonell before his hoast and Battalion. The Colonell of the whole Armie was that of Iuda: Being D'Azur (c'est Bleu Celeste) au Lyon rampant d'Or.

The Colonells of the tribes described with their Armes and Colours, the 4. cheefe Leaders.

That of Ruben, De gueulles au Belic (c'est la couleur Rouge) a l'Homme armé d'Argent.

In Armes, there are no more then two Mettalles, Or & Argent, Gold and Siluer: And foure Colours, Azure, Gueulles, Synople & Sable, Blew, Red, Greene, & Black. Mettall vpon Mettall, and Colour vpon Colour, are false Armes, if they be not quartered: Otherwise, they are subiect to question, and are good, beeing priuiledged by Princes and Soueraigne Lordes, and giuen vnto particular men by graunt. If not, they are false, and deserue not the name of Armes, but of fooleries, and foppish deuises.

The other eight Tribes had their Standards, each answereable to the colour of his Colonell, but with different charge, agreeable to their greatnesse.

The standards of the other 8. tribes, & theyr Armes.

Isachar portoit d'Azur a l'Asne passant d'Argent.

And Zabulon, D'Azur au Nauire arme & fresté d'Argent.

They which were of Rubens Hoast, Simeon portoit de Gueulles, a deux Espees d'Argent en Sautour.

And Gad gaue likewise, De Gueulles a l'Espee d'Argent, mise en Pal, la pointe embas.

Vnder Ephraim was Manasses, Qui portoit de Sable au Sceptre Couronné d'Or: Because hee was the eldest sonne of the Patriarch Ioseph, and hee that had the first lotte in the Land of Promise. To him appertained the Royaltie and the Priesthood, whereof he was despoyled, because he had not honoured his father.

Beniamin portoit de Sable au Loup passant d'Argent.

Vnder the Tribe of Dan, was that of Aser: Qui portoit de Synople semé d'Espics de Bled d'Or.

And that of Nepthali, De Synople au Cerf sommé d'Or.

This is thus remarked by the Rabbines, in the place before alledged, and on the second Chapter of the booke of Numbers, and the first and second Verses. Loquutus Dominus ad Mosé & Aaron dicens, Singuli iuxta VEXILLVM suum, & sub SIGNIS domus Patrum suorum, castra ponant filij Israel, e Regione, & in circuitu Tabernaculi fœderis castra ponent. The Lord spake to Moses and Aaron, saying, Euery man of the Children of Israel, shall campe by his Standard, and vnder the Ensigne of their fathers house: farre off about the Tabernacle of the Congregation shall they pitch. Which passage they interprete by the nine and fortieth Chapter of Genesis, and by the third plate of their High Priest, garnished with twelue precious stones, and on each of them was engrauen the names, and the Armes of the Tribes of Israel.

They adde beside, that Iosuah hauing caused the children of Israel, to passe ouer the Flood Iordane dry foote, he procured euery one of them, to place a great Stone vpon the banke of the fayde Flood, at the highest boundes thereof, and on each of them was carued the Names and Armes of the twelue Tribes, to serue as a figurale memorie vnto posterite, of that myraculous passage. And those twelue Stones, about the time when our Sauiour Christ conuersed among men, serued as titles and proofes of Nobility among the Iewes, to declare their extraction.

The 12 stones on the bankes of Iordan, bearing the names and Armes of the Tribes.

Saint Iohn, speaketh of the like Stones, representing the peoples dissolute and depraued liues, in the third Chapter of Saint Matthews Gospell. Putchris ex Deo Abrahæ filios suscitare, God is able, euen of these stones, to raise vp children to Abraham.

Saul in like manner, appointed to bee King ouer the Children of Israel, tooke for the Armes of his kingdome, the Ensigne Colonell of the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof he was descended. And Dauid, being called in his place (as one worthier then hee) tooke that of the Tribe of Iuda, whereunto the Patriarch Iacob, had transferred the right of Elder-shippe, and the appurtenances of Royaltie and the Priesthoode, as it is saide in the nine and fortieth chapter of Genesis, the eight and nine verses. Iuda te laudabunt fratres tui, manus tua in cernicibus inimicorum tuorum, adorabunt te filij Patris tui. Thou Iuda, thy Brethren shall praise thee, thine hand shall bee in the necke of thine enemies, thy fathers sonnes shall bow downe vnto thee.

Dauid had the Armes of the Tribe of Iuda.

The same Patriarke, blazoning the Armes of his sonne Iuda (which the Rabbines deuise to bee D'Azur au Lyon rampant d'Or) saide: Iuda, requiescens accubuisti vt Leo, quis suscitabit eum? He shall couch downe as a Lyon, and as a Lyonnesse: who shall stirre him vp? Dauid taking the Lyon for his Armes, caused it to bee engrauen in his Signet or Seale Royall, yea, and on his monies, which helde in currant course, vntill the declination of the Iewish Estate, according as it is set downe by Rabbi Abraham, in his historicall Cabala.

Iudaes Armes blazoned by his Father.

These Armes were conserued by the great King Salomon, who blazoning on them in the thirtie Chapter of his Prouerbes, saith: That amongest all the Creatures on earth, there are three which doe exceede and surpasse the rest. Also hee compareth them to Princes, as thus: Tria sunt quæ bene gradiuntur, & quartum quod incidens fœliciter. Leo fortissimus bestiarum ad nullius Panebit occursum. Gallus succinctus lumbos, & Aries; Nec est Rex qui resistat ei. The Lyon, King of Beasts, hath alwayes beene the Symbole of Royaltie, for his Generositie, conioyned with his clemencie, neuer running on any Beast which is humble to him. In like manner, in a good Prince:

Pr. 30, 30, 31.

Hailli erunt artes,
Parcere subiectis, & debellare superbos.

In the verie height of his anger, hee qualifieth it of himselfe, so soone as a Lambe is present before him, the Symbole of mildenesse and clemencie. For this cause it was, that the Diuine Poet Du Bartas, made the Lyon a Schoolemaster to Princes, thus:

The Lyon a Schoolmaster to Princes.

You Kings whose hands are arm'd with Iustice sword,
Pardon the subiect, to Rebelles death afford.
The generous Lyons vertue imitate,
Who neuer frownes vpon a Soldier prostrate.

The Assyrians (as the same Rabbines affirme) being so called of Assur son to Belus, who conquered Chaldea (afterward named Assyria) from the descendants of Nemrod, the sonne of Chanaam; tooke for the Armes of their Monarchie, L'Estendard vert au Bel or d'Argent. Their money, stamped with a Ramme, had course throughout all the East, noted in the Scripture, in Genesis the three and thirtie Chapter, the nineteenth verse, and in the seuenth of the Actes of the Apostles, the sixteenth verse. In memorie of this Belus, represented by a Ramme, the Assyrians, Ægyptians, and other people of the East, did so reuerence that creature, as they durst not eate thereof. So we read in Genesis the sixt, the one and twenty verse, and the three and fortieth Chapter, the fiue and twentieth verse.

The Armes of the Assyrians Monarchie.

The same Assyrians, first Authors of Idolatrie, adored their Belus, whom they reputed for a God; and did as much to their Queene Semiramis, wife to Ninus, called Belochus, placing her among the number of their Gods, charging their Standards and Banners (signed with the Leopard and Ramme) D'vne Colombe Argentee aux aisles estendues sur le drappeau Iaune. And the selfe-same Colombe releuee d'Argent sur vne Escu de Sin Or, was the first Armes for search and enquirie after. Semiramis in the Assyrian language, signifieth a Fowle or Bird, which serued as an apt subiect to those idolatrous people, to ranke their Queene in number of their Gods, and to say, that after hir death he tooke her flight vp to heauen, with her husband Ninus. According as it is obserued by Diodorus Siculus, in the third booke of his Annales, and the fift Chapter.

Diod. Sicul. in Annal. l. 3. c. 3

The Standard of the Ægyptians.

Now although this might be a lying and false discourse: yet so it is, that the Holie Scripture remarketh and designeth the Assyrians by this Doue, as it doth the Ægyptians by the Vulture. For, the Ægyptians Portoient l'Estendard Iaune a l'Esprevier & Vautour de Sable. It was also engraven in the Seale Royall of Pharaoh, giuen to the Patriarch Ioseph. So say the Rabbines, vpon the one and forty Chapter of Genesis.

Ori Apol. in Trast. Sac. Egypt. Norm.

The Ægyptians called the Vulture a Bird, without any addition, as for Antonomasia and excellence: Because that among all the Fowles and Birds of prey, she is the most iust, imparting equally the prey, to the Fowles which follow her: so saith Orus Apollo in his Treatise De sacris Ægyptiorum notis: Plutarch termeth this Fowle an Innocent, because (saith he) it feedeth a man from being offended by other creatures. Moreouer, it is the most full of pitty to her young ones, of all other Fowles that are. For, in the space of sixe and twenty dayes, abiding with them for their nourishing, she neuer leaueth them: but if she want sustenance for them, she launceth her thigh with her beak, and draweth thence blood for their food and nourishment. In like manner, this Bird was vsed as the Symbole of Iustice and Piety, and many times of Royalty: to serue as a lesson or Lecture to Princes and Monarches, for being clement and kinde Fathers to their Subiects. So I say then, that the sacred Scriptures vnderstoode the Assyrians by the Doue, and the Ægyptians by the Vulture.

Ier. 25, 38.

The Prophet Ieremie in his twenty fiue chapter, verse thirty eight, threatning the Iewish people with the comming of Nabuchodonosor, saith, Dereliquit quasi Leo vmbraculum suum, quia facta est terra eorum in desolationem, a facie iræ Columbæ, & a facie iræ furoris eius. He hath forsaken his couert as the Lyon, for their land is desolate, because of the fiercenesse of the Oppressour, and because of his fierce anger. Nabuchodonosor was King of the Assyrians, as it is euident in Daniel, and the Kings of Iuda and of Israel, led captiue into Babylon, are remarked by the Lyon, Dereliquit Leo sub vmbraculum suum: Because that the Kings of the twelue Tribes (diuided in their Kingdomes) bare the like Armes as King Dauid had taken and appointed.

Ozea 11. 11.

The Prophet Ozea, speaking of the Assyrians, ioyned with the Ægyptians against the Iewish people, to bring them into seruitude and slauery, saith: Anolabunt quasi Auis ex Ægypto (by the Bird he meaneth the Vulture) et quasi Columba de terra Assyriorum. They shall tremble like a Bird out of Ægypt, and as a Doue out of the Land of Assyria. And the same Rabbines interprete literally this Verse of Dauid, Psalme 68. Si dormiatis inter medios cleros, pennæ Columbæ Deargentatæ & posteriora dorsi eius in pallore Auri. Though you haue lyen among the pots, you shall be as the wings of a Doue couered with siluer, and her feathers with yellow gold. Concerning the ouerthrowe of Senacherib King of the Assyrians, and of his Army, wherein the Angel of God slew in one night, an hundred fourescore and six thousand men, as it is in the fourth booke of the Kings.

Psal. 68, 13.

The Banner and Armes of the Persians.

The Persians carried a white Banner, Chargee d'vne Aigle d'Or Essloye & Couronné, which was their principall Ensigne, as it is written by Zonaras, in his first Booke, and nineteene Chapter. And according to Xenophon, in the expedition and institution of Cyrus, the seuenth booke. Erat ei signum aurea Aquila in longa hasta suspensa, & nunc etiam id insigne Persarum Regibus manet. And the Prophet Ozea in his eight Chapter. Est sicut Aquila, quæ perniciter volat, ascendet Rex cum copijs suis, & castrametabitur contra Sacrosanctum Templum Domini: Speaking of Nabuzaradan, Lieutenant Generall to the king of Persia (whom the holy Scripture vnderstandeth by the name of King, without addition) which ruined the Temple of God, the Pallace Royall, and the principall houses of Ierusalem into ashes: As it is written in the fourth Booke of the Kings, the last chapter. As yet they haue the Sagittarie, as much to say, as halfe a Horse, and halfe a man, drawing a Bowe to let flye an Arrow. This Sagittarie was the stampe of their Coyne, whereon Agesilaus alluding, complaineth in Plutarch, to haue beene chased from the conquest of Asia, by thirty thousand Archers to the King of Persia: that is to say, by thirtie thousand pieces of Gold, called Darickes, because on the one side they had Darius, and the Sagittarie on the other.

4. Reg. 25, 9.

Pieces of gold called Daricks the Coyne of Persia.

Alexander the Great, hauing transferred the Monarchie of the Medes and Persians to the Greekes, retained still the white Banner, the colour and Liuerie to the Kings of Persia (so saith Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes) which they had borrowed from them of Iuda and Israel, who went cloathed in White, according to the custome of great King

Plut. in vit. Artaxerxis.

King Salomon, who shewing himself publiquely, vsed to weare a long white Robe: as is written by Iosephus, in the eight Booke of his Iewish Antiquities, the second Chapter.

So the most Christian Kings of France, haue retained for their Colonell the colour White, bearing the Crosse and Bauldricke or Scarfe White, whereby the French are knowne in battaile from other Nations, that carry them Red, with a Crosse disguised in Saultour, vnfitly applyed to Saint Andrew, whose Crosse is to bee seene at Saint Victor of Marseilles, wholly resembling those whereon our Sauiour suffered, Saint Peter, and the other Apostles Martyrs.

The Armes of Alexander the Great.

Alexander retaining the White Liuerie, Symbole of Royaltie, and colour of the Diademe, tooke the Lyon rampant Gueulles for his Armes, forsaking the Kingly Eagle: and caused it to be engraven in his Seale Royall. An Armes, which (in his memorie) was borne by his successors, Kings of the Parthians, Medes, Ægyptians, and other Easterne Princes. Plutarch in the life of this Monarch writeth, that he tooke the Lion for his Armes, because his Father Phillip of Macedon, dreamed the first night of his marriage, that he set such a seale on his wife Olympia, as had a Lyon stamped or imprinted on it. This dreame might be true, yet it came so to passe neuertheless, that (long time before the birth of Alexander the Great, and of Cyrus King of Persia) their Empires had bin prophesied, That of the Persians, by a creature hauing the visage of a man, to demonstrate the clemency of Cyrus: That of the Greekes, by the figure of a Lyon: And that of the Romaines, by the Royall Eagle. According as it is reported by the Prophet Ezechiel in his first Chapter, enstructed by a Cherubin, which he called Chobar: Like as the Monarchy of the Assyrians (finished before) had bin represented by an Oxe.

Ezek. 1, 10.

The like was obserued in the Antiquities of young Phillip, King of Macedon, in the bignesse of a peece of three Blancks, or of a Carolus with the sword, where on the one side, was the head of the King with great bushy hayre not well combed: And on the other side, a King sitting in his chaire, leaning on a small Iaueline, and holding a Gripe or Vulture on his left fist, which serued to expresse the Antiquity of Hawking. Whereby the Rabbines vnderstood that passage in the Prophet Baruch, his third chapter. Vbi sunt Principes Gentium, & qui dominantur super bestias quæ sunt super terram? qui in Auibus Cæli ludunt. Where are the Princes of the Heathen, and such as ruled the beasts vpon the earth? That had their pastime with the Birds of the Ayre. But I thinke rather, that he meant the Bird, sacred among the Ægyptians, whereof we haue spoken before. Other Antiquities are yet also to be seene, and of the like bignesse, which bee of King Perseus, hauing an Eagle on the one side, and on the other a Squire on horseback, which is the Sagittarie. This may seeme to demonstrate, that these Kings (ouer and beside the Lyon) retained both the Eagle and the Sagittarie of the Persians, as wel as the Vulture or Bird of the Ægyptians.

A note for the Antiquitie of Hawking.

Bar. 3, 16, 17.

The Armes of the Romaine Empire.

The Romaines tooke for the Armes of their Empire and Monarchy, the Royall Eagle, and for their Liuerie the Colour Red, as Purple and Scarlet. Their Colonell and principall Standard, which they called Labarum, was of purple, made square in forme, round about engirt with a frindge of Gold, carried on a Pike; In longa hasta, and of the same fashion as the Banners are in our parish Churches. The Heraldes and Kings of Armes called the Colour Red by foure sundry names; as Cinabre, Belic, Gueulles, and Rich colour, by reason of his brightnesse. And allowed it not to be carried, but by the Romane Emperors onely, and Cæsars destined to the Empire: For others were not permitted to take it, but by their concession and priuiledge.

The Red Colour had four names.

Romain Kings carried the Eagle.

The Eagle was borne by Numa Pompilius, Seruius Tullius, and other Romaine Kings. Succession of times inducted the Minotaur, the Wolfe, the Horse, the Swine or Bore. These foure beasts serued for Ensignes and Standards to the Legions and Cohortes of the Romaines, vntill the time of Caius Marius, who abolished the vse of them altogether, leauing the Eagle alone by it selfe, as is obserued by Plinie, in the tenth Booke of his naturall Historie, and the third Chapter. Romanis Legionibus Aquilam Caius Marius in secundo Consolatu suo proprie dicauit. Erat & ante prima, cum quatuor alijs, Lupi, Minotauri, Equi, Apri, quæ singulos Ordines anteibant. Paucis ante Aquila, sola portari in aciem cœperat, relinqua in castris relinquebantur, Marius in totum ea abscidit.

Plin. in Hist. nat. lib. 10. c. 3

Iulius Cæsar, Augustus, and their descending Emperors, Portoient de Gueulles a l'Aigle d'Or, aux aisles estendues, & a la teste Tesse. Constantine the Great, hauing parted in twain (as

(as it were) the Roman Empire, into that of the East, and that of the West, transforming from Rome to Bizantium, although it was the Emperiall Seate: yet he called it Constantinople, by his owne name, leauing an Exarc or Vice-Emperour as Lieutenant General at Rome, for guard and conseruation of the West. The Romane Eagle was then painted with two heads circled, which some termed Desplayed, and remained in common, as much to say, As Armes to the one and other Empire. Vntill the yeare of Grace, eight hundred and one, when King Charlemaigne (hauing by his valour wonne and conquered Italy) was crowned Emperor of the West, and honoured as he was of the Romaines, after the manner of the ancient Emperors. And for a more signale note, he wonne the Empire to the French (with deere expence of their blood) retaining in his Armes the Mettall and Colour of France, D'Azur al'Aigle a deux Testes Esployé d'Or. A heauy burthen on the stomeckes of numberlesse French, how it should bee so then, and Armes remayning for them too of the Empire, so farre as to the house of Saxon in Germany, who carried of their Mettall and Colour, namely, D'Or al'Aigle Esployé de Sable.

King Charlemagne, crowned Emperor of the West.

By the example of Princes and Monarches, their subiects and seruants (neerest to their persons) made themselues separate and distinguished from others, by titles of Nobilitie and Armes, which conserued their Families, and makes them to appeare aboue the common people. For, seeing that Vertue and Vice haue concurred from all times, and they do best distinguish their Louers, by contrarie Liueries to them here meant, euen as white from blacker It is no more then reason, that the Noble and Vertuous (by Blazons and Deuises) should be discerned from the vulgar. Moreouer, of those Nobles, the distinction is to be knowne by diuersitie of Armes, according to their inclination, and good or bad breeding. This is that which the Prince of Poets hath learnedly noted, of Nobleby Extraction, Science, and Learning, in his second Royall Boscage.

Of Nobility by discent, vertue, and Learning.

Celuy qui desiroit de monstrer sa Vertu,
Portoit sur le Harnois dont il estoit vestu
Ou dessus son Bouclier vne Recognissance,
Afin que par la presse on congneust sa Vaillance.
L'vn auoit vn Serpent, l'autre auoit vn Lyon,
Vn Aigle, vn Leopard. Ainsi vn Million
Par les Siecles passez D'Enseignes sont venuës,
Que les Races depuis pour marque ont retenues,
Escussons, & Blasons de leurs premiers Ayeulx,
Que la Guerre ennoblit parfaict Victorieux.

He that desires to shew his Vertue cleare,
Beares on the Armour he doth vse to weare,
Or on his Shield, a plaine Recognisance;
That thickest crowdes may know his Valiance.
One beares a Serpent; Other, hath a Lion,
Eagle, or Leopard: And so a million
(From Ages past) of Enseignes haue beene gain'd,
Which (afterward) their Races still retain'd
From their Fore-fathers; Scutcheons and Blazons knowne, Victoriously by Warre ennobled for their owne.

Then it is a popular errour, to say, that the inuention of Armes, of Blazons and Deuises, appeared not vntil within fiue hundred yeeres, and the Voyages to the East, for Conquest of the Holy Land, Religiously attempted by many famous persons: Because (in all times) their vse is made manifest, and practised by Nations, furthest of all other from our knowledge, as the Inhabitants of the Easterne Isles.

The vse of Armes, practised at al times, and by people furthest from vs.

Those people, at the Funeralles of their Tyrans Kings and great Lords, caused to be born before their bodies, the notes of Honour and the Trophees, which they had wonne and brought from their enemies in warre. Those Honours and Trophees were carried in the saide Funeralles, by Knights most apparant in Valiance and Nobilitie. And to this effect, exactly they kept the practise and vse of Armes and Blazons, conserued to their Families, and carried them to the enterring of their dead. So writeth Iosephus Acosta, in his fifte Booke Booke of the Naturall historie of the Indians, and the eight Chapter.

In the fourth Chapter of the same Booke, we learne by him, that the Kings of Peru carried in Armes, Vne Arc en Ciel, auecques deux Coulenures estendues aux costes d'iceluy.

The Armes of the Kinges of Peru.

That the Kings of Mexico carried for their Deuise, Vne Main tenant vne poignee de fleches de Roseaux, in remembrance and memorie of the first King of Mexico, named Acamapixtli, which signifieth in the Mexicane language, A handfull of Reeds.

That the Citie of Mexico Tenuchtitlan, had for her Armes; Vne Aigle Royale aux aisles, Esployees, & la Teste eslaue regardant Soleil, comme pour receuoir sa chalcur, ayant vne bel Oyseau de Proye, vne de ses serres, & de l'autre plante sur vne Tunal, & Pierre relegue. Because that in such a posture, this Bird was found, and in the place where the Capitall Citie of Mexico was builded, now named New Spaine: As the said Acosta affirmeth in the same Booke, and the seuenth Chapter.

The Citie, Armes of Mexico.

The Tlaxcalans, conjured enemies to them of Mexico, bare in their Standard & Banner, Vne Grue d'Or estendant ses aisles. And this was their Armes, as it is reported in the life of Ferdinando Cortese, who vanquished the Mexicanes, and conquered their chiefe City, in Nouember, 1519. And the great Standard of the same Mexicanes, when the King himselfe in person marched to the field; Portoit vne Griffon Furieux deschirant vn Tigre, qu'il tenoit soubs ses serres. A deuise erected ouer the gates of the Palace, belonging to the saide Kings of Mexico.

In lib. 7. Per. Cor. Cap. 17.

But what neede is there, of crossing ouer so many Seas, for this Antiquitie of Armes, and to go seeke it so farre off? We haue it at our owne doores, in regard that the Auncestors of the Gaules and French, carried for their ancient Deuise, the Ship.

The ancient deuice of the Gaules and French.

Cornelius Tacitus, describing the Customes of the Germaines (being but badly informed of their Religion) hauing seene, or heard by report, from such as had beene in the voyage of Germanie, that a Ship was figured in their Temples and Ensignes; immediatly he conceyued, that they adored the Goddesse Isis. Pars Suevorum & Isidi sacrificat. Vnde causa, & origo peregrina sacro parum compert, nisi quod ipsum Signum in modum Liburnicæ figuratum, docet aduectam Religionem.

The errour & mistaking of Tacitus.

The men of Suaba, neighbours to the Francs Sicambrians, dwelling in the Marshes of Westphalia, Cleue, & Guelderland, with Gulich, obserued the same Religion, Customes, and Policie, as the Gaules did. And as those two Nations were one selfe same people: euen so they retained (carefully) the figure of the Shippe, which Tacitus (in his language) tearmeth Liburnicall, in memorie of the passage which their Ancestours made from Asia into Europe, vnder the conduct of their Prince Gomer,

For by the same suiect, the ancient money of the Gaules and Germanes, were of two fashions and stampes on both sides. The one with a Lyon, Armes proper to Prince Gomer (the Gaules Hercules) on the one side; and on the other an Altar, with the number of LXIIII. which represented the sixtie and foure Prouinces of the Gauls (that extended themselues so farre as Rhine) mentioned by Tacitus, in the third Booke of his Annales, At Roma non Treuiros modo, sed quatuor & sexaginta ciuitates Galliarum defecisse videbantur: And thus he saw (of Antiquities) a like number on the backe side, and his figure on the other, stamped vnder the name of the Emperor Antoninus. And Strabo in the 4. booke of his Geography, and Dion in his 54. booke, vnderstood the Altar to be prepared in the City of Lyons, whereof Iuuenal thus saith:

The Ancient Coynes of the Gaules and Germaines.

Aut Lugdunenses Rhetan dicturus in Aram.

This should bee interpreted of the generall Altare of the Gaules, prouided stable and permanent by the Druides, within their sacred wood at the mountaine of Chartres, dedicated to the holy Virgin, that should bring forth the fruite of life.

The other kinde of Coine, had a Shippe on the one side, and a Head on the other, figuring the Image of the Patriarke Noah, or of his youngest sonne Gomer. A kinde of money brought into Italy by the first Gaules, when they went thither, and possessed it. Neuertheless, the Romaines enuying the glorie and fame of the Gaules; reserre the inuention thereof to their King Janus Bifrons. So saith Ouid in the first of his Fastes.

The description of the other Coyne.

At bona Pallenæis posuere Palatia Tectis
Hospitis aduentum testificata Dei.

Ouid in Lib. 1. de Fastis.

Speaking of a voyage which Saturne made to vs, the Romaines hauing retayned some shadow of Gomers passage to the Gaules, obscured (neuertheless) with lyes and fables: but the Gaules being possessed of Italy by their Coine, brought the knowledge to this this apparant passage. So the ancient Gaules had a sport, which they tearmed Head or Ship: for by putting one of those peeces into a Bonnet, and then (casting them both aloft) asked them which they would haue, Head or Ship, Caput aut Nauem. After the manner of a pastime, retained to this present day, by the name of Crosse or Pile.

Tacitus taxed with ignorance, in matters of great moment.

So Tacitus (shallowly informed) seeing some figure of Frigates and Shippes, with the Gaules and Germaines, equiuocated, by interpreting them of another sort, because hee would not seeme to be deceyued. Also he is constrained to confesse his ignorance, Ignarum comperisse, by not hauing discouered the subiect of such paintings. But as if hee had bene in Ægypt, he thought (seeing this) that it was the Hieroglyphicke of the Goddesse Isis, whom the Romaines vnderstood, Per peregrinum sacrum, because shee was brought to them out of Syria, and called Deum Syriam. Of whom Apuleius (in his Milesians) describeth the worship and Ceremonies, as we haue learned by Methodius, Latinus Pacatus, Sidonius Apollinaris, Beatus Rhenanus, and others. Non in signum aduectæ Religionis, as Tacitus beleeued: but, In memoriam huc aduectæ a Nationis Gallicanæ, by the passage of Gomer and his children, out of Asia into Europe.

Apul. in Milef. Methodius. Latin. Pacatus Sid. Apolinaris Beat. Rhenan.

The Citie of Paris (built in the yeare of the World, 2981. the first of Abezan of Bethleem, Iudge of Israel, successor to Ieptah, 1325. yeares after the Flood; and before the foundation of Rome, 199. yeares, according to the testimony of Learned Genebrardus, Archbyshop of Aix in Prouence, in the first book of his Chronologie:) A retenu pour son Armes le Nauire d'Argent Frette & Arme en Champ de Gueulles, as the Metropolitan of the French Nation.

Genebrard. in Chron. Lib. 1.

Some haue written, that Phillip Augustus, second of that name, called Gods Gift, & the Conquerour, was the first inuenter of the Lord Maior and Sheriffes in the Citie of Paris, for which he had not any reason or apparance whatsoeuer. For, could it be credible, that so goodly a Cittie, the dwelling place of our Kings, euen from the first and second Lyne, should be without a Body, and Officers fit for the same. Considering, that in the Capitularies of Charlemaigne and his Children, mention is made (in many places) De Scabinis, of Sheriffes, who were as Gouernours and Iudges Politicke, in the best Townes of France.

Lord Maior & Sheriffes in the City of Paris.

In the like errour are they, who report, that the Armes of the Ship were giuen to the said City of Paris, by the same Phillip Augustus. Considering, that from the time of the ancient Druides, the Ship had beene an Ensigne, of the said Citie of Parisians. It may be, for the reason alledged by Stephen Pasquier (treating on the same subiect) that the first limits of that great Cittie, represented the forme and figure of a Ship. For Paris, at her beginning, was no other then a Castle of pleasure, built (for the delight of Hunting) by the first Gaulish Kings, where (at this present) is the Pallace.

Afterward, the inhabitants chose their dwelling within the Isle shaped by Sein, which (in her situation) figureth the forme of a Ship, being large, and like to a Ship in her poop and hindmost part: where is erected the Cathedrall Church, her Cloysters, the Bishops Pallace, with the Hospitall. And the Prowe pointeth to the end of the Pallace Garden, now ioyning to Pont-Neuf, and full of houses, enclosing the Cittie, and liuely figuring the forme of a Ship: which among the Ægyptians, was the Hieroglyphicke of Soueraigne Power, the marke or Symbole of command and preheminence: And so Paris (by good right) is called, The Queene of Cities.

Affris, Lunaque prior, tua robore & armis,
Et reliquas Vrbes consilio superat.

The Germains are all (almost) descended of one Countrie, were neuertheless distinguished by their Armes the Lyon, but yet by diuers Blazons.

The verie greatest part of the Germaine Nations, albeit all (well neere) descended of

For the Francs or French, Le portoient d'Or en champ d'Azur.

The Gothes, Ostrogothes, and Visigothes, Le portoient d'Or en champ de Gueulles. And they that dwelt in Spaine, Le portoient de Sable en champ d'Argent.

Paradine writeth, that the ancient Bourgongnons (in like manner, issued and descended from Germanie, and of whom the Noble Romaine Tacitus maketh mention in his Germania) Portoient en Armes le Lyon de Sable en champ d'Argent. Wee shall shew the contrary, and the same of the Gothes in Spaine.

They of Denmarke, Portoient trois de Lyons de Sable passant l'vne sur l'autre, to shew their Balticke Sea as their descente.

Method. in lib. 4. cap. 19.

The Cymbrians had the Bull for their Ensigne, and they made one of Mettall, which they caused to be carried on a Pike in the front of their Armie. They would sweare by it (saith Plutarch in the life of Marius) and this people being subdued by the Consull Catullus Luctatius, the Bull was carried home to his house, as a note of the victorie which he had ouer them.

Plutarc. in vit. Cai. Mar.

We will conclude this Chapter of Armes and Blazons, with acknowledging and distinguishing the eldest sonnes from the yonger and inferiour.

The Eldest are knowne and discerned from the other, by the plaine Paternall Armes, without any Brisure whatsoeuer, except the Father gaue them so.

Eldest sonnes giue their Fathers Armes, without any difference.

It is ordinarily seene in illustrious and most Noble Houses, that the second son quartereth the Fathers Armes with them of his Mother. But this occasioneth confusion to their descent and Linage, if they haue store of masle children.

Others diuersifie and varie in the Chiefe, or else in the first quarter and Canton of the Chiefe, which is tearmed of Honor: Or else, Partissent, Flancquent, Entent en Poincte, ou mettent sur le tout.

The Canton of Honor.

But the most certaine knowledge is made by Brisures, so farre as to the seuenth generation, the end of all Parentage.

The extens of generation.

It is an assured Rule, that among Masles, the eldest acknowledgeth himselfe, & he ought to be acknowledged by his Father Armes: If he be not otherwise stipuled by Contracts of marriage, of donation, or of substitution, which doe extend so farre, as to the fourth degree.

The eldest beareth his fathers Armes

And if all the Masles would beare the Fathers Armes: they ought to bee distinguished according to degree of birth, or primogeniture, by Brisures.

For the second sonne, Doit porter le Lambeau de trois pieces: which is to be vnderstood, of Mettall or Colour, and which also ought to be obserued in all other Brisure.

Distinction for the seuerall sonnes in order

The third sonne, Vne simple Bordure.

The fourth, L'Orle.

The fift, Le Baston.

And the sixt, Le Bande.

If there be any more: the Chiefe, the first or last Canton of the Chiefe, or else, L'Ente en Poincte, will serue to be remarked.

The Assaillants or Challengers of all the younger thus borne, must bee acknowledged by Doubles Brisures.

How Challengers are to be acknowledged in their degrees.

In regard that the eldest sonne issued of the second, ought to retaine and beare the Fathers Armes: Auecques leur Brisure, le Lambeau de trois pieces en Chef.

The second, Le Lambeau de quatre pieces en Chef.

The third, Pareil Lambeau mouuant de Chef.

And the fourth, Pareil Lambeau chargé selon sa fantasie d'Aigles, Lyons, Croissants, Roses Aleryons, Merletes, ou Diapre.

The second sonne issuing of the first third, Portera la Bordure engreslee.

The third, Chargee de Besans, ou Torteaux.

The fourth, La Bordure Componee.

The next, Endentee, or Endenchee.

And the rest (if there be any more) Chargee de Annelets, partie de l'vn en l'autre, ou bien le Simple, ou le Double Essonier & Trescheur.

The second sonne issuing of the first fourth: L'Orle, which his descendants and he may diuersifie: d'Eschiquette, Pale, Conterpale, Lozange, Frette, Fusille, Faisses, Contre-Faisse, Pairle, Viure, Cheuronne, Contre Cheuronne, Verse, Contre verse, or charged with the before named Beasts, with Pannes, Macles, Molettes, Estoiles ou de Rustres, or other varieties which may be put into Armes.

Diuersitie of charges for their best distinguishing.

The second sonne of the first fift, and his descendants, may charge and varrie Le Baston, as hath bin said before, and the like.

Of the second sonne, and his Assayllants of the first sixe: A la Band, which may bee Coticee, Iumelee, Bretessee, Fewillee de Six, Componee, Endenchee, ou chargee d'Animaux ou de Pannes

But it is to be held for a Rule, and an infallible Maxime in Armes, and the noble Art of or foure Corps d'Armees.

The 4 battalions of the tribes of Israel

The Banner of the Tribe of Iuda, which marched in the head of the Hoast, and w the Collonell, had vnder it the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon, holding to the Eaſt pa The hoast of Reuben encampeth themſelues South, being followed by the Tribes of meon and Gad. Towards the West, marched thoſe of Ephraim, with the Tribes of Ma naſſes and Beniamin, the very leaſt of all. And to the North, the Tribes of Dan and Nepthaly. In the midſt of theſe foure Battallions, marched the Prieſts and Leuites bearing the Arke of the Couenant, and the Sacred veſſels.

Each of theſe foure heads, or principall Conducters, Iuda, Ruben, Ephraim, and Dan had a Colonell before his hoaſt and Battalion. The Colonell of the whole Armie was that of Iuda: Being D'Azur (c'eſt Bleu Celeſte) au Lyon rampant d'Or.

The Colonels of the tribes deſcribed with their Armes and Colours, the 4. cheefe Leaders.

That of Ruben, De gueulles au Belic (c'eſt la couleur Rouge) a l'Homme armé d'Argent.

And Danne, hee likewiſe, portoit Synople (c'eſt Verd) au Serpent Dragonné d'Argent.

In Armes, there are no more then two Mettalles, Or & Argent, Gold and Silver: And foure Colours, Azure, Gueulles, Synople & Sable, Blew, Red, Greene, & Black. Mettall vpon Mettall, and Colour vpon Colour, are falſe Armes, if they be not quartered: Otherwiſe, they are ſubiect to queſtion, and are good, beeing priuiledged by Princes and Soueraigne Lordes, and giuen vnto particular men by graunt. If not, they are falſe, and deſerue not the name of Armes, but of fooleries, and foppiſh deuiſes.

The other eight Tribes had their Standards, each anſwereable to the colour of his Colonell, but with different charge, agreeable to their greatneſſe.

The ſtandards of the other 8. tribes, & theyr Armes.

Iſachar portoit d'Azur a l'Aſne paſſant d'Argent.

And Zabulon, D'Azur au Nauire arme & frette d'Argent.

They which were of Rubens Hoaſt, Simeon portoit de Gueulles, a deux Eſpees d'Argent en Sautour.

And Gad gaue likewiſe, De Gueulles a l'Eſpee d'Argent, miſe en Pal, la point en bas.

Vnder Ephraim was Manaſſes, Qui portoit de Sable au Scepter Couronné d'Or: Becauſe hee was the eldeſt ſonne of the Patriarch Ioſeph, and hee that had the firſt lotte in the Land of Promiſe. To him appertained the Royaltie and the Prieſthood, whereof he was deſpoyled, becauſe he had not honoured his father.

Beniamin portoit de Sable au Loup paſſant d'Argent.

Vnder the Tribe of Dan, was that of Aſer: Qui portoit de Synople ſeme d'Eſpics de Bled d'Or.

And that of Nepthali, De Synople au Cerf ſomme d'Or.

This is thus remarked by the Rabbines, in the place before alledged, and on the ſecond Chapter of the booke of Numbers, and the firſt and ſecond Verſes. Loquutuſq; Dominus ad Moſe & Aarone dicens, Singuli iuxta VEXILLVM ſuum, & ſub SIGNIS domus Patrum ſuorum, caſtra ponant filij Iſrael, e regione, & in circuitu Tabernaculi fœderis caſtra ponent. The Lord ſpake to Moſes and Aaron, ſaying, Euery man of the Children of Iſrael, ſhall campe by his Standard, and vnder the Enſigne of their fathers houſe: farre off about the Tabernacle of the Congregation ſhall they pitch. Which paſſage they interprete by the nine and fortieth Chapter of Geneſis, and by the firſt plate of their High Prieſt, garniſhed with twelue precious ſtones, and on each of them was engraien the names, and the Armes of the Tribes of Iſrael.

They adde beſide, that Ioſuah hauing cauſed the children of Iſrael, to paſſe ouer the Flood Iordane dry foote, he procured euery one of them, to place a great Stone vpon the banke of the ſayde Flood, at the higheſt boundes thereof, and on each of them was carued the Names and Armes of the twelue Tribes, to ſerue as a ſignale or memorie vnto poſterities, of that myraculous paſſage. And thoſe twelue Stones, about the time when our Sauiour Chriſt conuerſed among men, ſerued as titles and proofes of Nobility among the Iewes, to declare their extraction.

The 12 ſtones on the bankes of Iordan, bearing the names and Armes of the Tribes.

Saint Iohn, ſpeaketh of the ſame Stones, repreſenting the peoples diſſolute and depraued liues, in the third Chapter of Saint Matthewes Goſpell. Poteris eſt Deus de lapidibus iſtis ſuſcitare filios Abrahæ. God is able, euen of theſe ſtones, to raiſe vp children to Abraham.

Saul in like manner, appointed to bee King ouer the Children of Iſrael, tooke for the Armes of his kingdome, the Enſigne Colonell of the Tribe of Beniamin, whereof he was deſcended. And Dauid, being called in his place (as one worthier then hee) tooke that of the Tribe of Iuda, whereunto the Patriarch Iacob, had transferred the right of Elder-ſhippe, and the appurtenances of Royaltie and the Prieſthoode, as it is ſaide in the nine and fortieth chapter of Geneſis, the eight and nine verſes. Iuda te laudabunt fratres tui, manus tua in cernicibus inimicorum tuorum, adorabunt te filij Patris tui. Thou Iuda, thy Brethren ſhall praiſe thee, thine hand ſhall bee in the necke of thine enemies, thy fathers ſonnes ſhall bow downe vnto thee.

Dauid had the Armes of the Tribe of Iuda.

The ſame Patriarke, blazoning the Armes of his ſonne Iuda (which the Rabbines deuiſe to bee D'Azur au Lyon rampant d'Or) ſaide: Iuda, requieſcens accubuiſti vt Leo, quis ſuſcitabit eum? He ſhall couch downe as a Lyon, and as a Lyonneſſe: who ſhall ſtirre him vp? Dauid taking the Lyon for his Armes, cauſed it to bee engraien in his Signet or Seale Royall, yea, and on his monies, which helde in currant courſe, vntill the declination of the Iewiſh Eſtate, according as it is ſet downe by Rabbi Abraham, in his hiſtoricall Cabala.

Iudaes Armes blazoned by his Father.

Theſe Armes were conſerued by the great King Salomon, who blazoning on them in the thirtie Chapter of his Prouerbes, ſaith: That amongeſt all the Creatures on earth, there are three which doe exceede and ſurpaſſe the reſt. Alſo hee compareth them to Princes, as thus: Tria ſunt quæ bene gradiuntur, & quartum quod incidet feliciter. Leo fortiſſimus beſtiarum ad nullius pauebit occurſum. Gallus ſuccinctus lumbos, & Aries; Nec eſt Rex qui reſiſtat ei. The Lyon, King of Beaſts, hath alwayes beene the Symbole of Royaltie, for his Generoſitie, conioyned with his clemencie, neuer running on any Beaſt which is humble to him. In like manner, in a good Prince: Pr. 30, 30, 31.

Hailli erunt artes,
Parcere ſubiectis, & debellare ſuperbos.

In the verie height of his anger, hee qualifieth it of himſelfe, ſo ſoone as a Lambe is preſent before him, the Symbole of mildeneſſe and clemencie. For this cauſe it was, that the Diuine Poet Du Bartas, made the Lyon a Schoolemaſter to Princes, thus: The Lyon a Schoolmaſter to Princes.

You Kings whoſe hands are arm'd with Iuſtice ſword, Pardon the ſubiect, to Rebelles death afford.
The generous Lyons vertue imitate,
Who neuer frownes vpon a Soldier proſtrate.

The Aſſyrians (as the ſame Rabbines affirme) being ſo called of Aſſur ſon to Belus, who conquered Chaldea (afterward named Aſſyria) from the deſcendants of Nemrod, the ſonne of Chanaam; tooke for the Armes of their Monarchie, L'Eſtendard verd au Belier d'Argent. Their money, ſtamped with a Ramme, had courſe throughout all the Eaſt, noted in the Scripture, in Geneſis the three and thirtie Chapter, the nineteenth verſe, and in the ſeuenth of the Actes of the Apoſtles, the ſixteenth verſe. In memorie of this Belus, repreſented by a Ramme, the Aſſyrians, Ægyptians, and other people of the Eaſt, did ſo reuerence that creature, as they durſt not eare thereof. So we read in Geneſis the ſixt, the one and twenty verſe, and the three and fortieth Chapter, the fiue and twentieth verſe. The Armes of the Aſſyrians Monarchie.

The ſame Aſſyrians, firſt Authors of Idolatrie, adored their Belus, whom they reputed for a God; and did as much to their Queene Semiramis, wife to Ninus, called Belochus, placing her among the number of their Gods, charging their Standards and Banners (ſigned with the Leopard and Ramme) D'vne Colombe Argentee aux aiſles eſtendues ſur le drappeau Iaune. And the ſelfe-ſame Colombe releuee d'Argent ſur vne Eſcu de Sin Or, was the firſt Armes for ſearch and enquirie after. Semiramis in the Aſſyrian language, ſignifieth a Fowle or Bird, which ſerued as an apt ſubiect to thoſe idolatrous people, to ranke their Queene in number of their Gods, and to ſay, that after hir death ſhe tooke her flight vp to heauen, with her husband Ninus. According as it is obſerued by Diodorus Siculus, in the third booke of his Annales, and the fift Chapter. Diod. Sicul. in Annal. l. 3. c. 1.

Now although this might be a lying and falſe diſcourſe: yet ſo it is, that the Holie Scripture remarketh and deſigneth the Aſſyrians by this Doue, as it doth the Ægyptians by the Vulture. For, the Ægyptians Portoient l'Eſtendard iaune a l'Eſprenier & Vautour de Sable. It was alſo engrauen in the Seale Royall of Pharaoh, giuen to the Patriarch Ioſeph. So ſay the Rabbines, vpon the one and forty Chapter of Geneſis.

The standard of the Ægyptians.

The Ægyptians called the Vulture a Bird, without any addition, as for Antonomaſia and excellence: Becauſe that among all the Fowles and Birds of prey, ſhe is the moſt iuſt, imparting equally the prey, to the Fowles which follow her: ſo ſaith Orus Apollo in his Treatiſe De ſacris Ægyptiorum notis: Plutarch termeth this Fowle an Innocent, becauſe (ſaith he) it freeth a man from being offended by other creatures. Moreouer, it is the moſt full of pitty to her young ones, of all other Fowles that are. For, in the ſpace of ſixe and twenty dayes, abiding with them for their nouriſhing, ſhe neuer leaueth them: but if ſhe want ſuſtenance for them, ſhe launceth her thigh with her beak, and draweth thence blood for their food and nouriſhment. In like manner, this Bird was vſed as the Symbole of Iuſtice and Piety, and many times of Royalty: to ſerue as a leſſon or Lecture to Princes and Monarches, for being clement and kinde Fathers to their Subiects. So I ſay then, that the ſacred Scriptures vnderſtoode the Aſſyrians by the Doue, and the Ægyptians by the Vulture.

Orus Apol. in Tract. Sac. Egypt. Notis.

A Fowle more kinde to her broode, then many Nurſes to their Children.

The Prophet Ieremie in his twenty fiue chapter, verſe thirty eight, threatning the Iewiſh people with the comming of Nabuchodonoſor, ſaith, Dereliquit quaſi Leo vmbraculum ſuum, quia facta eſt terra eorum in deſolationem, a facie iræ Columbæ, & a facie iræ furoris eius. He hath forſaken his couert as the Lyon, for their land is deſolate, becauſe of the fiercenеſſe of the Oppreſſour, and becauſe of his fierce anger. Nabuchodonoſor was King of the Aſſyrians, as it is euident in Daniel, and the Kings of Iuda and of Iſrael, led captiue into Babylon, are remarked by the Lyon, Dereliquit Leo ſub vmbraculum ſuum: Becauſe that the Kings of the twelue Tribes (diuided in their Kingdomes) bare the like Armes as King Dauid had taken and appointed.

Ier. 25, 38.

The Prophet Oſea, ſpeaking of the Aſſyrians, ioyned with the Ægyptians againſt the Iewiſh people, to bring them into ſeruitude and ſlauery, ſaith: Anolabunt quaſi Auis ex Ægypto (by the Bird he meaneth the Vulture) et quaſi Columba de terra Aſſyriorum. They ſhall tremble like a Bird out of Ægypt, and as a Doue out of the Land of Aſſyria. And the ſame Rabbines interprete literally this Verſicle of Dauid, Pſalme 68. Si dormiatis inter medios cleros, pennæ Columbæ Deargentatæ & poſteriora dorſi eius in pallori Auri. Though you haue lyen among the pots, you ſhall be as the wings of a Doue couered with ſiluer, and her feathers with yellow gold. Concerning the ouerthrowe of Senacherib King of the Aſſyrians, and of his Army, wherein the Angel of God ſlew in one night, an hundred foureſcore and ſix thouſand men, as it is in the fourth booke of the Kings.

The Banner and Armes of the Perſians.

The Perſians carried a white Banner, Chargee d'vne Aigle d'Or Eſploye & Couronné, which was their principall Enſigne, as it is written by Zonarus, in his firſt Booke, and nineteene Chapter. And according to Xenophon, in the expedition and inſtitution of Cyrus, the ſeuenth booke. Erat ei ſignum aurea Aquila in longa haſta ſuſpenſa, & nunc etiam id inſigne Perſarum Regibus manet. And the Prophet Oſea in his eight Chapter. Ecce ſicut Aquila, quæ pernicitur volat, aſcendet Rex cum copijs ſuis, & caſtrametabitur contra Sacroſanctum Templum Domini: Speaking of Nabuzaradan, Lieutenant Generall to the king of Perſia (whom the holy Scripture vnderſtandeth by the name of King, without addition) which ruined the Temple of God, the Pallace Royall, and the principall houſes of Ieruſalem into aſhes: As it is written in the fourth Booke of the Kings, the laſt chapter. As yet they haue the Sagittarie, as much to ſay, as halfe a Horſe, and halfe a man, drawing a Bowe to let flye an Arrow. This Sagittarie was the ſtampe of their Coyne, whereon Ageſilaus alluding, complaineth in Plutarch, to haue beene chaſed from the conqueſt of Aſia, by thirty thouſand Archers to the King of Perſia: that is to ſay, by thirtie thouſand pieces of Gold, called Darickes, becauſe on the one ſide they had Darius, and the Sagittarie on the other.

4 Reg. 25, 9.

Pieces of gold called Daricks the Coyne of Perſia.

Alexander the Great, hauing transferred the Monarchie of the Medes and Perſians to the Greekes, retained ſtill the white Banner, the colour and Liuerie to the Kings of Perſia (ſo ſaith Plutarch, in the life of Artaxerxes) which they had borrowed from them of Iuda and Iſrael, who went cloathed in White, according to the cuſtome of great King

Plut. in vit. Artaxerxis.

King Salomon, who ſhewing himſelfe publiquely, vſed to weare a long white Robe: as is written by Ioſephus, in the eight Booke of his Iewiſh Antiquities, the ſecond Chapter.

Ioſeph. in Antiq. Iudaic. l. 8. c. 2

So the moſt Chriſtian Kings of France, haue retained for their Colonell the colour White, bearing the Croſſe and Bauldricke or Scarfe White, whereby the French are knowne in battaile from other Nations, that carry them Red, with a Croſſe diſguiſed in Saultour, vnfitly applyed to Saint Andrew, whoſe Croſſe is to bee ſeene at Saint Victor of Marſeilles, wholly reſembling thoſe whereon our Sauiour ſuffered, Saint Peter, and the other Apoſtles Martyrs.

Alexander retaining the White Liuerie, Symbole of Royaltie, and colour of the Diademe, tooke the Lyon rampant Gueulles for his Armes, forſaking the Kingly Eagle: and cauſed it to be engrauen in his Seale Royall. An Armes, which (in his memorie) was borne by his ſucceſſors, Kings of the Parthians, Medes, Ægyptians, and other Eaſterne Princes. Plutarch in the life of this Monarch writeth, that he tooke the Lion for his Armes, becauſe his Father Phillip of Macedon, dreamed the firſt night of his marriage, that he ſet ſuch a ſeale on his wife Olympia, as had a Lyon ſtamped or imprinted on it. This dreame might be true, yet it came ſo to paſſe neuertheleſſe, that (long time before the birth of Alexander the Great, and of Cyrus King of Perſia) their Empires had bin propheſied, That of the Perſians, by a creature hauing the viſage of a man, to demonſtrate the clemency of Cyrus: That of the Greekes, by the figure of a Lyon: And that of the Romaines, by the Royall Eagle. According as it is reported by the Prophet Ezechiel in his firſt Chapter, enſtructed by a Cherubin, which he called Chobar: Like as the Monarchy of the Aſſyrians (finiſhed before) had bin repreſented by an Oxe.

The Armes of Alexander the Great.

Ezek. 1, 10.

The like was obſerued in the Antiquities of young Phillip, King of Macedon, in the bigneſſe of a peece of three Blancks, or of a Carolus with the ſword, where on the one ſide, was the head of the King with great buſhy hayre not well combed: And on the other ſide, a King ſitting in his chaire, leaning on a ſmall Iaueline, and holding a Gripe or Vulture on his left fiſt, which ſerued to expreſſe the Antiquity of Hawking. Whereby the Rabbines vnderſtood that paſſage in the Prophet Baruch, his third chapter. Vbi ſunt Principes Gentium, & qui dominantur ſuper beſtias quæ ſunt ſuper terram? qui in Auibus Cæli ludunt. Where are the Princes of the Heathen, and ſuch as ruled the beaſts vpon the earth? That had their paſtime with the Birds of the Ayre. But I thinke rather, that he meant the Bird, ſacred among the Ægyptians, whereof we haue ſpoken before. Other Antiquities are yet alſo to be ſeene, and of the like bigneſſe, which bee of King Perſeus, hauing an Eagle on the one ſide, and on the other a Squire on horſeback, which is the Sagittarie. This may ſeeme to demonſtrate, that theſe Kings (ouer and beſide the Lyon) retained both the Eagle and the Sagittarie of the Perſians, as wel as the Vulture or Bird of the Ægyptians.

Bar. 3, 16, 17.

The Romaines tooke for the Armes of their Empire and Monarchy, the Royall Eagle, and for their Liuerie the Colour Red, as Purple and Scarlet. Their Colonell and principall Standard, which they called Labarum, was of purple, made ſquare in forme, round about engirt with a frindge of Gold, carried on a Pike; In longa haſta, and of the ſame faſhion as the Banners are in our pariſh Churches. The Heraldes and Kings of Armes called the Colour Red by foure ſundry names; as Cinabre, Belic, Gueulles, and Rich colour, by reaſon of his brightneſſe. And allowed it not to be carried, but by the Romane Emperors onely, and Ceſars deſtined to the Empire: For others were not permitted to take it, but by their conceſſion and priuiledge.

The Armes of the Romaine Empire.

The Red Colour had four names.

The Eagle was borne by Numa Pampilius, Seruius Tullius, and other Romaine Kings. Succeſſion of times inducted the Minotaur, the Wolfe, the Horſe, the Swine or Bore. Theſe foure beaſts ſerued for Enſignes and Standards to the Legions and Cohortes of the Romaines, vntill the time of Caius Marius, who aboliſhed the vſe of them altogether, leauing the Eagle alone by it ſelfe, as is obſerued by Pliny, in the tenth Booke of his naturall Hiſtorie, and the third Chapter. Romanis Legionibus Aquilam Caius Marius in ſecundo Conſolatu ſuo proprie dicauit. Erat & antea prima, cum quatuor alij, Lupi, Minotauri, Equi, Apri, quæ ſingulos Ordines anteibant. Paucis ante Aquila, ſola portari in aciem cœperat, relinqua in caſtris relinquebantur, Marius in totum ea abſtulit.

Plin. in Hiſt. nat. lib. 10. c. 3

Iulius Cæſar, Auguſtus, and their deſcending Emperors, Porterent de Gueulles a l'Aigle d'Or, aux aiſles eſtendues, & a la ſeule Teſte. Conſtantine the Great, hauing parted in twain (as

(as it were) the Roman Empire, into that of the East, and that of the West, transpor-from Rome to Bizantium, although it was the Emperiall Seate: yet he called it Conſtanople, by his owne name, leauing an Exarc or Vice-Emperour as Lieutenant Genera at Rome, for guard and conſeruation of the West. The Romane Eagle was then painted with two heads circled, which ſome termed Deſplayed, and remained in common, as much to ſay, As Armes to the one and other Empire. Vntill the yeare of Grace, eight hundred and one, when King Charlemaigne (hauing by his valour wonne and conquered Italy) was crowned Emperor of the West, and honoured as he was of the Romaines, after the manner of the ancient Emperors. And for a more ſignale note, he wonne the Empire to the French (with deere expence of their blood) retaining in his Armes the Mettall and Colour of France, D'Azur a l'Aigle a deux Teſtes Eſploye d'Or. A heauy burthen on the ſtomeckes of numberleſſe French, how it ſhould bee ſo then, and Armes remayning for them too of the Empire, ſo farre as to the houſe of Saxon in Germany, who carried of their Mettall and Colour, namely, D'Or a l'Aigle Eſploye de Sable.

King Charlemaigne, crowned Emperor of the West.

By the example of Princes and Monarches, their ſubiects and ſeruants (neereſt to their perſons) made themſelues ſeparate and diſtinguiſhed from others, by titles of Nobilitie and Armes, which conſerued their Families, and makes them to appeare aboue the common people. For, ſeeing that Vertue and Vice haue concurred from all times, and they do beſt diſtinguiſh their Louers, by contrarie Liueries to them here meant, euen as white from blacker It is no more then reaſon, that the Noble and Vertuous (by Blazons and Deuiſes) ſhould be diſcerned from the vulgar. Moreouer, of thoſe Nobles, the diſtinction is to be knowne by diuerſitie of Armes, according to their inclination, and good or bad breeding. This is that which the Prince of Poets hath learnedly noted, of Noble by Extraction, Science, and Learning, in his ſecond Royall Boſcage.

Of Nobility by diſcent, vertue, and Learning.

Celuy qui deſiroit de monſtrer ſa Vertu,
Portoit ſur le Harnois dont il eſtoit veſtu
Ou deſſus ſon Bouclier vne Recogniſſance,
Afin que par la preſſe on congnuſt ſa Vaillance.
L'vn auoit vn Serpent, l'autre auoit vn Lyon,
Vn Aigle, vn Leopard. Ainſi vn Million
Par les Siecles paſſez D'Enſeignes ſont venuës,
Que les Races depuis pour marque ont retenues,
Eſcuſſons, & Blaſons de leurs premiers Ayeulx,
Que la Guerre ennoblit par faict Victorieux.

He that deſires to ſhew his Vertue cleare,
Beares on the Armour he doth vſe to weare,
Or on his Shield, a plaine Recogniſance;
That thickeſt crowdes may know his Valiance.
One beares a Serpent; Other, hath a Lion,
Eagle, or Leopard: And ſo a million
(From Ages paſt) of Enſeignes haue beene gain'd,
Which (afterward) their Races ſtill retain'd
From their Fore-fathers; Scutcheons and Blazons knowne, Victorioufly by Warre ennobled for their owne.

Then it is a popular errour, to ſay, that the inuention of Armes, of Blazons and Deuiſes, appeared not vntil within fiue hundred yeeres, and the Voyages to the Eaſt, for Conqueſt of the Holy Land, Religiouſly attempted by many famous perſons: Becauſe (in all times) their vſe is made manifeſt, and practiſed by Nations, furtheſt of all other from our knowledge, as the Inhabitants of the Eaſterne Iſles.

The vſe of Armes, practiſed at al times, and by people furtheſt from vs.

Thoſe people, at the Funeralles of their Tyngas Kings and great Lords, cauſed to be born before their bodies, the notes of Honour and the Trophees, which they had wonne and brought from their enemies in warre. Thoſe Honours and Trophees were carried in the ſaide Funeralles, by Knights moſt apparant in Valiance and Nobilitie. And to this effect, exactly they kept the practiſe and vſe of Armes and Blazons, conſerued to their Families, and carried them to the enterring of their dead. So writeth Ioſephus Acoſta, in his fifte Booke Booke of the Naturall hiſtorie of the Indians, and the eight Chapter.

In the fourth Chapter of the ſame Booke, he ſeaſons by him, that the Kings of Peru caried in Armes, Vne Arc en Ciel, accompagnee deux Couleuures eſtendues aux coſtes d'iceluy.

The Armes of the Kinges of Peru.

That the Kings of Mexico carried for their Deuiſe, Vne Main tenant vne poignee de fleches de Roſeaux. In remembrance and memorie of the firſt King of Mexico, named Acamapixtli, which ſignifieth in the Mexicane language, A handfull of Reeds.

That the Citie of Mexico Tenuchtitlan, had for her Armes; Vne Aigle Royale aux aiſles eſployees, & la Teſte eſleuee regardant droict le Soliel, comme pour receuoir ſa chalcur, ſeante ſur vne pel, ou eſcau de l'vne de ſes ſerres, & de l'autre plante ſur vne Tunal, & Pierre releuee. Becauſe that in ſuch a poſture, this Bird was found, and in the place where the Capitall Citie of Mexico was builded, now named New Spaine: As the ſaid Acoſta affirmeth in the ſame Booke, and the ſeuenth Chapter.

The Cities Armes of Mexico.

The Tlaxcalans, conjured enemies to them of Mexico, bare in their Standard & Banner, Vne Grue d'Or eſtendant ſes aiſles. And this was their Armes, as it is reported in the life of Ferdinando Cortezze, who vanquiſhed the Mexicanes, and conquered their chiefe City, in Nouember, 1519. And the great Standard of the ſame Mexicanes, when the King himſelfe in perſon marched to the field; Portoit vne Griffon Furieux deſchirant vn Tigre, qu'il tenoit ſoubs ſes ſerres. A deuiſe erected ouer the gates of the Palace, belonging to the ſaide Kings of Mexico.

In lib. vii. Per. Cort. Cap. 17.

But what needs is there, of croſſing ouer ſo many Seas, for this Antiquitie of Armes, and to go ſeeke it ſo farre off? We haue it at our owne doores, in regard that the Auncеſtors of the Gaules and French, carried for their ancient Deuiſe, the Ship.

The Ancient deuice of the Gaules and French.

Cornelius Tacitus, deſcribing the Cuſtomes of the Germaines (being but badly informed of their Religion) hauing ſeene, or heard by report, from ſuch as had beene in the voyage of Germanie, that a Ship was figured in their Temples and Enſignes; immediatly he conceyued, that they adored the Goddeſſe Iſis. Pars Sueuorum & Iſidi ſacrificat. Vnde cauſa, & origo peregrina ſacro parum compert, niſi quod ipſum Signum in modum Liburnicæ figuratum, docet aduectam Religionem.

The errour & miſtaking of Tacitus.

The men of Suaba, neighbours to the Francs Sicambrians, dwelling in the Marches of Weſtphalia, Cleue, & Guelderland, with Gulich, obſerued the ſame Religion, Cuſtomes, and Policie, as the Gaules did. And as thoſe two Nations were one ſelfe ſame people: euen ſo they retained (carefully) the figure of the Shippe, which Tacitus (in his language) tearmeth Liburnicall, in memorie of the paſſage which their Anceſtours made from Aſia into Europe, vnder the conduct of their Prince Gomer.

For by the ſame ſubiect, the ancient money of the Gaules and Germanes, were of two faſhions and ſtampes on both ſides. The one with a Lyon, Armes proper to Prince Gomer (the Gaules Hercules) on the one ſide; and on the other an Altar, with the number of LXIIII. which repreſented the ſixtie and foure Prouinces of the Gauls (that extended themſelues ſo farre as Rhine) mentioned by Tacitus, in the third Booke of his Annales, At Roma non Treuiros modo, ſed quatuor ſexaginta ciuitates Galliarum deſciuiſſe videbantur: And thus he ſaw (of Antiquities) a like number on the backe ſide, and his figure on the other, ſtamped vnder the name of the Emperor Antoninus. And Strabo in the 4. booke of his Geography, and Dion in his 54. booke, vnderſtood the Altar, to be prepared in the Citty of Lyons, whereof Iuuenal thus ſaith:

The Ancient Coynes of the Gaules and Germaines.

Aut Lugdunenſem Rhetan diſturus in Aram.

This ſhould bee interpreted of the ſecretall Altare of the Gaules, prouided ſtable and permanent by the Druides, within their ſacred wood at the mountaine of Chartres, dedicated to the holy Virgin, that ſhould bring forth the fruite of life.

The other kinde of Coine, had a Shippe on the one ſide, and a Head on the other, figuring the Image of the Patriarke Noah, or of his youngeſt ſonne Gomer. A kinde of money brought into Italy by the firſt Gaules, when they went thither, and poſſeſſed it. Nueretheleſſe, the Romaines enuying the glorie and fame of the Gaules; referre the inuention thereof to their King Numa Pompilius. So ſaith Ouid in the firſt of his Faſtes.

The deſcriptiō of the other Coyne.

Ouid in Lib. 1. de Faſtib.

Speaking of a voyage which Saturne made to Italy, the Romaines hauing retayned ſome ſhadow of Gomers paſſage to the Gaules, obſerued (neuertheleſſe) with lyes and fables: but the Gaules being poſſeſſed of Italy by their Coines, brought the knowledge to this

this apparant passage. So the ancient Gaules had a sport, which they tearmed Head or Ship: for by putting one of those peeces into a Bonnet, and then (casting them both aloft) asked them which they would haue, Head or Ship, Caput aut Nauem. After the manner of a pastime, retained to this present day, by the name of Crosse or Pile.

Tacitus taxed with ignorance, in matters of great moment.

So Tacitus (shallowly informed) seeing some figure of Frigates and Shippes, with the Gaules and Germaines, equiuocated, by interpreting them of another sort, because he would not seeme to be deceyued. Also he is constrained to confesse his ignorance, Rerum comperisse, by not hauing discouered the subiect of such paintings. But as if he had bene in Ægypt, he thought (seeing this) that it was the Hieroglyphicke of the Goddesse Isis, whom the Romaines vnderstood, Per peregrinum sacrum, because shee was brought to them out of Syria, and called Deum Syriam. Of whom Apuleius (in his Milesians) describeth the worship and Ceremonies, as we haue learned by Methodius, Latinus Pacatus, Sidonius Apollinaris, Beatus Rhenanus, and others. Non in signum aduecta Religionis, as Tacitus beleeued: but, In memoriam huc aduecta Nationis Gallicanæ, by the passage of Gomer and his children, out of Asia into Europe.

The Citie of Paris (built in the yeare of the World, 2981. the first of Abezan of Bethleem, Iudge of Israel, successor to Ieptah, 1325. yeares after the Flood; and before the foundation of Rome, 199. yeares, according to the testimony of Learned Genebrard, Archbyshop of Aix in Prouence, in the first book of his Chronologie:) A retenu pour ſes Armes le Nauire d'Argent Frette & Arme en Champ de Gueulles, as the Metropolitan of the French Nation.

Genebrard. in Chron. Lib. 1.

Some haue written, that Phillip Augustus, second of that name, called Gods Gift, & the Conquerour, was the first inuenter of the Lord Maior and Sheriffes in the Citie of Paris, for which he had not any reason or apparance whatsoeuer. For, could it be credible, that so goodly a Cittie, the dwelling place of our Kings, euen from the first and second Lyne, should be without a Body, and Officers fit for the same. Considering, that in the Capitularies of Charlemaigne and his Children, mention is made (in many places) De Scabinis, of Sheriffes, who were as Gouernours and Iudges Politicke, in the best Townes of France.

Lord Maior & Sheriffes in the City of Paris.

In the like errour are they, who report, that the Armes of the Ship were giuen to the said City of Paris, by the same Phillip Augustus. Considering, that from the time of the ancient Druides, the Ship had bene an Enſigne, of the said Citie of Parisians. It may be, for the reason alledged by Stephen Pasquier (treating on the same subiect) that the first limits of that great Cittie, represented the forme and figure of a Ship. For Paris, at her beginning, was no other then a Castle of pleasure, built (for the delight of Hunting) by the first Gaulish Kings, where (at this present) is the Pallace.

Afterward, the inhabitants chose their dwelling within the Isle shaped by Seine, which (in her situation) figureth the forme of a Ship, being large, and like to a Ship in her poop and hindmost part: where is erected the Cathedrall Church, her Cloysters, the Bishops Pallace, with the Hospitall. And the Prowe pointeth to the end of the Pallace Garden, now ioyning to Pont-Neuf, and full of houses, enclosing the Cittie, and liuely figuring the forme of a Ship: which among the Ægyptians, was the Hieroglyphicke of Soueraigne Power, the marke or Symbole of command and preheminence: And so Paris (by good right) is called, The Queene of Cities.

Affris, Lunaque prior, tua robore & armis,

The Germans are all (almost) descended of one Countrie, were neuertheless distinguished by their Armes the Lyon, but yet by diuers Blazons.

The verie greatest part of the Germaine Nations, albeit all (well neere) descended of

For the Francs or French, Le porteient d'Or en champ d'Azur.

The Gothes, Ostrogothes, and Visigothes, Le portoient d'Or en champ de Gueulles. And they that dwelt in Spaine, Le porterent de Sable en champ d'Argent.

Paradine writeth, that the ancient Bourgongnons (in like manner, issued and descended from Germanie, and of whom the Noble Romaine Tacitus maketh mention in his Germania) Porteient en Armes le Lyon de Sable en champ d'Argent. Wee shall shew the contrary, and the same of the Gothes in Spaine.

They of Denmarke, Portoient trois de Lyons de Synople passant l'vne sur l'autre, to shew their Balticke Sea as their descent.

Method. in lib. 4. cap. 19.

The Cymbrians had the Bull for their Enſigne, and they made one of Mettall, which they caused to be carried on a Pike in the front of their Armie. They would sweare by it (saith Plutarch in the life of Marius) and this people being subdued by the Consull Catullus Luctatius, the Bull was carried home to his house, as a note of the victorie which he had ouer them.

Plutarc. in vit. Cai. Mar.

We will conclude this Chapter of Armes and Blazons, with acknowledging and distinguishing the eldest sonnes from the yonger and inferiour.

The Eldest are knowne and discerned from the other, by the plaine Paternall Armes, without any Brisure whatsoeuer, except the Father gaue them so.

Eldest sonnes giue their Fathers Armes, without any difference.

It is ordinarily seene in illustrious and most Noble Houses, that the second son quartereth the Fathers Armes with them of his Mother. But this occasioneth confusion to their descent and Linage, if they haue store of masle children.

Others diuersifie and varie in the Chiefe, or else in the first quarter and Canton of the Chiefe, which is tearmed of Honor: Or else, Partissent, Flancquent, Entent en Poincte, ou mettent sur le tout.

The Canton of Honor.

But the most certaine knowledge is made by Brisures, so farre as to the seuenth generation, the end of all Parentage.

The extens of generation.

It is an assured Rule, that among Masles, the eldest acknowledgeth himselfe, & he ought to be acknowledged by his Father Armes: If he be not otherwise stipuled by Contracts of marriage, of donation, or of substitution, which doe extend so farre, as to the fourth degree.

The eldest beareth his fathers Armes

And if all the Masles would beare the Fathers Armes: they ought to bee distinguished according to degree of birth, or primogeniture, by Brisures.

For the second sonne, Doit porter le Lambeau de trois pieces: which is to be vnderstood, of Mettall or Colour, and which also ought to be obserued in all other Brisure.

Distinction for the seuerall sonnes in order

The third sonne, Vne simple Bordure.

The fourth, L'Orle.

The fift, Le Baston.

And the sixt, Le Bande.

If there be any more: the Chiefe, the first or last Canton of the Chiefe, or else, L'Ente en Poincte, will serue to be remarked.

The Assaillants or Challengers of all the younger thus borne, must bee acknowledged by Doubles Brisures.

How Challengers are to be acknowledged in their degrees.

In regard that the eldest sonne issued of the second, ought to retaine and beare the Fathers Armes: Aucecques leur Brisure, le Lambeau de trois pieces en Chef.

The second, Le Lambeau de quatre pieces en Chef.

The third, Pareil Lambeau mouuant de Chef.

And the fourth, Pareil Lambeau charge selon ſa fantaſie d'Aigles, Lyons, Croiſſants, Roſes Aleryons, Merletes, ou Diapre.

The second sonne issuing of the first third, Portera la Bordure engreſlee.

The third, Chargee de Beſans, ou Torteaux.

The fourth, La Bordure Componce.

The next, Endentee, or Endenchee.

And the rest (if there be any more) Chargee de Annuleis, partie de l'vn en l'autre, ou bien le Simple, ou le Double Eſſonier & Treſcheur.

The second sonne issuing of the first fourth: L'Orle, which his descendants and he may diuersifie: d'Eſchiequette, Pale, Conterpale, Lozange, Frette, Fuſille, Faiſſes, Contre-Faiſſe, Pairle, Viure, Cheuronne, Contre Cheuronne, Verſe, Contre verſe, or charged with the before named Beasts, with Pannes, Macles, Molettes, Eſtoiles ou de Ruſtres, or other varieties which may be put into Armes.

Diuersitie of charges for their best distinguishing.

The second sonne of the first fift, and his descendants, may charge and varrie Le Baſton, as hath bin said before, and the like.

Of the second sonne, and his Assayllants of the first sixe: A la Band, which may bee Coticee, Iumelee, Breteſee, Feuillee de Six, Componee, Endenchee, ou chargee d'Animaux ou de Pannes

But it is to be held for a Rule, and an infallible Maxime in Armes, and the noble Art of

of Painting and Blazon That he which beareth least, is the best; which will serue for question and enquirie.

CHAP. II.

Of Scutcheons, Shields, Targets, and Buclers.

The best way of Arming a Knight.

IT hath beene an ancient common Prouerbe among the French: That the Knight beginneth to Arme himselfe with his Spurres, and compleateth all with the Shield. But contrary to this popular error, we will begin to honour our Noble Gentleman, that is to say, to Arme him with a Shield, and make our conclusion with the Bathe and Spurres. For, the Scutcheon or Shield, (to speake vprightly) is the essentiall note of a Nobleman, as also of an Esquire and Knight. But let vs first obserue, the structure and fashion of the Shield, and the difference thereof, from the Target and Buckler.

Diod. Sicul. in Lib. 6. de Ant.

Diodorus Siculus, in the sixt booke of his Antiquities, describeth the fashion of our Shields: Arma ferunt (saith he, speaking of the Celtes and Iberians, French & Spanish) Scutum ad staturam hominis longum, proque libito cuiusque ornatum. He speaketh much to the purpose, according to the Custome of the French Nation, Scutum, a Shielde, and not Clypeum a Buckler, common to the Italians and other Nations, otherwise (neuertheless) then the French, Germaines, Spaniards, and English, who neuer bare any other, then the Shield.

In like manner, there is very great difference, concerning the fashion of Scutum, Clypeus, and Parma, the Shield, the Buckler, and the Target, among the Latines.

The Buckler of the Romans

The Buckler, which the Romaines called Clypeum, was of round forme, yet shaping Quail-wise, according to the manner of the Greekes. This is that which wee vse to call a Rondell, or round Target, in regard of the round figure. In this manner, the Greeke Palladines went to the pretended conquest of their Golden Fleece, described by Apollonius Rhodius in his Argonautes, who carried their Shieldes of round forme, whereon each man had his deuice answerable to his owne fancie, and of them, those Bucklers were termed Bucklers of Argos.

Apollon. Rh. de eo Tra. de Arg

Argolici Clypei, aut Phœbea Lampadis instar,

Virg. in Aeneid lib. 3.

So speaketh Virgill, describing the frightfull eye of the Gyant Polyphemus, great & wide as the roundure of the Sunne, when he is seene on the point of his rising in the East.

The Parma or Target.

The Parma, which we call a Target, differed from the Buckler, because it was of square forme, and yet more long then large, and somewhat more narrow both aboue and beneath, then in the middle: which enlarged it selfe more forward, then at the two endes, bowing, vaulting, or turning ouer, like to the ridge Tiles of houses.

The forme of the Buckler.

The Buckler was ordinarily in containdure, no more then three foot in circumference, proper for them, termed Enfans perdus, Gentlemen of Companies, reserued for, and exposed vnto all desperate seruices in warre (called by the Greekes Stradiots, of the word Στρατιὸς, placed in the vantgard of the Armie, to begin the conflict and combustion. The Romaines called them Velites, by a Metaphor deriued from the sailes of shippes, which guides them, being swolne bigge with winde. So these aduenturous Soldiers were lightly armed, for the surprizall of them before.

The Romaine Velites.

The Buckler for Horsemen

This Buckler was likewise common to Horsemen, seruing to receyue the blowes of stones cast by Slings, Darts, and Arrowes shot from the enemie.

Three sorts of seruitors on horseback, Hastati, Principes, Triarii.

Now concerning three other sorts of Foote Seruitors which they had, tearming them Hastatos, Principes, and Triarios, they vsed the Target called Parma, which ordinarily contained foure foote and an halfe in heighth, broad aboue, and beneath two foot and an halfe: In such sort, as it might couer the whole man in necessitie, bending one knee down to the ground.

The manner of the French Shield.

The Shield proper and particular to the French, and their neighbouring people, was broad aboue and in the midst, but finished in a point. Forma Scuti summum latius quæ pectus, atque humeri teguntur, fastigio æquali, ad imum cuneatior, mobilitatis causa, so sayeth Liuius in his ninth booke, speaking of the Samnites, who (made martiall by the Gaules)

Titus Liuius lib. 9.

passed

led into Lombardie, being armed after the Gaules manner: and this was the reason, y such shields were called Scuta Ligurina; they contained almost the height of a man, ueable at the point, because of turning and making head, on which side soeuer the ene- e appeared.

Diodorus Siculus, speaking of them belonging to the men of Geneway and Millaine, aulish from all antiquitie, as Plutarch writeth in the life of Furius Camillus, and of arcellus) in this manner describeth their Armes, that is to say, their Shields: Arma ent leuiora quam Romani. Operiuntur eorum corpora Scuto longo. Ad formam Gallorum to. Our Ancestors serued themselues with Shields, finishing in the point, as well for n on horse-backe, as on foote; as wee finde on Marbles and ancient Monuments or mbes.

These words, Operiuntur corpora longa Scuto, doe giue vs to vnderstand, that those ields were so long and large, as a man might couer himselfe in warre against the Ene- es darts and arrowes. And at such time as question was made, for passing and freeing y great Riuer; those long and large Shields might commodiously serue their masters in- ead of boates or Gondolaes for passage. Hereof we haue many remarkeable examples, Saint Gregory Victor Archbishop of Tours, the most ancient Annalist of France, and ho serued as a Lanthorne, Guide, or Iacobs staffe for the discouery of the Min s and vn- owne Treasures, concealed vnder goodly and venerable Antiquitie. In the third booke d thirteenth chapter of his history of France: Venientes ad Mosellam fluuium, cum transirent illum, & detinerentur a quibusdam, relictis equis, ac vestimentis Enatantes super uto (speaking after the Romane manner, he vseth this word Parma) positis, amnem in ulteriorem egressi sunt ripam. And in the fourth booke, the thirtieth Chapter, describing e siedge of Arles in Prouence, and the encounters there performed: Cum exercitus a rgo iaculis foderetur, operiretur que lapidibus ab Vrbanis, ad amnem Rhodanum dirigunt, que Scutis Superpositis ulteriorem ripam expectant. The impetuous Current of that eat Riuer Rhodanus carried a great number of the Enemies; so that the saying of the atine Poet, speaking of the riuer Simois, carrying on her waues the miserable Troyans, w it selfe then in practise.

Shields seruing men in need for passing Riuers instead of boates

Virg. in Aeneid. lib. 7.

—Correpta sub vndis
Scuta virum, galeasque, & fortia corpora voluit,
Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto.

Qui vix nandi impulsu, Scutorumque adiuti adminiculo, litoris alterius plana contingere tuerunt.

Shields kept in vse both for men and women.

Vnto this present time the forme of Shieldes, large aboue, and to the midst, haue been ept in vse, but finishing in the point, as well in the Armes for men as women, which had art of the moitie of those belonging to their husbands on the right side, and on the left, e moitie for those women. But as for maides vnmarried, they bare none but the Armes f their Father, framed Lozenge wise. And for the same reason, the Tombes of Stone, herein anciently their bodies had enterrement, were made in the forme of a Lozenge, cording to the custome obserued in Greece, on the graues of the Amazones, that is to y, Noble Maides: As Plutarch obserueth in the life of Theseus; but so they ought not o be made for Wiues.

The Shield the principall piece of Armes

And because the Shield was the principall part of Armes for a Knight; for the same respect, and in regard of excellency, he is said to be armed, ab Armo, so say the best expositors; because hee beareth it aloft on his arme, or on his left shoulder, which they call Armum.

Quam fortis pectore, & Armis!
What strong brest, What large shoulders!

So saith Virgill in deciphering his Prince, whom he maketh to haue large shoulders, as we vse to speake of large squareneſse. Armillas called Festus, ex Auro, quas Viri militares ab Imperatoribus donati gerunt, dictas esse existimant, quod Antiqui Humeros cum Brachijs, Armos vocabant.

How, and of what the Shields and targets were made.

These Shields, Targets, and Bucklers were made of thinne and yeelding boords, of Birche, Fig-tree, Linden, Willow, Elder, and Poplar, cut and framed into many pieces, and afterward ioyned together one vpon another, with cloth well glued; which being throughly dried, they then vsed to couer the Shields with the strong hide of an Oxe, being doubled twice or thrice, for to make it the stronger. The amorous Poet makes his Aiax the Telamonion, to carrie a Buckler fastned and couered with seuen-doubles.

Surgit ad hos Clypei Dominus septemplicis Aiax.

For better keeping the whole substance together, they fur-rounded the Shields, Targets, and Bucklers, with a circle of yron, brasse, copper, gold, or siluer, according to the wealthinesse of the Souldier. Tacitus in the second of his Annales, speaking of our Ancestors, saith: Nec Scuta quidem ferro, neruoque firmata, sed viminum textus, vel tenues & fucatas colore tabulas. In the midst or Bosse of the said Bucklers, there was ordinarily fixed a long pointed yron, which aduanced it selfe halfe a foot in height: The Romans called this pointed yron, Vmbonem. Virgil saith,

The ancient Order of Bosses in Bucklers

Flectunt que saligna
Vmbonum crates aly.

This was peculiar to Bucklers onely; for in the Greeke and Romane Targets, there was not any point at all, no more then in our Shields: in which place our Ancestors pleased to imbosse some Fowle, or foure-footed beast, as Diodorus Siculus relateth in the sixt booke of his Antiquities, Strabo, Cornelius Tacitus, Posidonius and Atheneus.

Heereupon afterward, they vsed to tearme those Shields Armes, or (speaking more grossely) Armories of Cognisances. And so, such a man, and such a Lord of such a house, carried (as we vse to say) such and such Armes. Because their Shield, or Escutcheon, was charged with such or such mettall, hauing an Eagle displayed, a Lion rampant, a Bull passant, or any other beast, d'Or, or d'Argent, d'Azure, Gueulles, Synople, or Sable.

How Coates of Armes began to be called so.

And by these differences of Shield, Target, and Buckler, men learned how to make Shields and Scutcheons of Armes: For the French, Germanes, Spaniards, and English ought to beare them square aboue, and so to the midst, but finishing orderly in a point without the aduise of ignorant Painters or Caruers, who make them of bias and thwart shape, and cut the point in part or wholly short, which should begin much higher. The Italians retaine the ancient forme of their Buckler in their Armes, making them Oualwise, and not in the round forme. For vs to doe the like after the Italian manner (as those personages are figured in the magnificent Gallery at the Louure) were to misprise the Nation for following the fashion of Strangers, or else to condemne faire and venerable Antiquitie, because her face is furrowed with the wrinkles of age.

How the French and others should beare their shields.

The Bucklers of the Italians

It is not long since I saw, that the Bretons carried square Armes, which wee call Banner, to shew that they are descended of the Knights Bannerets, as much to say, as of Lords: to whom for their wealth and number of seruants, the Dukes of Bretaine gaue permission to beare Bannners, and to haue Mottoes in them, as it is in France, bearing the name of Knights Bannerets. This is that whereof the Lord of Ioinuille speaketh in the life of the good King Saint Lewis: that they of the Court of Champaigne had beyond the Seas, in seruice of the said King, lost fiue and thirty Knights, all bearing Banners. And the Ceremonies obserued at the making of these Knights Bannerets, is remarked by John Froissard, where he speaketh of the battell fought in Spaine by Messire Bertrand du Gueselin, afterward Constable of France, for King Henry of Castile against the Prince of Wales; to whom, before the said Battell, an Englishman presented himselfe, named Iohn Chandois, the words in French are thus Englished.

The Bretons descended of Knights Bannerets.

There Sir Iohn Chandoyes brought the Banner betweene the Battailes, which (as yet) he had not any way moued out of the Princes Hoast, to whom he spake thus. My Lord, heere you see my Banner, I deliuer it you in such manner, that you pleasing to display it, I may thinke to beare it: for I thanke God I am well prouided of lands, goods, and inheritances, whereby I maintaine and hold this estate, according as thereto appertaineth. So the Prince, and the King Don Peter (who was also there present) tooke the Banner into their hands, Qui estoit d'Argent a vn pieu (c'estoit vn pal) aignise de gueulles, and restoring it to him, spake thus, Sir Iohn, behold heere your Banner, take, and God giue you leaue to vse it well. So departed Sir Iohn Chandois, and brought the Banner among his owne followers, speaking thus vnto them: Gentlemen, you see heere my Banner and yours, wherefore defend it as yours.

Against intruders to be Banner-bearers.

Now such as doe intrude themselues to beare a Banner, without hauing seruants sufficient to defend it, and meanes to support the expences thereto belonging: a mockerie is made of them, and they are to be armed like vnto the Square Ouppet: For his meniee (at the least) must be such, as to maintaine (at his owne charge) fiue and twenty Gentlemen, well mounted and armed, with each one his Sergeant at the least; for they were called Seruientes, and by a word (I know not whence deriued) Mattheruel, who with the sword, and a Iacke of Maile, carried the Battle-Axe, and the Shield. There are many Tombes to be seene in the Church and Cloyster of Saint Katherine du Val, of the Scholers at Paris of these Seruiteurs, qualified the Kings Sergeants, though stiled Seruientes ly Roye. Their Maces of Armes (to this day retained by the hundred Gentlemen of the Kings house, with the Pentioners halberts) engrauen by them; for none but their masters are they who carry the Launce.

These Bannerets caused to be carried before them in Battell, A square Pennon, armed with their Armes and Deuises, and thereby called a Banner; because it was made in the fashion of our Church-Banners, which were made the Standerds and Enfignes of the Romanes. After they were granted to beare a Banner, the Bretons cut off the point of their Shielde, and carried it square, marching so boldly with it in the front, to shew that they were become great Gallants. This grant of bearing a Banner, brought them another priuiledge, to haue high authority of Iustice, and to execute Iustice in the right of a Baron. So the States of Bretaigne sitting at Naunes, in the yeare 1451. Peter, second of the name, Duke of Bretaigne, gaue to Messire Rolland Peam, Lord of Grand-Bois, and of the Roche-Isgu, the title of Banneret, Right of Iustice in case of a Baron, and to beare Armes in his Banner. So saith Argentre, a diligent Obseruer of all the Priuiledges and Rights.

For the execution of malefactors vpon the gallowes.

Concerning the last Knights of the Holy Ghost, made by the late King Henry the Great (of happy memory) at the Augustines in Paris, among all the Armes of the Princes and Lords, I could not see any Armes in Banner, but those of the Marshall de Biron, Paremens escartelles d'Or & de Gueulles, and without any charge.

How Armes in Baner became so called.

Those Armes in Banner were so nominated, because of their cutting short by the point; so that they containe the same largenesse, as well in point as in chiefe.

Concerning the word Enseigne.

Monarches, Princes, and great Lords (whom the Ancients of France honoured with the title of Barons) marching in warre, carried many Ensignes of their Armes and deuises; for the worde Enseigne, is the generall name applied to the Companies, either of Foot or Horse.

In the first place, marcheth the Banner, a little longer then otherwise, and square in forme, (yet not after the fashion of Banners in our Churches) cut off beneath, like vnto a Gonfanon of Italie (the ancient Armes of the house of Bologne) is not carried by the means of a Staffe, trauersing the middle backward, but by a staffe at one of the ends.

The fashion of the Banner leading the way.

Next after followeth the great Standard, carried in the same manner, large aloft, but finishing in a round point, after the fashion of the French shield, which is cut like two round tongues diuided: And this great Standard ordinarily appeareth, and ought to be of much longer extendure then the Banner.

The great Standard.

After marcheth the Guidon, much lesse by a third part then the Standard, and differing from it in this manner: because at the point, it hath one onely round tongue, whole, and without any cutting.

The Guidon

In the fourth place is the Pennon, lesser by halfe then the Guidon, but hauing the same forme and tongue. All these are ordinarily made, and fringed with the Litteries and colours of the Prince, or Lord, to whose funerals they are carried. And beside what hath beene said, first of all is carried the great Standard of the Colours, charged on the one part and the other, with the Patronc and Tutelary Saint of his Realme or title, and his deuise. As not long since in Picardie, the three most ancient Houses thereof, carried their Armes and the title Blazoned on their name.

The Pennon.

The great Standard of Colours.

D'Ailly, Mailly, Crequy,
Such Names, such Armes, such Title.

The Coronet is of the same fashion as the Banner; square, but long, in number of the Standard, cut by a thred directly forward, and not declining to the point, as the Banners doth.

The Enseigne of a Horse Company.

In times past, there were none but Princes Souuaigues that carried the Coronet, which ought not to be charged with Armes or Deuise, but only the principall Lynetie of the Prince. In France it is White, in Spaine Red: in England and elsewhere it is of the Kingdomes Colours. This Cornet ought not to be carried, but in the presence of the Soueraigne Prince, vnder which other Princes and great Lords, haue ordinarily to serue to ranke themselues, for the conseruation thereof.

Enfignes of the Foot Souldiers

As for the Infanterie, they haue Enfignes and Flagges made Banner-wise: the Colour whereof (like to the Cornet) should be without Charge or deuise: but onely the sole Liuerie or Colours of the Kingdome, as we haue already sayd.

Who ought to beare Armes onely, & none other.

The Honour of bearing Shieldes, that is to say Armes, belongeth to none but Noble men by extraction, or by calling and creation. And it is not yet an hundred yeares, since such as were not of Noble condition, were punished with great fines and amercements, if they but attempted to beare any.

Marks or notes of Tradesmen, & of Merchats

It was permitted to them, to haue onely Markes or notes, of those Trades and Professions which they vsed: As a Tailor to haue his Sheares, a Cutler a Knife, a Shearman his Cloth-sheares, a Mason his Trowell, and the Compasse or Squire, and so of others. Merchants (for their more honour) might beare the first Letters of their names and surnames, enterlaced with a Crosse: as is to be seene in many ancient Epitaphes, and as yet to this day, vpon their packes or burthens of Merchandises. All these were called but Markes, they were not permitted to haue Shields, but onely Targets, hollow at the chiefe and flankes, like them which are giuen to Villages, at the Feast of the Saint their Patron, to manifest that they were not Shields.

Of such as counterfeyt Gentility.

But now adayes, the very meaneſt Merchant and Artizane, will counterfeyte to be Noble, and to giue Armes, for the most part falsely made, and worse emblazoned, and their cheefest excellencie, when they time and make answer to their Names. As Vide-Bichet, a Village, and the Fawne of a Hinde: Bourdin, a Bourrough and a Fallow Deere: Clergeon, a Key and a Bull-rush. Nay moreouer, there must be some Starre or Cresent (heeretofore the onely marke or note of Nobility) to shew the Diuinity of their spirit, in the composition of their representations. I haue seene a counterfeyte fellow, to giue himselfe Armes D'azur a Cheuron d'Or, au Croissant de Gueulles, Au hault d'iceluy deux Estoilles d'Argent au Chef & la Sphere Celeste soubs le Cheuron, with Crest and Mantle (extreme impudence) euen as it hee had beene Noble by foure races: there wanted but a Ladder and a Broome, to sweepe off the Cobwebbes from the roofe-Tiles of his Fathers house.

vpstart Companions will presume to giue Armes.

The cause of this great error and confusion

This corruption and confusion first grew from this, that the Noble Science of Blazons, was negligently preserued in her auncient splendour, by Kings, Heralds, and Pursuiuants of Armes, whose principall charge (in precedent times) was, to haue especiall care, that not any person should presume to beare Armes, if they were not giuen and graunted by the Prince, or retayned from his Auncestours, who had lawfull priuiledge to beare them. For they stoode bound, to keepe a Register of all Noble Houses, and therein to paynt their Armes, and describe their good actions in Warre, a Custome remaining well kept to this day, in the Chamber of Accompts at Paris, in the Letters of Nobilities which those Monarches then gaue, in the middest whereof is fairely limned, the Armes of such as were more lately ennobled. But returne wee now againe, to our former Discourse of Shields.

Of the Romain Emperours at their comming to the Empire.

By example of the French, the Romaine Emperours comming to the Empire, were exalted and carried on a Shield of fine or pureſt Gold, enammelled with the Empire, that is to say, De Gueulles a l'Aigle esployé d'Or, a deux testes. First taken by Constantine, at the time of his electing Constantinople in Thrace, to be the Imperiall Seate, the Empire being then diuided, into that of the East and West. It is thus reported by Georgius Cedrenus, in the second booke of his Collections, that he who was declared to be Augustus, that is to say Successor in the Empire, was exalted and carried on the Imperiall Shield: Imperatorio Clypeo insidetis, qui Imperio destinatur. And those Shields as wel as the sword of the Emperors, were hallowed & consecrated by the Popes, who ordinarily sacred the said Emperors. As Pope Leo did to the person of the Emperour Charlemaign, who being crowned Emperour of the West, he charged his Shielde with D'Or, de Esmaux de France, that is to say, D'Azur au Fleurs de Lys d'Or, a deux testes Couronnes, Lhuict l'Escu de France sans nombre.

The Emperors sacred by the Popes.

According as it was borne by his Grandfathers and Father, Pepin, Charles Martell and Pepin le Bref, first King of the second Lyne, the sayd Shield carrying Gueules

Crowne,

Crowne, in regard of the Imperiall dignity, and about it the Order of the Garter, instituted in the Noble house of France by the saide Charles Martell, Imperiall Armes, retayned by all the Kings of the second Lyne, and further on in the third. For Philip Augustus in some Charters, styled himselfe Emperour of the French, bearing the Golden Apple, as is noted in his Picture, the last of the Kings, on the frontispeece of the Church at Paris, of eight and twentie there figured, maintaining (with truth) the Title of Emperour appertaining to the King of France priuatiuely, before any other Prince, as descending of Charlemaigne, by whom the Empire came from the Greekes to the Freuch. And the Pope, a Germaine by Nation, Stephen, eight of the name, could not with equitie, spend largely vpon another mans purse, or disanull (without subiect) that which his predecessour (so many yeares before) had done, Pope Leo, third of the name. For he ordayned (sacring & crowning Charlemaigne Emperour, in Anno eight hundred and one) that by inuesting him, his Successours the Kings of France, should hold the Empire of the West; Curſing, euen to the day of Iudgement (Anathemate Maranatha) all such as should dispossesse or trouble them therein.

The Empyre translated from the Greekes to the French, by the Emperour Charlemaigne

The saide Pope Stephen, hauing crowned the Emperour Otho, first of the name (whom the Germaines tearmed Otho the Great) Duke or Count of Saxon: the saide Otho, to deface the memorie of the French Emperours, changed the Imperiall Shield blazoned by Charlemaigne, De Esmaux de France. For, being of the house of Saxon, who, as his Armes, Porte D'Or a trois Faisse de Sable, a la Coronne de Synople periee en Bande: He tooke L'Escu d'Or a l'Aigle esployé de Sable, Armes which the Germaine Emperors haue retained to this day.

Otho the great changed the Empires armes of the French.

We haue formerly saide, according to Pachymerus, that the Emperours (comming to the Empire) were exalted vpon a Shield, according to the example of the French: lee vs now see the proofe thereof.

Of the Emperors exaltation vpon a shielde at the first.

This custome was proper and particular to the French, from whom the Greekes and Romaines deriued it by example. It is very likely, that the Kings of the Gaules (extirpated by Iulius Cæsar) were not receyued into the Royaltie, without many Ceremonies; seeing we haue learned by tradition, that a Prince of the Druides, in whose person the Image of the Gaulish Kings remained, walking in publique, or holding Assembly of the Generall Estates of the Gaules, had alwayes carried before him, The Hand of Iustice, vpon a Cubite of Iuorie. And that comming to the saide Authoritie, the Seat whereof was kept at Chartres: he was exalted vpon a Shield, and so carried about the Assembly of the sayd States.

The Hollanders, neere neighbours to the Gaules, and with whome also they did take part, being reuolted from the Romaines: established (as King) one named Brinio, exalting him vpon a Shield, and so carrying him on their shoulders about the Campe. As it is obserued by the Noble Romaine Historian Cornelius Tacitus, in the fourth Booke of his Histories. Brinio, ipso rebellis familiæ crimine placuit. Impositoque Scuto, more Gentis, et succolentium humeris vibratus, Dux eligitur. He speaketh to the purpose More Gentis, because this fashion was proper and particular to the Gaules, and to their Brethren the Germaines, altogether conformable in Religion, and manner of life.

The Hollanders exalting of their King.

Iulian the Apostata, being Gouernour of the Gaules, was by the Gaulish Legions proclaimed Emperour, at his Pallace of Thermes, in the Suburbes of Paris. This Palace comprehended (in those times) the whole extenditre, where now is the Hay streete, the Hostel de Clugny, the streets of the Mathurins, of Coupe-gueule (at this present Sorbonne) and of the Masons, so farre as to the gates of Saint Iames, and Saint Michaell: And after the fashion of the Ancient Gaules, exalted vpon a Shield: so speaketh his Historian Ammianus Marcellinus. Impositusque Scuto Pedestri, & sublatus eminens, nullo sciente, Augustus renuntiatus est.

Iulian the Apostata proclaimed Emperor.

Hee saith Scuto Pedestri, to shewe, that it was according to the Gaules manner, and not the Romaines, because the Romaine Souldiours had the Clypeum or Buckler, and the Germaines and Gaules, the Scutus or Shield. Those there, the Target, long, and square both aboue and beneath: and they heere the Shield, largelaloft and at the midst, the rest finishing fairely in a point. Scutum ad staturam Hominis longum, prolibito cuiusque ornatum: So saith Diodorus Siculus, in the sixt Booke of his Antiquities. For the principall Armes of French Cheualiers, was the Lance and Shield. As for the word Framea, it is equiuocall, namely in the history of Saint Gregory Victor, Archbyshoppe of Tours, taking it for all kinds of Armes, to be vsed with the hand, Lance, Dart, Iauelin, Arrow, Eques Scuto, Framea que contentus est. So saieth Tacitus, de moribus Germanorum. The Knight is sufficiently armed with his Shield and Lance: For the Gauls neuer went without Swords, which they wore in a Scarfe or Bauldricke, A dextro latere, ad sinistrum pendent; saith the same Tacitus, Hanging from the right side to the left.

Difference betweene the Shieldes for Horse & foot

But there was difference betweene the Horsemans Shield, and the French foote Souldiers, which Marcelinus called Scutum Pedestre, because it couered the foote Souldier from the foote to the head, and whereon (when neede required) he might safely passe the greatest Riuers, by swimming on it, as before hath bin saide, according to the Authorities of Gregorie of Tours, in his history of France. Whereas the Horsemans Shield was little, to couer the breast onely, against the dangers of the Lance. As is to be seene in Figures on Tombes and Graue stones, after the Ancient maner: And at this present day, on the great Seales of Princes and supreame Lords, represented on horseback, armed from foote to head, with the Shield before the breast, and the drawne sword in his right hand.

The shield the chiefe Armes for a souldier on horse and foote.

Now the Shield being the principall Armes for a Souldier both on horse and foot, and an vndoubted acknowledgement, concerning the Nobleness of his extraction: it was all the care and diligence of the Foote Souldier and Horseman, to keepe and defend it with the perill of his life. Because such a one as was so negligent, or such a villaine, as to suffer it to be torne from him, or to loose it in a raunged Battaile: he was abandoned of all the world, as an excommunicated person, hated, detested, excluded, and banished from all commerce with men, so that he might better kill himselfe, rather then to suruiue such a shame, as we are instructed by Tacitus. Scutum dereliquisse præcipuum flagitium, nec cui sacris adesse (there is excommunication) aut consilium inire (diets and publike assemblies) ignominioso fas est. Multi superstites bellorum, infamiam laqueo finierunt. In the Salique Law (that is the Code of the Ancient French, from Pharamond so farre as to Lewes the Debonnaire) he that iniuried another, by telling him, that hee had lost or throwne away his Shield in the Hoast; he should pay six times twenty Deniers for a fine, that was three Solles, for the Sol of the French valueth forty Deniers. Si quis alteri imputauerit, quod Scutum suum proiecisset in Hoste, vel fugiendo præ timore CXX. denariorum, qui faciunt Solidos tres, culpabilis iudicetur.

Concerning the Salique & Ripuarie Law

Vnder the first Monarchs of France, at the Seats of Iustice, when the Pleas and suites were debated, contained in the Salique and Ripuarie Law, called Mallos, the place for the Assembly tearmed Mallus, (from whence came the Verbe Admallare, as much to say, as an Appealee, or defendant in an Appeale, Admallatus, Appealed:) there was vpon the Chaire or Seate of the President an Intendant of Iustice, L'Escu charge des Esmaulx, that is to say, A Shield charged with the Armes of the King; to demonstrate, that there was the Bench of Royall Iustice. The Salique Law, at the title De Reippus, concerning the marriage of Widdowes, the first Paragraph: Tunginius, aut Centenarius Mallum indicent, & in ipso Mallo Scutum habere debent & tres Sagibarones.

The titles of Officers of Iustice.

These Mallus or Pleas were not intended for ordinary dayes, when meetings were before the first Iudges, whom we call Prouosts: but on those held by the Bayliffs, who were called Countes, in the Law Ripuarie, Chapter XC. Graziones, Graffiones, Margraff, and Grauen in the Germane tongue, as much to say as Counts, Intendants of Iustice, who had vnder them Vicounts, particular Iudges in Cities and Townes, whose Lieutenants were also named Vicary, Vicares (a word retained to this day in the Germane Empire) and in France knowne by the name of Viguiers. But the Countes were the men, to execute the charges and commands of Iustice, they whom the Salique Law and the Capitularies called Tunginos and Centenarios. And for Associates on the Seats of Iustice, they had three sufficient and honest men at the least, men of good life, without any reproach, who serued to the said Counts as well for Assistants, as also Commissaries, to make the enquests, Informations in causes doubtfull, in matters Ciuill and Criminall. Those Associates and Commissaries, were called in the Salique Law Sagibarones, at the title of Afatomie, that is to say, of Donations. Hoc conuenit obseruare vt Tunginus, aut Centenarius Mallum habeant, & Scutum in ipso Mallo habeant, & tres Sagibarones.

Assises or times of generall Sessions.

Those Mallus were properly such, as in France are called Assises, or Great Sessions, because at those times, they iudged none other but causes of importance, specified in the Charter of Priuiledges, granted by King Lewes the Debonnaire, Emperor, to Spanyards fugitiues from Cathalogna, Rossillion, and Cerdaignia, Prouinces vsurped by the Moores.

Moores. Maiores causæ sicuti Homicidia, rapsus, incendia, depredationes, membrorum amputationes, furta, latrocinia, alienarum rerum inuasiones, quæ cum vicinis criminaliter accidunt, ad Comitis Mallum venire debent.

Prohibited places where the Sessions ought not to be kept.

And those great dayes of Sessions were prohibited and charged, not to bee kept in the Churches or Porches of Churches, or in sanctified places, which were called by our Ancients Paruis and Paradises, and we at this time tearme Paruis, were they couered or inclosed with walles, or no. Comes conuenientem locum consideret & inueniat vbi Rationem Ad Mallum tenendum constituat, Quia nefas est ibi reos puniri, vbi respectu diuinæ reuerentiæ misericordiam consequuntur. So speaketh the Ordonance of the generall Estates, held at Soissons, the yeare of Grace, 853. So that, if there were no any Paruis, couered or distinguished by a wall: before euery Church should be reserued a square Arpent of ground, to serue as Paruis, within which the Lay Iudge was prohibited to exercise his Iustice, in the Ordonance of King Clotharius the first. Si quæ Ecclesiæ, quibus Atria clausa non sint, vtraque parte parietum terræ spatium, Arpennis pro atrio obseruetur. And those Assises, for the weightinesse of the matters in them to be handled, were not to be holde but in the mornings. Placitum Comes non habeat nisi ieiunus, so saith the Ordonance of Charlemaigne, at the fifteenth Paragraphe.

The Parliament holde in the open field.

Aboue those Assises and great dayes of Generall Sessions, was the Parliament held euery yeare (as we shall further relate in our second booke) in the open field: In Campo, and not of good Cities, by the Ordonance of Childebert, first of the name, with the Generall Estates, that is to say, in the Generall Parliament held at Vtrecht. Traiecti omnibus nobis adunatis conuenit Campo. Notwithstanding, the Appellations of those great Sessions or Assises, were not concerned in the Parliament: because the Counts sentenced crimes, by the last iudgement, as the Prouost Marshalles do in France. They onely consulte on the State Affayres, according to the occurrences whereof, they make and publish diuersity of Ordonances. For, from the time of the Druides, who were the Soueraigne Iudges of the Gaules, the Parliament tooke knowledge of the State affayres, as well for Peace, as for Warre. And this generall Parliament was composed of Church-men, Nobles, Dukes, and Countes; that is to say, of Gouernours and Lieutenants generall and particular of Prouinces, and Officers of the Crowne of France, who were all held and obliged vnder paines) to yeelde themselues to the generall Estates: according to the Ordonances reiterated by King Charlemaigne. De pœnis Episcoporum, Abbatum, & Comitum qui ad Placitum nostrum non venerint. For the Parliament was called Royall, farre differing from the great Assises held by the Countes.

The Druides the chief Iudges of the Gaules.

The marke or note of the Parliament.

And the marke or signale of this generall Parliament, was a high Pole, planted in the middest of the field where the Assembly was made, on the toppe of which pole or stake, was fastened the Shield Royall, that is to say, the Armes of the Kings of France, in like manner as ouer the Iudges Seats.

A custome retayned by the Emperours of Germanie, as we are enstructed by Otho of Austria, Archbishop of Frisinghen, in the life of the Emperour Fredericke the first, the first Booke and the twelfth Chapter. Est autem consuetudinis Regum Francorum, quæ & Teutonum, vt quotiescunque ad sumendum Imperij Coronam, militem ad transalpinandum (passe the Alpes to go into Italy) coegerint, in prædicto Campo mansionem faciant. Ibi, ligno in altum erecto Scutum suspenditur.

Titles giuen to the French, by the great King Clouis.

The Poet Guntherus Ligurinus, in the life of the same Emperour,

Ligno suspenditur alte
Erecto Clypeus, tum Præco regius omnes
Conuocat, a Dominis Feudalia iura tenentes.

Thus the French made such worthie esteeme of their Shields, that they exalted and carried vpon them, their Princes and Monarches; comming to the Crown, to make publike note thereby, that by the like ceremonies as those, Royall Maiestie was embraced, be-weene their armes, as being iudged worthy of such manner of conduct. And that Nation, wholly generous and warlike (Gens Francorum inclyta, auctore Deo condita, fortis in armis, profunda in consilio, firma in pacis fœdere, corpore nobilis, candore, & forma egregia, audax, velox, & aspera, Titles which the Great Clouis gaue them) neuer went but armed, in what place soeuer it were: holding it for an assured Maxime, that the very greatest honour which they could do to their Prince, was to receiue him into their Armes. This ceremonie of eleuation of the Greeke Emperours, is particularly described by Popalates, in the great Office of the Crowne Officers of Constantinople, saying. Then the new Emperour seased on a Shield, was exalted on high, to be seene of the people, and that the ...res before, which sustained the said Shield, were raised by the said Emperor reigning, ...the Father of the Elected (if he were liuing) were with the Patriarche of Constantino... before; on the sides and behinde, came the Princes of blood, and for want of them, principall Officers of the Empire. In this order and equipage, the ...ted Emperor was carried three times round about the field, which the Romaine Hi... rians called Fossatum, where he descended from off the Shield; and afterward was ...nducted into the Church of Saint Sophia, to be crowned and Sacred: after the Sacri... e of the Masse, and the accustomed prayers. *Postea vero Imperator ipse Scuto insidens ...altum extollitur, & spectandus exhibetur omnibus turbis stantibus inferiore loco. CHAP. III.

Of Helmets; And likewise of their Ornaments, Labels and Crests.

Diodorus Siculus, describing the furniture of the ancient Gauls, speak... eth thus of their Armes for the head. Aerea galea caput muniunt paulum eminentiora, in qua cornua impressa, aut auium aut quadrupedum effigies sculpta sunt. The Gaules had for habillements of the head, Helmets, Murrians, or headpieces of Brasse, the Mezail or Beauers eleuated before the face: And for Crest, the hornes of terrestriall Animals of diuers kindes, and of Foules with wings displaied. That which this Greeke interpreteth Galeam, the Ro... maines called Cassidem, and the ancient French Helmum, which ...e call a Helm t, following the old Law of the Ribarols, in the thirty eight Chapter, where there is made some enumeration of Armes, and garments for warre, worne by ...e auncient French: Spatham cum Cogisa, the Sword and the Ponyard; Helmum, the ...ad piece; Beinbergas, the Greues and Tasses, &c.

Two kindes of seuerall Head-pieces for warre.

Of these Murrians, Caskes, Timbres, Helmets, and Head-pieces, our Ancestors had ...wo seuerall fashions, for the Horsemen, and for the Infanterie. For the Seruitours on foote, namely the Bisognes, that is to say, fresh men, or new come Souldiors, whom the ...omaines called Pyrones; they wore Caps or Coifes of hard boyled Leather, such as flaggons and Bottles were wont to be couered withall. And this kinde of couering the ...ead, was called Galea, by the Gaulish name Galerus, a Cap or Scull Cap. And as for the Caske or Murrian, which the Romans called Cassidem, it was made of apt yeelding plates of Iron, or of Brasse, which serueth for our better vnderstanding (those) passages in Diodorus Siculus, and Cornelius Tacitus, in his Germanie. Vix uni alterive Gallis aut ...alea.

These Murrians of Leather, or of Iron, which in elder dayes were reserued Burgeones, by reason the Bourgongnons (their deadly enemies) made vse of such Armours, did ordinarily represent the Muzzell of a Lyon, a Woolfe, a Dragon, or else some other fearefull ...eature, to strike (as hath beene said) feare in tiede children. ...

We learne of Homer, in the tenth booke of his Iliades, that on the dayes of battaile, Agamemnon sacred himself vnto the Sunne, with the skin of a Lyon, and with the head thereof couered his ...e head, ouer his back and shoulders, the skin reaching downe vnderneath his Cuisses. Virgil hath imitated the very same, in the seuenth booke of his Aeneidos, describing the equipage of a certaine man named Auentinus.

Our Auncestors enrich them with the Hornes of diuers Beasts, or elſe the Probo and ſnowts of Elephants: as yet to this preſent day doe the Nobles and great Lord Germanie, a cuſtome long time put in practiſe by them, as Plutarch writeth in the li Caius Marius: where he deſcribeth their Helmets and Creſts with Lyons mouthes, o other wilde and cruell beasts, as alſo the Hornes of them, whereon, becauſe they w ſeeme the more terrible, and greater then naturally they ſhould be, they wore the Pl of diuers Birds and Foules.

The Greekes learned of the Gaules, to ſur-round their Helmets and head pieces w plumes of Feathers, which we tearme Mantles, or Labels of a File, and the Creſt Hornes: As is obſerued by Euripides, ſpeaking of Hyppomedon the Myrenian; and N ſuruh, in the life of Pyrrhus, reporting, that this Prince was knowne aboue all the C taines of his Armie, becauſe out of his Helmet iſſued out two great Hornes of a Goate, in the very midſt of them, a high goodly Plume, wauing ouer the Helmet, which th called an Armet. The word Armet, is a diminitiue of the word Armes, becauſe, acc ding to the Noble Science thereof, it is, or ought to be, ordenarily adorned, with principalleſt Armes. For example, if the parties Armes be of a Lyon, an Eagle, o Bull: the Helmet ought to beare as Creſt, a Lyon, an Eagle, or Bull, if there be no ma for enquirie.

The ordinary adorning of the Helmet, according to the Armes of the perſon.

The reaſon of Enquirie.

Matter to be enquired is ſo called, in regard of Supporters (that is to ſay, which ſuſta the Armes) whether they be different, or no.

The Birth, or
The Office.

An example alleadged.

Concerning Birth; As all they of the famous houſe of Linſygnan, carrie for Cr Vne Cuue d'Or a la femme naiſſante qui ſe mire, & ſe peigne: becauſe that this illuſtri Farnilie (the ſourſe of ſo many Kings of Ieruſalem, of Armenia, of Cyprus, and ſo m ny wayes allied to the moſt famous houſes of Chriſtendome) tooke originall and defc from a great Lady of Poitou, the Lady of Melle, and of Luſignan, whence was diuid the name of Melluſine, whom the auncient Romancers ſuppoſed to be a Fayrie. In li manner, they of the worthy houſe of Cleues, carried a Swanne for Creſt, by being d cended of the Knight of the Swan.

Concerning Office.

By Office; for the dignity of the perſon, and namely, if he be an Officer of the Crown For, to this effect, the Chauncellor, chiefe of all the Soueraigne Iuſtices in France, and t Preſidents of the Mortier, or Cap worne in the Courts of Parlement; doe carrie as Cy le Mortier, as a note or marke of their Soueraigne Offices.

Creſts for diuers Officers in great place.

In like manner, the Conſtable may carry for Creſt of his Timbre, L'Eſpee nue en t a trauerſe. And the Deſtrochere of France, the Great Maiſter, and the Chamberlai Les Baſtons d'Or aux Eſmaux de France le premier en Pal, & l'autre en Bande. The Marſh the Battaile Axe; the Admirall, the Anker; the Colonell of the Infantrie, La Cuiſſe Hanche aux Poignees, & a la Trabe de France; the Maiſter of the Horſe, Porte en Ban Eſpee au ſouuereau, & la ceincture Royale ſemee de Fraunce, and in like manner other Of cers of the Crowne onely.

Princes of the blood of France.

As for the Princes of the Noble blood of France, they haue no other Creſt on th Tymbre and Helmet, but onely the Floure de Luce double: neither the moſt famous M narches and Soueraignes of Chriſtendome. In former times, as the Kings of France h had no other Supporters, then two Angels. As alſo their priuate Seale or Signet, w ſupported by one Angell onely. And not two: euen ſo the Princes of the blood of Fra for preheminence and dignity of the Lys de Lyllie, had no other ſupporters but two A gels. As I haue obſerued in many Monſteries of their foundation, and as any man m ſee in the Chappell of Bourbon, neere to the Louure. Now in regard of the Lambr quins, which are the Plumes for ornament of the Helmet: they ought not to be varied proceeding as the Eſmaux des Armes, and no other colors, for otherwiſe they are falſe. B ſume we now to our ancient Creſts:

Tit

Titus Liuius, ſpeaking of the King of Macedon Philip, in the ſeauen and twentieth ooke of his Romaine Hiſtory, writeth, that (according to the Gauliſh manner) this Prince rried on his Caske, a goodly Creſt of Hornes (if he were the Father of Alexander the reat, his wife Olimpias perhaps gaue him the Blazon) In arborem illatus impetu aqui alte n cornu Galeæ ad eminentem ramum poſtregit. Thus of the Greekes.

The Romaines, at their beginning, as in happeneth in euery new-ſpringing Common ealthes: were as ſimple in the tir harneſſe for warre, as in their manner of life, yea, and in eir Sacrifices, for they neither offred or burnt any Beaſts for Sacrifice.

On the Altars in their Temples, in the ſhade of ſome tufted wood, but only the branches Verueine.

Ara dabat fumos herbis contenta Sabinis,
In ſacris nullum culter habebat opus.

This we learne of Ouid in the firſt booke of his Faſts.

They had a cuſtome of delight, for ſome dayes in the yeare, to viſite one another in e forme of a Maſque-rado, and to diſguiſe their inuention, they would maske and co r their faces with great leaues of Bardane, the rootes whereof do beare Burre-Dockes: nd of this hearbe (hurtfull for labour) Virgill ſpeaketh in the firſt booke of his Geor cks.

Lapaque, Tribulique.

The reaſon was, becauſe this herbe called Lapa, had the ſurname of Perſonata: accor ng to the teſtimony of Plinie and Mathiolus, in his iudgement on Dioſcorides. So in the time of their firſt warres, when they marched on to battaile, or elſe returned cke with victorie: they ſhaddowed their Cabaſſets and Murrians with broad leaues of anthus, an herbe renowned by Virgill, in the ſecond booke of his Georgicks.

Et baccas ſemper frondentis Acanthi.

It is that which we call Brank-vrſin, whereof Plinie in the two and twentieth Chapter his Naturall Hiſtorie, Dioſcorides, and the great herbaliſt doe ſet downe the proper s.

In time following, the Romans borrowed of the Gauls, the faſhion of Helmets and reſts of Birds, placing Hornes vpon their Armets and Murrians, as Virgill in his twelft iade.

Enſemque, Clypeumque, & vmbræ cornua criſtæ.

But concerning the Lambrequins of Princes and great Lords, they made vſe (princi lly) of Oſtridge Plumes, for fairer embelliſhing their Helmets, and Chanfraines of their les for battaile. Plinie Prawia ex iis una propter amplitudinem pro quibuſdam habita ſis, Conoſque Bellicos, & Galeas Adornantes.

For want of them, they imployed in the ſame places, the tailes of Peacockes. Claudian his Panegyricke for the ſixt Conſulſhip of Honorius.

Some other ſerued their turns with Plumes of Swans, for their whiteneſſe, anſwerable Virgill.

But they were practiſed by Knights of honor.

Concerning the cruell and fleſh-deuouring Leſtrigons, couetous of humaine blood, hout diſcretion: they couered them and their horſes, with the tailes of Horſes or Buls, adfull for their ruddie colour, and condemned by all Antiquitie: Virgil in his ſeauenth oke, deſciphering the cruell and inhumane Mezentius, ſaith:

And for the ſame ſubiect, Virgill armed Turnus with an Helmet and Creſt of a Chimera, moſt frightfull aſpect.

To fixe and fasten those Plumes in the Crests and tops of Helmets: they had alwaye ready three or foure sharpe mayles, according as it is obserued by the Prince of Frenc Poets Peter de Ronsard, in his Franciade of the Combate betweene Francus and the Gia Phoneus: Thus Englished.

That this Minion should become our prey,
Let vs fasten his nailed Murrian,
Aboue the Temple, vowed to my Father.

And the same man, in describing the Helmet and Timbre of the Gyant, giueth him flash of Lightning for his Crest.

His Lance in hand, the Murrian on his head
Well Crested, the tempest doth resemble Sent downe from Iupiter in Summer monthes.

How Helmets were beautified in ancient times

In elder times, vpon the dayes of battaile, Princes and great Lords vsed to adorne and decke their Helmets (according to their qualities) with Buckles, Studdes and Circles of Gold, garnished with rich and costly Stones, & on the top or Crests of them, wreaths of corded Silkes, being the Liueries and colours of their Ladies and Mistresses, as also some curled lockes of their haire. Those Cordons (like wauing Scarfes) dangled downe (behinde them) on the crupper of their horses, the ends of them being fairely tasselled, and enriched with Pearles and precious Stones. Because vpon such dayes of Triumph and Glory, they rode with like alacritie of spirit, ioy and pompe; as if it were to wedding or solemne festiuals.

Zonaras, in the first booke of his Histories, the nineteenth Chapter, and other following, describing the battaile which Cyrus the Monarch of Persia, gaue to Croesus King of the Lydians; maketh the Prince Abradatas to be armed by the hands of his wife, the faire Queene Panthea, with rich Armour, which she her selfe had beaten and forged, commelled with Gold and Azure, because her husband should haue some neere resemblance to his Prince Cyrus. On the Armour was engrauen diuers Histories, which his Panthe couered with a Coate of Armes, composed of Tyrian Purple, embrodered curiously with Gold.

And taking her last farewell of him (for hee dyed in the battaile) shee embellished his Helmet (guilded and damasked with Gold and Azure, like to his Armes) with a great goodly Plume of Feathers, resembling the colour of the Hyacinthe, spangled with Gold. What followeth of this Historie, is at large set downe by Xenophon, in the seauenth booke of the Institution of a Prince: most worthy to be read by Ladies of Honor, who in the death of that faire and vertuous Princesse, may see a well polished Christall, of true and Conjugall loue.

These passages of Zonaras and Xenophon, doe enstruct vs, that the Greekes and Persians vsed Helmets and Plumed Crests. Ouer and beside which, those men that among the Romaines had won any prizes and Crownes, by their valiancie in warre: couered their Helmets and Caskes, as is remarked by Virgill, in his seauenth Æneiad.

Fronde super Galeam, & fœlici comptus Oliua,

Close Crowns Chappeaux and Circles.

And from thence it ensued as a custome, that the Helmets and Crests of Monarchs, Princes and great Lords, which by right could carrie close Crownes, Chappeaux, or Circles, were relieued, raised or lifted vp, to be distinguished and knowne in fights and battailes. And for the same subiect, the Shields of their Armes were adorned and relieued with faire Mantles (if they were Princes, or Dukes) charged with Esmaux and Blazons of their Armes, which wrapped about them.

The supreme part of Kings Crownes distinguished.

But concerning the point or top of those Crownes, they were different. For, among Christian Princes, the Noble King of France had his exalted with a double Fleur de Luce. The Emperour; the Kings of England, Spaine, Sicilie, Hungarie, Bohemia, and others of Poland, had their Crowns finishing in a Boule or Mounde, supporting a Cross. By example of the Romaine Emperors, successors vnto Constantine the Great, who pointed that his Buckler should be adorned with the Cipher and Monograme of X. P. S. and his Helmet with a Crosse for Crest; so saith Prudentius.

Christorum insignia Christus
Scripserat, ardebat summis Crux addita Cristis.

And the same Emperors carried also the Globe, on the dayes of their pompe and solemnities, to make it publiquely knowne, that by their beliefe in the wholesome signe of the Crosse; they were Lords on the earth, which the Globe represented by his rotunditie, and their Faith by the Crosse; on the tree whereof Iesus Christ was nailed, to deliuer the world from eternall death, according as it is written by Suidas.

We will conclude this Chapter with this aduertisement, that there are many sorts and differences of Helmets (as, in the like manner, of Crownes, whereof we will discourse in the last Chapter of this first Booke) practised and kept more carefully, and (if it may be said) more religiously in Germanie, then in all the other Kingdomes. Not permitting meane Gentlemen to cut and square with Princes, nor Yeomen to counterfeit Noblemen (Armes, Crests and Ornaments of them. For they will not suffer a simple Souldior, or a new-made Captaine, to beare Helmets, Lambrequins, Crest nor Supporters, the rules of the noble Science of Armes and Blazons, not being prophaned among them, as they are in other parts, through the ignorance of Heralds, Kings and Pursuiuants of Armes, to whom (being learned and skilfull) it appertaineth to giue Armes and Blazons, according to the quality of such persons, as are capable of bearing them, by the leaue of the Soueraigne Prince, and to none other.

Many varieties and differences of Helmets

The honorable care obserued in Germanie.

The distinguishing of bearing Helmets.

To Kings onely it belongeth, Porter le Heaulme au Mentail tarre de front a vnze grilles. To Dukes, A haults fleurons, that is to say, Soueraignes in their Countries, Nine Others, Dukes, Marquesses, Counts and Viscounts; Seauen: the high Barons, and Knights fiue; Gentlemen of so Noble a house, as they neither doe nor ought to Tarrer de front, may haue on the side onely, that is, Trois grilles. Such as are borne in lawfull and loyall marriage, turne to the right side; but Bastards to the left (all in one manner as the placing of their Armes.) But if they be no Bastards of a Soueraigne house, hauing right to beare Chappeaux or Circles: in this case they may be allowed to beare it, Tarre de front.

CHAP. IIII.

Of Heralds, Kings, and Pursuiuants of Armes.

The dignity of an Ambassadors place and Office.

AMong all the best gouerned Nations, it hath euermore bin held for a maine maxime, that Ambassadours haue the place of inuiolable persons, and euen (as it were) Sacred. Moreouer, whatsoeuer iniuries or wrongs they receiued, were reputed to be done to the persons of those Princes that sent them. Hanon, King of the Ammonites; hauing (in contempt) shaued off halfe the beards, and cut the garments to the thighes, of the Ambassadours sent from King Dauid: the Ammonites, with their King, were quite exterminated, and Rabbah, their capitall City (with all the rest be-) consumed into ashes: As it is written in the second booke of the Kings, the tenth d twelfth Chapters.

In what regard Ambassadors are punishable.

Now, although Ambassadours (to speake properly) are Spies (couered with a title full honor) to obserue the actions of Princes to whom they are sent: yet notwithstanding, ey haue no such permission granted them, as to debosh and corrupt the subiects and ailes of those Princes, to vrge priuate conspiracies, practises and threatnings, against ir estates and persons. For in so doing they are punishable, according to the right and of Nations, for breaking the lists and order of Hospitality: So that they are no longer to be held and reputed for Ambassadours, but disturbers of the publique peace and iet. There is one example of the ancient Gaules (without seeking any where else) recited by Plutarch in the life of Furius Camillus, where speaking of the Gaules departing out of their originary or naturall Countrey, to the number of three hundred thousand men, vnder conduct of the Nephewes to Ambigatus, King of the Gaules: hee saith, that having vnthralled the Alpes, they conquered Tuscanie, and at the siege of Clusium, the Romaines sent three of the Fabij to them as Ambassadours, to deale wisely with them in raising the siege, in fauour of the Clusians, who had requested and entreated the Romains so to doe.

Treacherie most infamous in Ambassadors.

The Ambassadours hauing deliuered their message to Brennus, Generall of the Gaules Armie, instead of returning backe to Rome, they went into the besieged Citie, and incited the inhabitants, to issue forth vpon the besiegers: among whom Quintus Fabius Ambustus (one of the Ambassadours) happened to be knowne: Vpon this occasion, Brennus calling the Gods of the Romaines to witnesse, how basely they had violated the rights of Nations, by being come as Ambassadours, and yet afterward to performe the action of an enemy; hauing raised the siege at Clusium, he caused the Gaules to march directly to Rome, which they surprised vpon a sodaine, and sacking it, put all to fire and sword, but first they sent their Heralds to the Romaines, demanding him who made the offence, that they might be reuenged on him. The Capitole was so narrowly besieged, that the Romaines were constrained to redeeme both it and themselues, paying the ransome of ten thousand pounds of Gold, which Brennus brought into Tuscanie; and this Gold was kept many yeares after, as a marke and especiall remembrance, concerning the dutie of an Ambassadour, and the iust reuenge which the Gaules had taken, for the breach thereof.

But so long as Ambassadours keepe within the tearmes of their charge, which ought to be maintenance of the Princes peace who sends them, with him to whom they are sent. In this case Sancta sunt corpora Legatorum, & inter Hostes esse debent incolumes; so saith Varro, in his third booke of the Latine tongue, and the Oratour also, inueighing against Verres. Their person is inuiolable, and the Prince that offendeth them, without occasion; begetteth the title of an enemy, and thereby draweth warre vpon him. So the Romaines ruined the Citie of Corinth, because the Inhabitants had outraged their Ambassadours. Vpon the same subiect, they delegued Great Pompey, to goe and make warre vpon Mithridates King of the Parthians. Si quis Legatum Hostium pulsasset, contra Ius Gentium id commissum esse putatur, quia Sancti Habentur Legati: So saith the Ciuile Lawyer Pomponius, in the finall Law De Legato. Digest.

Heralds haue the same priuiledge as Ambassadors.

Heralds haue the selfe same priuiledge, their persons are inuiolable and sacred: to them no outrage ought to be done, neither any violence, by words or deedes.

They tooke their beginning and first originall, so soone as the Kings and Princes of the world distinguished their Subiects into Nobles and Yeomen: by drawing the one sort neere to their persons, for their prudence and vertue, and reiecting the other from their seruice and counsell, because they could not be knowne worthy, or capable.

The Assyrians, Persians, and other Nations of the East had them in honor, their Princes making vse of their seruice. As the Rabbines haue obserued on the 41. Chapter of Genesis, in the aduancement of Ioseph, and on the third of Daniel. Plutarch in the life of Alexander the Great, writeth, that this mighty Monarch had for his ordenary Guard, three thousand yong men, all Persians, readily fashioned and prepared for Armes, and fit for all honest exercises; especially speaking the Greeke tongue most elegantly. Among these some were the Guards of his body; others, Gentlemen of his Chamber, Vshers of the Haule, Mace-bearers, Heralds, and Kings of Armes, for the executing of his commands.

The Greekes called these Heralds Ceryces, and Irenophylaces. Dionisius Halicarnassæus tearmed them Κηρυκες: the Romaines Caduceatores, Feciales, Præcones: and the French Kings, Heralds, or Pursuiuants of Armes, according to the interpretation of the Greeke names Εἰρηνοφύλακες Pacis Arbitros, Guardians and Sequestrators of Peace, as their ordinary appellation founded of Irenophylaces, taken from the effect and issue of their charge, which was, to appease differences by the waies of mildnesse, and to appoint Nations enemies, before they should proceede to handy strokes.

The effect and issue of a Heralds charge.

In euery City of Greece there were two Heralds, called by honourable title Κήρυκες as we learne of Vlpian, Interpretor of the Oratour Demosthenes, in th: Oration against Timocrates. They were honoured by all estates, in regard of their charge, nourished and maintained of the publique purse, and priuiledged aboue all other Citizens, to be the Apostles and workers of Peace, which still they councelled & maintained, inciting the people to preserue themselues in peace, & not to seek after war. As did the traitor Herald of the Athenians, Lords of Athens, named Laos, who discouered the designs of his Maisters to Thy-

The honorable estimation of Heralds.

Plutarche recordeth in the life of the said Prince. Hereupon, and for this reason, they carried Rods and Wands, made of the branches of Palme or Oliue (Symboles of peace) writhed or wound about with wooll, to demonstrate with what soft gentlenesse, they ought to acquit themselues of their charge. Those Rods were called Iresione, of Ἐιρήνη which signifieth to accord and make peace. They were painted between two Hornes of Amalthea, or of Abundance: because Peace, which is the best guift that God can giue to men, produceth all kindes of goodnesse whatsoeuer.

Pax aluit viteis, & sulcos condidit vna.

The Romaines writhed about the Caduceus of their Fecialians, two Serpents, like to that of Mercurie, whom they feigned to be the Messenger, the Herald and Interpreter of the Gods, and who (as the Poets maintaine) going one day vpon an Embassage, found in his way two Serpents, which fought together. Hauing put his Rod betweene them, they writhed themselues about it, comming to embrace and kisse each other: And in memorie of this miracle, alwayes after, Mercurie carried his Rod writhed about with two Serpents, and in imitation of him, the Caduceatores, Greekes and Romaines, carried their Rods in the same manner. These are Poeticall fictions, which carry no probability or likelihood of truth, it was with the Gaules Heifers that the Romaines ploughed: for Plinie reciteth in the nine and twentieth Booke of his naturall History, and the third Chapter, that the fashion of this Caduceus, was borrowed by the Romaines of the auncient Gaules.

Mercurie the Herald and messenger of the Gods.

The auncient Druides, Arbitrators and Sequesters both of Peace and Warre, before they gaue power to the Gaulish Kings and Princes, to march in battaile against their enemies (which they did by the tradition of militarie Standards and Ensignes, whereof they had the custody in their sacred Temples: Signa Detracta Lucis in prælium ferunt, so saith Tacitus) they sent their Heralds to their enemies, to incite and summon them to peace, and reparation of the iniuries receiued. Those Heralds carried their Caduecan Rods, made of the branches of Verueine, and thereof the auncient Druides made vse (according to the testimony of the same Plinie, in his fiue and twentieth booke, and ninth chapter) writhed with two figures of Serpents, by a certaine proportion and simmetrie: not for the Fables picted and inuented by the Greekes (ouer-bold and impudent lyers) but onely to giue knowledge and demonstration, that those Heralds interpreted the will of their Princes, being therein short, sweete, well aduised, wise and subtile as the Serpent, the Symbole of prudence and wisedome in the sacred Scripture. A vertue necessary in euery Statesman, but especially in an Embassador; if he would worthily accomplish his charge, to the honor and content of the Prince that sent him.

Obseruations concerning the Serpent.

Orus Apollo writeth in his Hieroglyphickes, that the Rod or Caduceus, writhed with Serpents, was the signale and noate of prouidence and wisedome: because, that among creeping creatures, of a foule and earthie substance, there is not any more aduised and subtile, then the Serpent; who to warrant and secure himselfe from the Shepheards armes, stoppeth his eares, the one with his tayle, and fixing the other firmely to the ground. He purgeth his braine and cleareth his sight with a certaine Hearbe, the property and vertue whereof is knowne onely to himselfe. Moreouer, he knoweth how to renew his old skin, becomming yong againe, and conserning himselfe long in life, by eating certaine Hearbe, remarked by Plutarch, Plinie, and other Naturalists.

For this reason the Druides, consuming themselues continually in the knowledge of naturall things, euen from the Cedars of Lybanus, to the Hysope, knowing the properties and admirable vertues of the Serpent, caused their Heralds Rods to be so writhed. This is that whereof Plinie speaketh, in the passage before alleaged, concerning the Druides and their Heralds. Hic complexus anguium, & efferatarum concordia causa videtur esse, quamobrem exteræ Gentes Caduceum in pacis argumentis circumdatum effigie anguium fecerint; neque enim cristatos esse in Caduceo mos est: The Greekes and Romaines learned the fashion of the auncient Gaules. And thereupon, for the properties of the Serpent, to make himselfe become yong againe: they feigned, that the Rod and Caduceus of Mercurie, had the vertue to cure diseases, and to re-seate the soule in the body, being deuided from it. And other wonders, whereof Homer speaketh in his fourth Odysses, Virgill in his fourth Æneiad, and the Lyricke Poet.

Tu pias lætis animas reponis
Sedibus, Virgaque leuem coerces

Aurea turbam, Superis Deorum
Gratus, & imis.

Those Rods and Caduceuses of the Greekes, made of Oliue branches, were nam*Cericia* Κηρύκια, whereof is said in the eight Law De ver. diuis. at the Digest. Sanct *est quod ab iniuria hominum defensum atque munitum est. Sanctum autem dictum est a S*minibus. Sagmina sunt autem quædam herbæ quas Legati Populi Romani ferre solebant,

The Romaines carried them of Verueine, which they called a Sacred Hearbe, and t

Chapter. Interim fortius augetur auctoritas, quæ quanta debeatur etiam surdis, hoc est

Of the excellency of Verueine.

The Greekes called Verueine Hierobotanon, and Peristereon, held by them (as well by the Romaines) for the most excellent among all other hearbes. And therewith th washed and made cleane the Table of their God Iupiter, and purified their houses; b making Perfumes and Suffumigations, of the masle Incense.

Verbenasque adolo pingues, & mascula thura.

So saith Virgill in his eight Eclogue. And the Greeke Priests, as also the Romaine, clo thed in their linnen Albes (in imitation of the Druides) making their Sacrifices, were cro ned with Verueine.

Velati Lino, & Verbena tempora vincti.

Saith the same Virgill in his twelfth Æneiad. And namely, that from the time of N ma Pompilius, the Disciple of Pithagoras, who was long time since those wise Druides t Romaines made no other Sacrifices, but onely with Verueine.

Ara dabat fumos herbis contenta Sabinis

So writeth Ouid in the first of his Fasts.

We learne of the auncient Annalist S. Gregorie Victor, Archbishop of Tours, in h

Heralds vsed to carry (in the deliuery of their Messages) Scepters, and consecrated Rods

Homer giueth Scepters to Heralds (and not Rods and whisking wands) euen as to Kin and Soueraigne Princes, attributing the like authoritie to them, yea, and in such sort the Grecian Princes would stand vp before them, giuing them honor and reuerence. A in those times then, such as exercised the Office of Heralds, were men well borne, great grauity, delicate in speech, skilfull and vertuous, which caused them to be hono red and respected of euery one. In the first of Homers Iliades, King Agamemnon, Ge rall of the Grecian Army, sent his two Heralds Talthybius and Euribates, to the Pri Achilles, for recouery of the faire Briseis, that he might restore her to her Father, the Pri Chryseis. (Whereto the said Achilles shewed himselfe gracious and obedient), and ent taining the Heralds honourably, saluted them, by the name of Messengers from the g God Iupiter) the title giuen onely to God Mercurie.

The two Heralds of King Agamemnon, and their honorable respect by Prince Achilles.

his Generall, in taking from him his dearely affected Briseis, whom he had won in faire rre, to the great good and aduantage of the Greekes.

It belonged to Heralds, to assemble Princes for Councell, and giue them Scepters (for ne but the Gods did then weare Crownes) as we learne of Homer in the second of his ysses: in the persons of an Ægyptian Herald, making an Oration to the Inhabitants Ithaca; and of Telemachus, receiuing his Scepter at the hand of his Herald *Piseno*r.
the third Booke, the same Telemachus and the goddesse Minerua, being entertained in the Mannor and Pallace of the wise Prince Nestor; the Heralds gaue them water to sh their hands, before they sate downe at the Table. In the fourth Booke, and diuers ces else, euermore the Heralds inducted, guided, and made the way for forraigne Prin
, arriuing at the Courts of Kings their Maisters, to see and obserue the singularitie of im.

Appollonius Rhodius gaue for Herald to his Argonautes, the Heros Æthalides, whom he gned to be the Sonne of Mercurie, and armed him with his Caduceus: to shew, that hee s eloquent and expert, quicke in a delicate flowing stile, and sufficiently capable to ex ute their enterprises.

Hereupon the Poets named these Messengers Heroas, which signifieth Demie Gods: And seemeth, that the French name of Herauld or Herault, descended from hence, as being y difficult, to finde any where else a truer Etymologie. The Romaines called them ciales, a name which Varro in his fourth booke of the Latine tongue, deriued and made descended from the word Fides: because the Fecialians were in such degree, as the de fenaries and Guardians of the publique Faith. Feciales dicti sunt, quod fidei publicæ in Populos præerant, Nam per hos fiebat vt iustum conficetur bellum, & vt fœdere, Fides eis constitueretur. Numa Pompilius, Second King of the Romaines, instituted their olledge, ordaining: that it was not lawfull to take Armes against any enemy, without ir consent and appointment.

The Heralds had a Colledge in Rome

Whensoeuer these Feciales went to denounce warre, or conclude peace: they carried the one hand the Stone, consecrated to beate downe the Romaine Engine, which they d to immolate in swearing Peace; Cum Cæsa iungebant fœdera porca.

And in the other hand a branch of Verueine. Ouer and beside these things, they car d a certaine Vaile, made and wouen of Wooll, wherewith they wrapped and couered ir heads, when they denounced warre, or deliuered their message: as, we learne by us Liuius, in the first booke of his first Decade. This Vaile came somewhat neare to the me of them, which are vsed in Churches ouer the Images of Saints. In following time, stead of thus couering their heads, they made a slit or hole in the midst of the Vaile, for heads passage, and so the Vaile was equally diuided, couering the brest before, and ke behinde of the Fecialian. And then it lost the name of a Vaile, and became to be ed a Coate of Armes: which the learned Budeus, the honor of France, on the Law ctum de rerum diuis. at the Digest, called Armillas, & Spinteres.

During the estate of the Romaine Common-wealth, the Fecialians wore their Coates Armes, made of fine white Cloath, fringed with fine white silke (the Colour and Li y of the Romaines for excellency, as yet it is of the French, and was of the auncient gs of Persia) A la Bande Iumelee; And foure Letters of Gold, S. P. Q. R. Senatus lusque Romanum. And from thence is descended the fashion of tearming Armes of ex ency, called to enquire for Mettall vpon Mettall.

A richer alteration of the Heralds Coate of Armes.

When the popular Estate was changed into Monarchie, the Fecialians of the Empe rs wore their Coates of Armes of Purple and Scarlet, fringed with Gold, an Eagle of same (with the Emperours name reigning) embrodered thereon; Because that the abre (called rich colour) was the Liuery of the Emperours, which the Romaines e lled with their Gods. This they borrowed from the Kings of Persia, who went attired he module of the high Priest of Ierusalem, at such times as the Iewes were translated, d tained among them in bondage and slauery. The glorious actions of Armes of Kings of Persia, were registred downe in Tablets of Cedar, gummed with Cina which we tearme painted with red, like to the Rubrickes and titles of our Bookes, is obserued in infinite places, by Xenophon, Arianus and Quintus Curtius, treating on liues of the Kings of Persia. To whom no one durst present himselfe, or speake, with words of Crimosine Silke, as much to say, as in highly exalted tearmes, and worthy the care of Royall Maiesty, as we learne of Plutarch. And the magnificence of those Kings of Persia, (making their ordenarie residing in the Citie called Shushan, which signifieth Floure de Luce) is described in the Booke of Hester, the first Chapter. The in the Garden and Forrest of the King, in all parts of the Tents, and Pauillions of Azure were hangings of White, Crimosine and Hyacinth colour, supported with Cords of fine Linnen and Purple. Pendebant ex omni parte tentoria Ærei coloris, & Carbasini, & Hyacinthini, sustentata funibus byssinis atque purpureis, &c.

The Greekes and the Romaines (by their example) made the Idols their Gods of wood of Cedar, and of Thyma, incorruptible, and not subiect to worme-eating: whereof ensued the prouerbe, Non ex quouis ligno fit Mercurius, common to the whole Do monomanie of the Paganes. And Plinie informeth vs, that the Greekes and Romaines painted and coloured the faces, neckes, hands, and whatsoeuer else was to be seene naked of their Idols, with the red tincture of Cynabre and Vermillion. In such sort, as it was by first Article of expences, which the Censors couched in their accounts (saith Plinie in his three and thirtie booke, the seauenth Chapter) for Cinabre and Vermillion, bought to transfigure their Idols. By which example, the Captaines, that came home triumphing into the Citie of Rome, were painted in the same manner, so saith Plinie. Triumphantium corpora Minio illini solita, sicque Camillum triumphasse.

Fuery Iride of Wood forbeth not to make gods of.

And like as the Romaine Emperors had their Imperiall Mantle, the Cassocke and Buskins of Purple, and of fine Tyrian Scarlet, Furred with a whitish Gray, or Ermines (as now adayes goe attired the Presidents and Councellors, of the right Parlements of France and as heretofore went the most Christian Monarchs, as well of the first, as the second and third line) In like manner, the Charters, Letters and Placards of the said Auncient Romaine Emperours, which they called Rescripts, and Pragmaticall Sanctions, were writen with red Ink, or Vermillion or Cynabre, as is said in the Law Sacri affatus. De diuersis rescriptis, at the Code Affatus nostræ manſuetudinis in quacunque parte Paginarum, non alio vultu penitus, aut colore, nisi Purpurea tantummodo inscriptione lustrentur: scilicet cocti Muricis, & triti Conchylij ardore signentur: For they were not esteemed as Ordonnances, Commands and Imperiall Rescripts, being signed in any other manner. For this reason, the composition of that Inke is, (in the same Law) named Sacrum encaustum, and was not permitted to any to make vse thereof, or serue their owne turnes therewith, under paine of being attainted of high treason, to be punished with death, and their goods confiscated. At this day in Turkie, the Passe-ports and safe conducts of the Grand Seignieur, and the Mandates of Iustice, are written in Arabian Letters, with fine Celestine Blew and Azure; and the names of God, of the false Prophet Mahomet, and of the Grand Signeur, in Letters of Gold: a magnificence retained by this people, albeit barbarous, ignorant and grosser (then euer were any) of the Romaine Emperors, or of Constantinople. So that of one thing, which was not worthy of a Prince, the auncient Romaine Prouerbe arose in vse, saying:

The habite of the auncient Romaine Emperours.

The great prerogatiue of Red Inke.

Nec titulus Minio, nec Cedro Charta notetur.

So saith Ouid, Elegia prima Tristium. But come we now againe to Heralds.

Ammianus Marcellinus, in the foureteenth booke of his History, telleth vs, that heretofore, Heralds and Kings of Armes, were cloathed with Coates of Armes, made according to the fashion, as Deacons of the Catholique Church vsed to weare. Pectunt tuniculam sine manicis textam, Maras quidam nomine (vt appellant Christiani) Diaconum latera scripta Græco sermone portabat, &c. Euen so, (Silices miscere sacra profanis) the Coates of Armes for Heralds, imitated the Dalmaticke fashion, without sleeues, but farre as to the elbow: bearing vpon the said short sleeues, and both before and behind the Armes of the Prouinces whereof they carried name, and such Armes, with their Query, are called Enamels, of the word Ammell, which Goldsmiths worke with fine the heads of Rings, when they fixe rich and costly Stones in them; Per latera scripta, Marcellinus spake to very good purpose, in mine opinion.

The auncient fashion of Heralds Coats.

For like as among the Greekes, and namely in the Metropolitane and Patriarch Churches of Constantinople, the Chasuble of Priests, the Dalmatiques of Deacons and the Pallium or cloake of Bishops, had the name of God wrought in capitall Letters about the hemmes or skirts: So in the same manner, the embrodered and long Tunicles and Dalmatickes of the Romaine Emperours, as also of the Consuls, were charged with Gold-embrodery, with the Emperours names. For the Greekes, beside this pas-

Order of Ecclesiasticall ornaments in Churches.

Marcellinus

Marcellinus, Zonaras, Zosimus and infinite other haue obserued the same. For the Emperors and Roman Consuls, as well of the Old as New Rome; we haue Ioannes Curopalates, in his Tract of the Offices of Constantinople: where he remarketh the garments of the Romaine Emperors, and likewise of their children, brethren and kinred; For so farre as to the Hoods or Chapeaus, the plates and skirts were garnished with Letters of Gold. Omnem capitis Domini quod embella dicitur, ex margaritis est totum, Replo eius habentur non ea eius qui fert ipsam ex virgulis aureis fimbriata, Tunica honorata eius sanguinea, aut rubra ornata margaritis, quale per illud tempus optauerit.

Concerning the Consuls, we haue the testimonie of the Bourdelois Poet and Senator Ausonius, in the gratitudes and thankefull kindenesses, which hee gaue to the Emperour Gratian, who had honoured him with the Consulship of Rome. Palmatam tibi misi, in qua Diuus Constantinus parens noster in textus est. Which giueth vs to know, that the Cloake Royall of the Emperours and Consuls, otherwise called the Mantle of Triumph, made of fine Tyrian Scarlet, and Furred with whitish Gray or Ermines; was embroded a hands breadth, enterlaced with names and titles of excellence, belonging to the Romaine Emperors. Whereby also another note may be obserued, concerning the Medales and antique figures, of the Images of our Redeemer and the Virgin Mary, represented with mantles; the bordures whereof are charged with titles of excellence and honor, which the Church thought fit to giue them.

Among the Heralds of France, there is one aboue all the rest, who is called Mont-ioye, surnamed, at the military cry or proclamation, of the great King Clouis, after he had embraced Christianitie: Mont ioye Sainct Denis. As if it should be said, that the Faith preached and brought into France, by great Saint Denis Areopagita, was the ioy and cheerefulnesse of the heart; or that that God, whom Saint Denis had proclaimed to the Gaulish people, was afterward to be his Ioue. This Herald, for his greater excellence, is called King of Armes of France; he weareth a Violet coloured Veluet Coate, with the Escocheon or Shield of France Crowned, and entoured with the two Orders of France, on the foure parts of his Coate of Armes. The other Heralds beare but simply three Floure de Luces of Gold, with the enamels of France, which is of Violet coloured Veluet, and on the halfe sleeues, the Armes and name of the Prouince or Duchie, whereof he is Herald, and so the rest: As Daulphine, Orleans, Anion, Alanson (Inheritances of the Lords and Sonnes of France) Valois, Bourbon, Berry, Vendosme, Bretaigne or Ermine, Bourgongne or Toison D'Or, when these two Orders had their course in France, as heretofore the Genette, the Starre, La Cosse de Genest, and Saint Michael, names and titles due to Heralds of the said Orders.

Mont. Ioye aboue all the Heralds of France, and the reason of his calling King of Armes of France.

Names and titles of the other Heralds of France.

And as each Prouince and generall Gouernment of France had his Herald and King of Armes, hauing his name wrought in Golden Letters on the sleeues of his Coate: So the King of Armes of Nauarre, Porte les Esmaux de Nauarre; Of Red or Crimsine Veluet, with the Escocheon of the Kingdome Crowned, and the Order of the Lillie entoured about. The other sixe Heralds of Nauarre, bearing names of the Kingdomes Merindades; doe carrie the same enamels naked, without Crowne, and without noate of Order. On their halfe sleeues they beare the most, to wit; Nauarre brizé, ou componne, escartelle des Armes de la Merindade. For in Armes the King thereof beareth the least, and the Heralds the most, as namely; Pampelona, Viana, Estella, Tudela, Olita and Sainct Palais, Capitall of the lower Nauarre, which had (in times past) for cry or proclamation of warre, the Heralds name (then) Roncenaux, after the preuailing against the Emperor Charlemaigne, as the Spanish Romancers say. And as heretofore the Cry of warre, for the first King of Sorrabia or Nauarre, was Begorre; in remembrance, that they had derived their originall from the Counte of Begorre, who long time was on the Chesse-borde of Nauarre, and for whose Antiquitie, the Countie was charged to the King, but with the wages for three Launces, and halfe, instead of a whole Subfide: A priuiledge granted to the Inhabitants of the said Countie, onely for their fidelity.

The King of Armes of Nauarre, and his habit, as also of the sixe other Heralds.

The first Kings of Sorrabia, or Nauarre.

At Rome there was a Colledge of the Fecialians or Heralds, composed of twenty, the chiefe whereof (for excellence) was called Pater Patratus; because, by being chiefe of that Company, he ought to haue children, and his owne Father yet liuing.

The chiefe Herald of Rome Pater Patratus.

In France, not onely the King of Armes Mont-ioye S. Denis, but also the other Heralds and Pourssuiuants were of Noble extraction; and Mont-ioye could not be admitted, without making proofe of his Nobleneſſe by three races, as well of his Fathers Stocke, as by his Mothers Heralds of France of Noble descent.

Annuall Pensions to the Heralds.

Mothers side. There was two thousand pounds of rents in Lands and free tenure, allowed for the said Monioye particularly, and a thousand pounds of annuall pension. As for the other Heralds, they haue a 1000. pounds in pension, & other rights, whereof we shall speake he reafter. The Colledge and society of the said Monioy, Heralds and Pursuiuants of Armes for France, was established in the Church of Saint Anthony the lesse at Paris, where anciently were and are to be seene, the Charters and Statutes of the Officers of Armes, and the Rolles, Names and Sur-names of the said Kings, Heralds and Pursuiuants; which Charters are of the yeare, 1406.

The Heralds Colledge at Paris.

Heralds are allowed entrance into all Courts of Princes and great Lords: and whosoeuer denieth their entrance, is held for inciuill, discourteous, and vnworthy any Noble Title.

They haue power to reproue the vices of Knights, Esquires, and Noblemen liuing badly: and if they do not correct such errors in themselues, to expulse them from Iousts, Tourneyes, and all other Martiall exercises.

Prerogatiues of Heralds.

They ought to counsell and aduise Princes and great Lords, to maintaine the Estate of Nobilitie, alleadging the truth of their words by their owne experience.

Such as eyther by words, deedes, or otherwise offred them any outrage; ought to make them amends in the hearing of the Colledge: otherwise, they were declared guiltie of high treason, degraded from Nobilitie, being published as ignoble and yeomen, both they and their posteritie.

Rights & dues to the Officers of Armes.

To Monioy did appertain particularly, the Garments which the King did weare on the day of his Sacring, and before him.

At Funerals.

To the Heralds in generall, at the Obsequies and Funeralls of Kings, Queenes, Princes and Princesses, appertained the Cloakes and Chaperons of mourning, the Litters of Violet Veluet, semed with floure de Luces of gold, and the hangings of blacke Veluet in Churches and Chappells, with the Ornaments of the burning Lights, the waxe excepted. The Cloakes at marriage of the said Kings and Princes, Queenes and Princesses, prouided, that there were but one Coate of Armes onely displayed.

At Marriages.

At Baptizing of Children.

At Baptizing of children to the said Kings and Princes, appertained to the said Heralds and Kings of Armes, the Vessell, Saltseller, Bason and Ewer to washe withall, the Mantles, Swathe-bands of the best, the warming-panne, the cloth of State, and Pillowes for the Infants baptizing. After Baptisme, they haue right also, three seuerall times to cry Largesse, and throw peeces of gold and siluer among the people. The like priuiledge likewise they haue, at the Sacring, Coronation, and entring of the Kings and their Wiues to their marrying.

At the foure chiefe feasts.

At the foure chiefe feasts of the yeare, when the Kings keep open Court and great Reuells, they haue then whole Largesse, and new Liueries, as also the Cup of gold, wherein the King drinketh that day.

Proclaiming of Peace.

At the publication of any Peace, the City or Towne where it is published by the said King of Armes, or Herald, is to pay him a Marke of gold.

The Creation of Knights.

On those dayes when eyther the King himselfe, or the Lieutenant Generall of an Armie doth create Knights; beside the habits of those Nobles, they haue double wages, and whole or entire Largesse: that is to say, both crownes of gold and white money: to wit, the King of Armes to haue twice as much as the Herald, and the Herald to haue twise as much as the Pursuiuant.

Tilting daies or otherwise.

On the dayes of Tourneyes, and actions of Armes, as well in fight, as to winne the loue of their Ladies; the defendants stand obliged to giue to the Heralds whatsoeuer falleth to the ground, and all that was carried betweene the two Lists, during the Combat, except the booke whereon the Chalengers and Defendants tooke their oathes. And the Combat or Tourney being ended, the Victors are to giue a Largesse.

Offices of the Heralds.

In like manner, the said Herald ought to draw the vanquished by the heeles out of the Lists and Railes, and afterward to set downe in writing, whatsoeuer passed in the said Iousts and Tourney: to paint the Armes of the Challengers and Defendants, their Portraitures, Titles, and Qualities, according to the truth. For this cause, it is very necessary for them, to haue seene many strange Countries, and read the histories of the World; to know the needfull formes and ceremonies, as well for the Creation of a Nobleman, as of a Knight. To be exquisite in the Noble Art of Blazons, Painting, and Limming, for better ordering the Armes of them, whom the Prince shall enoble for their Vertue, according ding to their naturall inclination to Armes or Learning. As also the propertie, nature, and condition of birds, creatures irrationall, both on the land, and in the water: the vertues of Plants, Trees, Flowres, Hearbs, Starres, and Planets. And from Heauen, to descend into the bowells of the Earth, there to apprehend the Nature of Mettalls, Mineralls, and precious Stones, as well as of the foure Elements; by whose intermixture, they may learne the composition of Colours, necessary for emblazoning according to Art, such Armes as they are to prepare, and what Creatures are to be Passant, Naissant, or Rampant.

The dues of Knights Banerets and Captains of bands to the Heralds.

To the said Officers of Armes, euery Knight Banneret that hath the meanes & power to carrie a Banner, ought to pay a Marke of Gold. And euery Captaine of a Companie of Foote, bearing Ensigne open in the Field; ought to pay a Marke of Siluer, due to the said Officers of Armes; for taking the names, sir-names, qualities and Blazons of their Armes, to bee set downe and depicted in the booke of the Nobilitie, of the Prouince whereof they are Heralds or Kings of Armes.

What Heralds are to doe on the daies appointed for battell.

It was also within the compasse of their charge, to aduertise Knights, Esquires, and Captaines, when the day of battell is appointed: on which day, the said Officers of Armes are to appeare in their best Ornaments before the white Cornet, or before the Great Standard or Banner of France, and at the brunt of violent encounter, to withdraw to some high exalted place, to make their eyes witnesses of that which is done on eyther side, and who haue carried themselues most valiantly; for making true report thereof to the King, or Generall of the Armie, after the Battell is ended, and then to set it downe in writing, that the memory thereof may remaine to posterity.

Their Office after the battel

It belongeth also to them when the battell is concluded, to number the dead; to restore the Ensignes; to demand the Prisoners taken in warre, for making exchange; to summon rebellious Townes and Cities: And in case of composition, reddition, or exchange, to marche first before the Captaine or Gouernour of them, and there to giue him assurance of his person.

Of apointing the field, or place for fight

At Iousts, Tourneyes, Combats, or Enqounters; it is their charge to marke forth the field for Battell, the Lists or the ground for Combat; to impart the Sunne equally to the Combatants at extremitie, be they Squires or Knights. And for their wages or reward, whatsoeuer falleth betweene the two Lists, appertaineth to them, as we haue already said: to wit, Horse, Armour, Armes, Plumes, Bardes, Chaufraines, Caparisons, and other Ornaments of Warre, and whosoeuer is desirous to make redemption of them, is to pay the Heralds the iust value of them.

Railes of the persons vanquished.

In Combats or Fights, all the Armes and Ornaments of the vanquished, belongeth to the said Officers of Armes, and the Lists likewise · the Chayres and the Cup or Bolle, wherein the Combatants drinke each to other, after the contention shall be ended.

Honor done to the Conqueror.

The Victor or Conqueror is to be conducted by them to his Chaire, with the cheerfull noyse of Trumpets and applausiue shouts of ioy, for exalting the glory, valiancie, and iust quarrell of the victorious: all (afterward) being Registred downe in writing; as the name, sur-name, quality, and Armes of the Partie. In recompence whereof, the Heralds ought to receiue sixe Markes of gold and siluer, to be distributed as formerly hath beene said.

Disgraces done to the vanquished person.

And as for the party vanquished, they are to tread on him with their feete, as a Traitor, a falsifier of faith, periured and forsworne: and then both he and his Armes to be drag'd at a horse tayle by the heeles, and so cast out of the Lists with all ignominie, to be deliuered to the executioners of Iustice. Then is the Victor to be conducted backe in Triumph to his lodging, and in the chiefe Church they are to hang vp and affixe his Armes and Shield, to serue as a memoriall of his victory to posterity.

At the King or Princes ennobling any man.

When the King or Prince doth enoble any one, the King of Armes or the Herauld is to emblazon his shield, and to Register him in the Charter, among the Noblemen of the Prouince, with the name, sir-name, Lordship and quality of the person: for the doing whereof, the new-made Noblemen is to pay him (by ancient right) a marke of siluer, and the new-made Knight a Marke of gold, as a dutie.

Two Heralds vnder euery K. of Armes.

Euery King of Armes is to haue two Heralds (at the least) vnder his command and obedience: and euery Herald a Pursuiuant onely, who before he may obtaine the title and dignity of a Herald, ought to serue seuen whole yeeres fully compleated.

In elder times, there were three seuerall kindes of Coates of Armes. The first was called called Tunique as we haue obserued by Ammianus Marcellinus, hauing short sleeues, and rounded beneath, which was particular for Kings of Armes.

The second was tearmed Plaque, particular for Heralds, and of the same fashion as the Tunique or Dalmatique for the King of Armes. Onely to shew the difference of Ranke and Qualitie; in the middest thereof hung two Pendants of silke, with faire tassels of the same colour as the Coate was made of.

The third was called a Coate of Armes, proper for Pursuiuants of Armes, which had wide long sleeues, finishing as in a point.

Heralds distinguished frō Kings of Arms

Heralds were (moreouer) distinguished from Kings of Armes, becausе Kings of Arms bare the Escutcheon crowned with the Crowne Royall, as well before as behinde, and also vpon the little sleeues. The Herald bare it but before and behinde, and on the shoulder or right sleeue, and not vpon the left. Beside, the Herald could not beare the said Escutcheon, but onely crowned with a Chappeau, that is to say a Dukes Crowne, or with the pearled Circle, that is, a Counts Crowne.

Pursuiuants from the rest.

As for the Pursuiuants, they ought not to beare the crowned Escutcheon, but wholly simple, on the left shoulder onely, and not on the right, as the Kings and Heralds doe, to shew, that they were of meaner qualitie, and may discharge themselues from the place of Pursuiuants of Armes, at such time as themselues thinke fit: but the King of Armes and the Herauld cannot doe so, or quit their places; except it be for mounting to a higher degree, as the King of Armes to be a Knight, and the Herald to the Office of the King of Armes.

Of such persons as may haue Officers of Armes in each degree.

Kings, Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Counts and Viscounts Soueraignes, may haue Kings of Armes: but Dukes, Marquesses, Countes and Viscounts; not Soueraignes, Heralds onely. High Barons, and Knights Bannerets, may haue Pursuiuants onely: but by the approuing and acknowledgement of some Herald. Notwithstanding, sonnes to the King, and Princes of the Blood of France, at all times haue had a King of Armes, as well in their Courts and Houses, as at their Marriages and Funeralls.

Concerning Princes Soueraignes.

We call Princes Soueraignes, such as (in Temporall occasions) do not acknowledge any Superiour: as the Dukes of Lorraine, Sauoy, Millaine, and other Potentates both of Germany and Italy, which beare not the Title of King.

Pursuiuants of Armes in their appellations.

Pursuiuants of Armes beare not the names of Prouinces, as the Kings and Heralds doe: but onely Epethites of Gallantry, of good encountring or ioyfull tearms; as Plaine-Way, Iolly-Hart, Verdure, Cleare-sight, Bright-greene, No-lier, Tell-troth, Cheare-fulnesse, Faire-seeming, Loftie-foote, and such like pleasant tearmes. Euery Knight Banneret hath his Pursuiuant, whom he calleth according to his owne minde; and sends to see strange Prouinces: to take knowledge of Princes, Lords, and Gentlemen, their Genealogies, Armes, and Blazons, to obserue them in Bookes and Registers.

How Pursuiuants of Arms are baptized.

At solemne feasts, when Princes and Lords keepe open Courts, Pursuiuants of Armes are ordinarily baptized: for we call it baptizing, when the name of their Heraldry or Pursuiuance is first giuen them, and the Ceremonie is in this manner. After Supper, the Prince or Lord of the assembly, causeth the Herald or Pursuiuant (whom he would baptize) to be presented before him, he being cloathed in a Coate of fine white Serge. Then the Prince taketh a great standing guilt cup, full of Wine, and in the presence of all his Court, powreth it on the head of the Herald or Pursuiuant, giuing to the Herald the name of his Prouince, or to the Pursuiuant, what pleaseth him, with his Coate and Esmaile, assigning him some good rentage, or some Borough for his support and maintenance.

Froissard writeth thus. After the Battell of Auroy, Iohn de Montfort aduertised the King of England, by a Pourſuiuant of Armes standing there ready, with the tidings of what had hapned. Of a Pourſuiuant he made him a Herald, baptizing him with the name of Windsore, giuing him great profits and Reuenues to maintaine him: so this ceremony was called Baptizing. And both Kings and Princes instituting the Militaric Orders of Knighthood, ordained there with a Herald of the said Order, baptizing him with the name thereof. As Lewis the eleuenth named Mont Saint Michael, the Herald of his own Order: the King of England Garter; and them of Orleans, Aniou, Bretaigne and Bourgogne; Porcupine, Cressant, Hermine and Toison d'Or, or Golden-Fleece. In France the Heraulds with their Esmaux, Portent le Sceptre Esmail le d'Azur, semmez de fleurs de liz d'Or: As in other kingdomes, Ils le portent des Esmaux, which are particular to them.

Kings

At what time Kings of Arms began to bee honored with respect in France.

Kings of Armes and Heralds began to be respectiuely knowne, as also to be in great honor and authoritie, vnder the reigne of Philip de Valois, King of France, whose Court was more magnificent and full of splendor, then euer any Kings had beene in France, hee delighting to haue Iousts and Tourneyes daily. Also at that time, and long after, the charges of Kings and Heralds of Armes could not be apprehended, but by the Nobilitie, hauing made proofe of their worthinesse before the Master of the Horse of France, to whom it belonged, to order prouisions, to receiue and install any in charge. Now a daies all is so corrupt and out of order, euery Office being bought and sold: that such as holde the places of Heralds, are Clownish persons, who haue neuer seene any thing; but are so impertinent for the Noble Art of Blazons and Painting, that they know not how to deuise the Armes of a Prince or great Lord.

Ignorance of Heralds and Painters.

At the entrance of the late King Henry the third of that name (of happy and glorious memory) made at Paris, he hauing beene called King of Poland; ignorant Painters, vpon the view of Heralds (more ignorant then they) Emblazoned the Armes of Poland d'Argent & de Sable, whereas (indeed) they are De Gueulles a l'Aigle d'Argent coronne d'Or. party de mesme au Caualier d'Argent a l'Escu d'Azure a la Croix Patriarchale d'Or, which is of Lithuania, and the white Eagle of Poland, as wee shall better perceiue in the following discourse.

Heralds the Controllers of Painters and Caruers.

Ignorance in Heralds (who ought to be Controlless of Painters and Engrauers, and who heeretofore acknowledged them as their maisters, and had their Letters, by reason of ignorance in the said Painters and Caruers, especially concerning the principles and rudiments in the noble Art of Painting) was apparantly knowne, at the entrance of Queene Mary of Florence, wife to King Henry the great, of glorious memory. For then, the Painters deuised and blazoned the Armes of Monsieur le Daulphin (at this present King of France) the one d'Argent, and the other d'Azure, to the Daulphine, the one d'or, and the other de Synople: whereas Monsieur la Daulphine ought Porter de France escartele de Daulphine, qui est au Daulphine passme Pers, that is to say, d'Azure.

Armes prepared for the Qu. of France.

The Armes of Queen Mary, purposely prepared for her entrance; there was defect in the Arms of Florence, which some make d'Azur. a six Besans d'Or. These chiefe charged, de trois Fleurs de Lys d'Azure escartelle d'Austriche, d'Argent a la Fesse. Others, A la Bande d'Argent: and all by extreame ignorance; becausе Austriche porte de Gueulles a la Fesse d'Argent. And Florence, or rather the illustrious house of Medicis, Porte d'Or a cinq Torteaux de Gueulles. And in chiefe, the place most honourable in Armes, Le Tourteaux de France, that is to say, D'Azure a trois Fleurs de Lys, d'Or. Which King Lewis the eleuenth gaue permission to be borne by Peter de Medicis, and by his Letters Patents, dated in the moneth of May, Anno 1465. As concerning the Armes of the Citie of Florence, they beare d'Argent a la Fleur de lys fleuronne doublement de Gueulles; which King Charlemaine gaue them, so say the Citizens thereof themselues.

Errors in Armes by negligence of Heralds or Painters are punishable.

The same impertinence, and on the same subiect of Armes, to honor the entrance of the said Queene Mary, followed at the same time. For the Painters and Sculpters entowred her Armes with Cordeliers d'Argent, instead of Palmes. And the field whereon the said Armes were couched, Blazonne de Tanne, ou fueille morte: All noates of a Widdow Queene, and mourning for a sonne or brother of the King. For the Noble Kings of France mourne in Scarlet violetted, and married Queenes in Estamine de roze seiche, and widdowes in blacke Cypres, but heeretofore Linnen; their vailes white, whereon they were called white Queenes. As concerning Cordeliers; the Armes of Queenes, Princesses and married Ladies of high birth, ought to be entoured with Palmes, Lawrell, Myrtle, and such like light greene things; but widdowes with Cordeliers of siluer, which tooke beginning by the inuention of Madam Anne, Duchesse of Bretaigne, & Queen of France, a chaste and modest Princesse, who being the widow to King Charles the eight, deceasing in the floure of his age, as she did the like: she caused her Armes to be entoured with a Cordeliere of siluer, wearing one also for a girdle about her, bestowing the like on all the Widdowed Ladies, and others that mourned in her traine for the Kings death.

Mourning habits for Queens, Princesses, &c. and order of their Armes.

Priuiledges granted to Kings & Heralds of Arms

Now, for such priuiledges as were granted to Kings of Armes and Heralds, some doe ascribe them to the King and Emperor Charlemaigne: others to Alexander the Great of Macedon, and others to the Emperor of Germanie, Charles King of Bohemia, fourth of that name, nourished from his youth in the Court of the Father of Cheualrie, Philip de Valois, King of France, first and last of that name, as heere followeth the Tenure in these words.

The Priuiledges granted to Kings and Heralds of Armes.

MY Souldiers, you are and shall be called Heralds, companions for Kings, and Iudges of crimes committed by Noblemen, and Arbitrators of their quarrells and differences. You must liue heereafter exempted from going any more to Warre, or Military factions: Councell Kings for the best, the benefit of the Weale publique, and for their Honor and Royall dignitie. Correct all matters vile and dishoneste: fauour Widdowes, succour Orphanes, and defend them from all violence. Assist with your Councell, such Princes and Lords in whose Courts you shall abide, and freely and without feare, demand of them whatsoeuer is needfull for you, as foode, rayment, and defrayings. If any one of them shall denye you, let him be infamous, without glory or honour, and reputed as criminall of high treason. In like manner also, haue you an especiall care, to keepe your selues from vilifying your noble exercise, and the Honor wherewith you ought to come neer vs at all times. See there be no entrance into Princes Courts, eyther of drunkennesse, ill speaking, flattery, babling indiscreetly, tanglerie, buffonnerie, and such other vices, which foyle and shame the reputation of men. Giue good example euery where, maintaine equitie, and repaire the wrongs done by great men to their inferiours. Remember what Priuiledges we haue granted you, in recompence of the painefull trauells in warre, which you endured with vs. And let not the Honours which we haue bestowen on you, be conuerted to blame and infamie by dishoneste liuing: the punishment whereof we reserue to our selfe, and to the Kings of France our Successors.

The Antiquity of Heralds & Kings of Armes

It cannot be iustly said then, that Heralds and Kings of Armes were not in request, but since the time of Charlemaigne. For euen from the instant, that the descendants of Adam were distinguished into Nobles and Yeomen; there haue beene Combats, Battels, and Encounters, and consequently Heralds, deriued from the body of Nobilitie.

We read in Arianus, Quintus Curtius, and Plutarch, in the life of Alexander the Great, that that Prince hauing sent Heralds to the Inhabitants of the City of Tyre, to make peace and alliance with them: the Tyrians in a mad incensed rage, (ignorant in the Lawes of Nations) tooke the Heralds, and threw them downe headlong from the battlements of their walles into the ditches, where they were bruised in pieces. Alexander to reuenge this iniury, inuaded the City, and hauing suprized it by a long fidge, he razed it downe to the ground, although it commanded the Sea, and put all the people to the edge of the sword. Because that Heralds walked in the same pace as Ambassadors doe, for honour and assurance of their persons.

But it belongeth, that both the one and the other should gouerne themselues with all modesty, without offending the Princes to whom they are sent. Sigismund, first of the name, King of Poland, caused the hat to be nayled to the head of the Ambassador sent from Basilius, the great Duke of Moscouia; because hee had spoken to him with his head couered, alledging, that it was the custome in his Country of Moscouia. An vnmanerly Ambassadors hat naild to his head.

During the reigne of Ferdinand King of Arragon, the Count of Orgell sent his Herald to defie him, and called to Combat the Count of Cardonna, Ammirant of Arragon. To braue whom, the said Herald came to deliuer his message at Barcellona, attired in a linnen cloth Coate, painted with some dishoneste actions, imputed to the said Count of Cardonna, named Iohn Raymond. The foolish Herald performing his charge with al indiscretion, was apprehended by the command of King Ferdinand, who hindered the Combat, and caused the Herald to be whipt naked with rods, through all the streets of Barcellona; a worthy chastisement for his presumptuous folly, so say the Spaniards in the life of the said Ferdinand. An indiscreet Herald iustly punished.

Sabellicus in the eight booke of the history of Venice, and the second Decade, writeth, that the Venecians, hauing reduced the City of Vicenza vnder their obedience, sent their Herald to Don Vincent de Carara, commanding him from warring on the Vicentines, with sharpe words, and full of brauing Rodomontados. Carara much offended at his behauior, commanded the Herald to be taken, cutting off his nose and both his eares, & so sent him backe to the Venecians, with this answer; That they ought not to send him a message in such manner; declaring thereby, that Princes should manage the liues of their Heralds, and not expose them to death by iniurious messages, or of such negotiations, as are difficult and dangerous in the execution.

In those cases, the wisedome of King Lewis the eleuenth may well be followed, who hazarded in great enterprises, men of base and meane quality. To the end, that if they succeeded not according to his minde, and that his people fell into any ill fortune, the losse should be the lesse, where he could not auouch them, but with danger of their liues. So he would not hazard the person of his Herald, by going into England, to mooue the motion for Peace: but employed a man of silly respect, gracing his Coate with the Cornet of a Trumpet, and giuing him the supposed name of a Herald. The same King in like manner, to mannage his affaires in Flanders, serued his turne with a vaine-glorious Barber, called Oliuer the Dane, and otherwise tearmed the Wicked, calling himselfe the Vicount of Corbeill (who would needs be reputed Count of Meulant:) But he was hanged in the reigne of Charles the eight, on a Iybbet in Paris, by Order from the Court of Parlament, the twenty day of May, Anno 1493. for his notorious robberies, cruelties, and massacres: but especially, because he had vsurped the Vicountie of Corbeill, against Iohn Amyart, lawfull Lord thereof. The prouidēt care of King Lewis the 11. in enterprises of perill. Oliuer the Dane a foolish Barber.

But if they be true Ambassadors or Heralds, and such bad entertainment be vsed vnto them, by those Princes to whom they are sent: it might iustly, (as it hath done heeretofore) serue as a new sparke and fire-brand of Warre. As happened, according to the testimony of Varro and Suetonius, betweene the Emperour Augustus Cæsar, and the Germanes, who (contrary to the right of Nations) had put to death the Romanes Ambassadours and Heralds, Titurius and Arunculeius. For reuenge of whose deaths, Augustus solemnely sware, neuer to cut his haire or beard, vntill they had felt due infliction. Heereupon beganne the Warre in Italie, and namely at Millaine, in the time of King Francis the first, to reuenge the death also of his Ambassadors, Rinson and Fregose, executed by night in the City of Millaine; by report of the Lord of Bellay, and the History of Italie. Of iniuries done to true Ambassadors or Heralds.

In the yeare 1527. the same King Francis the first, and the King of England, Henry the eight of that name, sent their Heralds into Spaine, to defie the Emperor Charles the fift, and to carry him the Lye, and bid him Combat. Being arriued at Burgos in Castile, where the Emperor then kept his Court, they had audience granted them, on wednesday the 22. day of Ianuary, the said yeere 27. and in the Hall of Presence, the Emperour being assisted with the greatest Lords of Spaine, when they spake. At entring into the Hall, Guienne King of Armes for the King of France, and Clarenceaux, King of Armes for England, presented themselues before the Emperour, about the ninth houre in the morning. Their heads were bare, and their Coats of Armes hanging on their right armes, when they demanded permission to deliuer their message, with assurance and safe conduct of their persons, for returning backe to France, without iniury or disturbance, Two Heralds sent to Charles the Emperor, and their worthy carriage.

which the Emperor promised them on the worde of a Prince. Guienne then defied him on his Masters behaife, as well by Sea as by Land, and deliuered him the Lyt in writing, Signed Guienne King of Armes: dated at Paris the eleuenth day of November, the said yere 1527. Guienne hauing heard the Emperors excuse, By the arrest of Rome, detention of the Pope, and the sacred Colledge of Cardinalls, tooke his Coat of Armes, & put on his body: the same Ceremonies being obserued by Clarencieux the Herald of England, who defied him likewise in his Masters name, and the Emperour gaue them their dispatche, and sent them away the said second day of Ianuary. So should Heralds and Kings of Armes gouerne themselues, when they are sent vnto Princes, and carry words of displeasing nature: to demand (first) assurance for deliuery of their message, or else, not to deliuer it all.

The Emperors answer returned to the Kings of France and England.

The said Emperour, Charles the fift, was seauen or eight moneths in sending backe an answer to the Kings, euen vntill the tenth day of September, in Anno Dom. 1528. His Herald Golden Fleece, or Toison D'or, presented himselfe first to the King of France, in the great Hall of the Pallace at Paris, the King being assisted with all the Princes of his Blood, diuers Ambassadors and strange Lords, with an infinite number of Prelates, Peeres of France, and other. But beeause the Herald had discouered his message with impudence, indiscretion, and Spanish Rodomontado rearmes, in presence of the King, and cloathed in his Coat of Spaine; hee was summoned to giue his Patent for acceptation of the fight, and the field for battell.

The impudence of an Embassador from the Emperor.

When he had declared publiquely, that he had nothing in writing, but onely his credence by word of mouth; the King denied him audience, and forbad him (before all present) on paine of his life, not to vtter or moue one word that might offend him. And so the Herald of Spaine returned backe, without doing any thing.

The Ceremonies whereby the Kings Heralds of France and England made vse, for denouncing Warre to Charles the fifth, were very simple, yet very sprightly.

The manner of defiances sent to enemies by sundry Nations.

The Ancient Romanes defied their enemies to extremitie, by throwing an enflamed Torche vpon their land: expressing thereby, that they would make their passage by fire and sword.

The Scythians, Tartares, and the Nations of Germanie (seated vnder the North) gaue to their Enemies the choyse of winde or sword; that is to say, eyther Peace or Warre: Peace by the winde, which causeth vs to breath; and Warre which is death, by the sword.

The Mexicanes, and people of Peru, defied Kings their enemies, by sending them Presents of Armes of defence, the Heralds rubbing their foreheads with a certaine oyntment, such as they embalmed their dead withall, round decking their heads likewise with plumes of feathers, such as they bestowed on the dead, before they gaue them enterring. And in making these Ceremonies, they defied them to the field, saying: Seeing you will not like of Peace, we will take away the life of you and yours: According as it is auouched by Iosephus Acosta, in his naturall history of India, the seuenth booke, and twelfth Chapter.

CHAP. V.

Of Honors, and Military Recompences, Shields, Collers, Girdles, Crownes, and Rings of Gold.

THE Romanes, (a most Warre-like Nation, and the best gouerned in all the inhabitable World) recompenced the valiancie of their Citizens and Souldiours, with certaine Prizes of Honour: which at the first were nothing else but fruites: produced by the Earths enemie; according as Crownes were then composed, plaited and fitted, but with simple Herbages of Grumen, Dogge-grasse, Oake, Lawrell, and other branches of Trees, as Titus Liuius writeth in the seauenth Booke of his Romane History, and Plinie in his Naturall History, the two and twentieth booke, and the third third Chapter, and onward. But as excesse and riot crept into Rome, by the aboundance of Conquered Prouinces; euen so in the same manner, the Prizes of Honour became changed and altered into Siluer and Gold. Nay more, those Mettalls were also releuated with the excellency of precious stones, tripled Collers, or Chaines of Gold, Crownes, Rings, or Horses, bredde and maintained at publique expence, became added thereunto. And then began the vse likewise of making Images and Statues (according to the life) of such men as had brauely exposed their liues in dangers, for the Cities safety and Honour. So that Amazonian Romane * Clælia, was honoured with her Statue on Horse-backe, planted in an honourable place, mounted aloft in the sacred street to serue as a Mirrour or Beacon, for conduct of the Romane youth, to arme themselues with courage, casting in their faces the reproach of a cowardly or home-keeping life, as the old Latine Poet said:

Plenty is the Nurse of excesse.

* A Noble Romane maide, that being in Hostage with Porsenna, deceiued her keepers, & swam ouer Tyber to the Citie.

Vos etenim Iuuenes animos geritis muliebres, Illaque Virgo Viri.

Now these departments and distributions of Honors were not done but with great and good knowledge of the cause. For, although at Rome the Temple of Honour stood with open face to the East, West, South and North, as granting entrance indifferentlie, to all them that cherished vertue, as some by one meanes, and some by other: yet notwithstanding, that they might be equally vsed, or knowne after one and the same manner, the Reward and the paine (according to the quality of persons) were alwaies different; because the distribution of them ought to be different, and ruled Ad Pondus, & ad Iustitiam.

The temple of Honor at Rome.

In the same manner, in all well gouerned Soueraigne Estates, distinct and separate by degrees of honour and preheminence, as Dukes, Princes, Marquesses, Counts, Vicounts and Barons; they are knowne as well by their Ornaments, as neere approach to the person of the Prince and Soueraigne, who for the distribution of those great honours, ought to locke them vp, and restraine them to the smallest number as possibly hee may. Hee should bestow them on his owne, as a sport or exercise of great price, earnestly wished for by all, but granted or admitted to very few; for nothing in the world doth more abase the worth of glory and honour, then when it is made common, or granted (without choyse and merit) to men of meane and wretched condition.

Acknowledgment of eminent persons.

How Honors and dignities ought to be distributed.

There are sufficient testimonies in one of the French Historians, concerning what contempt was made of the Order of the Starre, in the reigne of King Charles the seuenth, who gaue it (without choyse) to all such as offered him any seruice. The Princes & Lords disdained it, and the King himselfe abolished it from all vse, hauing giuen his Starre to the Captaine of the night watch, in the City of Paris. Another, in the learned Commentaries of Blaise de Monluc, Marshall of France, one of the very braueſt Captaines in his time, saith: That as an excellent testimony of Honour, King Henrie the second gaue him the Order of Saint Michael, which was not then prophaned, as it was in the time of Charles the ninth, when the Court was more full of Knights then it was of Horses: the Order being then so basely abused, that for giuing fiftie Crownes, any one might be made Knight of the Order of Saint Michael, without any regard or merit, neyther were those new-made Knights Gentlemen, or yet so good as the Farmers sonnes of the Countrie.

Sleiden in his second booke, obserueth the restriction made by the Emperor Sigismond King of Bohemia and Hungaria, concerning the number of Knights of his (ouerthrown) Order of the Dragon; consisting but of thirty persons (himselfe being chiefe of the Order) signale for vertue and well-deseruing. And the Emperour Charles the fift, whose life was of sufficient length, held but foure Chapters of his Order of the Golden Fleece, instituted by the house of Bourgongne. It is likewise the prophaning of the Dignity of any Order (the sole prize of honour and valiancie) in conferring and giuing it indifferently, to all such as desire it, or get it (vnder-hand) by fauour, and no merit.

Of prophaning Knighthoods dignity.

Amongst the Romanes, In Equite Romano Census, & Probitas spectabantur: So saith the Light of Ciuill Lawyers, the learned Cuiaux, in the one and twentie booke, and ninth Chapter of his Obseruations. Hee ought to haue goods and faculties sufficient to maintaine the Estate of Knighthood, and with those meanes, probitie of life.

His reuenues ought to be foure hundred Seſtertiaes, the Seſtertia valuing two Aſſis and an halfe, which made the fourth part of the Romane Denarius, which valued fiue Sols of French money, whereby the Seſtertia amounted to the peece of three Blanks: ſo that foure hundred Seſtertiaes aroſe yeerely to Foure-ſcore Pariſian pounds, which make an hundred pounds Tournois.

The probatiō of him that was to be Knighted.

Probitie or integritie, conſiſted in good manners, and a life without the leaſt taxation, or reproofe, being very neere to Noble nature: whereof he was to make proofe, by Antiquity of Triumphs, and olde duskie Images. Milites fieri non poterant, qui de genere militum nati non eſſent. And no one could be regiſtred downe in the Rolle of Honor, vntill he had formerly verified his Deſcent, to proceed from a Grandfather and Father of free condition: Conſtitutum ne cui jous eſſet, niſi cui ingenuo Patri, Auoque paterno Seſtertia CCCC. Cenſus fuiſſet: ſo ſaith Pliny in the three and thirtieth booke, and tenth chapter of his naturall hiſtory.

But after that the Romane Emperors had admitted into the ranke of Knighthood, all kinde of perſons indifferently, as well free as enfranchiſed; by money or fauour; the Honor of Knighthood became changed into contempt and diſhonor.

Honourable Recompences among the Romanes.

Now, among the Romanes, the prizes of Honor and Recompence, were Crownes, Collers and Rings of Gold, Bardes and Chanfreines for horſes; Coronæ Torques, Phaleræ, & Signa Militaria: and Standards, Banners, and Penons of Warre.

Concerning Crownes there were different ſorts, and ſome more worthy then the other: Aulus Gellius in the fift booke De Noctibus Atticis, nnmbreth ſeauen or eight. The firſt was called by the Romanes, Ouall, Oualis Corona, of the olde Latine verbe Ouare, which ſignifieth to reioyce, and the word Ouatio, Reioycing. This Crowne was made of Myrtle, a Shrub dedicated to the goddeſſe Venus:

Populus Alcidæ gratiſſima, Vitis Iaccho, Formoſa Myrtus Veneri, ſua Laurea Phœbo.

So ſpeaketh Virgill.

Corona Oualis, how beſtowed.

It was giuen to the Generall of an Armie, who without receiuing any wound, and effuſion of bloud, had the vpper hand of his enemie: Or had beene ſent againſt wretched ſlaues and Pyrates, vnworthy the exerciſe of Romane valiancie. This Generall might enter into Rome Triumphally; but on foote, being followed onely by the Senate (yet not on horſe-backe) with the bands of the Armie.

Corona Naualis.

The ſecond was Corona Naualis, the Nauall Crowne, made with a Circle of gold, releuated like Prowes and Poupes of Gallies and Ships, of the ſame Metall. It was beſtowed on a Captaine or Souldier, that firſt grapled the Enemies Galley, and leapt into it.

Corona Vallaris.

The third was tearmed Paliſſado or Vallaris, made of the ſelfe-ſame ſtuffe, and releuated with Pales, Piles or Stakes. The Generall of the Armie gaue it to a Captaine or Souldier, who firſt enfranchiſed the Enemies Campe, and ſo forced the Paliſſado.

Corona Muralis.

Of the ſame temper was that called Corona Muralis, raiſed with Breteſches, Parapects and Battlements of gold; ſeruing as a Recompence & Prize for him, who firſt mounted on the walls of a beſieged Towne or City, and there fixed the Standard, belonging to the Generall of the Armie.

Coron

Corona Ciuica. Or the Cities Crowne.

Corona Ciuica, more eſteemed then the Precedent, and made with flouriſhing branches of the greene Oake; was giuen by the Citizens of Rome to their fellow Citizen, who had ſaued a Citizens life in a ſiege, or in a ranged battell. The ancient Romanes (as well as the wiſe and learned Druides) held the Oake in ſingular eſtimation, as beleeuing verily, that the fruit of this tree ſerued (in former times) for bread and ſuſtenance to their elder predeceſſors, and that Wheate and Rie was in no practiſe for the vſe and nouriſhing of men, but by defect of Maſt or Acornes, as the Latine Poet ſpeaketh in his Georgicks.

Prima Ceres ferro mortales vertere Terram
Inſtituit; Cum iam glandes, atque arbuta ſacra
Deficerent ſiluæ, & victum Dodona negaret.

Rome gaue it likewiſe to them, who had well deſerued of the publique eſtate, and managed matters for her conſeruation. For this cauſe the Orator obtained it, hauing diſcouered the mine of treaſons deuiſed by Catiline and his Complices. Iulius Cæſar deſired it aboue all the reſt, & yet could not obtaine it; becauſe he had ſullied his hands in the bloud of his fellow Citizens. But the very faireſt Title of Honour which the Romanes could excogitate, to illuſtrate the memorie of Auguſtus: was to call him their Father, and gaue him the Oaken Crowne: ſo that the Medalls and Moneyes (as well gold as ſiluer) of that good Emperor (vnder whoſe reigne the King of Kings, and Monarch aboue all Monarchs pleaſed to take birth in his humanity) had on the one ſide the Image of the ſaid Auguſtus, and for a Legend round about, Divus Auguſtus Pater: And on the other ſide, a Crowne of Oaken leaues, ſuſtained or carried by two Harts, Symboles of Eternity, for their exceeding long life, and vnder them a round bowle of the world, with a Scepter of Antiquity. Within the Crowne were theſe Letters engrauen, Ob Ciues Ser. Ob Ciues Seruatores, on the ſides theſe two Letters, S. C. Senatus conſulto, to ſhew that this money was ſtamped by Decree of the Senate.

Cæſar could not obtain the City Crown, and the reaſon why.

The Moneys in Auguſtus Cæſars time.

Corona Triumphalis for Victors.

The Triumphall Crowne was plaited with branches of Lawrell, the Symbole of Victory; and (ſoone after) made of the pureſt gold; whereupon it was named Aurum Coronarium. It was giuen to the General, that returned home with Victory from a dreadfull enemy, by whoſe ſurprizall or ouerthrow, the Romane Eſtate wonne great aduantage: According to the ancient Prouerbe of our reuerend Forefathers; Let him haue the Honor of the Warre that bringeth home profit.

But the most excellent Crowne of all, was Corona Graminea, called by the Romanes Corona Obsidionalis, obserued by Virgill in his Bucolics;

Qui Gramineis attigit Herbam.

Plinie in the two and twentieth booke, and third chapter of his naturall history, saith: That this Crowne was giuen by all the people of Rome; but the other, by the Emperor or by Generals of the Armie. Corona quidem nulla fuit Graminea nobilior in maiestate Populi Terrarum Principis, præmijsque gloriæ, Gemmatæ, & Aureæ, Vallares, Murales, Rostratæ, Ciuicæ, Triumphales post hanc fuere. Cæteras Imperatores dedere, sola Graminea ab vniuerso Exercitu seruato, Seruatori Decreta est. The Ciuica or City Crowne was giuen to him that had saued the life of a Romane Citizen: but this was giuen to the Captaine, that deliuered a whole enclosed Armie, sharpely besieged on all sides by the enemies.

The composition of the Obsidionall Crowne.

This Crowne was taken, and made of the same grasse and hearbs, which were first found in the same deliuered field. Dabatur hæc viridi è Gramine decerpto inde, ibi obsessu seruasset aliquis. Because, that like as the ancient Ægyptians, Greekes, and Romanes (so speaketh Porphirius in the booke of Sacrifices and Magicke) made present (in elder times) of nothing else but hearbs to their gods, but afterward fruits gathered from the ground, & (in the end) liuing creatures: In the same manner, the honor and sacrifice (if it may be so said) which the Souldier rendred to his Generall, that had deliuered him from death, was to present him with the first hearbs found in the field, where hee had so happily receiued a second life? Summum enim apud Antiquos (so saith the same Plinie) Signum Victoriæ, erat Herbam porrigere Victoribus, hoc est Terra, & Altrice ipsa Humo, & humatione etiam cedere. A custome practised (saith Plinie) and deriued from the ancient Gaules, who vsed the same; by report of Cæsar in his Commentaries of the Gaulish warre. In obseruing that sprightly and Warlike Nation, he saith, that while they attended the shocke and signall of Battell, they would sit down on a Sod of earth, and tufte of greene grasse in their fielde of battell. And the Romanes (according to the testimony of Plinie) had not any thing in greater estimation, then Verueine, and the hearb called Dogges tooth, which is the Graminea. Auctores Imperij Romani Conditoresque immensum quidam sumpsere ex ignobilibus herbis, quoniam non aliunde Sagmina in remedijs publicis fuere, & in sacris legationibus, quam Verbenæ. Certe vtroque nomine idem significatur. Hoc est gramen ex arce cum saxo terræ euulsum: Hac (Verbenæ) semper Legati cum ad hostes Clarigatum mitterentur vsi, id est, res raptas clare repetitum vnus vtique Verbenarius vocabatur, as wee haue obserued in the former Chapter.

The meanest Crowne in value, but the most honorable.

This Obsidionall Crown was the meanest in value of all the rest, but the most excellent in honor, and it was giuen to the Generall of an Armie Romane, that had deliuered his followers, and compelled the enemy to dis encampe, and found the retreat. In the second warre of the Carthagenians, Fabius Maximus, hauing deliuered the City of Rome, when it was extreamely besieged by them: by order and decree of the Senate, hee was honoured with this Crowne Graminea.

The Crowne of Peace and Concord.

Outer and besides these Crownes that were of Honor, there remained yet another, and the very simplest of all; which (in Iudging vprightly) ought to haue the prime ranke of honour and preheminence: nay, rather more; because Peace is the sacred gift of God, and the best that man can haue, or wish for, farre excelling and surpassing in felicitie, the wretched and miserable condition of Warre. It was a Crown composed and made of Oliue Branches, which was bestowed on him that had managed Peace and Concord, betweene two mortall enemies, and by solid discretion, brought it to a successefull conclusion, neuer to be dissolued.

A Hieroglyphicall controuersie betweene Neptune and Minerua.

It is sufficiently known, that the Oliue is the Hieroglyphicke or Symbole of Peace, and by a queint inuention of the Poets, it was feigned, that question being moued for naming the City of Athens; the debate and controuersie hapned betweene Minerua & Neptune. To determine this difference, the gods being assembled in their Synagogue, it was ordained, that the preference should appertaine to the party of the Contendants, which could bestow on men the most beneficiall gift. Neptune striking the Earth with his Mace or Trident, immediately bounded forth a goodly horse, the Symbole of Warre.

Bello

Bello armantur Equi, Bellum armenta minantur.

Minerua on the contrary, shee produced a flourishing Oliue-Tree, the presage of Peace.

Oleaque Minerua inuentrix.

Hereupon, by an vnanimate voyce of the Gods, the prerogatiue was adiudged to Minerua, the Goddesse of Peace.

The Romane Honors greatly out of request by the Empires declination.

The vse of these Crownes became lost beyond measure, when the greatnesse and Maiesty of the Romaine Empire, began to totter and decline. And then Kings, who made a benefit of her decadence and fall, subrogated others in their stead. As namely the close Crowne for Imperiall, but altogether of a contrary fashion, to those of the moderne Emperours, both of the East and West; as wee are enstructed by Curopalates, in notice of the one and other Empire, who sets them downe quite otherwise, then they are at this present.

The Crowne for France.

NOw concerning that belonging to the Sacred Kings of the Lilie, The floure best beloued, which is without any Paragon: the Princes which are the yong shoots, and budding branches thereof, haue their Chappeaux and Tymbres honored on the Creast.

Dukes Crowns.

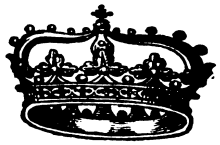
DVkes haue their Chappeaux, with Roses blowne and open spreading.

Marquesses.

MArquesses haue theirs composed of a Chappeau, and a Circle, three vpon one.

Counts.

FOr the Count, he hath a Circle with Buttons.



Vicounts.

AND the Viscount with Pearles; the first is releuated, but this other without any releuation at all: And the Ordonance of Chappeaux and Circles, is conformable to the preheminence.

Crownes for England and Spaine.

AS for the Crownes belonging to the Kings of England and Spaine, they are represented (without preiudice to their ranke) according to the common obseruation of Geographers.

Returne we now againe to the Romaine Antiquity.

The Emperor Augustus Cæsar (whose Ordonances may be taken from the Table of Royall dignity, and the degrees of honor) was long time retained in the distribution of them:

them: as Suetonius telleth vs in his life, the fiue and twentieth Chapter. Dona militaria aliquanto facilius Phaleras, & Torques, & quidquid Auro, Argentoque constaret, quam Vallares, ac Murales Coronas, quæ honore præcellerent, dabat.

And in the three and fortieth Chapter, speaking of Chaines of Gold, whereof (oftentimes) he made liberall gifts. In hoc ludicro Caium Nonium Asprenatem lapsu debilitatum Aureo Torque donauit, passusque est ipsum posteroſque Torquati ferre cognomen.

Caligula, to the Crownes formerly obserued, added other of his owne inuention: as Suetonius saith in his life, the fiue and fortieth Chapter. Participes Victoriæ nouo genere Coronarum donauit, quas distinctas Solis, ac Lunæ, Syderumque Specie, Exploratorias appellauit.

The same Suetonius noteth (on the words of the Emperor Augustus) that he gaue, as an especiall priuiledge of excellency and honor, to his Sonne in Law Agrippa (who had won the Nauall battaile on the coasts of Sicilie, the Storie whereof is sufficiently knowne) the Blew Standard for Generals by Sea, whom we call Admirals. Marcum Agrippam in Siculo post Naualem Victoriam, Cæruleo Vexillo donauit.

Concerning Collers and Chanfraines.

The fore-alleadged passage of the Emperor Augustus: Ne facilius Phaleras, & Torques, affirmeth, that those Collers and Chanfraines were his ordenarie gifts: but yet neuertheless, they were not granted at any time, except to persons of especiall merit. As is well obserued by the learned Budeus, the honor of France, vpon the Law Finale, De Senatoribus, at the Digest. That Torques Aurei Militibus ob rem Strenue gestam ab Imperatoribus donari solebant.

Because that this was the prize of Valiancie, and the most worthy recompence of Vertue. As it is said in the Chapter Ius militare, the first distinction Stipendiorum modu, Dignitatum gradus, Præmiorum honos, veluti cum Corona, vel Torques datur. For otherwise, Iuuenall would haue improued such a distribution, as speaketh his last Satyre.

Ipsius arte Ducis hoc referre videtur,
Vt qui fortis erit, sit fœlicissimus idem,
Vt lœti Phaleris omnes, & Torquibus omnes.

For concerning men of merit and honor, such recompences were neuer enuied; but (contrariwise) worthily acknowledged, both by the adornements of their Horses, and by the Coller of the Order, as witnesseth Silius Italicus, in his fifteenth booke.

Phaleris hic pectora fulget,
Hic Torque aurato circumdat bellica colla.

Vpon these two passages, of the Poets, and the speeches concerning Chaines of Gold in Collers, which is the true auncient note of Knighthood: we will insert here some other obseruations, collected from a farre greater number.

The honorable antiquitie of Chaines and Rings.

Among the Assyrians, Aegyptians, Medes and Persians, the Chaine of Gold for the necke, and the Ring of Gold for the finger, was the marke or Symbole of libertie, nobilitie and Chiualrie. In the foure and fortieth Chapter of Genesis, Ioseph, being a slaue in the Court of Pharaoh: was proclaimed Vice-Roye of Aegypt, for at free liberty, and the Ring of Gold put on his finger, and the Chaine of Gold about his necke, by King Pharaoh. As much was done to Mardocheus, by the King Ahasuerus, in the booke of Hester: And to the Prophet Daniell (as himselfe writeth) by the great King of Persia Nabuchodonosor.

Of the weathies called Stemma and Diadema.

We learne of Curopalates, in the booke of the Offices of Constantinople, that the Chaines of Gold giuen to Knights or Souldiors by the Romaine Emperors, were ordenarily thrice double. His noate is very remarkeable, for thereby hee enstructeth vs, that those that were giuen in his time (which is aboue eleuen hundred years since) called Stemma, were formerly named Diadema: which was a head-band of pure Gold, couered with Pearles and rich Stones, and therewith were engirt the browes of the Romaine Emperours, being made fast behinde the head, which they then called Stemma. Now concerning the word Diadema, it was taken (in his time) for a Girdle or Baudricke, proper onely to Knights and Souldiors, as a marke of honor, and preheminence. For this cause (saith he) Tyrants and Pagan Princes, desiring to martyrise Christian Knights, that would not offer incense to their Idols: first of all, they would despoile them of their Girdles and Baudrickes, and afterward deliuer them to the Hangmen and Tormentors, to make them endure the tortures of Martyrdome. Obserue here how hee describeth the Coller.

The Iron Ring a noate of slauerie to the Gaules and Germaines.

Coller, belonging to the Order of those Knights, which hee calleth Strepton, στρεπτὸν δὲ ἐστιν ὁλκὸς χρυσοῦ ἐκ τριῶν τορτευμένος καθάπερ στέφανος, ὅπερ φοροῦσι ἐπὶ τράχηλου.

That which at this present they call Strepton, is a Coller of Gold made and wrought by the Goldsmiths hand, into the forme of a wreath or garland, composed of three chaines, Torques. Aurum ductum, implexum ex tribus quasi funiculis, quod gestabant de collo.

Those Collers deriued onely from the Gaules.

Now you are to vnderstand, that the Romaines drew not the practise of these Collers from the Greekes, or any other Nation, but onely the Gaules, a most dreadfull Nation to the said Romaines, since the sacke of the City of Rome. Virgill (I will begin with his testimony, as most auncient) in the eight booke of his Æneidos, describing the Gaules by their long curled lockes of goodly haire, their golden Beards, their Iacquers, Cassockes and arming Coates, Bandez en Pal de diuerses couleurs, (as yet are worne by the Guard of the Kings Gates, and the great Prouost of the Household) and about their necks, white as Snow, (bare, and without any necke couering, according to the fashion of the auncient Gaules) but adorned with Collers and Chaines of Gold.

Aurea Cæsaries collis, atque aurea Vestis,
Virgatis lucent sagulis, tum lactea colla
Auro inclutuntur,

Diodorus Siculus, in the sixt booke of his Antiquities, speaketh thus of the Gaules. Circa collum grandes Torques gestant ex solido auro, & in digitis Annulos aureos.

Strabo, his contemporarie, in the fourth booke of his Geographie, making mention of the Chaines and Collers of Gold, as also Rings of the same mettall, which those Auncestors of the French wore about their neckes, and on their fingers; calleth both the one and the other, Honors of Excellence and Dignitie.

Titus Liuius exalteth one Manlius Torquatus (whom he maketh fourse and originall, of one of the greatest and most renowned Families in the Citie of Rome) for bearing the firname of Torquatus, A Torque detracto cuidam militi Gallo, by victorie in single Combat of a Gaulish Knight; whom Cæsar and Titus Liuius (coniured enemies to that warlike Nation) make more easie to be vanquished and surmounted by their pens, then euer they could haue bin by their Armes. Thus much concerning Collers: come wee now to Rings.

The passages formerly reported by Diodorus Siculus and Strabo, haue made vs an entrance, yea, another passage of the precedent. Manuum articulos, & brachys armillis aureis, exornant, & in digitis Annulos aureos gestant.

The endeauor of French youths to gain the honor of Knighthood.

The youths of France, to the end they might attaine to the honor of Knighthood, so soone as their first Armes were bestowed on them: made shew of wearing but a Ring of Iron, vntill they had made some proofe of themselues against their enemies, and brought to end some enterprise, whereby to win account and reputation. This is the testimonie of the noble Romaine Annalist Cornelius Tacitus, in describing the common manner of life of the Gaules and Germaines, ruled and gouerned by one and the same kinde of pollicy. Fortissimus quisque insuper annulum ferreum (ignominiosum id genti) velut vinculum gestat, donec se cæde hostis absoluat.

He said to very good purpose, Ignominiosum id genti, to a Nation wholly generous and magnanimious, borne to command, and not to serue; borne to subdue all the people in the world by force of Armes, and from their inuincible power, to giue and make Lawes, but not to receiue them from any person. Vndoubtedly, it was a matter very ignominious, to weare a Ring of Iron, the most vile and abiect mettall, that mother nature could yeelde from her fruitfull wombe: a mettall, the marke and Symbole of slauery and seruitude.

The most acceptable presents, which the round neighbouring people could send to these couragious men, to let them liue in peace (saith the same Tacitus) were the goodliest Armours, bright and cleare shining, sprightly Horses, brauely limb'd and accoustred, with costly Bardes, Chanfraines and other furniture for the said Horses, as also rich Collers of Gold. Gaudent præcipue finitimarum gentium donis, magna arma, electi equi, phalera, Torques que. It was no wonder then, if they affected Horses, their meere nature made it sufficiently knowne: because (at all times) they haue bin obserued, to be the most actiue, and very best Souldiors of the world.

The Gaules naturally affected to Horses

The Ring of Iron was (as we haue already said) a noate of slauery to the Gaules and Germaines, Germaines, to the Greekes and Romaines, who borrowed from the Gaules the diffe[rence] of Rings. All Slaues (in auncient times) wore Rings of Iron, in holes bored through their eares, vpon their fingers, and very often on their feete, like miserable Gally-slaues, fastened to the chaine: and in this manner they were condemned to digge and labour in Mines. Ad Metalla, Fodinasque damnati.

Lucian, for this consideration, introduceth Prometheus, fastned on the mountaine Caucasus, with great Iron Chaines, and on his finger a Ring of the same mettall; subiect to rust, and of no value.

Anulum aureum neque Seruus, neque Libertinus gestabat in publico, sed Anulo aureo Liberi vtebantur; Libertini argenteo, Serui ferreo, so learned Isidore telleth vs. It was by the Ring of Iron, that Slaues were knowne, as Apuleius saith in the tenth booke of his Milesians. Donec iussu Magistratum ministeria publica, contrectatis nequissimi, Serui manibus, Annulum Ferreum deprehensum, cum signo sacculi conferunt.

A passage which may make vs to obserue an order well kept in auncient houshold gouernment, when, to hinder the infidelity of Slaues, of vile birth, and worse breeding, as naturally inclined to all vice; those reuerend Elders lockt vp all things vnder key. For the Mothers of the Family, who had no other troubles in their heads, but loyall loue to their Husbands, and respect of the houshold (two points to be most wished in euery wife wife) did weare (on necessity) Rings of Gold. Within the table of some one of them, were ingraued certaine carracters, and a Scale on the one side, and on the other a little Key, fastened to a Chaine turning in the hand, to locke and open whatsoeuer might be subiect to pilfering. Because our auncients held this as an vndoubted maxime, Tot serui, tot hostes: whatsoeuer distinction may be induced of voluntary seruitude, or forced. Simus semper omnes, etsam in purpura. Si sperat fore clam, rursum ad ingenium redit, so saith the prouerbe, and the learned Comicall Terence.

A notable obseruation of Auncient Houshold gouernment.

Plinie in the three and thirtieth Booke, and the first Chapter of his Naturall History, saith: Nemo cibi, & potus, Anulo vindicantur a rapina. In Plautus, the Mother of the Family, to keepe her selfe from pilly theeues, went her selfe to Market, and at going forth of her house, lockt and made fast her Cubbords and other places of charge.

Obsignat cellas, refert Anulum ad me.

Whereof a seruant complained, detesting this dilligence, most requisite in house-keeping, to locke vp all things vnder Key, euen to the Salt-seller, as the same Plautus affirmeth:

Isti parcipromi qui Saliuum seruis obsignant Cum Sale.

And Marshall in his ninth Epigrame.

Nunc signat meus Anulus lagenam.

A diligence which S. Clemens Alexandrinus approueth, and commendeth in a Christian woman, in the third Booke of his Institutions. Dat Fœminis Anulum Aurcum, nec eum quidem ad ornamentum, sed vt ea obsignent, quæ doni digna sunt quæ custodiantur, propterea quod domus cura ad eas pertineat. Si enim rectam Pædagogi institutionem omnes probe sequerentur, nihil opus esset Signaculis, cum omnes essent ex æquo Iusti, & Serui, & Domini. Sed quoniam ignorantia, & mala educatio præbet occasionem propensionis ad iniuriam, fuit opus Sigillis. A passage which well deserueth to be translated into English.

The reason why the Ring of Gold was taken from a Christian woman.

It was permitted to a Christian Woman, to weare the Ring of Gold on her hand, not for ostentation, or vaine braucry, but for necessity and care of House-keeping. It is giuen her to seale and locke vp such things as are to be conserued; because she was married, to conserue and gouerne the goods of her Husband. For, if euery one vnderstood and knew the rules belonging to a rich Oeconomie, there would be no neede of locking any thing vnder Key: because the Maister and the Seruant would walke equally alike in iustice. But by reason of ignorance in the Maister, and bad breeding in the Slaue or Seruant, doing vniustly to his Maister; he makes his good guard, locking all things safely vp vnder Key.

Romaine triumphers did not weare the Ring of Gold, but one of Iron.

Among the Romaines, the Generals of Armes, that had deserued to triumph, were mounted vpon a Chariot, drawne by foure white Horses; hee cloathed in a large Mantle of Tyrian Purple, imbrodered with Palmes of Gold, and the Diademe or triumphall Crowne on his head. And yet notwithstanding, it was not lawfull for him to weare Rings of Gold, but onely of Iron, the marke of Slaues, and of their baseneſſe. To the end, that that on this day of brauery, they should fixe their eies on the vilenesse of the mettall, which they wore on their hands, and thereby acknowledge the inconstancy of the affaires of the world, whom they tearmed Fortune, who had nothing for her pedestall, but a rowling Bowle.

This is that which Plinie obserued, in the three and thirtieth Booke, and first Chapter, of his Naturall Historie. Et quum coronæ ex auro Hetrusco sustineretur a tergo, Anulus tamen in digito Ferreus erat, æqua Fortuna Triumphantis, & Serui publici Coronam sustinentis.

Concerning that which the saith of the Triumphall Crowne, made of pure Tuscane Gold: it was carried ouer the Victors head, by the publique Seruant which was behinde him (and on the same Chariot of Triumph) vnderstood to be the Executioner of Iustice, whom the Romaines held in such detestation, that he had his dwelling house farre enough off from the Citie, as the Oratour saith, and Iuuenall in his tenth Satyre, is conformable to the testimony of Plinie.

Quippe tenet sudans hanc publicus, & sibi Consul
Ne placeat, curru seruus portatur eodem.

This was in regard of feare, to haue the Hang-man for so neere a neighbour.

Zonoras a Greeke Author, in the second booke of his Ecclesiasticall Historie, hath added another notable noate. That to the Chariot of Triumph, was fastened a withy-band, a Bell and a whip: to let him vnderstand, that (being but a man) he might fall into some such inconuenience, as might cause him to be bound & whipt like a slaue, and passe through the Hang-mans hands; to the end, that he was not to be ouer-proud of his present prosperity. Malefactors condemned to punishment were led bound, bearing a Bell, or the Hangman for them: to aduertise the people walking vp and downe in the streetes, to withdraw themselues from thence, least they should be polluted by so vile company. Which custome is yet to this present day obserued in Turkie, in one and the same manner: sauing that the Turkes, not hauing retained the vse of Bels (which are euery where broken) haue none, in leading their condemned to punishment. In some places of France, Spaine and Italie, offenders are led to punishment with the sound of a Trumpet.

Concerning punishment of Malefactors.

The Triumpher, being highly exalted with glory and magnificence, rustling in Gold and precious Stones, brauely glittering in his Mantle of Scarlet, and Cinabre, wherewith his naked body was made to looke red, like to the Pagans Gods, or rather like the Persians, among whom the seauen Princes of their Empire (according to the ordonance of great King Cyrus) painted their faces and hands with Vermillion, to make themselues both more venerable and dreadfull to their Subiects, by their lookes: This Victor, adored as a Mars, when he returned from battailes in Honor: This Triumpher, preceded by all the Squadrons and Romaine Horse, of Kings and Princes subiugated, captiued and chained, with their lookes deiected, and fixed on the ground.

The seauen Princes of the Persian Empire.

(Manibus post terga reuinctis)

And followed by all the Romaine people, attired in fine white garments, crowned with Laurell, and bearing both Palme and Laurell in their hands: This magnificent man, in the height of all his Royall pompe, was (at diuers times) stearnely gazed in the face, by this publique Seruant, who caused him to remember the frailtye of worldly affaires. As we learne of great Tertullian, in the three and thirty chapter of his Apologies. Hominem se esse etiam Triumphans tunc illo sublimissimo Curru admoneatur. Suggeritur etiam ei a tergo. Respice te, Hominem; Memento te.

And the same Romaines, setting their Slaues at liberty, which they called enfranchising; tooke away their Ring of Iron, and gaue them one of Siluer, and, of Slaues, they tearmed them Freemen, and their children Ingenious and Free: to whom onely it was permitted to weare the Ring of Gold: the marke of the Son of the Family, returning home againe to his Father, as we reade in Saint Luke.

The Ægyptians at enfranchising their Seruants, gaue each of them a Ring of Gold: as appeareth in the Historie of Ioseph, Genesis the one and fortieth Chapter. To Captaines that had carried themselues valiantly in warre; as a recompence of honour, they gaue a Ring of Gold; within the beazill or collet whereof, was engrauen the figure of a Beetle-flye, so saith Plutarch in his Tract of Isis and Osiris; Because that that creature is altogether masle, and hath not any female: giuing thereby to vn-derstand, that Nobilitie maketh best apparance of it selfe, by valiancy and manly courage.

Euen so among the Romaines, the Ring of Gold was numbred among the gifts and recompences of honor, giuen to valiant Captaines, as Asconius Padianus witnesneth in these words. Quadam præmia, & dona militaria, & honori, & lucro sunt, vt hasta, vexilla, Phalera; & Corona Ciuica. At Anuli Aurei Ingenuitatis signa sunt. Concerning Military Gifts and Recompences, some doe bring but Honor onely, and others Honor and Profit together. Iauelins, Banners, Streamers, Ornaments for Horses, and the Citizens Crowne, they onely are honorable: but Rings doe bring both Honor and Profit together, because they are the signale or marke of free condition, and of liberty. And this he speaketh to very good purpose, because the Romaine Emperours granting the priuiledge of wearing Rings of Gold to their Slaues, did also (by the same meane) set them at liberty, so (by little and little) gracing them with Noble titles, among the ranke of Romaine Knights.

How the Romaine Emperors gaue freedome to their Slaues.

What they did in honor to Captaines and men of warre; they afforded to Slaues by fauour, or corruption. The fashion or manner vsed by the Romaine Emperors, in giuing Rings of Gold to Generals of Armes, was with these words. Quando tu quidem in prælijs, in bello, in re militari versatus es, ob hasce res, Hoc Anulo Aureo Dono.
To the former speeches, they added a long Oration, wherein was noted particularly, the prowesse and heroicall actions (of him whom they made Knight) performed in Battailes and dayes of Chiualrie, done in the sight of the chiefe of the Armie, with obseruation of circumstances, particularities of place, time, and the occasions, according as the Orator remarketh, inueighing sharpely against Verres (Diuinatione quinta) who contrary to all the auncient formes, had granted the Ring of Gold to his Tabellion or publique Notarie, vtterly incapable, and vnworthy to be made Knight.

When the Ring of Gold was giuen to the Generall of an Armie.

By money and corruption, Slaues obtained to be made Knights; as we learne of the great Arnobius, Aduersus Gentes, in the fourth Booke. Pecunia donat Anulos, & priora loca in spectaculis: Because in the Theaters and Amphitheaters, they sate in the places of Knights.

Plinie in his three and thirtieth Booke, the first and second Chapters, noateth this corruption, somewhat reformed by Authenticall Rules: Sed hodie De iure Anulorum Aureorum, at the Code, whereby following the ordonance of the Emperours Dioclesian and Maximian, the Enfranchised enioyed the place of Romaine Bourgesses, and to weare Rings of Gold. But yet debarred from the rights of Patronage, as it is said in the Law, Is qui ius, D. eod. Statius obseruing this corruption, spake very effectually to a Slaue, made Noble, and a Knight.

Mutauitque genus, lanaque ignobile ferrum
Exuit, & celso natorum æquauit honore.

And before him, Petronius Arbiter, describing the riot and excesse of the Slaue Trimalcion. Habebat in minimo digito sinistræ manus, Anulum Grandem Subauratum, & extremo vero articulo digiti sequentis minorem, vt mihi videbatur Totum Aureum, sed plaferreis velut Stellis ferruminatum. He taxeth him, with deriuing from Slauery to Nobility; which the Ring of Gold declared: distinguished with small Stars of Iron, on the next finger to the little, on the left hand.

The Physician finger

And from thence we learne, that Rings of Gold are worne by Noble persons on the medicinall finger of the left hand, called by the Latines, Digitus Medicus, as the little finger, his neighbour, Auricularis. Aulus Gellius, in the tenth Booke and Chapter of his Attick-Nights (followed by the whole Schoole of Physitions) declareth that a small and subtile Arterie (but not a Nerue, as Aulus Gellius saith) proceedeth from the heart, to beate on this Physition finger. The motion of which Arterie may be felt by touching the finger, as an Index or demonstration, of whatsoeuer is next to the Pulse, either in women in trauaile, or in weary and ouer-laboured persons; informing alwayes from time to time, when the heart beateth, or is offended.

The Physition finger neuer offended with the Gout.

This finger on the left hand, is rarely afflicted with the Gout, for the sympathie and neighbourhood it hath with the heart (the first liuing and last dying) which con-serueth

ueth the Gouty, vntill such time as the infection of corrupted humours, come to perse themselues in the left crannies of the brest or stomacke, vnder which is the int of the heart, and then this Annulary finger becommeth Glandulous & swolne.
r then, when vitall heate is quenched and wholly abated (as a light without oyle) r Lampe is extinguished, by the deuision of a whole part.
And the Canonists hold in the Glosse of the Chapter Fœmina the thirtieth, and e fift Question, that to this Physicall finger, a veine answereth, which taketh his urse and originall from the heart.
And this is the reason, why at Sacring the most Christian Monarches of France e only solemne act which they doe in all their life) the Ring of Gold is put on e fourth finger of the left hand, in signe of a marriage that day, betweene them and e Kingdome. As the same is done to married wiues in the Church, with the Silr Rod, the marke of honor, and obedience vowed by her to her Husband. For such ings ought not to be giuen, or worne otherwise.

CHAP. VI.

Of Ceremonies exercised and performed, in giuing Armes to Esquires, and bestowing the Order on Knights.

Whence came the first naming an Esquire.

Oncerning Esquires, without making any vnprofitable inquisition further off: they receiued appellation, as well of the Shields belonging to their Maisters, (termed in French Escuts) and vsed in their quests and actions of Armes; as also of their Horses, whereof they had the charge and respect, aboue all things else.

It is also sufficiently knowne, that in the Salique Law, Stables for Horses were, and are still called Escuries, at the eighteenth title De Incendijs, and the third Paragraph. Si quis Su-em, cum Porcis; Scuriam cum Animalibus, vel Fenile incenderit, I I D. Denar. qui faci-ut Solidos L X I. culpabilis iudicetur, excepto capitali, & dilatura. The selfe same, is in e fourth title of the Lawes of Bauaria, and in the complaint of the Archbishop of heims Hincmarus, against the Bishop of Laon, who carried the same name. Insuper & curiam ipsius intercluſit, &c. In processe of time, the name of Esquire became comon to such Gentlemen, as serued for Caruers at the Tables of Kings and Monarches f France, as likewise to the principall Officers of their household, and waiting in their itchin.

Obseruation among the ancient Gaules & Germaines.

Vnder the estate of the auncient Gaules and Germaines, their Sonnes did not apeare in publique, vntill they were become tall youths, and of yeares capable, to fa-ion themselues for the managing of Armes. Liberos suos, nisi quum adoleuerint, vt mu-as Militiæ sustinere possint, palam ad se adire non patiuntur; filiumque in pueriti state, in ublico in conspectu Patris assistere, turpe ducunt. This we learne of Cæsar, in his sixt ooke of the memories of the Gaules warre.

Such as was most in vse among the Princes of the Empire.

In this age of youthhood (commonly called Adolescencie) capable to learne what elonged to Armes: those yong Gallants were brought to diets and publique Assemlies, to learne some knowledge of the world, and to grow Courtly; And then it was, when they were made Esquires, by giuing them their first Armes, which ought not o be vnderstood of the Sword, because that was put into their hands, euen from their irth.

The presentation of the young Gentleman.

At these publique Assemblies, the Prince, the Father, or the neerest kinsman of the ong Gentleman there presented, deliuered report of his discent and Genealogie:
with persuasion of vndoubted hope, that he would neuer wander or degenerate from he wayes, wherein his famous Ancestors had alwayes walked. Then was hee re-eiued as an Esquire, by giuing him the charge of the Lance, and of the Shield, beonging to the Prince or Lord, that entertained him into his traine. This haue we learned of the Noble Historian Tacitus, in his Germania. In ipso consilio vel Principum, vel ater, vel Propinquus, Scuto, Frameaque Iuuenem Ornant. Thus you see the Ceremonies

The ancient manner of creating an Esquire.

obserued, in giuing the first Armes to a yong Esquire: which was (properly) a kind of Adoption, made by the Prince, of these yong vpshooting plants, to inmatriculate them, and giue them enrolement, among the Sonnes of the publique weale, whereof they began then to be made members: for, before these ceremonies, they were reputed no other then houſ-birds, or home-lings. Hac apud illos toga, hîc primus insignis honos; ante hoc, domus pars videntur, mox Reipublicæ.

Diſtinction betwixt yong Esquires of Birth-right.

In elder times (as yet to this day) Noblemen tooke the title, and the quality of Esquires, & carried their Fathers Armes, by distinction (as we haue already said) of the degrees of primogeniture, or birth-right: which yet neuertheleſſe could not be permitted, before the said Esquires were married, and become Fathers of the Family. For yong Esquires could not beare Armes (at leaſt paternall) if they were not knighted. Well might they seale with the Armes of their Mothers, and then when they were Knighted, it was permitted them to take the paternall Armes, (according to the degree of birth) in their Escutcheon and Seale, engirt with the Order by them receiued. But it was very carefully respected, that Esquires (were they married, or vnmarried) should haue their Spurres and Armes but siluered. Il n'appartenoit qu'aux Chevaliers d'en porter de Dorees. It belonged to none but Knights, to beare such as were Guilded.

A prohibition concerning Esquires.

Greeke Authors, as Posidonius, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, and Atheneus, in the fourth Booke of his Dypnosophystes, and the Tract De Coena Celtarum, maketh mention of the Gauliſh Esquires; who attended diligently behinde the Knights their Maiſters (so long as they were seated at the Table) with their Shields and Lances.

The proper Armes of a French knight.

For, the Lance and Shield were the proper and naturall Armes, appertaining to a French Knight. And therefore they are called in their Capitularies, Arma Patriæ, which Esquires carried alwaies after their Maiſters, into whatsoeuer parts they went, and vpon what occasion, as namely.

To feasts and Banquets: the passage formerly alleadged of Atheneus, may serue for proofe.

To Benches of Iuſtice, called places of suites and controuersies; their owne Capitularies, third Booke and two and twentieth Chapter. Vt nullus ad Mallum, vel Placitum nisi Patria arma, id est, Scutum, & Lanceam portet.

Likewise to the Church. At the Councell of Magunce, and the seauenteenth Canon. Laici vero qui apud nos sunt Arma Patria portare non prohibemus, quia antiquus mos est ad nos vsque peruenit. We shall obserue this auncient Custome more amply in the Tract concerning the Order of the Starre.

Of these Esquires (whom the Latiniſts call Armigeros) Virgill hath a passage in the second booke of his Aneidos.

Et Equorum Agitator Achillis.
Armiger Antomedon.

Tacitus witnesseth vnto vs, that they were appointed to follow in the seruice of Kings, Princes, and great Lords, to learne the training and profeſſion of Armes, and to make application of them, as well for peace, as warre. And this was the reason why he gaue them the title of Companions, or fellowes. Magna Comitum aemulatio, quibus apud Principem suum locus, & Principum cui plurimi, & acerrimi Comites. Hæc dignitatis, hæ vires, magno semper Electorum Iuuenum globo circumdari, in Pace decus, in Bello præsidium.

As we passe on in this discourse, we may remember, a word formerly spoken of which Latine Authors (traducing it from Strabo and Diodorus Siculus) haue interpreted by the name of Lance (a meere Gauliſh word) for that of Framea, which they say is Equinocall, for all Armes both offensiue and defensiue, hurting farre off. And Pilum in the passage before alleadged, maketh the Gaules to be armed with Lance-gaies and long Iauelins, to hurle and dart out of their hands, as in the eight Booke of his Aneidos.

Bina Aſpina coruſcant.
Geſa manu.

And it is well knowne, that the Gaules (in elder times) possessed a great part of Italie, talie, and all Insubria, at this instant called Lombardie, and tearmed Transalpine Gaule in regard of France) consequently the Mountaines of the Alpes, Alpina geſa, & Liburna Scuta, which euermore haue beene taken for Armes of the Gaules, namely, the Lance and Shield. This is respectiuely obserued by Procopius, speaking of the wars in Italie, done by Belisarius, in the time of the Emperor Iuſtinian the Law-maker.

The Sword is a weapon generall to all Souldiors.

But the word Framea, should not be vnderstood of the Sword, Armes generall to euery man of warre indifferently, albeit disguised with many diuers names, of a Tucke, Horsemans-Sword, Blade, Cemitarie, Faucheon, Rapier, Flamberge: all which epithites notwithstanding, that of the Gaules and Germaines was properly but a Sword. The Interpreter of Diodorus Siculus, hath remarked this propriety; Pro Ensibus, Ferreas Spatas gerunt a dextro latere pendentes. In France, they that speake the language of Oc, doe yet tearme it Espade. And the Romaines, in their tongue, name this weapon of Armes, Ensem, as in the second Aneidos.

Laterique Argiuum accommodat Ensem.

And the Armes of the long Pike or Speare, called by the Romaines

Pila minantia Pilis;

Was among the Gaules and Germaines The Lance: As the same Interpreter of Diodorus Siculus hath very well obserued; Iaculis bellant, quæ illi Lanceas vocant. Beside which, as well the Horseman, as the Fantaſsine, had the Axe of Armes, commonly called the Battaile-Axe, which in the Historie of S. Gregorie of Tours, is called Francisque. And Flodard, in the Historie of the Church of Rheimes. In elder time also, the hundred Gentlemen of the Kings house, with their Battaile-Axes, carried the same kinde of Axe, represented by their Pentioners Polaxes.

How the name of Cheualier tooke the first beginning.

The greatest care that any Knight had, was, to be continually furnished with a good Horse, which he tearmed Bon Cheuall, and thence it seemeth, that the name of Cheualier receiued Originall. And it is well knowne, that (at Rome) such men were called Chualers. Qui Equo publico moerebant. For such Horses were maintained at the publique charge, in time of the Common-wealths first springing: And afterward, at the Knights owne expences, when their Reuenue valued foure hundred Sestertues, as we haue already said.

The degrading of Romaine knights

Cornelius Tacitus, speaking of Romaine Knights degrading, and cast off by the Emperour Vitellius, for the murthering of his predecessour, writeth: that he tooke away Their Baudrickes and Horses. He saith moreouer, that the Horse of one of those dismounted Knights, running after his Maister, would not forsake him, till the Knight at one stroke with his Sword, slew the Horse; and afterward sheathing it in his own body, died betweene his Horses feete.

By this pittifull spectacle, and the passage formerly remarked from Curopalates, touching the Diademe; we vnderstand, that the Baudricke giuen to Knights, was called Cingulum Militare, and that the Romaine Emperours, or Lieutenants Generals of Armies and Prouinces, in honoring Captaines or Souldiors (respectiue for valiancie) with the Baudricke and Girdle, did first declare the proweſse of Knights in future hope, and afterward vsed the same kinde of formall proceeding before set downe, of words at the deliuery of Rings of Gold. Quando tu quidem, &c. Hoc te Baltheo Dono.

The first Christian order of making knights.

The first Kings and Princes, being Christians, at giuing this golden Girdle, kissed the new made Knight on the left cheeke, and vsed these words. In honor of the Father, of the Sonne, and of the blesſed Holy Ghoſt, I make you a Knight. And then they receiue his hommage, the Oath of vassailage, and fidelity of the Knight, he being on his knees before them.

In the life of the Emperour Lewes the Debonnaire, and in the Monke Aimonius, his fift Booke and seauenteenth Chapter of his Historie of France, he saith, That the Emperour Charlemaigne, euen on the point of marching to Battaile, to vanquish and ouercome the Hungarians; made the said Lewes the Debonnaire (his Son) Knight, in the Towne of Reganesbourg, at this day called Ratisbonne, engirting him with the Baudrick, & the Sword of a Knight, giuing him also the Accollade, that is say, kissing him.

The Knights Sword differing from them of ordinary vse.

We haue tearmed it The Sword of a Knight, to declare, that it was different from the ordenarie vse; for like as vpon solemn daies, for Ceremonies beloging to the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt, Instituted in the Augustines at Paris, by the mirror of Christian Princes and Monarches Henry, third of the name, King of France and of Poland (of blessed memory) the Knights were all cloathed in white, their hose and pumpes white, and their Swords adorned with a Scabbard of white Veluet: euen so the Swords which the Knights wore, vnder the reignes of the first, second, and at the beginning of the third Ligne, vntill the reigne of the great King S. Lewes, were couered with fine white cloathe, curiously waxed, and the same Scabbards were all ouer-semmed with Crosselets of Gold. As testifying thereby, that it appertained particularly to them, to fight for the faith of Iesus Christ, against the enemies of the Crosse. We learne this out of the Chronicle of the same Monke of S. Gall, in the life of the King and Emperor Charlemaigne.

Hæc erat paratura antiquorum Militum Francorum, Calciamenta forinsecus aurata, cum rigijs tricubitalibus insignata; fasciolæ crurales vermiculatæ; & subtus eas tibialia, ac coxalia lineæ, quarnuis ex eodem colore tamen artificiosissimo opere Variegata, superque, & fasciolas in modum intrinsecus, & extrinsecus, Curcis ante, & retro, longissimæ illæ corrigiæ tendebantur. Deinde Camisia gluzzina; posthec Baltheus Spatæ colligatus, quæ Spata primo Vagina Fagea; secundo corio qualicunque; Tertio, Linteamine, Candidissimo cera lucidissima roborato, ita cingebatur, vt per medium Cruciculis eminentibus, ad Peremptionem Gentilium demonstradam, auuaretur. We shall hereafter obserue the particularities of this excellent passage.

These Swords for Knights were hallowed with plentie of Ceremonies, by the very chiefest Prelate that was then in the Court. Being laid vpon the Altar, the Prelate Officiant vseth these Prayers.

The manner of hallowing the Swords of Knights.

EXaudi Domine, quæsumus preces nostras, & hunc gladium quo famulus tuus N. accingi desiderat, Maiestatis tuæ dextera benedicere dignare, quatenus defensio, atque protectio possit esse Ecclesiarum, Viduarum, Orphanorum, omniumque Deo seruientium, contra sæuitiam Paganorum, alyisque insidiantibus sit potior, terror, atque formido, per Christum Dominum nostrum, &c.

Heare Lord we beseech thee our Prayers, and this Sword, wherewith thy seruant N. desireth to be guirded and readily Armed (the right hand of thy Maiesty will vouchsafe to blesse. That it may serue for a defence and protection of thy Church, Widdowes, Orphanes, and all the Seruants of God, against the tyrannies of Pagans, and other deceiuers, seruing also as a terror and threatner of them. Through Iesus Christ our Lord, &c.

Duties to be performed by the Knights to be made.

After that the Knight to be made, hath bathed the day before, watched all night in the Church, receiued his Creator (after confession first made) and taken the Oath, to protect and defend the Churches of God, Widdowes, and Orphanes from all wrong and violence, with promise to warre against (to his power) the Pagans and enemies of Iesus Christ: the Prelate deliuereth the Sword into his hand, with these words. Serue Christi, sis Miles in nomine Patris, & Filij, & Spiritus Sancti, Amen.

Seruant of Iesus Christ, be a Knight, in the name of the Father, and Sonne, and Holy Ghost, Amen.

ACcipe hunc gladium tuum Dei benedictione Collatum, in quo per virtutem Spiritus Sancti resistere & eijcere valeas omnes inimicos tuos, & cunctos Sanctæ Ecclesiæ aduersarios, atque protegere castra Dei, per auxilium inuictissimi triumphatoris Domini nostri Iesu Christi. Esto memor illius de quo Prophetauit Psalmista dicens. Accingere gladio tuo super femur tuum potentissime. Vt in hoc per eundem, vim æquitatis exerceas, molem iniquitatis potenter destruas, & sanctam Dei Ecclesiam, eiusque fideles propugnes, ac protegas, nec minus in Fide falsos, quam Christiani nominis hostes execreris, & destruas, Viduas, & Pupillos clementer adiuues, atque defendas, desolata restaures; restaurata conserues; Vlciscaris iniusta, confirmes bene disposita; quatenus hac in agendo, Virtutum triumpho glorioſus, Iustitiaque cultor egregius, cum Mundi Saluatore, sine fine merearis ad Cælestia Gaudia peruenire. Qui cum Patre, & Spiritu Sancto viuit, & regnat Deus, per omnia sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

Receiue this thy Sword, coupled or ioyned with Gods blessing, wherewith, by vertue of the Holy-Ghost, thou shalt preuaile, to resist and ouerthrow all thine enemies, mies, and all aduersaries of the holy Church, as also to protect the Armie of God, by the vnconquerable assistance of the Triumpher Iesus Christ our Lord: Guird thy Sword vpon thy strong thigh: That with it thou maist exercise the power of equity, destroy and ouerthrow the hopes of iniquities, and for Gods Church, and faithfull people thereto belonging, fight valiantly and defend them, and no lesse against them of False Faith, then the name of Christians, to repell the hostes of such enemies, and destroy them: Widdowes and Orphanes clemently to assist and defend, and restore the desolate, preseruing them that are deliuered. Thou shalt reuenge the wronged, confirme the well disposed; and in performing these things, by vertue hereof triumph gloriously, be a worthy patron of Iustice, and with the Worlds Redeemer and Sauiour, attaine to the heauenly ioyes without ending. Who with the Father and the Holy-Ghost liueth and reigneth God, world without end, Amen

The Antiphonall.

Be of good courage, goe forth like a man, and obserue the ordenances of the Lord, that thou maist walke in his wayes, and keepe his commandements, precepts, testimonies and iudgements, and which way soeuer thou turnest thee, the Lord be with thee.

Let vs Pray.

God, who gouerneth both heauen and earth by thy prouidence, blesse and prosper thy seruant N. vndertaking thy sacred warfare; that all hostes of his enemies, by fortitude, and vertue of the Spirituall Sword, may be broken: And (thou, fighting for him) be deepely wounded: Thorow Iesus Christ our Lord, &c.

And to close vp the Ceremony, the Canticle is sung of the Sonnes of Corah, which is the foure and fortie Psalme, beginning; Eructauit cor meum verbum bonum, the eight verse whereof, is to be repeated three seuerall times. According to the vsual translation, it is the 45. Psalme.

Concerning the Oath, which the Knights make in receiuing the Order of knighthood; at all times, and in all places, it hath bin continually vniforme and alike. As we learne of that great splendor of the Church Saint Hierome, in his third Epistle, speaking of Nepotianus, Qui ad hoc habebat Cingulum; vt Viduis, Pupillis, Orphanis, Oppressis, Miserisque subueniret.

But the Ceremonies were diuers, according to customes obserued in the places. To some, Princes gaue the Kisse of Brotherhood, of Fauour, and of Loue, Osculum Pacis, to new Knights. To others they gaue a boxe on the eare; as the Emperour Charlemaigne vsed to doe, a custome long time retained in France, as well as in Germany. Others were made Knights, by giuing them three blowes with the Sword flat-long, betweene the necke and shoulders: which is yet obserued, especially on the dayes of Battaile, before they proceede to handy strokes. And as yet also is in vse, with the Guardians of the holy Sepulcher of our Lord at Ierusalem, in conferring the Order of the Holy Sepulcher, to voyagers comming so farre, and requesting to haue it. Ceremonies sundry, according to diuersity of places. Knights of the Sepulcher.

Petrus Blessensis writeth in his nintie and fourth Epistle, that in his time, Knights went and receiued their Swords from off the Altar: declaring thereby, that they were obedient Sonnes to the Church their Mother: for maintenance and defence whereof, they protested to make no spare of their blood, euen to the last drop thereof, and to accomplish whatsoeuer they stood bound to doe, by the Oath of Knighthood. Hodie Tyrones Enses suos recipiunt de Altari, vt profiteantur se filios Ecclesiæ, atque ad honorem Sacerdotij, ad tuitionem Pauperum ad vindictam Malefactorum, & Patriæ illa-

A custome obserued in France.

And for making this protestation, of defending the Faith of Iesus Christ, such was the custome obserued in France; that Knights in hearing Masse, Tenoient leur Espee nue in Pal, so long as the Gospell was in reading.

We haue formerly noated from the Monke of S. Gall, what was the equipage and ornament of Knights of France, vnder the first and second ligne of their Kings, here now you shall see the forme and practise obserued by the Romant of old Reynard, deuised and composed in the time of Philip le Bel, fourth of the name, King of France and of Nauarre, whose Court was better stored with Princes and Noblemen, then any other in those times. The Author feigneth in this Romant, that the Lyon, King of foure-footed Beasts (to whom, he giueth the name of Noble) determined to make his sonne Noblon Knight, vpon the day of his natiuity. The greater part of Antiquities were sought for, and deriued out of the most auncients Romants, as well in Prose as Verse, like Pearles out of the smoakie papers of Ennius. And because it appereth much better in the old French tearmes (the Authors further meaning referued to himselfe, as may be discerned by the lines fractions) then it can doe by traduction; I haue truely inserted the same, as it is in the Originall.

Moreouer, we shall obserue other Ceremonies, vsed at the making of Knights, in the Tracts of the Orders of England, and of Spaine.

Nobility in three descents by Father and Mother.

But before they may come to the honor of Knighthood, and to receiue the Accolade, they must make proofe of their Noblenesse by three races at the least, as well on the Fathers side, as the Mothers. Otherwise, the man is not to be admitted, nor receiued, although he be ennobled by the Mothers side in sixe descents or races, because the wombe doth not ennoble.

Custome of sundry places in France.

The old custome of Paris, Orleans, and of the Baronny is such, as if a man be not Noble from his Father; yet were he so by eighteene descents of stocke by the Mother: such a one being suffred to be made Knight. His Lord may cause his Spurres to be cut off vpon a dunghill.

The Man ennobleth, but not the Woman

The verball Processe in the auncient Custome of Meaux, importeth, that in the Palatinate Countie of Champaigne and Brie: La Verge Ennoblit, & le Ventre affranchit. Which approueth, that the Woman cannot Ennoble, but the Husband onely: And so (consequently) that the sonnes descended of a father, being a yeoman, and of a mothers Gentlewoman, are not sented and reputed to be noble.

And yet notwithstanding, the same verball Processe of the said custome of Meaux, imparteth this rule and Maxime, that the Compartitor, deriuing his principall meanes from the Rule of Right: it must needs be, that Partus sequitur ventrem; which is alwaies vnderstood hood of the same condition of the mother, be she free or seruile. So that in Champaine and Brie, it is held, that the Woman doth Ennoble, and many (in the said two Prouinces) are not ennobled, but in regard of the mother. I haue neuer seene that Priuiledge, although I haue made very diligent inquisition, in my being at Troies in Champaigne, where that worthy Gentleman Seigneur Pithous could not fully resolue mee, which hee might haue done sooner then any other, being of the same Country. But the Lord of Joinville, Seneschall of Champaigne, in the life of Saint Lewis (vpon whose seruice hee attended in his first voyage ouer the Seas) writeth, concerning himselfe: That he refused to accompany the said holy King S. Lewis in his second voyage; because (saith hee) that during his absence, his people had beene badly vsed by the Kings Officers. And in the said voyage, he had lost twenty or thirty Knights of Champaine, all Banner-bearers; by which losse it ensued, that the greater part of the Nobilitie of Champaine were dead, or else remained prisoners, in the two battailes which the said King S. Lewis lost at the Masore, and at Rexell. The widdowes and their daughters were enforced to re-marry themselues to Yeomen and Farmers, onely through defect of Noble persons. And thereupon, by some custome or priuiledge (which that place held as a Law) the Gentlewomen of Champaigne and Brie ennobled their husbands and kinred.

Enobling by the mother.

Men made honorable by their wiues.

Philip de Beaumanoir, Bayliffe of Clermont in Beauuoysis, in his Customary or Court-Rolle, which he alwaies kept by him fairely written, of Anno 1283. informeth vs, that the Sonne of a Gentleman, and of a woman seruant held in slauery, was made a Knight by him to whom the said seruant belonged, being ignorant of his condition. His seruitude comming to knowledge, the Lord of the woman-slaue would haue sould the said sonne, alleadging, that he was made Knight by ignorance of his being a slaue borne. Nuertheless, fauour of freedome so farre preuailed, that hee continued a free-man and Knight, because the Honour of Knighthood had enfranchised him, which his Lord and Master might doe, the fauour sufficiently couering the error. If any other but his Lord had made him Knight, he had lost both Knighthood and freedome together; because he that made him Knight, had not sufficient power to enfranchise him.

A testimony out of an ancient manuscript.

A yeoman may be Knighted by Fauour.

The King or Prince Soueraigne, and none other, by Grace and absolute power, may make him Knight that is Noble by the Mother. Hee may also make a yeoman Knight, because the Letters of Knighthood ennobleth the Yeoman, though hee be issued in villenage, both by father and mother.

A man called Philip, surnamed of Bourbon (by reason hee was borne in the said place) a Yeoman, had two sonnes: the Count of Flanders made one of them Knight, and the Count of Neuers did as much to the other. The two Counts were condemned in a-nereements to the King, by an Order set downe on the day of All-Saints, 1279. and at Pentecost also, 1280. And the two brethren each of them in a thousand pounds fine to the King, by a Decree ordered on S. Martins day, 1281. And yet notwithstanding, they remained Knights still, by grace and fauour which the King of France and Nauarre, Philip le Bel, fourth of the name, afforded them.

Preparatiõ to receiue the Order of Knighthood.

The proofe of Nobilitie being made, or the dispensation of Yeomanrie obtained by grace and fauour; the Esquire prepareth himselfe to receiue the Order of Knighthood, watching the night before in the Church or Chappell, with deuout prayers and meditations. When morning is come, He entreth into the Bath, to wash and make cleane his whole body; whereby he is giuen to know and vnderstand, that in all his following lifetime, he ought to be neat and cleane, as well of body as soule; honest in his manners and behauiour of life, wholly disposed to embrace vertue, and to vse in all his actions, modestie, prouidence, and wisedome. But especially, and aboue all things, to keepe his word inuiolably, and his faith vnstained, which is called by the Orator in his booke De Officijs, The foundation of Iustice.

What is vnderstood by bathing.

Fides alma, alta primis, & iusiurandum Iouis.

Because whosoeuer hath violated, or (but once) failed in his worde, by iests or lies; is forsworne before God, in whose presence he plighted his Faith, as the same Orator saith: Qui Fidem violat, is Iouem violat. And whosoeuer is a belier of his Faith, if he would be reuenged at another time, it behoueth him necessarily, that Aut nouos faciat Deos, aut Auditores: Either to forge new gods, or new Audators: so saith Demosthenes, in his declaiming against Æschines.

The

Office of the High Chamberlaine.

The Great Chamberlaine of France, in regard of his said Office, ought (among other things of like seruice) to furnish the Kings Court in Winter with straw, and in Summer with Rushes, to keepe it cleane, and in handsome condition. To looke that the King Haubert, that is, his Cuiraſſe want no Buckles, nor tongues to those Buckles: to prouide the Bardes & Chanfreines for his horse: and to prepare the Bathes for new-made Knights. And in regard of discharging this duty, there belongeth to him, the Robes and Surcoats which the said new-made Knights did weare, when they entred into those prepared Bathes: And the Cloake of euery Vaſſaile, doing Homage to the King.

After the Bath, the Knight to be made, was cloathed on his naked body, with a garment called a Gambiſon, which was like to a womans kirtle quilted, otherwise tearmed Auqueton, and ouer that a shirt of silke or fine linnen cloth, which the Monke of S. Gall called Camiſiam Glizzinam, ordinarily imbrodered with gold and silke at the skirts and corners. Vpon this shirt was put the Haubert, that was the Coat of Maile, reaching downe to the knees, and a Coller or necke peece of Leather about his necke, which the Romancer of Reynard meant by his rime;

De menacer vne Cuirie.

Ouer all was put the Coat of Armes, so named, in regard it was made with Lambeaux of Colours and Liueries of the Knight presented. Those Coats were in ancient Epitaphs and Paintings, figured in the fashion of skirted Cassocks, but short enough, like vntothe Archers of the Kings Guard, streaked & paled with his liueries. And such as they were of the Gauliſh Nation in elder times, of whom Virgill speaketh.

Virgatis lucent Sagulis.

But at this present, the Coates of Armes are made short, after the fashion of the Chastres shires, which are kept and worne vpon deuotion: and such are the Coats of Kings, Heralds and Purſuiuants of Armes in these daies.

The ancient fashion of French Knights Cloakes.

But by the testimony of Antiquitie (as we haue already said) reuerend in her furrowed wrinkles, we learne from the Monke of S. Gall, that French Knights were Cloakes large and deepe, which were called Cloakes of Honour, in the fashion of those for Kings and Dukes, being fastned vpon the right shoulder, and then turned vp on the left, so that they were long both before and behinde, and according to the ancient Romane square forme. The Monk of S. Gall continuing the habits of Ornament for French Knights, saith; Vltimum habitus eorum erat Pallium Canum, vel Saphyrinum quadrangulum, duplex, sic formatum vt cum imponeretur humeris, ante, & retro pedes tangeret, delateribus vero, vix genua contingeret. I haue seene in the Cappell of Dukes at Digeon in Bourgongne, the square Chasubles of Antiquitie, which were shewne me, with the Reliques wherwith the Church is adorned.

Corners of Veſtments open on either side.

* Or Mantelet according to Plautus.

This Cloake was double, Pallium duplex, because the Cape or Coller is called * Mantelet, as is plainely signified by the teatmes of the Monke of Saint Gall. He informeth of a garment, such as when the French fortified themselues in Gaule, vnder our Kings of the first line, perceiuing the Gaules to make vse in their seruice of Warre, of long skirted Cassocks, or sleeueleſſe Iackets, varied into diuers colours or Liueries; they forsooke their great Cloakes, and garmented themselues answerable to the Gaules manner: euen as in new fashions and habits of nouelty are pleasing and affected, onely through the desire of change. King Charlemaigne well obseruing the discommodity which those long-skirted Cassocks or Mandilions, brought to the Horſemen of the ancient Gaules, reaching but halfe way downe their thighes (as Martiall saith,) Dimidiaſq; nates Gallica Pallia tegit,

Like short Cloakes with sleeues.

According as the inhabitants in the Villages neere about Paris, with their Palletocs or Cassocks, white or violet, such as they were described by the Monke: Charlemaigne ordained, that the French should resume into vse, the great and long Cloake, worne by the Swart-Rutters; and that the Friſons which then were in France, exercising the Trade of Taylers, who (like Millers, that out of one sacke of Corne take double toule) made the like benefit of one garments fashion. Obserue heere the very wordes of the Monke of Saint Gall: Sed vt mos eſt humani ingenij, cum inter Gallos Franci militantes, virgatis Sagulis lucere conſpicerent, nouitate gaudentes Antiquam conſuetudinem dimiſerunt, & imitari cœperunt. Quod interim regidiſsimus Imperator idcirco non prohibuit, quia bellicis rebus aptior videretur. Sed quum Friſones hac licentia abutentes, aduerterent, & breuiſſima illa Palliola ſicut prius maxima vendere compersſſet, præcepit, vt nullus ab eis, niſi grandis longiſsimaque illa longiſsima Pallia conſuetudinaria pretia cœmeret.

The ancient Cloakes in vse to this day.

The fashion of this ancient Cloakes of Honor, are practised and in vse euen to this day, in the Orders of Knighthood; as wee perceiue by the great Cloake in the Order of the Holy Ghoſt, which is the Great Order of France, the most famous and venerable of all Christendome: the Mantelet, and the turning great Cloake, releuated with Charracters and Monogrammes of the King (Great Master and Founder of the Order, with the Lillie) according as heeretofore were the Cloakes of Honor, worne by the Emperors and Consulls of Rome, formerly obserued in the Tract of Kings and Heralds of Armes; according to whose Coates, those were fashioned like, belonging to Kings, Princes, and Knights, made in forme round, yet square, more long both before and behinde, and more short at the shoulders.

Cloaks worn by the Emperors and Consulls of Rome.

The Knight to be made, being in such equipage as formerly hath beene described; was presented and conducted to the Prince, who caused him to haue guilt spurres put on, beginning with the right heele, and ending with the left. Then the Knight, and such as guided him, brought him on his knees before the Prince: who, after the Liedge Oath, taken on the holy Euangeliſts: guirded him with the Sword, and made him a Knight, in the name of the father, the sonne, and the Holy Ghoſt.

The reason why the Liege Oath is giuen in the Order of Knighthood.

We haue tearmed it Liedge Oath, because that Oath of Knighthood being such, it bindeth him (as a Knight) to the Prince that gaue him the Order, to serue him toward and against all, Nemine dempto. And this is the reason, why Kings and Soueraigne Princes, be they naturall or protectors, ought not permit to Princes and Lords, which are their naturall vaſſailes, or vnder their protection, to erect or meddle with other Orders of Knighthood, except they declare to the protector, that they withdraw themselues from his protection. In the doing whereof, the goods which they enioy in the Eſtate of the Prince, Protector, are to be confiscated, in what manner soeuer they doe poſſeſſe them. Because to erect an Order or particular society, with any Oath whatsoeuer; setting any cloud or colour thereon, that may be giuen thereto: is to make a State within a State, a League and Rebellion against the Soueraigne, punishable with death.

Now concerning the Ceremonies formerly particularized, they are done in the times of Peace and leyſure, in the Courts of Kings. For in the times of Warre, they are not so carefully obserued, as on the day of Battell, before they proceed to handy-stroakes, when Esquires desire to be made Knights, to giue them the greater courage in well doing, and to be enterred as Knights, if they die in the fight. For the Prince or Generall of the Army then giueth them three stroakes, smitten flat-wise with the naked Sword on the backe, and pronouncing those words formerly related, without any other ceremonie. The like is done after the battell, to such as the Generall taketh knowledge of, for their valiant and worthy seruice, accordingly to recompence their valour: as King Charles the eight did, at his returne from the kingdome of Naples, after the battell of Fornoue.

Difference between Knights made in peace and in warre.

In the time of Charles the sixt, called the well-affected King, the Emperour Sigiſmond came to see him at Paris, and was lodged at the Pallace in the Chancerie: this happened in the yeare 1416. and the moneth of Marche. By permiſſion of the King, hee came and sate in the Court of Parlament, on a day of Audience, when the cause was pleaded between the two Lords of Peſteill & Signell, they both pretending right to the Office of Steward for Beauquaire. In the contract of marriage of Lewis Duke of Anjou, King of Sicilie, with Ioland of Arragon; he is named Seneſcallus Nemauſi, & Beliquadri.

A Hiſtory well worth the obseruation.

By fauourable and friendly Letters, Signell was highly commended to the said Emperour, who hearing that Peſteill (to fortifie his right) alledged Signell to be vncapable of exercising and holding the Office of Stewardship; because (as yet) hee was not knighted: suddenly he caused him to be brought before him, saying; That hee had the power to make Knights. Then commanding a sword to be brought by one of his Gentlemen, and Signell being on his knees before him, he gaue him three blowes on his backe with the sword, and taking off one of his owne guilt spurs, caused it to be put on Signels heele, and guirded him with a Girdle, whereat hung a long knife, in stead of a sword. So he was made Knight by the Emperor Sigiſmond, not in any enterprize against the sacred Maiesty of the King of France, in his Royall Pallace (as all the ancient Ordonances and Charters of France doth specifie) but because the said Prince had power to make Knights in all places of Kingdomes and Seigneuries, belonging to other Kings and Princes, according to the constructions of the Iuriſconſultes, who hold the Creation of Knights to be be an act lawfull, which is not restrained to any day, condition, or distinct place, but assigned precisely.

Another attempt of the Emperor impeached by the Kings Officers of Lyons.

Neuertheless, when (in the same yeare) the said Emperour, being in the City of Lyons, would haue exalted the Countie of Sauoy into a Duchie, and cloathed Amadis with the Ducall Cloake, setting the Cap of Honour on his head, after the fashion of Princes of the Empire: The Kings Officers in Lyons caused him to dislodge thence, passing ouer the riuer of Rosne, and the Lands of France, to performe that act of an Emperor, on the lands belonging to the Sauoyan, if so it seemed good to him: for he could not exercise any such in the Kings Territories, such as are Lyonnois, Prouence, Bourgongne and Dauiphine. The King is Emperour in his kingdome, not relying temporally, but on God onely. For this cause Iohn Froissard obserueth, that at the entrance of Charles of Luxembourg Emperour, fourth of the name, and his sonne Wenceslaus, King of Bohemia, and elected of the Romaines (which entrance was made in the City of Paris, Anno Dom. 1378. and at the gate of Saint Denis) King Charles the fift, furnamed the wise, put himselfe between them, affording the right hand to the Emperor, and the left to his sonne the King of Romanes, but King Charles himselfe was mounted but on a white Gelding, as shewing thereby, that he was Emperor in his owne Kingdome, and (there) such honor was due to him as could not be communicable to any other Soueraigne Prince, whatsoeuer he were.

Cingulum Militare of the ancient Romanes, & the Baldricke of the old French

Now, concerning the Girdle, wherewith the Emperour Sigismond caused the Seneschall Signell to be guirded, and whereat hung the long knife: this maketh vs to remember, that the Cingulum Militare of the auncient Romaines, and the Bauldricke of the olde French, were made of a large strong thong or strap of whit-leather, hauing the ends of pure gold, couered and fastned with nailes of the same mettall, (as wee haue already formerly said, and may haue occasion to speake of againe hereafter.) And to this Bauldrick or Militarie Girdle, the sword was made fast on the left side, and on the right a long Poniard or Warre-knife of fine steele, with three or foure squares on the blade, very keene and sharpe-pointed, (much like to the daggers of Scotland) which hung all along vpon the right thigh.

The Lord of Ioinuille, Steward of Champaigne, in the life of the great King S. Lewis, speaketh thus: I remember that I found there a Horsemans thicke quilted Cassocke, cut off from the owner, who was a Sarazin, which I tooke vp, and put the open part towards me, to make a Shield thereof, and it did me good seruice in such necessity, for otherwise I had been slaine: and yet I was wounded in fiue parts of my body, and my horse in fifteene. Within a while after, there came to me one of the Burgesses of Ioinuille, who brought me a Banner of my Armes, and a great knife of Warre, which I haue yet still to shew.

The Poet Claudian armeth the Romane Knight with this knife, hanging (according to the French Prouerbe) at the girdle, ouer and beside the sword. In his second Panegyrick of Stilico:

Quin & Sydonias chlamides, & fingula bullis
Aspera, gemmataque togas.

And so he further proceedeth on.

The long dagger-like kniues, had three or foure cutting edges, and were after the Germane fashion. The first of them that was seene in France, was at the battell of Bouines, wonne by Philip Augustus, in the yeare 1215. on Sunday the 27. of July, against the Emperor Otho; Iohn Without-land, King of England; Ferrand of Portugall, Count of Flanders, in regard of his wife Ioane, eldest daughter to deceased Baldwin Count of Flanders, Emperor of Constantinople; Renaud de Dommartin, Count of Boulongne likewise by meanes of his wife; and Simon de Dommartin his brother (Comes Domini Martini, and not Dammartin) according to the testimony of Rigordus, a Monke of S. Denis in France, Physitian, Chronicler, and Chaplin to the said Philip Augustus, whom hee followed on the day of the said battaile. He saith: that the Almaignes and Dutch attending on Otho, all ran vpon the person of the King, who saw slaine before his eyes Stephen de Longchampe, a braue, noble and most faithfull knight, by the blow of a knife, which he receiued into his head at the sight of his Caske or Helmet. For the enemy made vse of a kinde of weapon, admirable for fashion, and (before then) vnknowne: because they carried long kniues, thin and slender, yet formally made, hauing three edges, all cutting downe from the handle to the point, and vsed them in the stead of Swords.

The bloudy battell fought at Bouines in Anno 1214.

Pugnatur

Pugnatur ergo ibi ab vtraque parte virtute admirabili, & cadunt multi. Ibique ante oculos Regis ipsius occiditur Stephanus de Longo-Campo, Miles probus, & Fidei integræ Cultello recepto in Capite per Ocularium Galeæ. Hostes enim quodam Armorum genere vtebantur admirabili, & hactenus inaudito. Habebant enim Cultellos longos, graciles, tria quadrata, quolibet acumine indifferenter secantes, a cuspide, vsq; ad Manubrium, quib. vtebantur pro Gladijs. Sed per Dei adiutorium, prævalnerunt gladij Francorum, & Virtus eorum indefessa. Namque repulerunt totum aciem Othonis, & peruenerunt vsque ad eum, adeo vt Petrus Malenicinus Miles, quidem plus Armis, quibus alios præcellebat, quam seculari prudentia pollens, ipsum Othonem per frænum apprehenderet.

The knife called the knife of mercy.

Ancient Romancers called this long knife of Warre Miserecorde, Mercy, because such Souldiers or Knights as were beaten downe and vanquished, beholding their enemy to grasp this knife in his hand ouer them, and ready to stab it into the sight of his Helmet, or into his shirt or Coat of Male, or (wanting them) into his Haubert, cried for Mercy, by desiring life. The Noble Romant of the Rose saith:

Thou that in Manhood art to good inclin'd,
Take pitie, and let Mercy rule thy minde,
When thou discouerest bleeding sighes and teares,
Instead of Sword, and words of frightfull feares,
Then Mercy in most maiesty appeares.
Vndoubtedly, if Authors trueth rehearse,
The rudest stones and Diamonds it will pierce:
But let Warres knife be painted n'ere so faire,
Yet both the point and edge too piercing are.

After the manner of wearing Dudgeon daggers.

Such men as made profession of Armes, vsed to weare Swords, and those Kniues of Warre, and some others, as well Citizens as Country-men, weare at their girdles those kniues of Warre: yet not behinde, as on their backes, but hanging downe on the thigh, like to the Baionets in Gascoigne: young lads vsed to weare them euen from their childhood, and those lads in Paris, as also else-where, were called Bachelers, as much to say, as ready (for yeares) to be Esquires or Souldiers. Young maidens likewise, apt for mariage, were tearmed Bachelettes, according as in Picardy they are called to this day. They haue yet in Paris a Country song or Roundelay, which is sung and danced by Maides and youths in Summer-time, on Festiuall dayes after supper, Dialogue-wise in questions and answeres.

Mariage-able Maides.

Where then is the Bacheler?
Safe and sure, safe and sure,
Heere behold the Bacheler,
With goodly lookes, milde and demure.
A rich girdle, and faire knife;
He deserues a faire wife.

On the behalfe of Bachelers, and in honour of the worde or name, wee will conclude this Chapter for two remarkeable reasons. The first, because in the French Military discipline, there was such an Order obserued: that all the first ranke of honour, consisted of Knights Bannerets, followed by Knights Bachelers, and in the third place merched the Squires. The Knight Banneret was he who had so many Gentlemen his seruants at command, as he could raise a Banner, and make vp a company of Souldiers, to be maintained at his Table, and their wages paid out of his purse.

Knights Bannerets seconded by Knights Bachelers. Of the Knight Banneret.

Of the Knight Bacheler.

The Bacheler or lower Knight, was he, who had not seruants sufficient to leade to the Warre at his owne expences, but marched vnder the Banner of some other. And these degrees of Honor were knowne and distinguished by wages; in regard that the Knight Banneret had twenty Sols by the day, the Bacheler tenne, and the Squire had no more to dispend, but onely fiue.

Concerning the Oath of a Knight.

Moreouer, it is obserued also, that the Knight had no other oath, but the faith of a Knight, as appeareth in the Letters Obligatory of Hugh Count of Saint Paul, of Guye, and of Iames his brethren, dated in the moneth of Aprill, An. 1289. for the Land of Anenes in in Henault: and the brethren were bound to King Philip le Bel, by the faith and oath of Loyall Knights.

The Captall de Buch.

Concerning that of Iohn de Grailly, Captall de Buch, which is a Signeurall Principality in Guienne, abutting on the Ocean Sea, betweene Bourdeaux and Baionne, sometime peopled by a part of Bourbon men of Bourdeaux, acknowledged vnder the name of Visuſci: And therefore this Signeury (appertaining to the Noble houſe of Candale) is called Veſta, vel Caput Boiorum; in French, The Captalat de Buch. He was taken priſoner in warre, in the moneth of September, and in the yeare 1364. when he gaue his Seale vnto King Charles the fift, to keepe within the priſon appointed for him. But if he chanced to breake it, he was to be held for falſe, periured, and a diſloyall Knight, in belying and failing his owne faith. His Armes were alſo to be reuerſed, and turned with the heeles vpward, And as a man thus ſhamed and diſgraced, to be ſo condemned in all the Princes Courts.

The reward of perfidie in Knighthood.

The like Oath made Iohn Duke of Bretaigne, to King Charles the ſixt, by the agreement concluded betweene the King and him, the fifteenth day of Ianuary, in the yeere one thouſand three hundred and foureſcore, and the ſaid Oath was dated the ſixteenth day of Aprill, next following.

All the examples hitherto alleaged, are taken out of the Court Regiſters.

CHAP. I.

Of the Ancient Originall of the French.

SAint Hierome, the Father of Learning, and cleare flame of the Church, who (for a very long time) made his abiding among the Gaules, and namely in the City of Treuers, at that time the Capitall City of the reſt; in his Epiſtle Ad Ageruchiam, de Monogamia, deſcribing their miſerable condition, as he had good knowledge thereof, and beheld with his owne eyes, vnder the Empire of Arcadius in the Eaſt, and Honorius in the Weſt, ſpeaketh in this manner.

Innumerabiles, & ferociſſimæ Nationes vniuerſas Galliás occuparunt. Quidquid inter Alpes & Pyrenæum eſt quod Oceano, & Rheno includitur. Quadus, Vandalus, Sarmata, Alani, Gepides, Heruli, Saxones, Burgundiones, Alemanni, & O lugenda Reſpublica, hoſtes Pannoniæ vaſtarunt. Maguntiacum nobilis quondam Ciuitas capta, atque ſubuerſa eſt, & in Eccleſia multa hominum millia trucidata: Vangiones longa obſidione deleti, Remorum vrbs praepotens, Ambiani, Attrebates, extremique hominum Morini, Tornacus, Nemete, Argentoratum tranſlati in Germaniam, Aquitaniæ, Nouem popularum, Lugdunenſis, & Narbonenſis Prouincia (præter paucas vrbes) populata ſunt cuncta.

How the Gaules with ſeuerall Nations inuaded, became in miſerable eſtates

An innumerable company of ſtrange Nations, ſauage and barbarous inuade the Gaules in generall, that is to ſay, their ancient extendure, compriſed within the encloſure of the mountaines of the Alpes and Pyrenæans, and the great River of Rhine. The Wallakians, the Polonians and Vandales, the Alans, Gepides, Herules, Saxons, Bourgongnons, Allemdignes, and (O poore deplorable condition of the Gaules) the Hungarians made a totall forraging of them. Ma-

Maguntia, a City sometime most famous and renowned, forcibly taken and sacked; the Citizens and Inhabitants massacred, euen in the Church. Wormes, with all the wealth thereof, made desolate by a cruell and long siege. The rich, strong, and potent City of Rheims, as also Amiens, Arras, the people of Picardy and re-conquered Countries, planted vpon the Ocean shoares, Tourney, Spire, Strasbourg sacked and spoyled, & the people of them, branded with the names of prisoners and slaues, carried into Germany, and on the further side of the Rhine, with all their wealth and possessions, to serue as slaues to those cruell Nations, voyd of all pitty; by whom the Prouinces of Guienne, Gascoigne, Languedock, Lyonnois and Prouence (some of the Townes excepted) serued but for an Essay of their tyrannie.

At what time the Gaules came thus oppressed, and how.

Those barbarous Nations passed the Rhine, and threw themselues into Gaule, and in the yeere of Grace, foure hundred and sixe, about the ending of December; being incited thus to doe by the promises of Stilico the Vandale, who coueting to make his sonne Eutherius Emperour, was slaine with his Father, by the command of Honorius, in the yeere foure hundred and eight. So saith Orosius in his seuenth booke, and the eight and thirtieth chapter, and the two and twenty day of August.

The persecutions in the primitiue Church

God sent forth the arrowes of his wrath and fury, vpon the Romaine people, to reuenge the bloud of so many Martyrs, shedde on the face of the earth, during the persecutions excited wrongfully, and without cause, against the Church then growing. As is obserued by the Spanish Priest Paulus Orozius (who was a Contemporane with those two great Pillers of the Church, Saint Ierome and Saint Augustine, to whom Orozius was a Scholler) in the seuenth booke, and two and twentieth Chapter of the Worke-manship of the world. Soluuntur vndique, permissa Dei, ad hoc circumposita, reliquæque Gentes, laxatisque habenis in omnes Romanos fines inuehuntur. Germani Alpibus, Rhetia, Italiaque perrupta atque peruastata Rauennam vsque peruenunt. Alemanni Gallias peruagantes, etiam in Italiam transeunt. Grecia, Macedonia, Pontus, Asia, Gothorum inundatione deletur. Nam Dacia trans Danubium in perpetuum auferetur. Quade, & Sarmata Pannonias depopulantur. Germani vlteriores abrasa potiuntur Hispania. Extant adhuc per diuersas Prouincias in magnarum vrbium ruinis paruæ, & pauperes ædes, signa miseriarum, & nominum iudicia seruantes, ex quibus nos quoque in Hispania Tarraconem nostram, ad consolationem miseriæ recentis, ostendimus.

Behold the Allemaignes which forrage the Gaules. The Germanes hauing franchisted the Alpes and Grisons, trauersed Italie, and rauaged all, so farre as Rauenna. The Gothes hauing laid open Scandinauia, ouer-ranne Greece (or Epyre) Pontus, and the people of Asia. Dacia is (for euer) subiected to the Romanes. Wallachia and Polonia, aduancing themselues into Countries, haue Cantonned themselues with Austria and Hungaria. The Germaines beyond the Elba, haue possessed themselues of Spaine. Marcomir at this present, as a marke and testimony of their courses, you may behould (heere and there) desert fieldes throughout the Prouinces of Spaine; the Cities and Townes sometime highly renowned, to haue now no more then the Name to haue sometimes beene; and the soyle and seate thereof marked out with small Cottages, which beare their Names. Namely the place of my birth, poore Arragon, whereof remaineth now no more, but olde decayed houses, and ruined buildings, for all their comfort and consolation.

The chief City of Tarraconia.

Those holy men formerly alleadged, liued about the yeere of mans saluation, foure hundred.

Saint Gregory Victor, Archbishop of Tours, the most ancient and faithfull of all the French Annalists, in his first booke, and two and thirtie chapter, informeth vs: That a King of the Almaignes, whom hee calleth Chrochus, came and forraged the Gaules (where he lost his life) vnder the Emperour Probus, in the yeere of Grace two hundred and fourescore.

The inundations and rauages of those Barbarous Nations, beganne altogether in the ninth yeere of the Empire of Galien; and of our Lord, two hundred sixty three. Wherein (so saith Trebellius Pollio, the Romaine Historian, in the life of the said Emperour) there was a generall Pestilence throughout all the Prouinces of the Empire, with fearefull tremblings of the earth, and an vniuersall darkenesse (more then Cimerian) which continued for many daies together. Great claps of Thunder (Ioue non Tonante) contrary to reason, and against all common rule. All finite number of houses, villages, and Cities, with their Inhabitants, swallowed , beside many thousands of people, dying with the meere feare and affrightment. uers openings of the earth, filled with mortiferous stinking waters, and the Seas erflowing their bounds and limits prescribed, drowned the land, deuouring al- with the Waters impetuous passage, whole Townes and Villages.

And in one and the same instant, Nations and People, before vtterly vnknowne, med desirous to displume the great Romaine Eagle, and conuert her into the rowe of Horace: Quasi coniuratione totius Mundi, concussis Orbis partibus, vndique lum extitit, so saith the same worthy Historian.

Wee haue seene the Deluge of people, that wasted Gaule in the time of Saint ome, following the course by him formerly set downe, after they had passed the ine.

In the yeere foure hundred and twelue, Honorius the ninth time, and the youn- Theodosius the fifth time being Consulls; the Gothes forsaking Italie, vnder the onduct of Athaulphus, once more vanquished the Gaules. As Saint Prosper of Aitaine, and Sabaianus Bishop of Marseilles, (who liued at the same time) in the reatise which hee wrote of the iust iudgement and Prouidence of God, affirmeth his third booke, and so forward.

Latinus Pacatus, in his Panegyricke to the Emperour Theodosius the yonger: Vnde ordiar nisi a tuis, Gallia, malis? quæ ex omnibus terris, quas illa pestis insiderat, haud inuia tibi vendicas priuilegium miseriarum. The Vandales, after they had forraged e lands at their arriuall, possessed for some time the Champaigne Countrey, and this possession there remained no more of noate, but Vandalorum opera. Bourngne hath kept the name of her ancient possessours, euen to this day; and the andales quitting the place to the Bourgongnons, passed the Riuer of Loire, to possesse themselues of Aquitaine; from whence, both they and the Alans and Sweues ere expelled by the Visigothes of Italie, Conducted by Gisericus, (or Gensericus, cording to some Writers) to whom Honorius had giuen this rich Prouince (which e could not keepe any longer) in the yeere of Grace foure hundred and eighene.

By vertue of this donation, the Visigothes got the possession of Aquitaine, part hereof was called Gothia; and to this day Langue de Hoc, or of Goth. Accordg to others it was named Septimania, and Narbonnoise Gaule by our Ancients.

They chased from thence the Vandales, the Alans and Sweaues, who being vnle (in a companie) to turne backe againe, shifted for themselues in Spaine. The andalls and Sweues, conducted by their Princes Gondericus or Genthairus, and nsericus brethren, and sonnes of Modegisila: the Sweues by Hermenericus, and e Alans by Ataces; so that in the yeere foure hundred and nineteene, part of the andales and Sweues ouercame Galicia, and Castille the elder: the Alans had Portgall and the Prouince of Carthagena.

Successe of the Barbarous nations in other Countries.

The other Vandales and Silinges, held for their Lotte and partage, the Counie Bætita of Spaine, called (after their name) Vandalia, and thence forward, uen to this present) by change of a Letter, Andalousia the best Prouince of Spaine. ll these people, as well as the Gothes of Italy, and the Visigothes of Aquitaine, were fected with the Arrian Heresie.

Concerning the French in these tempestuous times.

But where are the French all this while, while others make themselues so much oken of? Were they at this time vnknowne, or hidden, as Achilles in Homer as, handling the distaffe? Nothing so; for they were a long time renowned for aliancie and Prowesse, and held in reputation, to be the very hardiest people of Gerianie.

The French that went into Gaule.

And yet neuertheless, it is a Maxime constant and assured, that they were the st of them that passed into Gaule; not to take an Essay of it, as the rest had done, hose defects they noted; but to possesse themselues there in earnest, and to beome Masters of it by setling their Conquest there, without letting slip or loosing eir hold, following the Nature of the generous Lyon, which they bare for their rmes. For the French (as wee doe commonly see one nayle drueth out another) pelled from thence by force of Armes, all such others as had made possessision of the places before them, as namely the Romanes, Vandales, the Alans, Sweuians, Bourgongnons and Visigothes, whom Gregorie of Tours, the ancient Annalist, named Gothes, without making any difference of them that held Italie (properly named Gothes) from the Visigothes of Gaule, who afterwards possessed themselues of Spaine.

The Authors purpose before he proceed any further in this discourse.

Yet before I set downe their Conquests, I shall perhaps doe an acceptable worke vnto the Readers, to touch by the way, what was their Originall. And so much the rather, because many writers haue placed their first abiding in the Marishes of Mœotides, and builded thereon Castles in Spaine, in the time of King Bamba, and the great Aunt Sicambria, Grandmother to a new people, abiding within the Circle of the Moone; making a new world, according to the opinion of some distempered Philosophers, destitute of iudgement and reason.

The opinion of some Historians, whence they came.

Some Historians make them to come from the Pannoniaes, for there are two at this day, the higher and the lower, which are the Kingdome of Hungaria, and the Archduchie of Austria, and that they came from thence, to dwell vpon the bankes of Rhine first of all.

And so hauing past ouer that famous Riuer, they went into Thuringe, where they builded many Cities and Townes, ordaining to rule and gouerne ouer them, as also to conduct them in Warres, Kings and Dukes, distinguished and discerned from other neighbouring Princes, by their long lockes and tufts of hayre; chosen and culled out of the principall families among them.

Saint Gregory Victor, Archbishop of Tours, in his second booke of the Historie of France (which shortly shall be seene of mine owne Translation) toucheth this opinion in the ninth Chapter. Tradunt multi eosdem (hee speaketh of the French) de Pannonia fuisse digressos, & primum Litora Rheni amnis incoluisse: dehinc transacto Rheno Thuringiam transmeasse, ibique iuxta Pagos, vel Ciuitates Reges Crinitos super se creauisse, & prima, & vt ita dicam nobiliori suorum familia. Hee reporteth nothing but this opinion of the ancient Originall of the French, whereunto neuertheless he trusteth not, for the reasons which wee shall relate more at large, when we come to the fifth chapter of this second booke.

He speaketh nothing at all of the Marishes of Mœotides; of the imaginary Sicambria, nor of the cinders of Troy.

A second opinion of a Germane original

Others doe maintaine, that the French had a Germane Originall: De Francorum Origine, secundum Germanos lis esse data videtur, qui Francos Galliæ Incolas rebus bello egisque gestis Clarissimos sibi vendicant. So saith Adrianus Turnebus, in the fiue and twentith booke, and the seauen and thirty Chapter of his Aduersaries. And hee addeth, it must necessarily be concluded, that they made one part of Germanie, as mingled and confused among them, without making any band apart; because Tacitus and Ptolomie, who exactly haue remarked the people and Nations of all Germany or Allemaigne, make no noate or mention at all of the French.

A third coniecture concerning Scandinauia.

Others will haue them to be descended from Scandinauia, grounded on a pretended passage drawne out of Ptolomie, who describing this Peninsula, which Plinie the Naturalist in his fourth booke, calleth Clarissimam Scandinauiam magnitudinis incomperta, denominateth and specifieth amongst the Inhabitants thereof, some one kinde of people, bearing the name of Phiraisi, which they say to be depraued, changed and altered, instead whereof (according vnto their iudgement) it should bee reade ΦΡΑΓΓΙ, and pronounced Frangi, from whence (as it should seeme) should come the title and surname of Franci.

A fourth different out of Scythia.

There be others beside, who from the same Ptolomie, and other Geographers, following his straine, will haue them to be descended from Scythia, and the Marshie Mœotides, and by the name of Brenci, the B. changed to F. and so drawne in by the eares, to be made that of Franci.

A good rule, and aduise in doubtful cases.

Now, at all times, and as often as question is made of Etymologies, and the Originall of proper names and Appellatiues (a matter somewhat difficult and queazie) wee should not proceed to the correction of them, without certaine and apparant reasons, and supported by the testimony of Authors of good noate, with this obseruation of the same Ptolomie (which they doe alleadge) who speaking of Scandinauia, Scandinauia, otherwise called Scandia, Baltica or Basilia, auoucheth it to be inhabited with seauen seuerall kindes of people, which were the Gothes, Ostrogothes, Visigothes, Danes, Rataines, Rugians and Tanians. He speaketh no more of the French then of the Megarians; a common prouerbe vsed by the Greekes.

Seauen seuerall kindes of people inhabiting Scandia.

But the most ridiculous opinion, is of them, who would create them out of the miserable ashes of great Troy, and of a supposed Francus or Francion, the pretended Sonne of Hector, a Paladine in painting, yea, a precious Relique, carried throughout the world; to the end, that her desert Prouinces might be planted with so noble a Seede. Hunibauld, and the Abbot Tritemius, Germaines: One Frier Annius of Viterbo, an Italian, the Comenter on a false and supposed Berosus, the pretended Chaldean, and of one Manethon of Phrygia, who neuer had being but in the world of the Moone (for the true Berosus a Chaldean, whom the learned Phylo a Iew, and Iosephus doe alleadge so often, neuer wrote any thing of the ashes of Troy) Iohn Maire the Belgian, in his illustrations of Gaule; Richard de Vesselbourg; one Frier Noel Talepied, of the Gray Fryers Order; and of later date, one Du Pre of Lyonnois, displayeth in the frontispice of his celebrated trauailes, the mangly countenance. And the rest of the same ignorant temper, haue plunged themselues in the Gulfe of those lyes and fables, taking them for money of the best payment, maintaining; that the people which followed the fortune of this imagined Francus, were (of him) named Frenchmen. All these reporters of Fables and Sonnets, are resembled to the pretended God Iupiter, whom the French Poet in the first Booke of his Franciades, feigneth and figureth in painting, to saue the supposed Francus. They made a Phantasma, like to the Iuglers of the Hostell de Bourgongne at Paris, making of Astianax, a Francus, like to Amphitrio in Plautus.

Fabulous writers of the Troyan Francus and the people comming of him.

Homer, Prince of the Greeke Poets, giueth but one Sonne, called Astianax, and surnamed Scamander, to the valiant Hector, and Andromache his wife, in the sixt Booke of his Illiades.

The Latine Poet calleth him nothing but Astianax, in the second Booke of his Aeneidos.

Sæpius Andromache ferre incomitata solebat
Ad Soceros, & Auo puerum Astianacta trahebat.

And like as those are meere Fables, of all the pretended Gods, and forged by the Greeks and Romaines:

Mulciber in Troiam, pro Troia stabat Apollo.
Æqua Venus Teucris, Pallas iniqua fuit.

Reade Thucidides his preface, an Historian of approued integrity, and more likely to vnderstand the truth of those antiquities of Greece.

Fables meerely inuented by the Poets.

So are the Siedges of Troy the Great, and of Thebes with an hundred Gates: And the voyage of the Argonautes, to conquer the Golden Fleece, the three most famous enterpises which the Poets euer feigned.

If Troy was, it neuer was taken, nor sacked after such manner, as Homer and Virgill haue feigned: According as it is proued by Dion Prussensis, in the booke which he wrote De Troia non capta.

Æneas, Anthenor, and other supposed great Lords of Troy, pretended founders of Rome and other places, are imagined names of persons that neuer were, but in the minde and fantasie of Poets. The Cato of his age, Pybrac, made (to good purpose) the Queene of Carthage say, that the Latine Poet taxed her with immodestie, and her Æneas with treason and perfidie.

I Rome, in me, ne're saw thy fugitiue Æneas.

But leaue we these Fables, to whosoeuer liketh to be led by them.

The French Poet, in the place before alleadged (to the end wee may talke no more of diuinations) being desirous to encounter them on the name of the French, by the adoption and composure of two Gaulish words ioyned together, Phere-Encos, which signifieth Beare-Launce, saith that his Francus.

In signe of Valiance,
Was by his Souldiors named Bear-Lance,
Phere-Encos, a name of people conquered,
Afterward said Francuz, ill pronounced.

Called Francuz by corrupted pronunciation.

Among the Armes of the auncient French, ouer and beside the Launce, was the Battaile-taile-Axe, which they called Anchon, and moreouer, yet to this day, in many Prouinces of France, it is tearmed an Achon, wherewith they ſerued themſelues in warre, by throwing it a farre off at ioyning with the enemy, onely to diſcouer the man, and to cleaue his Shield. Becauſe this Achon was darted with ſuch violence, as it would cleaue the Shield and compell the Maiſter thereof to hold down his arme, and being ſo diſcouered, as naked or vnarmed; it made way for the ſooner ſurprizing of him. It ſeemeth, that this weapon was proper and perticuler to the French Souldior, as well him on foote, as on horſeback. For this cauſe they called it Franciſcus. Franciſca, Securis oblonga, quam Franci libram in Hoſtes. For the Horſeman, beſide his Shield and Franciſca (Armes common, as we haue ſaid, to the Footeman) had alſo the Lance, which being broken, and ſeruing to no further effect: he laid hand on his Franciſca, as we learne the vſe of that weapon in the Archbiſhop of Tours, his ſecond Booke and twentie ſeauenth Chapter of the Hiſtory of France: and Floardus, in that Hiſtory of the Church of Rheims, the firſt Booke, and the thirteenth Chapter. But returne we now againe to the French.

The Battaile-Axe a weapon vſed by the ancient French.

If they had bin deſcended from the Pannoniaes, which haue (from time to time) bin famous, and tooke part with Germanie: it is not to be doubted, but that the Noble writer Tacitus, who purpoſely tooke delight to be a Topographer; would haue obſerued ſomewhat of them which cauſed the contradiction, and bringing to compromiſe, of the ſame Turnebus before alleadged, that the Anceſtors of the French tooke Originall from Germanie. Whereas contrariwiſe, he deriueth their ancient Originall from the Gaules: Gentis nobilis præſertim, & glorioſa in Europa, Imperij maieſtatem retinentis, Propaginem, & Sobolem, noſtros nominauerim. And this he wrote not without cauſe (although there be ſome that take it againſt the haire) becauſe it is a matter aſſured, that Germanie was peopled by the Gaules, and that the Allemaignes, by ſuch Colonies and plantations, were of the Romaines, baptiſed with the name of Germaines, Brethren of the Gaules, whom they reſſembled in corpulence of body, manners, and behauiour of life.

Germanie peopled by the Gaules.

The Geographer Strabo, in the ſeauenth booke of his Geographie (whereon all the Hiſtorians and Geographers, the Greekes and Romaines moulded and faſhioned their workes, as on a good Originall and perfect exemplary) informeth vs, that Regionem trans Rhenum ad Ortum vergentem Germani colunt, nationem Gallicam pauliſper imitantes, & fœcunditatis abundantia, & proceritate corporum, & colore flauo: cum reliquis in rebus, & formis, & moribus, & victus cultu pares exiſtant, quales Gallos diximus. Ideo Romani hoc illis nomen iure indidiſſe mihi videntur, perinde ac eos Fratres (Romano ſermone) Germani intelliguntur. But for the better vnderſtanding of this paſſage, it behoueth vs to obſerue the time, when Germanie was peopled by the Gaules.

At what time Germanie was peopled by the Gaules.

About the yeare of the World, three thouſand and three hundred; before the moſt bleſſed birth of the Sauiour of Mankinde ſixe hundred and thirteene; at ſuch time as Nabuchodonoſor, King of the Aſſyrians, held the Iewes in ſlauerie; and that Tarquin the elder Commanded ouer the Romaines; were made two ſignale departures of the Gaules, to inhabite Greece, Italie, Allemaigne and Spaine: So ſaith the learned Antiquarie Claudius Fauchet, at the beginning of his Hiſtorie of France.

At that time reigned ouer the fertile Gaules Ambigat, a rich and puiſſant Prince, whoſe Court was ordenarily kept in the Towne of Bruges, according to the vulgar opinion (and as others ſay, at Viarion) ſo called by Cæſar, and ſuch as followed him, tearmed it Auaricum: the inhabitants and people of Berry; Auares, & Bituriges, and the Champaine grounds thereof, which ſome name Sologne, are tearmed of the ſame Cæſar in his language, Campi Catalaunici, and in Me, one word Catalaunia.

The Nephews of Ambigat appointed to conquer new Countries.

Ambigat, to diſcharge the Gaules, which ſwarmed then to an infinite number of people; made election of the Sonnes of his Siſter, being his Nephewes, Sigoneſe and Beloueſe, to goe conquer new Prouinces, and gaue to each of them three hundred thouſand men, with their Families. Beloueſe tooke his way to Italie, which he peopled, there building Townes and Villages, and all his conqueſt beyond the Mountaines of the Alpes, was named Tranſ-Alpine Gaule, and is ſo ſtill to this day. Her preſſed further on his fortune, and aduentured his conqueſts into Thrace, ſubduing Macedon and Greece, as well the Iſles, as the firme Land: as it is written by Strabo, Plutarch, Pauſanias, Titus Liuius and Iuſtine. This migration is not here any part of our Tranſ-Alpine Gaule.

The Conqueſts of Belouefe.

ſubiect, Fauchet tooke it to his taske, and worthily acquitted himſelfe thereof: Now we will take our owne, that of Allemaigne or Germanie.

Sigoneſe had his troupes compoſed (as well as that of his Brother) of Sambres, called at this preſent Picads, of Arteſians, Beauuoiſins, Chartraines, Berruyers, Bretons, Aquitains, Sequanois, Suiſſes, Bourbonnois, Limoſins, Toloſians, Seuenois, Rouergats, and other people, drawne from all the Prouinces of Gaule, and diuided into two troupes, for the better peopling of ſuch Lands, as ſhould fall to their lot and partage; whereunto alſo they gaue their names, conſerued euen to this preſent day.

The compoſture of the troupes belonging to Sigoneſe, and their deuiſion.

He had Almaigne or Germanie to his part, and hauing paſſed Rhine, which ſeperated the Gaules; in ſtead of the goodly plaines, and Champaine grounds of Italie, he found himſelfe to be in vnpleaſing places of the Forreſt Hercynia, which the Romaines called Syluam incomperta magnitudinis, and whereof no one knoweth the end. The people of Sigoneſe inhabited and made their abiding in the ſhades thereof, making glades (by little and little) for their commoditie.

Rhine the partition of the Gaules.

The firſt that freed themſelues of the Riuer, were the Sambres, the Arteſians and Toureſians formerly named, in regard of the Riuer of Sambre, called Sabis by Cæſar, in his ſecond and ſixt Bookes of the Gaules warre. Ipſe cum reliquis tribus legionibus ad flumen Sabin (and not Schaldim) quod influit in Moſam, extremaſque Arduennæ partes peruenit. Quo cognito, Cæſar ad eum locum pontem facere, atque exercitum traducere conſtituit. For this Riuer, which they of the Ardennes called Sambre, hath her ſpring in the ſaid Forreſt of Ardenne, on the confines of Vermandois, and of Henault, and making diuers turnings and windings, commeth to laue the Towne of Namure, and afterward looſeth her ſelfe in the Riuer of Meuxe. Fortunatus, the Biſhop of Poictiers, rancketh among the Riuers of France, this Sabis of Cæſar, called Sambre, which the ſaid Fortunatus tearmeth Sabam, in his ſeauenth Booke, and fourth Poemme.

Iſara, Sara, Chares, Schaldis, Saba, Somena, Sura.

This is that which Cæſar calleth Sicambros, and Tacitus Sugambros; diſguiſing thus auncient proper names, and Gauliſh vocables in the Romaine definence or ending, to make them the apter for their owne language. Which Cæſar began with a purpoſed deliberation, to the end, that (in time) the honor and glory of the Gaules Nation might be vtterly loſt. A ſtratagem of Romaine malice, to hide the Gaules for euer, from the moſt rare ſecrets of their goodly pollicie, with the antiquity of their Cities and Prouinces. Yet notwithſtanding all this, in the end they found bright day light, and knowledge of their hainous and deadly enemies, namely, the writings of Cæſar, of Titus Liuius, and others. After Cæſar followed the Greekes, who, not to bide behinde, and not appeare inferiour to the Latines in ſpirit; meeting with what was written of remote and ſtrange Nations, omitted not (though not tyed thereto) to change and diſguiſe the ſame Latine names, inuented by Cæſar, and ſuch as followed him, by cloathing them alike in their Grecian garments. So that the Gaules had no meane paine and trauaile, to know their owne rights, in the writings of Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Ptolomie, and other Greeke Authors, as hardly as in them of the Latines. And this is that which made them trip and ſtumble ſo often, in the broad way of the Itinerarium Coſmographicall of Æticus; attributed vnaduiſedly by the ignorant, to the Emperour Antoninus, and thought to be his.

The mallice of the Romaines againſt the Gauls.

The Greekes following the Romaines in malice to the Gauls

Thoſe people then, which by Iulius Cæſar are called Sicambres, the firſt that paſſed ouer the Rhine; planted themſelues alſo firſt on the borders and lands of Allemaigne, where they were then, when the ſame Cæſar (to make himſelfe knowne) croſſed ouer that great Riuer. They peopled all the extendure of the Countrie, bounded on the one ſide of the ſide Riuer for one part, euen from the way where the Riuer of Lipp, in Latine Lippias, runneth to ſwallow it ſelfe in the Rhine, and remounting againe all along the Forreſt Bacenis, bordereth the two Landſgraues territories of Heſſen and of Thuringe, the Dutchie of Saxonie, and the Marquiſate of Brandenbourge, ſcourbing it ſelfe round-wiſe, to returne and winne the coaſt of the Ocean Sea at Hambourg, continuing on ſo farre as to the Riuer of Rhine; Friezland being a dwelling of the Sambres, in one part of her bounds.

The firſt plantation beyond the Rhine.

The moſt notable Riuers of this their abiding, which bathe and water it, at this preſent are named Lemſs and the Weſere, heretofore called by Tacitus Amaſias, Amaſis, Amaſia

The famous Riuers of the Sicambres abiding.

Amasia and Visurgis by Strabo. And the name of the same extendure, was called Sicambria, but afterward Westphalia. In following time, the said Sicambrians remounted further into the Countrey, peopling there Franconia: which Gregorie of Tours, in the place before alleadged, calleth properly Franciam. Come we now to the numbring of the Gaules, which peopled Allemaigne.

The second company that passed the Rhine, were them of Sens, and where they made their plantation.

The men of Sens, hauing (after the Sambres) passed the Riuer of Rhine; planted themselues neere to the other. These are they whom Cæsar called Senones, and Suenos: Tacitus Semnones, and others Suiones. They inhabited that extendure of the Countrey, which reacheth from Hambourg, so farre as to Pomerania, all along the Ocean Sea, which of them was called Sueuica on the one side: along the Riuer of Elb, called Albis in Latine, coasting the Sicambres, and remounting by the other side, coasted the Riuer Odera, cutting by Bohemia, they mounted vp so farre as to Nuremberg; in such sort, that they had their quarter both within and without the Forrest Hercynia, on this side and beyong the Elb, euen to the Forrest Bacenis, called at this present of Turing. This extendure of the Country, is called by Cæsar Senonia, soone after Sueuia, and vnto this instant Saxonia, and the inhabitants of them Sesnes, Senons and Saxons. In following time, and by example of the Sambres, they got more elbow-roome, reaching vp higher into the Countrey, and possessed themselues of places, which Cæsar calleth Noricos, and so farre as to the Mountaines of the Alpes, called Alpes Noricæ. This new intrusion into the Countrey, and whereof they had made seisure in the Norican Alpes, and round about them: was, of their name, called Senonia Noua; afterward Suevia, and at this present Suaba, in Latine Sub Albia. Strabo, in the seauenth Booke of his Cosmographie, saith, Senones, Sueuorum natio, partim intra, partim extra syluam Hercyniam habitant. Sueuorum quidem gens amplissima, à Rheno siquidem vsque ad Albim perueniunt. These are his owne words.

How far they extended themselues at euward.

The plantations of the Senones and Beauuoisins.

The Angeuins and Beauuoisins, planted themselues betweene the Senones and the Sweuian Sea, making vse of the Country now called Pomerania: in memory whereof, the Inhabitants of that Prouince are (euen to this day) named Andes, Andegan, and Anty by Beatus Rhenanus vpon Tacitus.

The men of Languedoc.

Betweene the Saxon and the Bohemian, the people of Languedoc made their stay, as also about Tolossa; but Cæsar in his sixt Booke, calleth them Tectosages, holding them in esteeme and reputation, for their valiancie and iustice. Their Capitall Cittie among the Gaules, where they receiued birth, retaineth the name of Tolosa Tectosagum, the Metropolitane Sea, and second Seate of Iustice, belonging to the most Christian Kings. And Cæsar, when hee speaketh of them of Germanie, saith, that Fertilissima Germaniæ loca, circum Hercyniam syluam Tectosages occuparunt, atque ibi consederunt: quæ gens ad hoc vsque tempus his se continet sedibus, summamque habet iustitiæ bellicæ laudis opinionem. Sebastian Munster, in the third Booke of his Cosmographie writeth: That the most part of the Country where the Tectosages dwelt, is at this present enclosed within the Duchie of Wittemberg, and watered with the Riuer of Necre, Necar. Tectosagum gens putatur Necri ripam occupasse, quo loco adhuc arx vetusta visitur, qua Tecktkensibus postea Comitibus, & Ducibus nomen dedit. Ea arx Teckt ab iis dicta Tectosagum Populis vulgo appellatur.

The plantation of the Seuenois.

The Seuenois, dwelling in the Mountaines of Languedoc, peopled the Forrests and Mountaines, which are betweene Saxonie and the Sweuian Ocean, neere about Mombourg. The inhabitants of this extention, are to this present called Gabali, and Gabalitones, conformably to them of Geuaudan, the Cathedrall Church whereof is Mimat called in Latine Mimatus, and her people Gabali, Gabalorum. The title of the Bishop thereof, being Episcopus Minatensis, Comes Gabalorum.

The plantation of the Bretons.

The Bretons, whom Cæsar calleth Armoricos Populos, fashioned at all times for Marine negotiations; tooke for their partage the coasts of the Germaine Ocean, called Sueuian and Suionicall by Tacitus, instead of Senonicall. Suionum hinc Ciuitates ipsa in Oceano, præter vires, armaque Classibus valent. Ergo iam dextro Sueuici maris latere Æstyorum gentes alluuntur, quibus ritus, habitusque Sueuerum, lingua Britannicæ proprior.

The peopling of Russia and Prussia.

In the same steps, the men of Rouerge, and of Ouercy, whom Cæsar tearmed Rutenos, peopled Russia and Prussia, called in Latine Rutenia and Prutenia, and the people

People of the said two Prouinces called Ruteni and Pruteni.

The plantation of the Limosins.

The Limosins peopled in like manner, neere about the Germaine Ocean of Limosia, and of their name, the inhabitants there dwelling, haue beene from all times called (especially by Tacitus) Lemouices, and Lemouij, in stead of Liuonienses and Liuonij.

The Chartraines and where they planted.

The Chartraines, named by Cæsar Carnutes, made their dwelling neere to the Pannoniaes, peopling Carnutia, with the great and lesser Carnia. Their first Colonie, by change of letters, was called Carinthia, Carnutia, and by Eusebius in his Chronologie, vnder the yeare of our Lord one hundred and fourescore, the inhabiters there are named Populi Carnutum. The two other haue retained their auncient appellation of Carnia, and of Carniola, or Carniolis: but returne we now to the Sicambres and Sueues.

The plantation of the Heluetians.

On the right hand of them, betweene them and the bankes of Rhine, there the Heluetians planted themselues; at this instant called Swizzers, and in the Germaine language, the Confederates or Allies: who caused to be builded Seafouse, Fribourg, and Rotuill, they dwelt sometimes in the Marquisate of Bada.

Plantation of the Bourbonnois in Bohemia.

On the left hand of the same Sueues, the Bourbonnois lodged themselues, whom Cæsar calleth Boios: And they planted themselues in that Prouince of Germanie, which beareth title of the Kingdome of Bohemia, whereunto they gaue their name, confirmed euen to this present day.

What they were that planted with the Bourbonnois.

The Berruieres peopled coniointly with the Bourbonnois, the Dutchie of Bauaria, by Cæsar called Noricum, tearmed Bauaria, and Baiocaria, à Boijs, & Auaris populis, with all the extention of the Countrey, contained vnder the name of Noricum, Alpes Norica, and the inhabitants Noriques, called by Titus Liuius Bourbonnois: and these extended from the Rhine, so farre as the passage to the Citie of Trent (which maketh the seperation of Germanie, and the Lands belonging to the State of Venice) & from thence so farre as Hungaria. Cæsar in the first Booke of the Gaules warres, speaking of the Bourbonnois, writeth, that the Heluetians, which are the Swizzers, tooke as companions and associates Boios, qui trans Rhenum incoluerant, & in agrum Noricum transierant, Noreiamque oppugnarant, receptes ad se socios sibi adsciscerant, to shew the auncient dwelling of the Gaules in Allemaigne, or Germanie.

Concerning the peopling of Hungaria and Morauia.

And as for Hungaria, it was perticularly peopled by the Berruyers, who gaue it the name of Auaria, changed afterward into that of Hungaria, the people being called Auares Populi, soone after Hunnes and Hungars. They peopled also Morauia, which bare their name, and afterward the Pannoniaes, as much to say as the lower, which is the Hungaria, named Auaria (as we haue said) honored with the title of a Kingdome. And the higher, which is the Arch-Duchie of Austria, named Marche d'Austria by Charlemaigne, after he had conquered it, as Auentine writeth in the fourth Booke of his History of Bauaria, more at large.

Of these troupes or Colonies of the Gaules in Germanie, Cæsar, speaketh in the text Booke of Bello Gallico, with these words worthy to be remarked. Ac fuit ante tempus illum Galli Germanos virtute superarent, & vltro bella inferrant, ac propter hominum multitudinem, agrique inopiam Trans Rhenum Colonias mitterent. Strabo saith as much in his fourth and seauenth Bookes of his Geographie.

And the learned Tacitus, in his Germania, deducing briefely that which Cæsar set downe in larger manner, saith. Validiores olim Gallorum res fuisse, summus auctorum diuus Iulius tradit, eoque credibile est etiam Gallos in Germaniam Transgressos. Igitur inter Hercyniam syluam, Rhenumque & Moenum amnes Helueti, Vlteriora Boij, Gallica Vtraque Gens tenuere. Manet adhuc Boiemi nomen, significatque loci veterem memoriam. The same Historian, in another passage, saith. Leuissimus quisque Gallorum & inopia audax, dubia possessionis solum occupauere.

And this is the reason, why the auncient Geographers comprehended vnder the name of Celtes and Galates (that is to say the Gaules) the Allemaignes and Germaines. In like manner, the Genius of nature Aristotle, who liued three score and ten yeares before Cæsar, in the second Booke of his Meteores, writeth: That the great Riuer of Danubius thwarted the Countrey of the Celtes, and yet notwithstanding, euery man knoweth, that Dunoua watereth the most part of Germanie.

Diodorus Siculus, who liued (well-neere) at the same time as the Geographer Strabo did did, maketh mention, that Aristotle comprehended vnder the name of Celtes, Gaules of Almaigne and Spaine, long before peopled by the same Gaules. In memory whereof, it retaineth the name of Celtiberia, from the Riuer of Ebro or Eberus, so farre as to the Pyrenean, and the Kingdome of Portugall likewise, vpon the same subiect.

Dion anoth r, Greeke Author, in the life of Augustus, speaking of the Conquests which Claudius Drusus Nero made in Allemaigne; called the Inhabitants Celtes. Drusus Tiberij frater missus contra Celtas qui trans Rhenum incolunt, captis rebus omnibus quæ facta essent obuiam, vsque ad Albim Fluuium est progressus.

And Vibius Sequester, a Romane Historian, is of the same opinion, as the Authors before alleaged. For, vnder the name of Galates, he comprehendeth Allemaigne, wholly and intirely: in the Tract which he wrote of Riuers, Mountaines, and Nations subiected to the Romaine Empire, which he seemeth to haue borrowed from Strabo and Diodorus Siculus, who called all the extension of Germanie, comprized and enclosed within the Rhine, from beyond Danubius, and from beyond Scythia (which comprehend Poland, Moscouia, and Tartaria for the greater part) Galatiam Magnam, Great Gaule.

Two especiall obseruations concerning the Riuer Rhine.

Wee will conclude this Chapter with two particularities of the great Riuer Rhine: The first, that it hath beene receiued from all times, to serue as a borne and limit of the Gaules and Germanes. We haue one Tract of Cæsars, in his fourth booke of the Gaules warres, of the answere which the Sicambres made to him. Populi Romani Imperium Rhenum finire. For then the Romans had ranged the Gaules vnder their obedience, & would subiugate Allemaigne, for which they neuer had any reason. While so many people thereof fought valiantly for their freedome, the Romanes many times triumphed in paintings, of such there as they had vanquished. Moreouer, that great Riuer was whole and intire to the Gaules. And therefore the Poet Catullus, writing, Ad Furium & Aurelium, said:

Siue trans altas gradietur Alpeis,
Cæsaris visens monimenta magni,
Gallicum Rhenum, horribile & vlti
. . . . . mosque Britannos.

How the Iewes made triall of their wiues honesty

The other particularitie, whereby Catullus called that great Gaulish Riuer; Rhenum Gallicum, is; for as much as the Iewes did serue their owne turne of bitter waters, thereby to approue the pudicity or chastity of their wiues, when they suspected them to be somewhat short heel'd, as we learne from Iosephus and learned Philo the Iewe: euen so in like manner, and for the same subiect, the Gaules serued their turne with the Riuer of Rhine. For they desiring to haue an assured proofe of the fidelity of their wiues, (as if there were place to try it by a Ballance or compromise) after they were layd in childe-bed, they took the tender young Infants and exposed them (starke naked) vpon the water of that violent Riuer. If they sunke, and were drowded therein, then they iudged them to be Bastards, fit for no other fortune, excluding their wiues from their houses, and seuerely punishing them for their incontinency: for they wholly had the power of life and death ouer them, according as Cæsar writeth in the sixt booke of his Bello Gallico. On the contrary, if the Infants did swim, as borne vp vpon the Rhine, they acknowledged them to be legitimate, nourished and educated them carefully, as children of the family.

The like triall made by the Gaules.

For this cause the Greeke Poet Poet Nonnus, in Dionysiacis, to good purpose called that great Riuer of Rhine ελεγχιγάμον, The Iudge and Reuenger of Marriage, foyled with the wiues immodesty, Matrimonij violati vindicem.

Iulian the Apostata obserueth the same noate, in his Epistle Ad Maximum, naming the Rhine the Essayer and Touch-stone of Chastity in the Gaulish women; the Plummet for sounding, and infallible proofe of their Legitimate children; καὶ ἀμέμπτων γάμων, καὶ παίδων σωτηρίων ἀντιδωρούμενος. As much saith Galen (who by the saying of Plutarch) lockt in the schoole of Philosophy, in the Tract which hee wrote, De Sanitate tuenda: The Greeke Prouerbe.

Ταρσαλίοις Κελτὴν ποταμῷ ξυλίμενι Ῥῆνῳ.

CHAP. II.

Of the Migrations, remouings and passages of the Sicambres, and other people out of Germanie, into Gaule, and on the hither side of the Rhine.

IN the former discourse we haue made knowne, what people of Gaule peopled the waste Germanie. The Sambres, who are they (as we haue already said) which dwelt vpon the Riuer of Sabis, rested on the Riuer of Rhine, and were they whom Cæsar called Sicambri. These people, renowned for valiancie among the naturall Gaules, were present in the Armie of Arioustus, King of the Germaines, when he would needes make head against Cæsar, who commenced the conquest of the Gaules. They were they, who confronted the same Cæsar, then by way of a brauado, he would shew himselfe to the Germaines, to succour the Inhabitants of Cologne on the Rhine: after hee had caused a Bridge to be builded, whereof hee describeth the forme and fashion, in the fourth Booke Bello Gallico.

The Sicambres famous for their valiancie.

A Bridge built by Cæsar neer to Cullen.

This Bridge was built very neere to Cologne, which declareth, that the Sicambres, and their neighbours the Sweues, possessed not onely the higher Germanie, but also great part of the lower: for otherwise Cæsar had (to small purpose) built that Bridge neere to Strasbourg, or to Spire, which are (at this day) face to face with the Sueuian Suaba. So that it behoued him necessarily, that those two neighbouring people, and which followed him alwayes in warre; should hold and possesse all the Country, which marched to the Riuer of Elb (that is Albis) from whence they might make their inuasions and courses, euen so farre as to the territorie of them of Cologne, which Cæsar calleth Vbiens, constrained to appeale for their aide and succour. And this is the reason why we haue formerly placed the Sambres, or Sicambres, so farre into Friez-Land, where the Riuers of Emss and of Vuezer, runne rowling and dessending into the Ocean Sea. Sicambria (quæ nunc Vuest-phalia dicitur) inter Rhenum, Cheruscos. Bructeros, Langobardos extendebatur.

The Sambres or Sicambres placed in Friezland.

The ancient Sicambria, afterward called West-phalia, had on the East side the Riuer of Vezer (Visurgus) for frontier: on the South, the Mountaines of the Landsgrave of Hessen, which Ptolomie calleth Monte Orobios: on the West, the great Riuer of Rhine; and on the North-side Friezland, Holland, Vtrecht and Transi-Issellana.

The scituation of the ancient Sicambria.

It is a matter very remarkeable, that the French hauing embraced Christianity, at the Sacring of Clouis, which happened in the yeare fiue hundred, and by their expulsion, the very neerest prouinces of their obedience: yet notwithstanding, they of Westphalia retained long time the Romaine Demonomanie, euen vntill such time as Charlemaigne, being become a peacefull Lord ouer them: he established foure Episcopall Churches, namely, Munstre, Osnabourg, Paderbrun, and Minde. And to hold vp in dutie of the Catholique Faith, the inhabitants of this Countrey (meruailously inclined to Idolatrie) he instituted a cruell Inquisition (by the modell and patterne whereof, was the holy Office in Spaine prouided) or secret kinde of Iustice; with soueraigne power to punish Traitors, and periured persons to God, taken in Idolatrie, without hearing them speake: so that (without any noise) from euening to morning, the Idolaters were seene hanged, and fastened to Trees, without distinction of Noblemen from Peazants, poore from rich, because ordenarily, the greatest persons were hanged vp, whose authority might otherwise serue for a shelter to the meaner sort, to doe ill. By which rigorous course, without forme or any figure of Iustice; the Westphalians were kept within the compasse of well doing. Those close concealed

The old people of Allemaigne.

This ancient Sicambria, was (in following time) inhabited with diuers Nations. there were the Teutons of Mela, whom Ptolomie calleth Teutones, placed on the Ma ticke Sea, and these men ioyned themselues to the Cimbrians, at such time as th entred among the Gaules, and were ouercome by Caius Marius in Prouence, neere Arles Camargne plaine, called Campus Marius, of that great Romaine Captain These Teutons or Theutons, caused Teutoburgum to be built by the side of a good Forrest, famous by the buriall of the Romaines. Next followed the Busasteres Ptolomie, whom Tacitus calleth Bructeros, who possessed the Diocesse of Mu stre and neighbouring Countries: for there were both the great and less Bructeres.

Satisfaction concerning the Sicambrians, and their original.

That which hath aboue bin said, in my iudgement, may suffice to make seene knowne, both with the eye and finger, the auncient dwelling of the Sicambrians, their true originall. Hereafter we shall see further, how they were transported (some part of them) into Holland vnder Augustus; then carried away from thence der the Empire of Constantius (father to Constantine the Great) further off into Ga namely into Picardie, and Prouinces neighbouring on the Ocean Sea; whe they returned after the death of the said Constantius; how those of Westph mounted higher into Allemaigne, to inhabite Franconia and Thuringe: from whe (some yeares after) they repassed the Rhine, to descend (in good earnest and m fully) to possesse themselues of the Gaules.

gustus performed some small matter more: yet his Lieutenant Varus, and some Le ons, remained there for gages at Teautobourg, as we haue ittremarked by Tacitus. erius, Lieutenant to the said Augustus, partly by loue, and partly by force; trea some meanes of peace with the Sweues and Sicambrians, the very neereſt to Rhine: and made alliance with their King Maroboduus (King of the Sicambri and Sweues, from the time of Augustus) by the consent of whom, the Sicambri were causd to passe the Riuer of Rhine, and planted themselues betweene armes thereof (of three, as some haue noated) where it disgorgeth it selfe the Ocean Sea. This abiding of theirs, gaue a part to the said Sicambri traiected or ferried out of Germanie into Gaule, and to the vtmost confines reof, and it is acknowledged vnder the name of Holland, called by the Ro ns Batauis, and the arme of Rhine, whereon it is seated; Vahalis, and at this present l; but by the Bishop of Auuergne, Sidonius Apollinarus (writing to the Emperor iorian) Vachalis.

The transmigration from Westphalia into Holland.

But this transmigration from Westphalia into Holland, is not to be vnder of all the Sicambrians in generall, but onely a part or company of them. T did not (for this present occasion) forsake their auncient Sicambria, which possessed vntill such time, as they made assurance for themselues in Gaule, in declining of the Romaine Empire. That bright burning Lampe of the Chu Saint Hierome, who had long time studied at Treuers, then Capitall Citie of Gaules, and who (in his owne person) had seene Marcomir and Sunnon, Kings France, Grandfathers to King Pharamond (for Saint Hierome passed out of thi into a better, in the yeare foure hundred and twenty, being aged fourescore thirteene yeares, in the holy Citie of Bethelem) describeth thus their dwell (such as it was in his time) in the life of the good Hermet Saint Hilarion, ter Saxones, & Alemannos, gens non tam lata, (quam valida) apud Historicos Ge mania, nunc vero Francia vocatur. For (as we shall say elsewhere) the Romaines cal Sidonius Apollinaris, who liued in the time of King Merouæus, and was sent an Ambassage to him, by the Romaine Emperours, to moue an agreement disciphereth this auncient dwelling of the French, by the Floods and B uers of Waal, of Viadeer, of the V. and of the Elb, writing to Cossea a man of a singuler good aduise, and whom hee reputed (for integritie of li capable, to settle some appointment with this generous Nation, and warl French.

The same dwelling of theirs was assured, so saith Agathias the Greeke Aut (who had Souldier-like serued vnder the Emperour Iustinian, and liued in time of Great Clouis, King of France, his Sonnes) as well in Westphalia, b beyond, and on this side the Rhine, in the Duchies of Cleues and Gulich, Countie of Zutphen, where they extended themselues into Gaule on the one and on this side the Rhine into Thuringe, and also into Franconia, saith this Aut in his first Booke of the Gothes warres.

Constantius, father of Constantine the Great.

It is a case most certaine, that Constantius, the Father of Constantine the Gr was sent Lieutenant Generall into Gaule, to represse the maritime incursio which the French (setled in Holland) made on the shoares of the Oc Sea: from whence ioyntly with the Sesnes or Saxons their neighbours, they d bled euery way the Sea-coasts of the Romaine Empire. To checke these proc dings of theirs, he transported out of Holland the shrewdest & hardest kinde of po ple, further vp into Gaule: thus we are instructed by the Panegyricke of Ma an spoken to the said Constantius, whom hee commended, for hauing retaken logne on the Sea; ouerthrowne Alectus, successour to Carausius; and the nch, who shouldered them in England, and swept the coastes of the Nor- ndie Sea, Picardie, Flanders and Holland, from the rouing and Piracies of French, whom hee had rid the Countrey of, and transported to Beauuois niens, to Langres and Troyes. Per Victorias tuas, Constanti Cæsar inuicte, quid- id infrequens Ambiano, & Bellouaco, & Triquassino solo, Lingonicoque restabat; baro cultore reuirescit Which hee meaneth of the French, dispersed into ese Prouinces, emptied of their auncient Inhabitants, by the spoyles of strange ations in Gaule. The same Rhethoritian, in another Panegyricke, informeth , that the same Emperour surprized some French, euen within their owne arishes, whom hee transported into Gaule, as well as those out of Holland. quid loquar rursus intimas Franciæ nationes non ad iam his locis, quæ olim Romani in- serant; sed à proprijs ex origine sua sedibus, atque ab vltimis Barbariæ litoribus ulsas, vt in desertis Galliæ regionibus collocatæ, etiam pacem Romani Imperij cultu iuua- nt, & arma dilectu.

But these people thus traiected into Gaule, made their stay there for no long time; r being of a generous and martiall spirit, and such as made sale of their liues ra- er for fight, then to consume them in the rust of ease and sloath: And as Claudi- saith, speaking of them;

Illi terribiles, quibus otia vendere semper
Mos erat, & fœda requiem mercede pacisci.

No sooner heard they the death of the Emperour Constantius, but they returned gaine into Holland, where they recommenced their Pyraticall kinde of life, and ought valiantly against Constantine the Great, and his Sonnes, as well by Sea, as firme Land, so say the Panegyristes, because the French Nation encreased to in- nite numbers of people. By meanes whereof, they made their extendure daily, oth beyond, and on this side the Rhine, and namely into the lower Germanie, here they peopled the Prouince, which of their name (euen to this day) is cal- d Franconia. Sigibert in his Chronicle, nameth this peopling, to be in the yeare f Grace, three hundred twenty fiue. Franci, Sicambria egressi considere secus Rhe- um in oppidis Germaniæ But it is a question, whether he speaketh of their Colo- ies in Franconia, or of them which they sent on the hither side of the Rhine, into he Duchies of Cleues, Gueldres and Gulich, which they held then, when they pos- essed themselues of the Gaules.

Franconia bearing name of the French.

For the Germaine Authors agree together, that in the yeare of Grace, three hun- red twenty sixe, the Soraues (who were they of Thuringe) being hurried by the ueues, who (by Droit de Bien-Seance) became possessed very suddenly, of one part f the Lands belonging to them of Bauaria, where they had planted a new Colo- ie of the Suabes: were constrained (to conserue the rest of their deuision) to call to eir aide and succour the Sicambrians, renowned for valiancie, vnder the name f the French; to serue as a bulwarke and strong wall betweene them and the ueues, who made themselues knowne by the name of Allemaignes, as wee said efore.

The generall opinion of Germaine Authors.

The departure of the French out of their Sicambria.

These French then departed out of their Sicambria, to the number of three hun- red and fourescore thousand men, with their Families; and went to plant them- elues in the Lands of the Soraues, where formerly had made their abode the Tsipetes and Tenchteres. Cum inter Sarabos (so say the Germaine Authors) & con- nes eorum Sueuos, perpetuum esset diſsidium, commeatos ex infariori Germania Si- ambros, illos collocarunt in pago Herbipolensi, qui mediarent inter ipsos Thuringos, atque ueuos.

The people of Wirtzbourg in Franconia.

The same Authours (for the Romaine Historians speake nothing of these migrations) expresse moreover, saying that Francones primum habitauerunt iux- a Rhenum in inferiori Germania, in his regionibus quæ hodie Vuestphalia, & risia, appellataque est ab eis regio illa Sicambria, sicut, & Sicambri sunt appellati.

sunt appellati. Contigit autem sub Anno Domini Trecentesimo Vigesimo Secundo, [illegible] ringi & Sueni multa haberent dissidia, & praelia continua quæ propter Franci a[illegible] gio vocati, quasi murus constituti fuerunt inter eos, atque Suenos. Thus you see [illegible] they say in this case.

In this place to set downe the Topohraphies of thir plantation, and Colonie, [illegible] the Paralels of them, which are renowned to this day, with those beside [illegible] the French wan passage: the narration (in my iudgement) would be too tedious some, and it may be discerned in Munster, who tooke it to his taske. Wee [illegible] onely say, that this Franconia is gently watered with the Riuers of Moein, of [illegible] berne, where Neccar in part, and Saltz make a supplement: which serueth [illegible] this discourse, because that the French, those I meane which dwelt in the very [illegible] part of Franconia, and of Westphalia, were named by the Historians of Rome, Franci Antiuarij, and Ampsiuarij, and those people which bordered on the Riuer [illegible] (called Salts by the Allemaignes) were by the same Romaines named Franci Salici, and by abridgement Salij, of the verbe Salire, that is to say, Saulter, to be agile, quicke and nimble of foote, to leape and mount well, a quality most notably requisite, for such as dwell in watrie and marshie places, except they helpe themselues with Stilts. So that it differeth nothing from the purpose, that those people of the French, who (at all times) inhabited neere to the Rhine, and within the marishes, which the Riuer procureth by her ouer-flowings, in the auncient Cambria, as well beyond, as on this side the great Riuer, with them that are planted there on the Sala (whereof we now speake) should not for their agility (as iustly they might haue bin and were) named and called Salians by the Romaines; who were alwayes wont (and the same is common to other Nations) to obserue each one particularly, by his proper habitude and custome. For example. Such of the French, as were dwellers on the great course of the Riuer, were called Nageurs, Swimmers, and they of the Marshes Saulteurs, Leapers, and so of other Nations. Peculiarities familiarly obserued by Sidonius Apollinaris.

> . . . . . Tibi vincitur illis,

So that it was a nicke name giuen to the French, in regard of their naturall disposition and dwelling, as (yet to this day) their enemies tearme them French Toades. From whence grew the Fabe, that their auncient Kings carried such creatures in their Armes. And this shall serue to shew, that from the time of Ammianus Marcellinus, who serued Souldierlike in Gaule, vnder the impious Iulian the Apostate; the French were surnamed Salians (Quos consuetudo Salios, vocitauit, as serueth this Author) saying, that (by custome in one word) the French were surnamed commonly, Salians.

Foure noated Riuers.

Betweene the Cities of Bamberge, and of Nuremberge, is a great Mountaine, couered with high Pines, from whence it tooke the name of Fichtelbourge: in it is the sourse of foure Riuers, commended in Germanie, to wit, the Moein, the Nab, the Egra and the Sala.

This last Riuer tooke name of the Bourgade (neighbour to the place of her nomination, which (is called Sala) as (without paragon) the Queene of Riuers in France, that is Seine, tooke name of a small Village, named Saint Seine: aboue which, in a Wood on the left hand, this Riuer hath her spring. Saint Seine is an Abbey of the order of Saint Benedict, about fiue miles from Dijon, betweene Chanceaux and the Vale of Suzon, a most dangerous passage.

Strabo touching in his passage along (concerning the Riuers of Germanie) particularly that of Sala, saith. Bisurgis & Luppias amnes in vnum ad Amasiam (Ems) calleth it Amisiam) deferuntur Bructeros minores (as we haue already [illegible] the Bructeres, otherwise tearmed Busatteres, were diuided in twaine, that [illegible] er and the lower, these last neere to Friex-land, and the other neere [illegible] and of Bronsvicke) *labens. It giueth name to the Hamlet or the Hamlet to it. much I dare say, that like as the Seille which laueth and sprinkleth the great [illegible] wne and Citie of Mentz, was heretofore called Salia by Fortunatus, Bishop of [illegible] ctiers, in his third Booke, and twelfth Poem, in regard of some Well or Spring Salt, which was neere vnto it, as he saith in his seauenth Booke;

Seu qui Mettim adit de sale nomen habens.

Euen in the same manner, the Village and the Riuer of Sala in Franconia, tooke t appellation A Sale: because that neere vnto them there were (in former times) pe Wels, the water whereof was apt to make Salt in great abundance, and but very few of fresh water. As we see the same exercised at Salins, in the Countie of [illegible] urgongne; and at Salies, in the Pyrenian Mountaines, in the Countie of Co[illegible] nges, the Diocesse of Couzerans, from whence streameth the Riuer of Salat, which [illegible] h watereth and crosseth Saint Girons, passeth vnder the Bridge of Saint Lize (in [illegible] tine Lizerius) the Cathedrall of Cozerans, betweene Prat and Taurignan, to Salies: called of a Well, the water whereof maketh Salt, and so to Saint Iulian, vnder [illegible] hich the Salt runneth, and looseth it selfe in the Riuer of Garonne, at a place [illegible] ed La Fourche.

The Noble Historian Tacitus telleth vs, that the Hermondures and Cheruscques, [illegible] Marcomans and the Catters, made strong warre among themselues, which of them [illegible] ould be Maister of that place, called Sala, in regard of the Salines, or Salt-pits, hereof (yet to this day) Springs and Wels are to be seene, neere to the Towne of [illegible] ala, the aspiration added, and pronounced for an S. on the Riuer of Sal (which [illegible] lleth in the Moein, in the Towne of Gemonde, after it hath made the separati[illegible] of Misnia, and of the Landsgrauate of Thuringe) Sometime there had bin [illegible] o Villages, whereof the old ruines are yet to be seene, the one called the higher [illegible] la, and the other the lower. The higher was remarkeable, by a Castle of plea[illegible] re, builded by Charlemaine, for the recreation of Hunting at Antonne. It is sweet[illegible] seated on the Moein, and so thence on the Sal, and to this Castle hee would send [illegible] e Ambassabours comming from strange Princes, and tooke his delight to hunt [illegible] ere, in the months of September and October, and thence forward to the night Saint Martin in winter. At the comming from this Castle was a goodly Forrest [illegible] led Saltz Forte, a limbe of the Forrest of Bouchone (Bichona Sylua) branching [illegible] om the Hercynia: commodities which made this place very pleasing to the Emrours Charlemaine, and Lewis the Debonnaire.

CHAP. IV.

At what time the Sicambrians and Sweues, tooke the names of French and Germaines.

HE People most potent, and renowned of all other in Allemaigne or Germanie, and which euermore (without ceasing) warred with the Romaines; were alwayes the Sicambrians, and the Sweues: these latter dwelling in the higher Allemaigne (as we haue formerly said) and the other in the lower. Sueui in superiori, & Sicambri in inferiori Germania sedes suas habuere, the one being deuided from the other by the Riuer of Albis. So that the Romaine Hiſtorians neuer ſpeake of the Sueues, but when the Sicambrians marched along with them in Field, to keepe them company. Both of them were conioyned enemies to the Romaines, banded againſt theſe people in hate, onely to oppreſſe, & bring them into ſeruitude & ſlauery. And this neere neighbouring of theirs, cauſed them to be wholly conforme in their faſhions & manner of life, as also of a mutuall will, to conſerue their libertie, and expulſe the Romaines out of the plenteous Gaules, and to become Maſters of them themſelues, as Tacitus telleth in his Germania. Eadem cauſa ſemper Germanis transcendendi in Gallias, mutandæ ſedis amor, vt relictis paludibus (this he meaneth of the Sicambrians) & ſolitudinibus ſuis (of the Sueues) ſoecundiſsimum Galliarum ſolum poſſiderent.

But come we to the names of Allemaignes and French.

Concerning the name of French.

Some there are, who would deriue the name of French from theſe Latine words (for excellence) Ferias, Ferocitas, & from thence Feroces, & Franci of Ferocitate Dicti, grounding (at aduenture) on the paſſage of Strabo, purpoſely reported before of the Gauls Colonies planted in Germanie. Nationem Gallicam imitantes, & Feritatis abundantia, animis, proceritate corporum, & colore Flauo. And in truth Ammianus Marcellinus deſcribeth the man and woman Gaule, to be white of fleſh, with broad ſhoulders, goldyellow of haire, being ſo tall and ſtrong of body and ſtature, that the Romans ſtanding by them, ſeemed as if they were but dwarfes and Pigmeies, falling (by chance) out of their ſleeues. Hereupon it was, that the Gauliſh women made a mockery of them, as dwarfes and diminitiues of men; ſo ſaith Cæſar in his Bello Gallico. But aboue all, they were of a dreadfull countenance, and affrighting, as Marcellinus ſaith in his fourth booke. So that the Sicambrians, of the Gaules Originall, are called by Horace (deſcribing the praiſes of the Emperour Auguſtus) Feroces, and fleſhed with bloud, cæde gaudentes.

Te non pauentis funera Galliæ,
Direque tellus audit Iberiæ.
Te Cæde gaudentes Sicambri
Compoſitis venerantur armis.

And in the ſecond Ode of the ſame booke, to the ſonne of Marcus Antonius.

Cancines maiore, Poëta, plectro

Iſidore, with all his Etymologies, would haue much adoe, to draw by the lockes, Francois, out of this Latine word Ferocia.

For, concerning the remitting the Tribute by the Emperour Valentinian; that is but a meere gullery, and a groſſe ignorance; as wee ſhall ſee heereafter, by the date of time.

The honorable Antiquity of the French.

Other Authors, of more ſublime and elenated ingenuity, deſeruing immortall praiſe for their great Reading, teach vs; that the French haue beene famous (by that name) from the time of the Oratour Cicero, that is to ſay, from the times of Cæſar and Auguſtus, all along. For theſe braue ſpirits ſay, that Cicero ſpeaking of them in the ſixth Epiſtle of his fourteenth booke, Ad Titum Pomponium Atticum, and calling them by their name: Balbus meliora de Gallia X X I. dicliteras habebat. Germanos illaſque Nationes re audita de Cæſare, Legatos miſiſſe ad Aurelium, qui eſt Præpoſitus ab Hircio, ſe, quod imperatum eſſet facturos. All went well hitherto, and heere followeth the purſuit of diuers found Huntſmen, in queſt of finding forth the Frenche.

For, tell me (I pray you) to what purpoſe did he cut off the thred of his diſcourſe, by thruſting in that of the vnhappy funerals to the Romanes, of Iulius Cæſar reduced into aſhes? Leaue theſe idle ſtuffs to ſuch as loue them, and come we to the truth.

This is verified by good and probable Authors.

The Sicambrians hauing (by their valiancie) wonne the aduantage, and the command ouer the reſt of the people in the lower Germanie, as they had it from the time of Strabo; made among one part of them, a Hanſe, that is to ſay, a League & Societie: for this opinion, I ſubſcribe to the deceaſed M. Iohn du Tillet, whoſe memorialls are the markes of his painefull labours, and who might well ſay (without enuy) for his great and diligent examinations in ſuch caſes

The interpretation of the word Aleman

We may learne by him, that the people of the higher Germany, called themſelues Alemans: the word Aleman being compoſed of two dictions Germanicall, as name of Al, which ſignifieth All, & Man, Homo, Almand. All-man, or elſe Allerley-Mans, men of diuers Countries, vnited and ioyned together; as Agathias writeth, in his firſt booke booke of the Gothes Hiſtory. And ſo ſaith Du Tillet, that the people of the higher Ger-manie, were called Alemans, of the name of the League which they made together.

In imitation of the Sicambrians of the lower Germany, who were the firſt that league themſelues with other of their Germane neighbours, to maintaine together their liberty againſt the Romanes.

They tooke a new name to auoyd al enuy among them.

Theſe people being thus leagued with one accord, (to take away all enuy among them) took a new name, and (by a good preſage) anſwerable to the deſire which they had to make themſelues famous by Armes, and to make the people free, Free People, without bending vnder the yoake of the Romane Empire: called themſelues hereupon Frein-Hanſen, which ſignifieth in the Germane tongue, The Company of Free-Men, and of theſe two words (by Syneresis) it is made but one, Franſen, which ſignifieth More then a Man. So ſaith Iornandes, in his Gothiſh hiſtory, that the Gothes called their chiefe Leaders in Warre Hanſen, Demy gods, and more then Men: as if they would ſay; that their Captaine, he alone had the ſtrength of all a Company.

The company of Freemen.

The like was obſerued in certaine Aleman townes, aſſembled into one Company, to Trafficke and Merchandiſe with one common purſe: they had many exemptions, by name of the Harſe Teutonique, that is to ſay, The Company of Alemans.

Hanſe Teutonique, the company of Alemans.

Of this name of Hanſe, there remaineth the memory of certaine rights, granted by the firſt Kings, to the Prouoſts of Merchants, and Sheriffes of Paris. I haue ſeene and read the Charter of the Hanſe, granted to the Inhabitants of Mante, by Philip Auguſtus, concerning his rights of the Hanſe, and this is the Tenure.

The names of Alemans and French vnknowne to Cæſar, Strabo, Tacitus and other Romane writers.

Theſe names of Aleman, and Frenche, hauing ſucceeded in place of them of Germanes, Sweues, and Sicambrians; were vnknowne to Cæſar and Strabo, who liued (well-neere) at one time; to Tacitus and other Hiſtorians and Geographers, vntill the declining of the Romane Empire. Thus you ſee the times, when the names of Franc and Alemans, began to be obſerued by the Romane Hiſtorians.

When the Sicambrians were knowne by the name of Frenche.

The Sicambrians appeared vnder the name of French, during the Empire of Galien, ſonne and Aſſociate to Valerian, who going to warre with the Perſians; was betrai-by his Lieutenant Generall Macrinus, to the Perſian King Sapores, who lockt him in a Cadge, where he ended his life. This ſurpriſall happened in the eight yeere their Empire, and in the yeere of Grace 262.

Sixe Emperors aduancing their ſelues together.

The yeere after, to wit, two hundred ſixty and three, that Macrinus, or Macri-nus cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed Emperour by the Souldiers of his Army. The like did Aureolus in Sclauonia: Valens in Achaia: Piſo in Theſſalia: Æmilianus in Ægypt, and Poſthumus in Gaule. In briefe, at this time was the reigne and Empire of the thirty Tyrants.

Againſt this Poſthumus, Galien ſent an Armie, thruſt into rout and confuſion by the French, waged by the ſaid Poſthumus; who by their aide and fauour, maintained himſelfe (ſome time) in his vſurpation. For from thence forward, the French were renowned in valiancie, aboue all the people of Germany.

Galiens vanity and folly notwithſtanding his foyle.

Now although Galien was vanquiſhed, yet neuertheleſſe, at the ſolemnity of the tenth yeere of his Empire, which was in the yeere of Grace, two hundred ſixtie and foure, he made a muſter and appearance of the Romane people in diuers troupes, all conſiſting and compoſed of two hundred men, whom he had clothed after the fashion of French, Perſians, Gothes, Polonians, and other ſtrange Nations, euen as if he had come home with victory, whereto he neuer enclined, or made any proffer.

And for this he was mocked by the Romanes, who very well knew the contrarie:
ſaith the Romane Hiſtorian Trebellius Pollio, in the life of the ſaid Emperour.
Thus came the Sicambrians to be knowne, vnder the name of French, the yeere of ce, two hundred ſixty three, and by the ſame name are noted by Trebellius Pollio, firſt of the Romane Hiſtorians, that maketh mention of the French.
Which cauſed this to be written by the learned Genebrard, Archbiſhop of Aix in uence, in the third booke of his Chronologie. Gallienus aduerſus Poſthumum, qui am annis iam Imperatorium nomen obtinebat in Gallia, exercitum miſit, & Fran-Rheni accolas ſibi adiunxit: Atque hic primum Francorum mentio in Romanis is.

There was a later ſpeaking of the Alemanes, and onely in the time of the Emperor bus, who reigned in the yeere of Grace, two hundred foureſcore and fiue, and o-threw ſome troupes of the Almaines, by the report of Vopiſcus, whereupon Gene-rd ſpake ſo. Hic primum Alemannorum fit mentio.

So that it remaineth conſtant, by the teſtimony of the alleadged Authors before, d by that of Aſinius Quadratus, a Romane Hiſtorian, alleadged by Agathias, in the t booke of the Gothes warres: That thoſe people of the higher Germany, were called mans, and them of the lower, French; who ſomtimes extended their dwelling vnto the thes of Rhine. For the Germanes dwelt (in former times) between the Riuers of Mœin, he Rhine, and of Danubie, ioyning to the Martian Forreſt, Countries and Prouin-which at this preſent the Sweues poſſeſſe, comprehended vnder the name of Aleines.

So we may plainely perceiue, that the French obtained not this name by payment imaginary tolles or tribute, whereat they were tallied by the Emperour Valentinian firſt (as ignorants haue written) becauſe that Emperour began not to reigne vntill out the yeere of Grace, 364. And the French were knowne for Warriours, euen the Romane Hiſtorians themſelues, an hundred yeeres before, to wit, from the re two hundred ſixty three. Let vs now ſuruay ſummarily, their Military exploits d actions, ſince they tooke the name of the French Company, vntill the Conqueſt the Gaules.

Confeſion of the Antiquity of the French by the Roman writers.

CHAP. V.

The Military Exploits and Actions of the Frenche, before the Conqueſt of the Gaules.

THE French, vnder the name of Sicambrians, did daily make warre vpon the Romanes, & on the Gauliſh Townes of their obedience, being on this ſide of the Rhine, and namely on them of Cologne, from the time of Cæſar, as wee haue already ſaid. So that to ſuccour the Inhabitants of that City, the Romane Emperours were conſtrained, continually to keepe ſtrong Garriſons there, according to the report of Tacitus. Vlpius Traianus cauſed it to be peopled with olde Legions of Romans, to keep it in Guard, & hinder their courſes.

Strong Garriſons ſtill kept by the Romãs, to ſuccor Cullen.

Vlpius inde venit. quo formidata Sicambris Agrippina fuit.

So ſaith Sidonius Apollinaris, in the Panegyricke ſpoken to the Emperour Auitus Father in law.

But it proued a quite contrary caſe, after that they were aſſembled vnder the name French; for then they made themſelues knowne (for valiancie) to the Romanes, both by Sea and Land. In the time of the Emperour Claudius, ſucceſſour to Galien, they made themſelues famous for actions on the Sea, aboue all other Nations, becauſe for making ſhippes and ſayling, they were the onely Maiſters, according as it is reſerued by Sidonius Apollinarius, in the ſame Panegyricke.

The French absolute Lords and Masters of the Seas.

In the time (I say) of that Emperor Claudius, they began to vndertake a formal course of trafficke and merchandizing, of Roauing and Pyrating on the Sea, wherof they became absolute Lords and Maisters. But not contented with those booties gotten on the West Ocean of Germanie, and on the Coasts of Flanders, where the Romanes (though not safely enough) conserued their Empire and domination: the French performed as much on the Seas of Gaule and Spaine, so much their stomacks boyled to feede on Warre.

Notable Piracies committed by the French on the Seas.

In the yeere of Grace, two hundred threescore and ten, they beeing associated with the Saxons, or Sesnes their neighbours, aduentured to run and proceed on in their fortune: so that sweeping the Seas before them, they pillaged all the Romane Vessells, found on the Ocean. So saith a Panegyrist of that time. Franci prater ceteros truces, quorum vis, cum ad bellum effecuescet, vltra ipsum Oceanum æstu furoris euecti, Hispaniarum oras etiam armis infestas habebant.

Eight yeeres after, to wit, in the yeere of Grace, two hundred threescore and eighteene, the second of the Empire of Probus, they robbed againe all the coasts of Gaule, afflicted by land with the courses and rauages of Chrocus, and of his Alemans, barred vp beyond the Necar and Elb, as it is written by Vopiscus.

In the yeere of Grace, two hundred fourescore and two, the sixt of the reigne of the same Emperour Probus, his Lieutenants tooke some French Foists, separated by a stormy Tempest from their consorts. The Romaines tied the French men to a chaine, to make a Triumph of them through the Cities of Asia. Those men, howbeit very few in number, hauing met (by chance) with some Barkes of passage; got possession of them, and made themselues so dreaded by their great boldnesse, that at the very fame of their valour, and expertnesse in occasions on the Seas; the whole Nauall Armie of the Emperour Probus, durst not meddle with them, but (constrainedly) fled to a place of retreat, sauing themselues by the helpe of a prosperous winde. So that this meere handfull of the French, hauing gotten roome and liberty, coursed at ease and their owne pleasure, the Sea called Mare Maiore, robbed all the Isles and Coasts of Greece, from Asia and Affrica, without meeting any person that dared to oppose them.

The name of the French much feared in many places.

Saragossa that famous and rich City ransacked by the French.

They tooke landing in the Isle of Sicilie, sacked Saragossa, a famous and most wealthy Cittie, the very chiefe of all the Isle; disburdened the Ships Anchored in the Ports and Hauens thereof, and (laden with vnspeakeable booties) returned homeward free, and passed the strait of Hercules, at this day called Gibraltar, recouering the great Ocean Sea, and their Marishes of Holland, and of Westphalia.

We learned this admirable aduenture, from the Greeke Historian Sozimus, and from the Panegyrist Eumenius, in his declamation spoken to the Emperour Maximinianus. Recursabat in animos illa sub diuo Probo, & Paucorum ex Francis captiuorum incredibilis audacia, & indigna felicitas, qui à Ponto correptis manibus Graciana Asiamque populati, & impune plerisque Lybiæ litoribus appulsi, ipsas postremo nauibus quondam Victoriis nobiles reperant Syracusas, & immenso itinere peruecti, Oceanum, qua aperuit, intrauerunt, atque ita euentu temeritatis ostenderant, nihil esse clausum piratis desperationi, quo nauigijs pateret accessus. And after that time, the French continued their Sea robberies, in as ample manner as before.

Carausius lieutenant to Diocletian, sent against the French.

So that in the yeare of Grace, two hundred fourescore and fiue, the Frenche and Saxons, vnited and knit in amity together; againe appeared on the Ocean Sea, making themselues Masters thereof. In such manner, as to impeach their courses, Diocletian, in the second yeere of his Empire, was forced to prepare and rigge forth a Fleet, the conduct whereof he gaue to one of his Lieutenants, named Carausius, who found that he met with his match; in plaine tearmes, men that neither feared him nor his forces; because they forbare not to robbe still on the Coasts of Flanders, Picardy, Normandie and Bretaigne, then called the coasts of Armorica, and the Morini. Carausius was constrained to fall to agreement with them, and feeding them fat with money tooke them for his good friends and neighbours.

Afterward he made good proofe of their valour in Warre, and employed them in his seruice so profitably, that making them his breast-plate of defence, hee proclaimed himselfe Emperor, got the possession of Great Bretaigne (afterward called England) and of the coast Armorica of the Gaules; as wee vnderstand out of Eutropius, in the ninth booke of his Breuiarie: Post has etiam tempora Carausius, cùm apud Bononiam (Bullen on the Sea) per tractum Belgicæ, & Armoricæ mare pacandum accepisset, quod Franci, & Saxones infestabant, à Maximiniano iussus occidi, purpuram sumpsit, & Britannias occupauit.

Diocletian, more furiously incensed against them, then before, tooke for his Sonne in Law Constantius, first of that name, to whom he gaue the charge and gouernement of the Gaules, in the yeere of Grace, two hundred fourescore and twelue, or thirteene. This man, as we haue elsewhere said) pared the nailes of the French, as well of them that tooke part with Carausius, and of his Successor (who maintained himselfe for the space of ten yeeres in the vsurpation, onely by the French Armes) as those of Holland, with whom were ioyned some of the Sesnes; which by the said Constantius were thence dislodged, and placed elsewhere: as saith the sixt Panegyricke. Purgauit Batauiam hoste aduecto. He transplanted out of Holland diuers troupes of the French (who were most factious, and could best skill of Nauall affaires) into the firme Land of the Gaules, Picardy, Champaigne, and Bourgongne, and others into fields desert of inhabitants, seated on the lands of Treuers and Tourney, by command from the Emperour Maximianus, proclaimed Cæsar by Diocletian. Tuo? Maximiniane Augustæ natu, Neruiorum, & Treuirorum arma iacentia lætus postliminio restitutus, & receptus in leges Francus excoluit. Vt loca deserta quæ ipsi deprædando vastauerat, culta redderet seruiendo.

Constantius sent by Diocletian against the French.

The same Panegyrist, declaring the praises of the two Cæsars, saith: O Kalenda Martia, sicut olim armorum voluentium, ita nunc æternorum auspices Imperatorum. Partho vltra Tigrim redacto. Dacia restituta: porrectis vsque ad Danubij caput Germaniæ, Rætiaque limitibus, destinata Batauiæ Britanniæque vindicta, &c. So that the French remained quiet and safe enough, and without remouing by Sea; vntill the death of Constantius, which happened in England, in the yeere of Grace, three hundred and sixe.

As for the French on firme land, they trauersed and passed the Rhine, to forrage the Gaules. Aurelian (who was Emperour soone after) hauing his Garrison at Maguntia, with the troupes whereof he was Tribune: came and tooke tardie seuen hundred of their troupe, detaining three hundred of them prisoners.

Afterward, when he was possessed of the Empire, he preuailed once more against another band of them, whom he made Captiues, and led them Captiues to Rome, to serue as an Ornament in his Triumphe, with a song in his owne praise; the burden whereof (after Ballad manner) declared: That he had ouercome a thousand French, a thousand Sarmates or Polonians, and other Nations, easie to be vanquished in painting. So it is deliuered by Flauius Vopiscus, in the life of Aurelianus.

Aurelian ouercunning for the French, in taking troups of them.

But so soone as the winde brought tidings to the French of the death of Constantius; they presently entred into the Field. But his sonne Constantine (who was surnamed The Great, for his glorious actions, & namely for embracing the Catholique Religion, forsaking Idolatry) he hindred them from their bad courses. He marched himselfe in person against them with a puissant Armie, quickly laying a great part of them to sleep, and tooke prisoner Ascaricke, King of the Frenche, with Ragazehis brother, whom he sent to Rome, where they serued as pastime to the people, and for food to Lyons in their sports. The Panegyricke of Nazarius informeth vs, that this discomfiture of the French, was at the beginning & entring into the Empire, of Constantine the Great; who pardoned the rest, tooke their chiefe Commanders to his seruice; and (among other) a valiant Captaine, named Bonicius, who performed incredible exploits against Licinius; so saith Ammianus Marcellinus, in his fifteenth booke.

Constantine the great marched in person against the French with his Armie.

Vnder the same Constantine, the French went againe into the Field, hauing vnderstood that hee was busied against Maxentius, who beeing vanquished, they returned into their Marishes, where they did keepe themselues quiet, vntill after his death.

Constantius, the eldest sonne of Constantine, being possessed in the Empire of the East Conſtantius, eldeſt ſonne of Conſtantine the great.

Eaſt; they fell againe to their former diſorder, and repaſſed the Rhine to forradge the Gaules. Conſtantius had little reaſon to meddle with them, for the ſixt Panegyricke declareth, that this Nation made themſelues vnconquerable. Francum truculentum ſola carne ferina diſtentum, qui vitam pro victus ſui vilitate contemnat, Quanta Mala ſe Superare vel capere? And which was worſe, the French, expelled the Country by his grandfather Conſtantius, into Champaigne and Bourgongne; returned into Holland, at the ſame time as other French (their companions) hauing ſet free the Rhine, came likewiſe to neaſtle themſelues in Holland: Diuerſa Francorum Gentes Batauiam inualerunt: So ſaith the Panegyriſt. To hold them in (as it were with a bridle) Conſtantius was glad to ſend his Nephew Iulian the Apoſtata, to gouerne the Gaules, in the name of his Brother the Emperor Valens: to whoſe lot and partage Gaule was falne, by the death of Conſtantine the Great his father.

Valens vexed them with mighty warres, during the peace of two yeeres; namely, the fourth and fifth of his Empire: yet neuertheleſſe with diuerſitie of euents, one while ſpeeding well, and then againe worſe, according to the lotte of Armes, and fortune inceſtably following warre. So that loſing any longer patience with them; of enemies they became his friends, making peace and alliance with them, in the yeare of his ſecond Conſulſhip, and of Grace, three hundred forty two. Hee choſe a good number of the moſt valiant among them, wherewith hee filled his Romane Legions, and they ſerued him beneficially; for he left the French Saliens, enioying the poſſeſſion of Toxiandria. Theſe men were they whom Iulian the Apoſtata much turmoyled (by the ſaying of Ammianus) contrary to the intention notwithſtanding of his Vnkles Conſtantius and Valens, who ſo long as they liued, kept peace with the French, of whom the Court of Conſtantius was filled: for the ſame Ammianus Marcellinus, ſpeaking of them in the forenamed fifteenth booke, hath theſe words: Francorum ea tempeſtate multitudo in Palatio florebat, and that was for their faithfulneſſe. For he obſerueth a Tribune of the Emperors horſemen, named Laniogazus, a French-man by originall, who was ſo loyall and faithfull to Conſtans, as hee onely followed and aſſiſted him to the death, which hee alſo hindered in one Silvianus, vpon his rebelling againſt Conſtantius, who would haue done it in the yeare of Grace, three hundred fiftie and fiue.

The proceedings of the Emperor Valens with the French.

Concerning Toxiandria, otherwiſe named Taxandria, it was a great village, planted in the midſt of the Mariſhes or Fennes, to make all approches thereto the more difficult, chiefely to them of Tongres in the ſecond Germanie, betweene the confines of Liege and Brabant, whereof there may be yet ſeene the ancient trackes at the place called Teſſendorlo, vpon the confines of the ſaid Liege, very neere to Dieſt in Brabant: from which places, the Saints Lambert and Hubert expelled Idolatry, and planted there the true Religion of Ieſus Chriſt.

The chiefe & ſtrogeſt dwelling of the French, was in Fenny grounds.

Theſe Emperors hauing then long time kept peace with the French, it was broken by a courſe and rauage, which the Alemans made vpon Gaule, all along the Rhine, where they poſſeſſed themſelues of forty townes, in the yeare of Grace, three hundred fiftie and foure; in regard that the French were ſuſpected to haue their hand in the buſineſſe, as it is written by Zozimus and Ammianus Marcellinus, in his ſeauen and twentieth booke. Gallicanos tractus Franci, & Saxones ijſdem confines quo quiſque erumpere potuit terra vel mari, prædis acerbis, incendijſque, & captiuorum funeribus violabant. For theſe were the Galleries and ordinary walkes into the Gaules, becauſe ouer and beſide Taxandria, they had Holland on this ſide the Rhine, and other lands elſwhere: So ſaith the Panegyriſt of thoſe times. Multa Francorum millia Batauiam, aliaque loca cis Rhenum innaſerant. And another Terram Batauiam, vicinaque loca a diuerſis Francorum Regibus occupatam.

The peace of the French broken by the Alemans.

Cullen take by the French frō the Romans.

Moſt certaine is it, that in the yeare three hundred fifty and fiue, the French ſurprized from the Romanes the City of Cologne, ſeated on the Riuer of Rhine, which they pilled, ſacked, and ruined. So that to make head againſt them, the Emperor Conſtantius proclaimed as Cæſar his Nephew Iulian (ſurnamed the Apoſtata) and ſent him to command ouer the Gaules (as wee haue already ſaid) in the yeere of Grace three hundred fiftie and ſixe. At which time the Apoſtata being aſſiſted with a potent Armie, recouered from the French the City of Cologne, and made Peace, to the honor of of the Empire) with the Kings of France, who had ſought to compaſſe it by their Ambaſſadors: ſo ſaith the Panegyriſt, and Ammianus Marcellinus, in his 27. booke.

But in the yeere following, three hundred fifty ſeuen, the French perceiuing the Apoſtata gone vp farre in warre againſt the Alemanes, who had robbed theſe Townes vpon the Rhine; once more they made a rode forth into Gaule, to get what firſt ſhold come to their fingring. The Apoſtata returning with victory from the Alemanes, came with a fierce and hot aſſault vpon theſe boote-halers, whereof hee hewed a great number in peeces, and beſieged others 3. moneths together in a Caſtle, whereof they got poſſeſſion on the Meuze, compelling them (by famine) to yeeld themſelues to his diſcretion. In the Sommer following, 358. hauing once more ſet his Army on foote to goe againſt the Alemans, he tooke his way through the Countrey of Tongres, and ſo ſtrongly beſieged Toxandria; as the French Inhabitants were inforced to yeelde themſelues vpon compoſition. So that they left the Gaules and Toxandria, and repaſſed beyond the Rhine, into their ancient dwelling: ſo it is affirmed by Ammianus Marcellinus, in his 17. booke. Quibus paratis petit primos omnium Francos, eos videlicet quos conſuetudo Salios vocitauit, auſos olim in Romano ſolo apud Toxandriam locum, habitacula ſibi figere prælicenter.

Another aduenture of the French to their own detrimēt

Toxandria beſieged by the Apoſtata.

There is a plaine appearance, that this peace was of no long continuance, & that the French (lickeriſhly longing after ſuch rich booties, as they had caried out of abounding Gaule) could not reſtraine themſelues from paſſing thither. For the ſame Ammianus Marcellinus writeth in his 20. book, that the Apoſtata, hauing alwaies a flea in his eare, and a wary watchfull eye, ſurprized a troope of French, aſſembled at a feaſt & mariage of one of their Princes; carried away the Bride, made hauock of the company, mangling diuers of them in peeces. A Towne taken, and the Triumph Straw: A blow for a blow, with ſmall aduantage. For the French quickly made way to reuenge themſelues, putting the people to fire and ſword, all along the coaſt of Rhine, to the no meane coſt and harme of the Townes and Villages belonging to the Romane Empire; and in contempt of Iulian the Apoſtata, who in the yeere 360. (like a perfidious Traytor to God and his Prince, though anſwerable to the nature of hereticall Apoſtats) hauing cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed Emperor by his Armies; would, for his laſt peece of ſeruice (as the ſame Marcellinus telleth vs in his 20. booke) worke wonders, & giue ſuch a gird to the French, as ſhould remaine for remembrance of him.

Reuenge wrought by the French in deſpight of Iulian the Apoſtata.

Hee muſtred then together all his Armie, paſſed freely and ſilently the Riuer of Rhine, and ſurprized the French in the ſtrength of their Mariſhes, where (vntill that time) the Romanes durſt neuer aduenture to paſſe. The firſt they met withall, were the Antuarians, meaning thoſe French both before, and at the paſſage of Rhine, all of them being put to the ſword. Among whom were Theomir (ſon of Richimer, Kings of France) for ſo the Weſtphalians and their round engirting neighbors called them, and Aſcila his mother. Hee had a great number of priſoners beſide, with very rich ſpoyles, and compelled the reſt to beg their peace of him, which he granted to them: Prouided, that they ſhould afterward refraine from forraging, and committing any more robberies in Gaule. S. Gregory of Tours toucheth this ſharpe checke of theirs, in his ſecond booke and ninth chapter of the hiſtory of France. In Conſulatibus legimus Theodomerem Regem Francorum, Filium Richemeris quondam Regis, & Aſcilam matrem eius gladio interfectas. This ſtormy tempeſt kept the French to ſtrict tearms of peace, during the reignes of the Apoſtata, and alſo of Iouinian as Valentinian, firſt of that name, with whom Macrianus King of the Alemans made a treaty of peace, in the 11. yeere of his Empire, and of Grace 374. This Macrianus couetouſly affecting to forradge France, was taken and ſlaine by Mellobaudes, King of the French, as we learne by Ammianus Marcellinus in his 30. booke. It is apparant that the Alemanes and French entred into contention, about the bounds and limits of their lands, making ſhrewd attempts one vpon the other, as ordinarily it hapneth betweene two potent Princes.

The ſilent ſtealth of Iulian on the French in their Fennes.

Macrianus K. of the Almans

For, vpon the ſame ſubiect, the Saxons iſſued forth the bounds of the Ocean Sea, vexing the French for paſſage through their lands, to fall violently vpon the Gaules. But the French (as Paulus Oroſius the Spaniard informeth vs, and Iohn the Deacon of Aquileia) welcommed them with ſuch ſharpe entertainment, as they were not willing to meddle any more with them.

And from thence (as it seemeth) sprang the sourse and originall of the immortall wars between the French, Almanes, and Saxons, who (in the end) met with their matches, and were ouer mastered by the French.

Now, the Emperour Valentinian the first, being dead in the yeere of Grace 375. Gracian his sonne acknowledging the good offices, done by the King of the Frenche, Mellobas or Mellobaudes, to his father and him: created him Great Master of his Pallace, and Consull with him, in the yeare 377. And in the yeere after, hee made him Lieutenant Generall on the coast of the Rhine, to hinder the courses and passages of the Alemans, who in the yeere three hundred threescore and eighteene, and the third of his Empire, came with a puissant Army to besiege the Towne of Strasbourg. Mellobandes and the French fought with the Alemans so successiuely, that thirty thousand of them lay slaine in the field. And from that time forward, Gratian held the French in such account, only for their valiancie; as he filled his Regiments with them, whereof likewise he gaue the conduct and command to French Captaines, saith Marcellinus in his thirtieth booke, with further addition of their braue behauiour.

The great aduancement of Mellobaudes by the Emperor Gratian.

This King Mellobaudes, (by some tearmed Merobaudes) soone after brought into credit with Gratian, a valiant French Prince, named Ricomer, to whom hee gaue command of the Armie, which he sent as succour into Thrace (spoyled by the Gothes) to his Vncle the Emperour Valens. But the courses of the Aleman Nations, by their robberies in Gaule, imported such remedie, that Gratian sent Ricomer to guard the frontiers of the Rhine, in quality of a Duke, as much to say, as Lieutenant Generall of the Empire, in absence of the King Mellobaudes, which as wee haue already said, vanquished neere to Strasbourg, those whom Ammianus Marcellinus, in his 31. book, calleth Barbaros Letienses, making vp the body of an Armie of threescore & ten thousand men. This ouerthrow happened in the yeere of Grace 378. And the Bourdelois Poet Ausonius (sometime schoolemaster to the Emperor Gratian, who had made him Consull with Olybrius, in the yeere 379.) testifieth (speaking of his said Consulship) that this great Victory ensued from the French and Sweues, ioyned together in fauour of the Romanes.

Ricomer, a valiant French Prince, in fauour with Gratian.

Iane, veni, nouus annecueni, renouate veni Sol.
Hostibus adomitis, qua Francia mixta Sueuis
Certat ad obsequium, Latys vt militet armis.

And afterward hee sheweth vs, what enemies waged Armes against the Romane Empire, all issuing forth of Pannonia and from Scythia, to wit, the Gothes, who were possessed of Thrace, the Hunnes, Quades, Gepides, Alanes, Vandales and other.

Enemies against the Roman Empire.

Quà vaga Sauromates sibi iunxerat agmina Chunis, Quaque Getis socijs Histrum insultabat Alanis, &c.

Heere may be obserued, whether the French tooke their Origine, or no, from the Pannoniaes, or the Marshie Mœotides, to come make their flanking and abiding on the Rhine. And S. Gregory of Tours, noting the Descent of all these strange Nations, and the Countries of their Originall and birth; would haue done as much of the French Nation, if they had beene any other (originally) but Gaules or Germanes.

Something wee learne from the Bishop of Auuergne Sidonius Apollinaris, and an admirable doctrine in mine opinion: for in the Panegyricke of the Emperour Maiorian, he remarketh the flood of those strange Nations.

Basterna, Sueuus,
Pannonius, Neurus, Chunus, Geta, Dacus, Alanus, Bellonothus, Rugus, Burgundio, Vesus, Alites, Bisalta, Ostrogothus, Procuites, Sarmata, Moschus.

He maketh no mention at all of the French, whom hee calleth otherwise Sicambrians; for hee knew them to be of the Gaulish Nation, inhabiting long time on the banks of Rhine, and that they were knowne by the name of French, almost two hundred yeeres before Maiorian.

The prouident respect of the Emperor Gratian, for the Empire of the West.

Now the Emperor Gratian, presaging that this swelling deluge of Nations before named, would make a confusion in the Romane Empire, and labour to vnplume the Eagle: hee named for Cæsar and Successour to the Empire of the West Theodosius the Great, in the said yeere of Grace, three hundred threescore and nineteene, sending him him against the Gothes into Thrace. And Gratian himselfe went into Gaule, to impeach the Alemans from robbing and spoyling, where hee vanquished them in a ranged battell. So writeth Sozimenus, in his 7. booke, and 4. chapter: Sub hoc tempus Gratianus Alemannis Galatas Occidentales (that is to say in Gaule, at this present named France) adhuc infestantibus, bellum intulit, illosque deuicit.

Gratian hauing proclaimed Theodosius Cæsar; he gaue him the conduct of the succor which he led to the Emperor Valens his Vncle, who was burned aliue in a Cottage of straw by the Gothes, that then made hauocke and spoyle in the East, and against whom (as the Greeke Authors affirme) Theodosius obtained a famous Victory, the same yeere as he was proclaimed Cæsar; or, according to other, in the yeere 380. Claudian speaking of this Victorie, in the fourth Consulship of Honorius, sonne to the said Theodosius the Great, wrote thus:

Nulla relicta foret Romani nominis vmbra,
Ni pater ille tuis iamiam ruitura subisset
Pondera, turbatamque ratem, certaque lenasset
Naufragium commune manu.

And the honor thereof was attributed vnto the French troupes, conducted by two braue Captaines of the same Nation, named Bautonius and Arbogastes, whom the Emperor Gratian gaue as Councellers and handy-helpes to Theodosius, and he made very profitable vse of their worthy seruice, in all his great and glorious enterprises.

In the yeere of Grace, 383. Mellobaudes or Merobaudes, King of the French, being made Consull the second time, (with Flauius Saturninus) the Gouernour of Great Bretaigne, called Flauius Clemens Maximus; proclaimed himselfe Emperour, and passed into Gaule, to establish the seat of his vsurped Empire, in the City of Treuers, which Ammianus Marcellinus calleth Clarum domicilium Principum, because that in those times, it was the capitall City of the Gaules, &c.

Flauius Clemens Maximus Gouernor of great Britain.

This Maximus was a Natiue of great Bretaigne, issued of very meane birth, but what wanted that way, he made good appearance of in Armes; and the better to couer his vsurpation, hee tearmed himselfe a neere kinsman to Theodosius the Great, by the Empresse Saint Helena, mother to the Emperour Constantine the Great. So thus vnder this couerture, he got possession of the Gaules and Spaine, where (as some said) he was borne. Gratian offended to be thus betrayed by his Romane Souldiers in Gaule, in Spaine, and in Great Bretaigne; called to his ayde the Hunnes and the Alanes, to send them against Maximus, to fight with him both by Sea and Land. Whereat the Souldiers of his Guard waxing angry, the good Emperor Gratian was miserably murdered in the City of Lyons, and by his owne people, who forsooke him, leaning to one of the Captaines, named Andragathius, belonging to the Tyrant Maximus. S. Hierome bemoaned the violent death of this good Prince, hapning in August the said yere, 383. Gratianus ab exercitu suo proditus, & ab obuijs vrbibus non receptus, ludibrio hostis fuit, cruentæque manus vestigia parietes tui, Lugdune testantur. So speaketh that great light of the Church in his third Epistle. In briefe, Maximus so proceeded on, that the same yere he procured to be slaine Mellobaudes King of the French, then Consull, and making his abode at Maguntia, with a valiant Captaine, called Balion, Lieutenant of the Horse to Gratian in Gaule, which Prouince they manfully defended against Maximus. The same yeere also, Theodosius proclaimed his eldest sonne Arcadius, Augustus, and his successor in the Empire of the East, albeit he was then but 8. yeeres of age.

The good Emperor Gratian cruelly murdered by his owne followers.

Mellobaudes King of the French slaine.

But why in the passage of this discourse, do I not set down one especiall note, wonderfully remarkable for Princes, in a chiefe quality belonging to them? It is reported by Socrates, in his fift booke and tenth chapter, and by Sozimen, in his 7. booke and 12 chapter. Theodosius hauing written to the Emperor Gratian some few months before his death, earnestly intreated him to send him a man of singular Piety, only to instruct his children. Seeking for a man of that worthy quality, and hauing found him, he sent him to Constantinople: for Gratian had entreated Pope Damasus (a man famous for sanctity of life, both before, & long after his death) to send him a Decon of the Roman Church, named Arsenius, a man of signall probitie, & great learning. When this man was come to Constantinople, Theodosius deliuered his sonnes into his charge, saying:

An excellent President for Princes.

The care of Princes for their childrens education.

That thence forward, hee should be the father of his sonnes, much rather then himselfe. Euen as if hee would haue said, that such as informe the soules of young children in vertue, are their true fathers indeed, and more then they that gaue them but their bodies. Theodosius going (on a day) into the Schoole where his sonnes were taught, saw Arsenius standing, reading the lesson to the Emperour Arcadius sitting in his Throne. He grew offended against Arsenius, and reproued him, as not knowing what belonged to his charge; in standing, and suffering his Scholler to sit. Arsenius excused himselfe by the honour which was due to the Emperour, before whom it was vnbeseeming for him to sit, and the Prince to stand. Immediately Theodosius took the Empires notes of honour from his Sonne Arcadius, and caused him to descend from his Throne, wherein hee seated Arsenius, and held his sonne bare-headed before his Master, speaking this notable sentence: My Sonnes shall be worthy to succeed in the Empire, at such time as they haue knowledge and learning, maried and coupled with Grace & Piety. He was none of those ignorant Princes, which held a sottish beliefe; That if one can read, it is sufficient for a Gentleman.

This age affords few such Fathers and Masters.

The death of Grattian, and of his most confident friends, hapning in such manner as you haue heard, and by the trecheries of the Tyrant Maximus; Theodosius sent the two worthiest Captaines which he had, Bautonius and Arbogastes, to succour the Emperor Valentinian the yonger, who remained ordinarily at Millaine; against whom Maximus was desirous to marche, to possesse himselfe of Italie. This was in the yeere 385. the tenth of the Empire of Valentinian, and seuenth of Theodosius: at which time, the Emperor Arcadius, & this Bautonius the French Captaine were chosen Consuls at Rome, the one residing at Constantinople, and the other in the City of Millaine. This is the same Bautonius, of whom S Augustine made the Panegyricke, before the Emperor Valentinian, as such time as he came to Millaine; for so himselfe testifieth, writing against Petilian in his third booke, and 25 chapter: Cum ego Mediolanum ante Bautonem Consulem venerim, eique Consuli Kalendis Ianuarijs laudem in tanto conuentu consectanti hominum pro mea tunc Rhetorica professione recitarem, &c.

Bautonius and Arbogastes chief Captains to Theodosius.

As for the other Captaine Arbogastes, hee was sent with his French troupes into Gaule, to fight with Maximus; who to frustrate the intention of Arbogastes, and vtterly disappoint his endeuour: in the same yeere made a counterfeit peace with the Emperours, Theodosius and Valentinian. So that in the yeere 386, Euodius (made Prefect of the Gaules Praetorum, by this Tyrant Maximus) was created Consull with Honorius, the second sonne of Theodosius, being then in the Cradle, and aged fourteene moneths onely; for so we are instructed by Claudian,

> ..... Inter cunabula Consul
> Prouehcris signans posito modo nomine Fastos, > Donaturque tibi qui te produxerat annus.

The politicke craft of the tyrant Maximus.

Genebaudes the sonne to Mellobaudes made king of the French.

By the death of Mellobaudes, his sonne Genebaudes was chosen King of the French, who continued the fidelity of his father with the Emperour Valentinian the younger: neere about whom was the Consull Bautonius (Count of the Domestickes, that is to say, Great Master of the household to Valentinian) who by intelligence with the new King of the French, secretly made offers to the Tyrant Maximus, to assist him with a great number of the French, to possesse him of Italy, according as hee had resolued. But the cunning plot was disclosed, and found to be a politique deuise to intrap Maximus, and rid the world of him; as we learne by that great Doctor of the Church Saint Ambrose, Ambassador from Valentinian to the said Maximus, in his 25. Epistle, sent from Treuers to Millaine, to the said Emperor Valentinian, in the yere 387. and wherein he defendeth the practises wrought by the said Bautonius against Maximus. Et quid mirum si hoc Bauto fecisset Trans-Rhenanus genere, cum tuministeris Imperio Romano Barbarorum auxilia, & turma transfumitanas? Maximus pursuing his purpose, passed into Italie, and ransacked the Cities thereof. Valentinian and his mother Iustina, saued themselues by Sea, fledde to Thessalonica, to the Emperour Theodosius, who to furnish himselfe with the charges and expences, fitte and sufficient to re-seat them in their dominion: made a new imposition to be leuied on them of Antioch, that had rebelled against him, and of a popular outrage, which admitteth no matter of fence or reason (and then which can be no worse) they beate downe the Statues of Brasse of the Emperor Emperour Theodosius, and of his first wife Aelia Flaccilla, mother to the Emperours Arcadius and Honorius.

This folly was sharpely reuenged on the Authors thereof, and to the intire ruine of the Citie: but by the mercy and clemencie of Theodosius, who committed this vengeance wholly to God. So that at the tidings of pardō, the Inhabitants of the city, as men risen againe from death to life, testified the notes of their ioy, by venerable antiquity; as Sozomen obserueth, in his seuenth booke and three and twenty chapter. Forum Coronantes, Lucernas Accendentes, Et Lectos ante Officinas Componentes, & tanquam nuper Ciuitate nata, festum agentes. In more yonger daies, and before the furious league, in *An.*1588. in Paris hath beene seene on festiuall daies and recreations; tables set for suppers at the doores of houses and shops in the streets, with generall reioysing: but ciuill warres caused the whole losse of those ancient customes.

The fruits of Popular furye & disturbance

Maximus being possessed of Italie, and knowing that Theodosius leuied a powerfull Armie to meet and fight with him, prouided his best meanes for entertaining him, gathering (from all parts) his troops of men, and made Andragathius his Admirall, to keepe the Ionian Sea in his power, if Theodosius should make his passage that way.

prouision of the tyrant Maximus, to encounter Theodosius.

The Colonell of his Armie by land, was his brother Marcellinus, to guard the bywaies and passages of Italie. And he himselfe with his troups (euermore victorious) tooke the guardance of the Pannoniaes, to winne way before Theodosius, if hee should take that course, as indeed he did.

Maximus foyled by the Emperor Theodosius.

Theodosius finding Maximus encamped before Siscia (a City of the higher Pannonia) gaue him battell, and won the victory. Maximus fled for safety into Aquileia but being brauely pursued, the City was so narrowly besieged, that his owne Souldiers (reuolting from him) seized on his person, and cloathing him in Imperiall garments, fast bound and manacled, deliuered him to the Emperour Theodosius. Hee being a milde and mercifull Prince, would haue beene gracious to him: but the Souldiers of his guard plucking him violently from him, cut off his head, the sixt of the Calends of September, three hundred fourescore and eight, then being Consuls the Emperour Theodosius the second time, with Cynegius.

Maximus the tyrants death.

We learne the end and Catastrophe of this Tyrant Maximus from Sozimus, in the fourth booke of his histories, and from the Panegyricke of Latinus Pacatus. Rapitur ab oculis Theodosij Maximus, et nequid licere posset Clementiæ, inter innumeras manus fertur ad mortem. Theodosius likewise ouerthrew the Armie by land, conducted by Marcellinus and the Admirall Andragathius, hauing receiued tidings of his Masters death; first of all leapt headlong into the Sea, and so was drowned.

Victors death last sonne to Maximus.

These newes being reported in Gaule, the Count Arbogastes (by pollicie) tooke out of his mothers armes the last sonne of Maximus, named Victor, whom he put to death. And thus (in a moment) Gaule, Spaine, England, Italie, and all that belonged to the Empire of the West, was deliuered vp to the lawfull Emperor, and that of the East sufficiently secured. So saith the same Latinus Pacatus, a most famous Oratour, and a Gaule by nation, in his Panegyricke spoken to the Emperour Theodosius, in the Citie of Rome on the day of his Triumph, in the moneth of August, 389. But returne we to the French.

Sigibert writeth in his Chronicle, vnder the yere 387. that the French put to flight and to the edge of the sword, neere to the City of Treuers, Quintinus and Heraclius Lieutenants to Maximus the Tyrant, during the time of his absence in Italie (so hee would haue it to be credited) because some other report this ouerthrow to be in the yeere fourescore and eight, in stead of seauen. Franci Quintinum & Heraclium Romanorum Duces cum omnibus penè suis iuxta Treuerim delent.

This passage being cut ouer-short, is interpreted more at large by S. Gregory Victor, Archbishop of Tours, in the second booke of his History of France, and the ninth chapter, according to the testimony of Sulpitius Alexander, and in these words.

The Tyrant Maximus, hauing lost all hope of enioying any longer his authority, shut vp himselfe in the City of Aquileia, like a man bereft of all spirit and iudgement.

In the time of this Emperor, the French vnder the conduct of their Dukes (Claudian calleth them Kings) Genebaudes, Marcomir, and Sunno, enfranchising the bounds & limits of their ancient dwelling, impetuously (first of all) inuaded Germany, where after after they had slaine an vnspeakeable number of the Inhabitants, and pilled the richest townes thereof, they gaue shrewd affrightments to the City of Cologne. The newes of their proceeding being reported in the Cities of Treuers, Nannius & Quintinus, both Commanders of the Horsemen, and vnto whom the Tyrant Maximus had comitted the charge of his son, as also the gouernment of the Gaules, hauing brought their forces into the field, came to succour Cologne. But the French laden with most rich spoyles, passed backe againe ouer the Riuer of Rhine, hauing left good troupes of theirs on the Romanes lands, resolued to pursue their former purpose, and to make hauocke of all. But it fell out otherwise, for the Romanes followed them in the Rere, and hauing ouertaken them in the Charboniere Forrest, gaue them the check-mate, and slew a great number of them.

The French slay also the trade Germanike Nannius and Quintinus, Commanders of the Gaules.

A great number of French slaine by the Romanes.

The Romane animated and exalted with courage, sate in Councell & deliberation, whether it were better to crosse the Rhine or no, and by that means enter into France. Nannius being a wise and politique Captaine, could not allow of this aduise, alleadging for his reasons, that there were euident appearances of the Frenchmens fore-cast, hauing all prepared to welcome the Romanes, of whom (vndoubtedly) they would winne the aduantage, in regard they were the stronger on their owne grounds.

Quintinus quite contrary in opinion to Nannius.

This opinion was nothing pleasing to his companion Quintinus, and them that followed his directions: so that Nannius hauing made his retreat to Maguntia, Quintinus with his Armie went and encamped neere to the Castle of Nuz, and afterward passed the Rhine. At the second lodging vpon this passage, Quintinus and his followers found themselues to be among great Villages, and numbers of Cottages or Coats, yet without any inhabitants. For the French, appearing to be fearfull of the Romans, and meerely driuen to flye before them, intended to intrap them; and therefore (purposely) left those Cottages and Townes as forsaken, withdrawing themselues into the thickest parts of their Woods, the great wayes and passages whereof, they had bound taft with the spreading branches of Trees, knitting them intricately on strong knots one within another.

A notable deuise of the French before the Romanes.

The Romanes in a fond and foolish reuenge, set all the Villages and Cottages on fire (onely in meere despight, because they found no victualls in them) in signe of Trophies and Triumphes of straw, remaining all that night with their Armour on, and yet not discouering any person.

A silly reuenge taken by the Romanes.

About the breake of day, conducted by their Colonell Quintinus, they entered beating into the Woods, where they continued hem'd in till noone day, misled in all the pathes and passages, with infinite toyle and trauell they found meanes to free themselues of the combined branches, but yet met with worse fortune: and as the vulger Prouerbe is, fell out of a feauer, into a disease of farre greater danger. For at issuing forth of the Forrest, they came into the wide open fieldes, which were all Marishes, both at the entrance, and all sides about them.

The Romanes vnfortunate in their proceedings.

The French had purposely hidden themselues within the woods, onely to draw the Romanes into those myery fields of trembling earth, and full of Bogges and Quagmires, wherein the Romanes were much pestered. Now appeared the French-men on the tops of trees, which serued them as so many exalted Towers and Turrets, for discouery of an enemy before he draw neere. At them they let flie their darts and arrowes embalmed in venemous hearbs (for it was a custome of the Frenche, to impoyson their darts and arrowes, as it is noted in the Salique Law, the first Paragraphe, at the Title de Vulnerbus) with Lead. And like vnto a thicke darke Clowd, which breaketh into hayle and stormie raine; euen so it chanced to the poore Romanes; or rather much worse; for such as the arrowes fell vpon, the skinne being but pierced, it festered immediately, and they died rauing by violence of the poyson. By this meanes the French (who knew the best and warrantable grounds) assembled in great numbers, engirting the Romane Armie, and made a most terrible slaughter of them.

The French shed poysoned darts wherewith they greatly annoyed the Romanes.

The miserable perplexities of the Romanes.

The first rankes of Horse were ingulfed in the Bogges, both men and horses, and the beasts that carried charge and luggage, were so deepely swallowed in the myres, as no meanes serued for drawing them out, as likewise the rest that followed their steps were subiect to the like successe.

As for the foot Souldiers, they being more agile and light then them on horseback, although although they were bemudded and foyled with the filth of the moist fields: yet (with some difficultie) they got thence, and escaped into those Woods, from whence they issued in the morning, there hiding themselues among the bushes till night came (which hath neither shame nor feare) and so were sheltered by fauour thereof, in the best manner they could deuise, or as was possible for them.

The whole Armie being thus confused, and the rankes in disorder for to saue themselues: it need not be demanded, if the French (being in safetie) were well reuenged for the Charboniere Forrest, and no great good market of their enemies. For Heraclius, maister of the Campe du Regiment, and of the Legion of the Iouiaians, and all them that had command in the Armie, remained there dead; and such as saued themselues from this dayes misfortunes, were but a very small number. You heare what is anouched by Sulpitius Alexander, in the third Booke of his Historie.

In the fourth booke he speaketh of the death of Victor, the last or yongest sonne of the Tyran Maximus. At that time, in the place and sted of Nannius and Quintinus, were subrogated two other Captaines, named Carietto and Surius, who (with their Armies) encamped themselues face to face with France, vpon the confines of Germanie. It must be vnderstood of the first Germanie, which is on this side the Rhine, and not of Allemaigne, beyond the Elb, nor of that Germanie afterward called Franconia.

Three distinctions concerning Germanie.

He saith afterward, that as the French intruded themselues againe into Germanie (doubtlesse the first) they brought away thence an vnspeakeable bootie. And Arbogastes, being vnwilling to endure these brauadoes, which was nothing else but Griefe to the vanquished, and Dishonor to the Romaines: councelled his Emperour Valentinian the yonger, to chastise the French, and make them pay the penaltie of their passed transgressions, except they would readily deliuer, and in all haste what they had stolne and carried away before, from the Lands of the Romaines, and surrender vp into his hands, the principall Commanders of their people, who had massacred the Captaines and Romaine Legions, to take vengeance on them, for the broken and violated peace. This last course vpon the limits of Rhine, made by the French, in the time of those new Captaines Carietto and Surius, chanced in the yeare of Grace, three hundred fourescore and nine, and the ouerthrow of Quintinus, and the Legions established for guarding the Rhines frontiers, was in three hundred fourescore and eight, and not fourescore and seauen, as Sigibert obserued.

The Councell giuen by Arbogastes to the Emperour Valentinian.

To know the reason, why Arbogastes, a Frenchman by Nation (so saith Auentinus, the brother of Marcomir and Sunon, sonnes to Genebaudes) incited the Emperour Valentinian his Maister, against the French: these are close and concealed Letters from vs, and what soeuer thereof can be said, meere guesses and coniectures, wherewith a faithfull Historian ought not to be charged. Very certaine it is, that Valentinian neuer would haue the French for his enemies, who had loyally confirmed the Romaine alliance, vnder their Kings Mellobaudes and Genebaudes, so lately deceased, and to whom succeeded his sonnes Marcomir and Sunon, not crediting the councell of Arbogastes. Onely he came to visite the Gaules, and the frontiers of Rhine, whereon he had speech and conference with the Kings Marcomir and Sunon, who renewed the auncient alliance, giuing hostages on both sides for assurance thereof, sworne on either part in the yeare three hundred fourescore and ten.

Guesses are no good grounds to build on for any true Historian.

Arbogastes offended at this alliance, made without his aduise and counsaile; thenceforward studied reuenge, as well against the Emperour his Maister, as them of his owne Nation. So that (notwithstanding the peace, and the hostages giuen) he resolued to make warre vpon the French. And so soone as Valentinian (who had spent the winter in the Citie of Treuers, after the peace made) had taken his way towards Lyonnois, in the yeare of Grace three hundred fourescore and eleuen, and that the Traytour Arbogastus had shut vp his Maister in the Citie of Vienna, vnder sure and sufficient guard: he came with a part of his Romaine Legions to Cologne, euen in the hart of winter, to the end he might suddenly rush into France. Imagining ning this to be the apteſt ſeaſon, to giue a gird to the French, and taking them at vnawares, he ſhould ſpeede the better, by ranſacking their Townes, and conuerting them into aſhes: all meanes of ſuccour being denied them, for ſeeking ſhelter in their woods, in regard there were no leaues or branches (as then) on the Trees.

The Bructeres were firſt let vpon by Arbogaſtes.

Hauing then aſſembled the body of his Armie, preſently he paſſed the Rhine, and for his firſt attempt, aduentured on the Bructeres (as being neereſt to the Rhine, reducing into cinders the Towne of Ætia, as then peopled with the Chamanes; making ſpoyle and waſte all thereabout, without meeting any perſon to offer reſiſtance. Onely he ſaw appeare the King of the French, Marcomir, with his French Antuarians, and ſome number of the Chattes, (we haue formerly noated the moderne names of all thoſe Nations) on the top of the Mountaines; but ſo farre off, as he could not receiue any harme by them. This is that which Sulpitius Alexander deliuereth in the fourth Booke of his Hiſtorie.

S. Paulinus, in the life of that great ſplendour of the Church S. Ambroſe, Biſhop of Millaine, purſueth the reſt of this paſſage, concerning the Count Arbogaſtes, ſaying. At the beginning Arbogaſtes, in his firſt attempt, was ill welcomed by the French, of whom yet in the end he had the victory: After which, hauing had conference with the Kings Marcomir and Sunon (for Paulinus giueth them the name of Kings) there was peace and alliance made againe betweene them, ſolemnely ſworne on either part. Now it happened, that Arbogaſtes, at a magnificent Banquet, conferring with the Kings Marcomir, Sunon, and the chiefeſt Lords of the French, he was queſtioned by Marcomir, if he had any knowledge of Saint Ambroſe. He replying, that he knew him, and was familiar with him. It is not then to be wondred at (ſaid Marcomir to him) if all things ſucceede with thee, ſo well as thou canſt wiſh, hauing the grace and fauour of ſo Holy a man, who could ſay to the Sunne: Stand ſtill, and by and by it ſtood ſtill. Theſe are the very words of S. Paulinus.

The words of King Marcomir to Arbogaſtes.

Per idem tempus Arbogaſtes Comes aduerſus gentem ſuam, hoc eſt Francorum, Bellum parauit, atque pugnando, non paruam multitudinem manu fudit, cum reſiduis vero pacem firmauit. Sed cum in conuiuio a Regibus gentis ſuæ interrogaretur, Vtrum ſciret Ambroſium, & reſpondiſſet noſce ſe virum, & diligi ab eo atque frequenter cum illo conuocari ſolitum, audiuit: Ideo vincis omnes, qui ab illo viro diligeris, qui dicit Soli, ſta, & ſtat. The French, although they then were Pagans and Idolaters; attributed neuertheleſſe the good fortune of Arbogaſtes, to the knowledge which he had with Saint Ambroſe, whoſe ſanctity of life they much admired.

The reaſon why S. Ambroſe loued Arbogaſtes.

And that which moued him to affect Arbogaſtes, was the perfections that he acknowledged to be in him, euen ſuch as Suidas hath noated on the name of this Captaine. Arbogaſtes Francus, robore corporis, & aſperitate animi flammæ ſimilis, proximus a Bautone, in hoc fuit conſtans, & exquiſita modeſtia, & odium irreconciliabile auaritiæ, &c. Arbogaſtes, a French man by Nation, in ſtrength of body, and in viuacitie of ſpirit, like vnto a flame of fire, held the ſecond ranke and dignity of Honor, next vnto Count Bantonius. He was conſtant and couragious, of ſinguler modeſtie, a mortall enemie, and vtterly vnreconcileable, to the peſtilent vice of auarice, ſo that he made no ſpare of any thing to his Soldiours. And this was the reaſon, why the Emperour Theodoſius thought him meete and neceſſary, to be neere the perſon of Valentinian, to ioyne the grauity of his manners, and carriage of life, with his owne, and faſhion them with his yong yeares, to make him a Prince perfect and compleate, when he ſhould become an aged man; but he neuer attained thereto.

Arbogaſtes growneth ambitious againſt his Maſter the Emperour Valentinian.

Becauſe Arbogaſtes, hauing all the neceſſary vertues, remarkeable in a worthy Captaine, and had won the praiſe and honor to be ſuch a man: he ſuffered himſelfe to be led by idle opinions, and ſurprized with ambition, of attaining (one day) to the Empire. So ſaith Sulpitius Alexander, in his fourth Book. For he began to trouble the calme quietneſſe of the Eſtate in Gaule, hauing procured the Emperour his Maiſter Valentinian, to be lockt vp in his Pallace at Vienna (in Daulphine) and brought him to ſuch tearmes, and deſperate condition, as to be depriued of the Empire. For the charges of the warres being in the hands of the Romaine Legiona, and all Offices (as well of peace as warre) giuen by Arbogaſtes, and as himſelfe pleaſed; Valentinian was onely Emperour in name, but his Conſtable in effect. And the whole State being being at his command: of all them that had taken the Oath of fidelity to the Emperour, there was not one that durſt ſhew himſelfe familiar and friendly, or obedient to whatſoeuer he commanded. Nullus ex omnibus Sacramentis militiæ obſtrictis reperiebatur qui familiari Principis ſermoni, aut iuſsis obſequi auderet. Theſe are the words of Sulpitius Alexander.

So that the perſon of the Emperour, and all the occaſions of the Empire, remaining in the power of Count Arbogaſtes: it was very eaſie for him to cut off his Soueraigne, as Zozimus faith in his fourth Booke, and in theſe tearmes.

Arbogaſtes, hauing the whole power ouer the Romaine Horſemen, for which he was moſt conuenient, in regard of his experience in actions of Warre, and being an vtter enemy to Couetouſneſſe: attained to ſuch ſupreame authority, that he carried himſelfe very ſaucily in ſpeeches, and wholly vnſufferable to the Emperour, whom he would taunt and cenſure in his meaneſt actions, appointing quite contrary to whatſoeuer he commanded. Which Valentinian being vnable to endure, grew diſpleaſed many times againſt him; but without aduantage, becauſe Arbogaſtes had all the Romaine Armie on his ſide. Vpon a day, as the Emperour ſate in his Throne, he beheld Arbogaſtes paſsing by before him, whoſe boldneſſe and vnreuerent behauiour, he being no longer able to ſuffer: as he went by, he thruſt into his hand a countermand, whereby he tooke from him the charge and dignity of Conſtable, and of Coloncll of the Romaine Legions. Arbogaſtes hauing read the countermand, rent it in pieces, and trampled it vnderneath his feete, ſaying to the Emperour: That hee did not hold any of thoſe Offices of him, and therefore he could not take them from him. From that day forward, falſe reports being carried betweene them, each of them ſtood vpon his Guard; but the ſtronger ſtill fell to Arbogaſtes. Who cauſed the Emperour to be ſtrangled, and afterward faſtened his body to a Iibbit, as if he had bin the hangman of himſelfe. So writeth that excellent Father of knowledge and learning Saint Hierome, in his Third Epiſtle. Adoleſcens Valentinianus, & bene puer, poſt fugam, poſt exilia, poſt recuperatum multo ſanguine Imperium, haud procul ab Vrbe, mortis Fraternæ conſcia, (for of two Brothers the eldeſt was ſlaine at Lyons, and the yonger at Vienna) necatus eſt, & cadauer exanime ſuſpendio infamatum. And this cauſed many Hiſtorians to write, that this Emperour was ſtrangled by himſelfe, impatient of the rude and intollerable wrongs, which he ſuſtained by his Conſtable Arbogaſtes.

A ſubiect ouerbold and ſaucie with his Soueraigne.

And eſpecially Sigibert, who ſetteth downe the vntimely death of that yong Emperour, of great hope, and very peaceable nature (as Saint Ambroſe writeth in the Funerall Oration for this Prince) in the yeate three hundred foureſcore and ſixteene. Valentinianus Imperator nimia auſteritate Arbogaſtes Magiſtri militum ad vitæ tedium perductus, laqueo vitam finiuit. An errour in the circumſtanee of his death, and alſo in the date of time: becauſe he dyed in the yeare of Grace, three hundred foureſcore and twelue, the day before the Eeue of Pentecoſt, in the Conſulſhip of the Emperour Arcadius (for the ſecond time) and of Ruffinus, according to the Conſularic Faſts.

Arbogaſtes, to couer his villanie, aduanced (by little and little) to the Empire, a certaine man named Eugenius, to reigne in effect, but as his ſubſtitute to vſe command. Eugenius auxilio Arbogaſtis tyranniſat; So ſpeaketh Sigibert, purſuing the end of Valentian. Adding withall, that in the yeare three hundred foureſcore and ſeauenteene, the Emperour Theodoſius the Great, exterminated both theſe Tyrants, and dyed immediately after. Theodoſius Eugenium, & Arbogaſtem in Bello perimit, & ipſe non multo poſt obyit. Poſt quem filij eius Arcadius & Honorius, imperant annis tredecim.

Claudian enſtructeth vs, that this Eugenius was one of the Houſhold of Count Arbogaſtes, in the Panegyricke for the third Conſulſhip of the Emperour Honorius.

Proh! crimen Superûm, longi proh dedecus æui:
Barbarus Heſperias exul poſſederat oras,
Sceptraque deiecto dederat Romana clienti.

And at the fourth Conſulſhip of the ſame Honorius.

Hinc ſibi Germanus famulum delegarat exul.

Theſe

The singular wisedome of the Emperour Theodosius.

These men to maintaine themselues in their tyrannie, and sound the secrets of the Emperour Theodosius the Great, sent Ambassadours to him: but he kept them some time, without admitting them audience, and onely shewed them a muster of his potent Armie, and would not giue them any other answere. Arbogastes and his fellow Tyrant issuing forth of Millaine, to hinder the Emperour Theodosius from passing the Alpes, who marched in person to the warre, hauing vnder him Stilico, husband to his Niece Serena, and other great Commanders in warre: when they arriued at those Mountaines, and being not so strong as the enemy; Theodosius prepared himselfe to Prayer, by the example of Moyses, and God gaue him the victory (famous for the Miracles described by Claudian) albeit he was an Idolater. As we reade in the Panagyricke, for the third Consulship of the Emperor Honorius, where speaking of the victory giuen to Theodosius, he saith

O nimiùm dilecte Deo, cui fundit ab antris
Æolus armatas hyemes, cui militat æther,
Et coniurati veniunt ad classica venti.

The Tyrant Eugenius was brought bound fast and mannacled, to Theodosius, who pronounced the sentence of death vpon him, But as for Arbogastes, hauing bin two whole dayes in flight, full of furie, rage and despaire; he slew himselfe with his owne Sword and Ponyard, as is verified by Claudian in the place before alleadged.

At ferus inuentor scelerum traiecerat altum
Non vno mucrone latus, duplexque tepebat
Ensis, & ultrices in se conuerterat iras.

A plaine contradiction of Sigibert.

This victory happened in September, the yeare of Grace three hundred fourescore and foureteene, and not seauenteene as Sigibert saith) then being Consuls the Emperors Arcadius for the third time, and Honorius the second time.

Before this Battaile, the tyrant Eugenius (by the counsell of Arbogastes) would haue made the French afraid, but obserue what Sulpitius Alexander saith. Eugenius hauing prepared his Armie, resolued to crosse the Rhine, to the end, to make a muster or shew of such forces, as he had at his command of barbarous Nations, as the Almans and French, to whom the Kings were at all times allied, and confederates together: but he did not make his passage.

The quiet continuance of the French.

So the French continued in quietnesse, after the alliance and peace, which the Count Arbogastes made with them, till after the death of the Emperor Theodosius the Great, happening at Atillane, the sixteenth of the Calends of February, the yeare of Grace three hundred fourescore and sifteene, in the Consulship of the two Brethren Olybrius and Probinus.

The Empires of the East and West deuided betweene the two Sonnes of Theodosius.

Theodosius left the Empire of the East to his eldest Sonne Arcadius; hauing from the yeare fourescore and eleuen, inuested in that of the West, his yongest sonne Honorius. In whose tender time of yeares, the Alemans and French began againe to moue and stirre: euen as all mischances happen to such Kingdomes, as haue children to be their Kings, for then it is, when euery one will be fishing in troubled waters. Væ Regno cuius Rex puer est, & Principes mane comedunt. So saith the diuine wisedome. In this manner was the Empire of the East troubled, and by the fastious deuises of Ruffinus, to whom Theodosius (going against the Tyrant Eugenius) had giuen the gouernment of the East Empire, and of his two Sonnes. And the subiect of his discontentment, ensued from this, that Theodosius had preferred Stilico with him; as we learne of Claudian, his second Booke In Ruffinum.

Iamque tuis, Stilico, Romana potentia curis
Et rerum commissus apex, tibi credita fratrum Vtraque maiestas, gemminaque exercitus aula.
Ruffinus (neque enim patiuntur saua quietem Crimina, pollutæque negant arescere fauces)

Crimina,

Infandis iterum terras accendere bellis,
Inchoat, & solito pacem turbare tumultu.

And also by another occasion, that, as a signe and noate of especiall fauour, Theodosius had caused the daughter of the said Stilico (named Maria) and of Serena, daughter to the Brother of the said Theodosius, to be affianced to his yongest Sonne, and he to wed her, so soone as he should come to the age of foureteene yeares, as he did in the yeare of Grace three hundred fourescore and eighteene, in September. The said Honorius being Consull the fourth time, with Eutichianus, as Claudian informeth vs, as well in the Panegyricke of the said Consulship, as the Epithalamium for the said Honorius; who in the yeare before named, and in the said moneth of September entred into the foureteenth yeare of his age.

So soone as the newes were certainely knowne, concerning the death of Great Theodosius; as suddenly were the Alemans and French in the Field, to repasse the Rhine, and seeke their further fortune in Gaule. To stay their forwardnesse, Honorius the Emperour of the East (who, as we haue already said, had Africa, Italie, Spaine, England and Gaule in partage) presently sent away Stilico, who in the same yeare three hundred fourescore and fifteene, reassured the frontiers of Rhine, which he viewed and visited from the very originall and spring thereof (and which beginneth within the very high Alpes, neere to the Episcopall Citie of the Grisons, called Curia Rhetorum, issuing forth of a Mountaine named Adula by Strabo) so farre as to the Ocean, so saith Claudian in the Panegyricke for the third Consulship of Honorius, happening in the yeare three hundred fourescore and sixteene, hauing for companion his brother Arcadius, Consull the fourth time. In the which voyage, he saith, that the Kings of the Alemans and French, came and did him honour, laying downe their Armes, to the end they might haue peace with him. This was the first militarie expedition of Stilico, against the Nations (enemies to the Romaine Empire) in the West, exalting themselues as foes to his Maister Honorius. According to the testimonie of the Poet Claudian, who noateth that voyage with these perticularities.

The first voyage of Stilico against mutinous Nations in the West.

Hunc tamen in primis populos lenire feroces,
Et Rhenum pacare iubes: Volat ille citatis
Vectus equis: nullaque latus stipante caterua,
Aspera indiferas qua Rhetia porrigit Alpes,
Pergit, & hostiles (tanta est fiducia) ripas
Incomitatus adit, totum properare per amnem.

So that this first voyage of Count Stilico, was but to take knowledge of the enemy, whose designes he wisely preuented, as alwayes it behoueth a valiant Leader in warre to doe. For without the attendants of an Armie, which neuer walketh but by counted steps; Stilico, with his presence onely, secured the frontiers of the Rhine, and gaue the Alemans and French Kings, sufficient breathing to embrace peace, thereby to salue them anew, by comming themselues to moue it on this side the Rhine.

The very presence of Stilico dreadfull to his enemies.

——— Segnique verenter
Ostendisse mora transiecti lintribus amnem.

And againe.

Attonitos Reges humili ceruice videres
Ante ducem nostrum: Flauam sparsere Sicambri

Imploratque tuum supplex, Alemannia, nomen.

And discyphering the Aleman people, which performed homage to him, he saith

Basternæ venere truces, venit accola syluæ

Bructherus

Bructherus Hercinię, latisque paludibus exit
Cymbrus, & ingentes Albim liquêre Cheruſci,

The Oſtrogothes poſſeſſed themſelues of Prouinces belonging to the Romaine Empire.

This thorne taken thus forth of Honorius his foote, Stilico with his Armie paſſed into Greece, to fight againſt the Oſtrogothes; who, by intelligence from the Count Ruffinus, were ſeiſed on prouinces ſubiected to the Romaine Empire. Alſo by other intelligence from the ſame Ruffinus, the two Conſtables, Gaines of the Eaſt, and Stilico of the Weſt, were conſtrained to leaue the buſineſſe, without doing any thing, which coſt the life of Ruffinus: who to vſurpe the Eaſterne Empire, had formerly raiſed vnknowne people, inhabiting vnder the North climate, in the Mariſhes of Meotides, and in Pannonia, as Claudian ſaith in his firſt Booke.

Iam gentes, Iſtrum mouet, Scythiamque receptat
Auxilio: traditque ſuas hoſtilibus armis
Reliquias: mixtis deſcendit Sarmata Dacis,
Et qui compedes in pocula vulnerat audax
Maſſagetes; patriumque bibens Mœotium Alanus.
Membraque qui ferro gaudet pinxiſſe Gelonus,
Ruffino collecta manus.

Ruffinus ſlaine by the Romain Armie neere to Conſtantinople

But Ruffinus liued not to enioy all theſe match-makings of his treacheries; becauſe he was ſlaine neere to Conſtantinople (the fift of the Calends of December, in the yeare three hundred foureſcore and fifteene) by the Romaine Army, which he had delaied and hindred from fighting.

Gildonus proclaimed himſelfe Emperor.

Now, in the yeare of Grace three hundred foureſcore and eighteene, Honorius being Conſull the fourth time, with Futychianus: the Gouernour of Affrica, named Gildonus, cauſed himſelfe to be proclamed Emperour, he reuolting from Honorius; who forthwith ſent Stilico againſt him, and who, after ſome encounters, taught him to vnderſtand reaſon. Claudian deſcribing this warre of Affrica, ſaith:

Poſt domitas Arctos alio prorumpit ab axe
Tempeſtas: & ne qua tuis intacta trophęis
Pars foret, Auſtralis ſonuit tuba. Mouerat omnes Mauſorum Gildo populos.

Gildonus ſtrangled himſelfe in Sicilie.

But this new vpſtart Traytour, was paid with coyne of the ſame ſtampe, as is onely currant and due to ſuch, as are fellons and Traytours to their Prince. For he ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by Sea, the windes proued ſo contrary to him; as, after their impetuous ſeruice, in driuing on, and returning him backe againe, out of one tempeſt into another: he landed in Sicilie, where he hanged himſelfe, feering to fall into his enemies hands, who afterward cut off his head, as it is auouched by Claudian.

Agnouitque nouos abſens Arethuſa triumphos,
Gildonis ſenſit teſte cruore necem.

The titles of honor giuen to Stilico.

During this warre in Affrica, which tooke an indifferent long continuance; the French in the abſence of Count Stilico, Conſtable and Colonell of the Romaine Armie (for he was knowne by theſe titles of honor and preheminence: Stilico, vir Illuſtriſſimus, Magiſter Equitum, & Peditum, Comes Domeſticorum, & Tribunus Prætorianorum) began to vndertake their wandrings againe, for paſſing the Rhine, and robbing the Gaules, as they did vnder the conduct of their King Marcomir. So that at returne from the Affricane warre, Stilico was conſtrained to refreſh his Armie ſome few dayes in Italie, and afterward tooke his way towards Gaule: where he fought with the Alemans, conioyned with the French, and gaue them a great ouerthrow; in the Ides of Iune, the yeare of Grace three hundred foureſcore and nineteene, Manlius Theodorus bing then Conſull. For the Conſularie Faſtes beare no name, of an abhominable Eunuch, named Flauius Eutropius, ſtrangled for his vile extorting concuſſions: As Claudian obſerueth in, the Panegyricke, ſpoken to the ſaid Conſull Theodorus.

Stilico tooke priſoner Marcomir King of the French.

Stilico paſſed the Rhine, ſtill purſuing on his Conqueſt, and at the retraite of the Alemans and French: he entrapped Marcomir, King of the French, whom he made his war-priſoner, and then ſo boldly followed on the troupes of the French, that he compelled the reſt to pleade for agreement, and deſire peace with ſuch conditions, as ſhould be pleaſing to the vanquiſher. Stilico ordered his victory, by command from the Emperour Honorius his Sonne in lawe; made peace with them, impoſing for Tribute on the French, that he knew them good Souldiours, and a certaine number muſt be taken from among them, to ſerue in the Romaine Armies; with expreſſe charge, to liue thenceforward in quietneſſe, without making any foradgings on the Rhines frontiers. According to that which Claudian ſaith:

——— Cum forte decorus
Cum Stilicone, Gener, pacem implorantibus vltro
Germanis reſponſa dabat, legeſque Chaucis
Arduus, & ſtauis ſignabat iura Sueuis.
His tribuit leges, his obſide foedera ſancit
Indicto, bellorum alios tranſcribit in vſus,
Militet vt noſtris detonſa Sicambria ſignis?

In two words he expreſſeth the Alemans, by the name of Sweues; and the French by that of the Sicambrians, as we haue related already.

Stilico leadeth Marcomir priſoner.

Stilico hauing left good Garriſons, for defending the Rhines frontiers, and receiued the hoſtages: tooke his way to Millaine, leading along with him Marcomir, King of the French, whom he ſent priſoner to Sienna in Italie, where he ended his life. So ſoone as he was departed thence, King Sunno, brother to Marcomir, and his ſucceſſour; would needes make head againe, as endeauouring to recouer his Brother, taking (by way of reprifall) certaine Townes of the Romans. But he was ſlaine by the French themſelues, who would keepe the peace ſworne to the Romans, and (thereby) made meanes for recouery of their King. The end of theſe two Brethren Kings, is liuely deſcribed by Claudians.

Sunno, brother to Marcomir, ſlaine by the French.

Regia Romanus diſquirit crimina carcer;
Marcomirus, Sunnoque docent, quorum alter Etruſcum
Pertulit exilium: quem ſe promitteret alter
Exulis vltorem, tacuit mucrone ſuorum.
Res auidi conſcire nouas odioque furentes
Pacis & ingenio ſcelerumque cupidine Fratres.

And, after their deaths, the French were ſeauenteene yeares without any Kings, being then gouerned by Dukes onely.

After the ſecond voyage of Stilico, both Alemagne and French were (for a time) ſo encreaſed and tranquile; as, without any damage, a man might trauaile thorow them, as Claudian ſaith. The Rhine, being (before) furious, and and ſwarming with armed troupes; was become like an vnhorned Stagge.

——— Rhenumque minacem

Vt Saltus iam rura colat, ſtexoſque Sicambri
In falcem curuent gladios.

It ſeemed, that they had vtterly forſaken the actions of warre, to vndertake the ſickle and Scith, addicting themſelues to husbandry. For they of the firſt and ſecond Germany, freely paſſed the Rhine with their Flockes and Heards; to let them feede at the Mountaines of France and Alemagne.

Geminasque viator
Cum videat ripas, quæ sit Romana requirat,
Vt iam trans fluuium, non indignante Chaico,
Pascat Belga pecus, mediumque ingressa per Albim, Gallica Francorum montes armenta pererrent.

The same Poet in the Epithalamium of the Empresse Marie, wife to the Emperour Honorius, and daughter to Count Stilico, telleth her; that Thence-forward, she might walke thorow Alemagne and France, without any euill encounter.

——— Iam Rhenus, & Albis
Seruiet, in medios ibis, Regina Sicambros.

The Empire of the West being thus calme and tranquile, Stilico, who had neuer bin Consul: was chosen the first day of the Serculare yeare foure hundred, with Aurelianus. Claudian, in the second Panegyricke, spoken to the said Stilico, maketh Rome to speake in this manner.

Qui mihi Germanos solus, Francosque subegit
Cur nondum legitur Fastis?

Because he sought to make the Westerne Empire in peaceable condition.

——— Nullus Boreæ metus: omnis & Austri
Ora silet: cecidit maurus Germania cessit:
Et tanum pax alta legat, te Consule.

But this peace (not long after) was molested by the practises and factions of the same Stilico, to make Eucherius his Sonne Emperour, and played at spoile-King with Honorius.

Stilico, conspireth against Honorius his Lord.

For, hauing bin created Consull (the second time) with Anthemius, in the yeare of Grace foure hundred and fiue: he practised with strange Nations, and namely the Gothes, then holding Greece and part of Thrace, that they should come thundring into Italie: As afterward they did, vnder conduct of their King Alaricus. In the meane while (on the other side) the Alans, Scythians and Vandales, with the Bourgongnons and other Nations of the North, prepared themselues, to goe take their share of the Gaules, neuer to part thence: which they did, onely to please Stilico, a Vandale by Nation.

Alaricus Kig of the Gothes inuadeth Italy by the meanes of Stilico.

Alaricus comming into Italie, by practise and intelligence with him, in the yeare foure hundred and sixe: Stilico, that he might giue freer passage to the Northerne Nations; leueied the companies which guarded the Rhines frontiers, and caused them to come into Italie, as Claudian saith.

Agmina quin etiam Flauis obiecta Sicambris
Quæque domant Castos, immansuetosque Cheruscos
Hue omnes uertere minas, tutumque remotis
Excubys Rhenum solo terrore reliquit.

Now during the time that Alaricus tooke and sacked Rome, making himselfe rich with the spoyles thereof, and all his Armie (this surprizall happened the ninth of the Calends of September, in the yeare of Grace foure hundred and ten, Varanes being then alone Consull of the East, created by the Emperour Arcadius, for Honorius did nothing in the West, but expected what should become of the Siedge of Rome) the two Kings of Alemagne, Goarus and Respendialus, coueted to passe the Rhine, to infest Gaule with their Armies. But he first ranked himselfe on the side of Honorius (Stilico and his Sonne Eucherius, conuinced both of fellonie and treason, were slaine by the Romaine Armie, in the yeare foure hundred and eight) the other King, named Respendialus, was constrained to make his retreat, and to forsake the frontiers of the Rhine.

Goarus and Respendialus Kings of Alemagne.

The death of Stilico and his Sonne Eucherius.

In the yeare foure hundred and ten, the Vandales would plant themselues in Gaule, and in passing on the way, forradged the Lands of the French: but because they could winne passage no where else, they were well beaten in three or foure encounters. And in one of them, their King Godegisilus was slaine in the field, with twenty thousand of his people, perishing by the edge of the Swords of the French. So that the Vandales had bin quite foyled, if the Alanes (who came in the time of greatest neede) had not brought succour, and passed the Riuer of Rhine with the same company. Thus are we instructed by the Historian Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus, and reported by S. Gregory of Tours.

The yeare foure hundred and eleuen, vnder the Consulship of the Emperour of the East Theodosius the yonger, the fourth time (without any Consull in the West, being ouerwhelmed with miseries) a man named Constantine, of a simple Souldiour, as he was no more, being exalted Emperor by the Garrisons of England (at such time as Alaricus desquieted Italie) sought also make himselfe Maister of Italie, as he had already done of the Gaules, England and Spaine: the Regencie of which Prouince hee had giuen to his Sonne Constantius, whom hee had likewise proclaimed his Companion in the Empire: So, saith Sozomenus in his ninth Booke.

Constantine a silly Souldiour made Emperour.

Constantius being come from Spaine, where he left his wife, and all his furniture at Sarragossa (the Capitall Citie of Arragon) and for his Lieutenant one named Gerontius: hee went to parlee with his Father at Arles in Prouence, vpon the subiect for his voyage into Italie. Both of them agreed in one opinion, and perceiuing, that in Italie none would stirre against them: Constantine giue himselfe to all dissolute courses of life, and aduised his Sonne, to returne backe againe into Spaine, hauing to guide and conuoye him, taken certaine troupes of well appointed Souldiours, to make way before him, while as yet he remained with his Father. He receiued newes from Spaine, that Gerontius had caused to be proclaimed Emperour, one (named Maximus) of his most intimate and endeared friends, who kept his Imperiall seate at Tarragona in Catalogna, and prepared a potent Armie composed of strange Nations) for his descent into Gaule, going desperately onward, to besiedge Constantine in Arles, and his Sonne at Vienna.

Constantius the Sonne of Constantine gouerning in Spain.

One vsurper striueth in Armes against another.

The Tyrants Father and Sonne, being thus summoned to the Trompets sound; speedily dispatched away Edolegus or Edobeccus, a Duke of the French, into Alemagne and France, to deriue succour from those Nations.

But during these entercourses, another Captaine, belonging to the Emperour Honorius (Father of Valentinian, who was third Emperour of that name) and his Lieutenant Decimus Rusticus, Maister of the Offices, and conductors of a puissant Armie, consisting of French and Alemanes (that of the French, was led by two of their Dukes, called Marcomir and Ingomer, Brethren) descended from Italie into Gaule, and went to besiedge the Tyrant Constantine within the Citie of Arles, before which Gerontius had already held some moneths siege. But constrained to raise it, by the Armie of Honorius, which drone the other into disorder: hee made his retraite in all haste towards Spaine, where hee was slaine by his owne Souldiours, who held him in contempt, by reason of his flight.

A third Captaine sent from the Emperour Honorius.

While the Siedge of Arles proceeded on, Constantius was aduertised, that Edobeccus Duke of the French (so Frigeridus calleth him, and Sozomenus, from whom we derive this Narration more amply, yea and perticularly, then that which Frigeridus saith) approched neere, with great supply of succour of the Alemans & French, to raise the siedge: Constantius resolued to cut off this succour by the way, & therefore passed the Rhosne, to surprise the fore-goers, ambuscading in a wood part of his people, conducted by Vlphilas his Grand Prouost, as also the French Dukes Ingomer and Marcomir. Duke Edobeccus being (for his part) desirous to fight, hauing past the troupes of Vlphilas, without perceiuing them: came to handy-blowes with Duke Constantius, the encounter waxing very hot. Then Vlphilas with his Horsemen, came to charge vpon this fresh reply, setting on them in the rere, which troubled the ranks, some whereof fairely fled, and the rest yeelded to Constantius. But as for the chiefe Leader Edobeccus, well mounted as he was, he retired to a Gentleman, named Ecdicius, whom he accounted to be his friend, by hauing (formerly) done him many great courtesies: but he in barbarous vnthankfulnes, smote off his head, which he brought to the said Constantius, from whom he expected some great recompence. Constantius tooke the head, and said vnto him, In the Emperours name I giue thee thankes: But presently he dismissed him from his Campe, saying; That he would not haue it sullied, with the company of a man so traiterous, and perfidious.

A note of abhominable ingratitude, & worthily rewarded.

After this ouerthrow, Constantius returned to the Siege of Arles, sending to the beſieged Tyrant, the head of Edobeccus. Conſtantius ſeeing all comfort fled from him, deſpoiled himſelfe of all his Imperiall habits, and fled into a Church, where he was admitted to be a Prieſt. They of the Citie, hauing capitulated for themſelues, opened their Gates to Conſtantius: who reduced the Prouince into the power and obedience of the Emperour his Maiſter, in whoſe name he placed the Gouernors, and then returned into Italie; ſending before him the tyrant Conſtantine, and his other Sonne Iulian, to be preſented to the Emperour Honorius. But they were ſlaine by the way, and their heads cut off vpon the Riuer of Mince, ſo ſaith Prigeridius. Sozomenus onely writeth, that they were put to death, without any notice of the place. And the Spaniſh Prieſt Paulus Orozius addeth thereto, that the Tyrant Conſtantine had taken out of a Cloyſter, his eldeſt Sonne Conſtantius (where he had long time bin a profeſſed Monk) to make him his companion in the Empire. And that God ſuffred the Father and Son (being both ordained Prieſts) thus to be ſlaine and maſſacred; becauſe they preferred earthly Empire, before that which is heauenly.

Arles is deliuered to Conſtantius on the Emperors behalfe.

Difference betweene Authors.

So in the ſame time, and about the ſaid yeare foure hundred and eleuen, an infinite number of Tyrants were cut off by violent deaths: As namely Conſtantine and his yongeſt ſonne in Italie; Conſtantius and Maximus in Spaine; Iouinus and Sebaſtianus; Iouinus his Brother alſo in Italie; Sarus and others in England and in Gaule.

CHAP. VI.

Of King Pharanond: And likewiſe concerning the Salique Lawe.

WE haue heretofore ſeene, how the French were gouerned by their Kings, vntill the yeare of Grace three hundred three ſcore and nineteene: to verifie the ſaying of the noble Romaine Hiſtorian Tacitus, ſpeaking of the people as well of the higher, as lower Germanie: Semper apud vos Bella, Regeſque fuere, donec in ius noſtrum conſederetis. Which will ſerue to contradict ſuch, as (in meere ignorance) haue written, that Pharamond, was the firſt King of the French, and haue ſuppoſed falſities vnder fabulous names, inuented at mens pleaſures, to be deriued out of Dauids Pſalmes, Og, Bazan Regem.

Marcomir (Couſin to the laſt Kings Marcomir and Sunon, iſſued and deſcended from Richimer, brother to King Merobaudes) iuſtly afflicted, becauſe thoſe of his Nation rendered themſelues mercenarie to the Romaines, alwayes weakening them by one meanes or other; inſtead of compoſing a body together; and forming it into an aſſured eſtate on the Gauliſh Lands, vſurped by the Romaine Emperors (as Nations further off from them, made apparant by their example) declared to the French (being aſſembled in the open fields, to hold their eſtates according to their auncient cuſtome) theſe or the like ſpeeches.

Elſewhere called Mellobaudes.

That it was a ſhame, or rather a misfortune, which ſerued as their ruine, that in the warres with the Romaines; the chiefe and principall perſons among them, tooke contrary parts, either to cut their owne throates, or to periſh by the Romaines Armes. Witneſſe whereof was Ebodichus, traiterouſly maſſacred by his hoſte Ecdicius, and Duke Ingomer, his owne brother, ſlaine at the Siege of Arles. It was therefore moſt expedient, to liue no longer in ſuch confuſion: but rather to conſpire altogether, to the end for creating a King among them, to whom at all times they ſhould ſweare intire obedience, and that vnder his conduct, they might poſſeſſe themſelues of the rich abounding Gaules, whereto their predeceſſours had (from time to time) aſpired, and for their attaining thereto, had ſo often times croſſed the Riuer of Rhine, all ending their liues (by a glorious death) in an enterpriſe ſo honorable; in regard they had now ſuch a time, wherein their ancient enemies, the Romans, knew no longer of what wood to make themſelues Arrowes, or which way to be of any certainty.

The effect of the Oration made by Marcomir to the French.

This councell being allowed for good, all with one voyce and conſent, elected and named for their King, the Sonne of the ſaid Duke Marcomir, and who fought vnder his Father in reſiſtance of the Romaines, which made him famous for valour and height of courage. He called himſelfe Pharamond, which ſignifieth in the Germaine tongue; A true Prince, and one that keepeth his word: Vertues which made him preferrable before all others, and cauſed him to be exalted and carried on a Shield (according to the manner of the French) three ſeuerall times about the whole aſſembly. Varamundus impoſitus Scuto, more Gentis, & ſuccolentium humeris vibratus Rex Francorum eligitur. All the Nations of the French Hanſe, hauing ſworne firmely obedience and fidelity to him (vpon their Armes) conformed themſelues according to the cuſtome obſerued by the ancients of the French.

The election of Pharamond to be King of the French.

The Nations of the French Hanſe.

But in this place (before wee paſſe any further) I would gladly roote vp that falſe opinion, conceiued by too many, and make it apparantly knowne; that long time before this Pharamond: the French had bin gouerned by Kings, famous for vallancie in the Romaine Hiſtories.

The French had Kings long time before Pharamond.

I make not any account at all, of Princes ſpoken of by ſuch as are ignorant in the French Hiſtorie, deriuing them from the aſhes of old Troy. I abhorre and condemne Poeticall fictions, when they ſhall be vſed for the foundation and beginning of a Hiſtory, wherin the horoſcope & natiuitie of Princes of noate, ſhould haue no other guide or direction, but only truth it selfe, testified by such Authours, as couch nothing in their writings, but what they haue seene with their eyes, and not led by heare-say.

What care & reſpect ought to be in a faith-full hiſtorian.

In like manner, I deteſt such as by the selfe-same ignorance, burne day-light with a bead roll of Kings, reported vnder fabulous names, inuented vpon pleasure; as Trithemius hath done, after Hunibald the Lyer, the Belgian Maire, and those of his ranke: I onely honour and esteeme them, that are credibly obserued by the Romane Hiſtories, since the time as the Sicambrians (the famous Ancestors of the French) made themselues dreadfull to the Romanes, vnder the name of French-men, according as the Sueues vnder that of Alemans.

The dignity and maieſty of Hiſtory.

Full well I know that the Romane Geographers Strabo, Tacitus, Suetonius, and diuers other Authors, famous for learning, and especially in Hiſtories, which is (to speake properly) the Regiſter of Immortality, and Mirror of the worlds inconstancy; haue made notable mention of Maroboduus, King of the Sicambrians & Marcomans, acknowledged by Augustus Cæsar. But then to remarke the Kings his Successours; the queſt is obscure, and drowned in the Sea of eternall obliuion. And therefore we purpose to speake of none, but such as wee haue light of, by testimony of our enemies the Romanes themselues, in their Hiſtories and Poesies. Now; among those certaine and assured Kings, which ought to precede Pharamond, I obserue the first to be;

1. Aſcaricus, who commanded ouer the French, in the time of Conſtantine called the Great. The Panegyricke of Nazarius, made and pronounced to the said Conſtantine, enstructeth vs: that the said Aſcaricus, King of the French, and the Prince Regazus, or Radagazus his Brother, were vanquiſhed and ouerthrowne in a foughten battell, by the said Conſtantine at the beginning of his Empire. As much saith Ammianus Marcellinus, Secretary to Iulian the Apoſtata, in his 15. booke. After Aſcaricus and Regazus, succeeded their Cousine.

2. Richimer, King of the French, Father to King

3. Theodomir, surprized and defeated by Iulian the Apoſtata, who sent him prisoner to Rome, with the Queene Aſcila his mother; as we learne by the Hiſtoriographers, Ammianus Marcellinus, Renatus Frigeridus, and S. Gregory of Tours, the most ancient French Annaliſt, in his second booke and ninth chapter of the Hiſtory of France. Theodomir left two sonnes, Mellobaudes and Richimer, 2. of the name; Father to } Marcomir and Ingomer, } Dukes of the French.

4. Mellobaudes, King of the French, in the time of the Emperour Valentinian the first, who knowing the Valour of the said Mellobaudes, sought his friendſhip, and made him Conſull of Rome with him, in the yeere of Grace, 368. as Ammianus Marcellinus affirmeth in the 31. booke of his hiſtory. After Mellobaudes succeeded in the French Kingdome his Sonne.

5. Genebaudes, King of the French in the time of the Emperour Valentinian the yonger, according as it is witnesſed by that bright splendor of the Church, S. Ambroſe Bishop of Millaine, in his 25. Epiſtle. The said Genebaudes left two sonnes, 6 Marciomir and Sunon.

Both of them Kings of the French, in the time of the Emperor Valentinian the yonger, as it is obserued by S. Paulinus, describing the life of S. Ambroſe. These two brethren seeking to continue the purpoſe of their Predeceſſors, Kings Aſcaricus, Richimer and Theodomir, to posſeſſe themselues of the Gaules: were vanquiſhed by the Lieutenant Generall of the Romane Emperour Stilico. Marcomir was confined to Sunon in Thuſcane, and Sunon slaine some few yeeres after by the faction of the Romanes: As it is recorded by Claudian, in the Panegyricke and Tract De Laudibus Stilichonis.

By the death of these two laſt Kings, there was Interregnum or vacancie of Gouernment 17. yeeres, during which time, the French were conducted and ruled by their Princes and Dukes of the line Royall.

Marcomir
And Ingomer.

Brethren, sonnes to Richimer, second of the name, brother to the King Mellobaudes. They were Souldiors in pay to Honorius, Emperour of the Eaſt, in fauour of whom they were preſent with a powerfull Armie, composed of the French, at the siege of the Towne of Arles in Prouence, against the Tyrants Conſtantine and his Sonnes, taken prisoners at the surpriſall thereof; As we finde written by Sozomenus, and S. Gregorie of Tours in their Hiſtories. Marcomir (eldeſt Brother of Ingomer, was Father to 7 Pharamond.

Seauenth (and not first) King of the French, elected in the open field of Wrtzbourg, the first day of May, foure hundred and seauenteene, as Sigibert writeth in his Chronicle: And in the Diet or generall Parlement of the French there aſsembled; then being Conſuls of Rome, the Emperour Honorius the eleuenth time, and Conſtantius (of whom we haue so often made mention in the end of the precedent Chapter) the second time.

From this King Pharamond, the Monarches of France deriue their originall; and of them, they make the moſt Illuſtrious houses of Chriſtendome to be deſcended.

Concerning the eleuation of this Pharamond, as King; the Preface of the Salique Lawe speaketh in this manner. Marcomiris quoque dedit hoc Conſilium Francis, & elegerunt Pharamundum ipſius Filium, & eleuauerunt in Regem ſuper ſe Crinitum.

William the Breton, in the first Booke of his Philippides; that is to say, the life of King Philip Auguſtus, called the Conquerour, and Gods-giſt, saith

Aqua Francigenæ progreſsi cum Pharamundo
Marcomiri genita, quem iam genitor ſuus illis
In regem dederat.

The same Poet, Phyſition in ordenary to King Phillip Auguſtus; and a Monke of S. Denis, the stately Mauſolus or buriall place of the French Kings, speaking concerning the changing the name of Gaule, into that of French, saith:

Et ſic terra fuit Francorum nomine dicta
Francia, cuius erat antiquum Gallia nomen
In qua Regali Pharamundus primus honore, Excluſis penitus Romanis ſuſſit.

The Reigne of Pharamond was foureteene yeares, for he dyed (according to the learned Onuphrius, and other Authors before him) in the yeare of Grace, foure hundred and thirtie: then being Conſuls of Rome, the Emperour Theodoſius the second, for the thirteenth time, and Valentinian, third of the name, the third time.

His ordenary abiding was at the Caſtle of Diſparch, on the frontiers of Thuringe (where the Lands-Grauiat of Heſſenis) as we learne by S. Gregorie of Tours, in the second Booke of the Hiſtorie of France, and the ninth Chapter. But not in Toxandrie, that is to say, the confines of Liege and Brabant, as some haue imagined, who would change the Text of S. Gregorie of Tours: In termin Thoringorum, by setting downe, In termino Throngorum. For Pharamond, and Clodion his sonne, neuer had their setled dwelling, in any other part, but in Thoringe or Thuringe. And the place of their buriall, on the top of the Mountaine called Franckenburge (as one would say, the French-mens Mount, neere to the Forreſt Boucone, planted iuſtly betweene Franconia, Heſſen and Thoringe) where the Kings of the French, Merobaudes, Ingomer, Marcomir, Pharamond and Clodion his son, and Succeſsors had their buriall.

The Mount of the French.

In the yeare of Grace foure hundred twenty two, during the Conſulship of the Emperours Honorius the thirteenth time, and Theodoſius the tenth time: Bonifacius, Count of Affrica (as much to say as Gouernour) a braue and valiant Captaine, Captaine, vpon some discontentment, reported by Saint Prosper of Aquitaine in his Chronicle, forsooke the part of the Emperor Honorius, and made himselfe Master of Affrica, to the great hurt of the Easterne Empire, continually troubled by the death of the Emperour Honorius, hapning the eighteenth of the Calends of September, some hundred twenty three, in the Consulship of Marinianus, and Asclepiodorus. Immediately after whom, one named Ioannes, Notary and Secretary to said Honorius, possessed himselfe of the Empire, and held it vnto the yeere following; when hee was ouercome by Ardaburius, Lieutenant to the Emperour Theodosius, and Valentinian the third made Emperor of the East.

Iohn the Notarie or Secretary attained to the Empire.

During these Commotions in Italie and Affrica, Pharamond resolued to get possession of one part of the Gaules, the very neerest to the hitherside of the Rhine. And thereupon, in the said yeere foure hundred twenty and two, hee sent a puissant Armie to that part of the Rhine, forraging round about the Cities of Treuers, Maguntia, and possessing themselues of Tongres, with other neighbouring places, wherein he planted good Garrisons of Naturall French-men, to inhabit there, as they did, for the better fauouring of such as should passe after them, and for further pursuit of the Conquest.

Pharamond inuaded one part of the Gaules.

It is also recorded in the Romane Histories, that in the yeere of Grace foure hundred twenty foure, then being Consuls the Emperors Theodosius of the East the eleuenth time, and Valentinian of the West: there was some agreement and Treatie of peace, betweene the said Emperour Valentinian the third, and King Pharamond; to whom Valentinian voluntarily acquitted what he had conquered (by the sword) of the Romanes lands, sparing some Territories of his owne in Italie.

A treaty of peace between the Emperour & Pharamond.

Pharamond had quiet enioying of the said conquered Lands, and gaue way to no one for them, vntill the yeere of Grace, foure hundred twenty eight, in the Consulship of Taurus and Fœlix, in which yeere Count Aetius (sent to defend the Gaules) surprized the French in a Towne called Helena, being at a wedding, slaying some part of them, forcing the rest to flight, and carried away the new married wife, with her furniture.

Aetius a famous generall of the Romanes.

We haue formerly obserued, the like act done by Iulian the Apostata. Aetius afterward recouered from the French, what they possessed on the hither side of the Rhine, as we learne by S. Prosper of Aquitaine in his Chronicle, where hee saith. Pars Galliarum propinqua Rheno, quam Franci possidendam acceperant, Aetij Comitis armis recepta est. As much saith Cassiodorus, and the Bishop of Auuergne, Sidonius Apollinaris, in the Panegyricke spoken to Maiorian, noting this surprizall made by the Count Aetius, and these are his owne words:

Pugnastis pariter Francis, qua Clodio patentes
Attrebatum terras peruaserat, hic coëuntes
Claudebant angusta vias, arcuque subactum
Vicum Helenam, flumenque simul subtramite longo
Arcus suppositis trabibus transmiserat agger.

And then followeth,

..... Fors ripa colle propinquo
Carbaricus resonabat Hymen, Scythicisque Choreis
Nubebat Flauo simillis nouanupta Marito.

Now, in the yeere of Grace, foure hundred twenty fiue (wee will no longer count the History of France by the Romane Consulls, which serue but as markes and dates of the yeeres) the French began not to be pollicied by any new Lawes, as if they had formerly liued altogether in Barbarisme: but reformed their owne ancient constitutions newly, and put them into better order, by command of their King Pharamond, a iust Prince and good Iusticer.

No new Lawes ordained among the French, but their owne old.

From all Antiquitie, the principall charges, as well of Peace as Warre, of Iustice and Armes, were held in France by Noblemen onely, without any calling of the Yeomen, or Common kinde of people: as retaining this ancient custome from the Gaules their Ancestors, among whom, Plebs pene seruorum habebatur loco, Quæ per se nihil audebat, & nullis adhibeatur consilio, as Cæsar saith in the first booke of his Bello Gallico. And after King Clouis became a Christian, in the Parlements of France held two seuerall times in the yeere, there entred none but the Prelates and Nobles; who likewise had their Prelatures. Nor speech was made of the third estate, till after the Nobilitie had preferred Ignorance with Vertue, and made a Trophie of it.

Wherefore, to collect the ancient Lawes of the French into one Code; Pharamond gaue order to foure principall Lords of Franconia, Wisogast, Bodogast, Sologast, and Widogast, Superintendents of Iustice. These men met together three sundry daies of Parliament, in the Seigneuries whereof they bare the names, as Solohaim, Bodohaim, and Widohaim, and couched them downe in writing, in the auncient Germaine language.

The ancient French Lawes collected into one Code.

Pharamond did nothing, but added the 6. Paragraphe, at the Title of Aleudes, or Franchise, which is the threescore and second of the Salique Law, according whereto, the successions of the Fiefs and Franc-Aleu d' or High Iurisdiction, held without homage, fealty, fine, or seruice, were ruled. And heere you may see the Paragraphs of this Title.

Paragraphs of the Salique Law.

1. The Frenchman (Homo Francus) chancing to dye without an Heyre masle, the Father and Mother suruiuing, shall succeed in the Seigneury which he held.

2. If the Father and Mother are deceased before, and the defunct hath brothers and sisters left; the Brothers shall succeed in the said Seigneuries.

3. And where there are no Brethren at all, the Sisters by the Fathers-side shall inherit them.

4. And in defect of them, those by the Mothers-side.

5. And if there be neither Sisters by Father nor Mother, nor Brothers by Father nor Mother, at the day of the Franc-Mans death; the feodale succession shall belong to the very neerest kinsman of the Fathers side.

6. But concerning lands conquered by the French Saliens, and wonne with the Sword: Women cannot succeed in the totall, nor in the meanest part or portion of them; but they shall intirely appertaine to the masles, and from Lance to Lance, without falling vnto the Distaffe.

De Terra vero Salicâ Nulla Portio Hæreditatis Mulieri Veniat: Sed ad Virilem Sexum Tota Terra Hæreditas Perueniat.

Thus you see the fundamentall Law of the Kingdome of France, the most famous of Christendome; which admitteth none but Masles to the Crowne thereof; it excludeth women, and the Masles descending of them.

The Salique Law admits no women to the Crowne.

But for better vnderstanding the subiect of this Ordinance, and what is meant by the Salique Land: it behoueth to know, that Pharamond hauing begun the Conquest of the Gaules; to animate further the courage of his people, and for a firme continuance, would needs appoint, that those lands should be in Franc-Aleud, or Free Iurisdiction (a tearme which is yet to this day in vse of that Antiquity, Francorum Allodium) that is to say; they were held by the Cheualiers of that Conquest in full exemption, as relying vpon God onely, and their swords.

Lands of free-hold, & without controule.

And forasmuch as among the Nations of the French Hanse, the French Saliens were the apt est to Armes, and most ready in seruices for their Kings: To honor them, Pharamond ordained, that all that which they had won in Gaule, should be named Salique Land. Imitating the Romanes in this point, according as in many other, among whom, the lands conquered from their enemies, were distributed, parted, and diuided to the Souldiours of the old Bands, and others, who were present at the Conquest of them, and so appointed as their recompences.

Salique Land so named of the French Salians.

Tacitus in his Germania, calleth Decumates agros, Lands vsed by the Gaules beyond the Rhine, and the large Danubius. Those Lands of nouell Conquests, being Frontiers and Limitrophing on enemies, were consequently subiect to courses and robberies, and which smelt (according as we vse to say) first of all the Canons powder, and therefore were left to the naturall inhabitants of those places, by the War-like Conquerors, to till and husband them, at the charge of Champart or Field-rent. And in this regard they were called Agri Decumates, of the tithe which they payed as a dutie, to the Lord of the soyle, and of the Fee.

Agri Decumates, turned Fields.

Such

Such Lands neuer fell to the Distaffe, but alway from Lance to Lance, Nunquam a Lancea transibat ad fusum. Nay moreouer, if the male of the Lords of Conquest were vncapable to make profession of Armes; by right of reuersion, those Lands returned to the Prince, who eythet kept them, or else inuested some other in them, by right of kissing his hand onely, or as his Liege-man.

This is that which Lampridius obserueth in the life of his Emperor Alexander. Ea quæ de hostibus capta sunt, Limitaneis Ducibus, atque militibus donauit, ita vt hæreditaria essent, si hæredes militarent, nec vnquam ad priuatos peruenirent. Addidit hic animalia, & seruos vt possent colere quod acceperant.

And Procopius, in his first booke of the Vandales Warres, writeth that Giserich being gone out of Spaine into Affrica, and hauing conquered a part thereof; diuided it betweene his two sonnes, Honoricus and Gensonius: Theodatus his yongest sonne being deceased without children. And as for the best Lands, Houses, & Cattell, hauing taken them from the vanquished Affricans; hee made partage and deuision of them to the Captaines that had borne him company ouer the Seas. So that those Lands (saith this Author) did afterward beare name of the partage, and of the lotte of the Vandales, Κλῆροι Βανδίλων καλοῦνται: Sortes Vandalorum. And so the lands conquered from the Romane Empire by the Ostrogothes of Italie, and Wisigothes of Spaine, are tearmed in their Lawes, Sortes Gothica, and by way of Brauado to the vanquished, Sortes Romana.

The Lot or portion of the Vandales.

So by the example of Procopius, and other Historians of ancient knowledge, the Alemans which haue written of the French Monarchie; baptised with the name of Decimes Saliques, all that extendure of the Countrey conquered by the Kings thereof, as well from the bankes of the Rhine, as on this side, and beyond the Alpes and Pyreneans.

Decimes Saliques, the Country so named of Conquest.

Women then, by the ancient Law of the French Salians, as also the Ribarols, the very neerest to the Rhine; succeeded (by defect of Heyres masles) in the Fiefs or Fees seated as well in Franconia, wonne without striking one blow (as we haue already said before) as in Sicambria. But in those of Conquest, they had nothing to meddle with them: and the reason is, because they are not capable of taking vp the Gadge of Battell, to beare a Banner, and to march vnder it, for the command of men; to whom they ought to be obedient, by order of nature, as also right Diuine and humane.

Women vncapable to inherit Lands of Conquest.

It hath beene practised at all times, among the Nations of greatest fame, that women neuer had any command. Eumonius, King of Sparta dying, left his kingdome to his Sonne Polydectes, who deceased also without heyres masle liuing, onely hee had two daughters, so that (by right) his brother Lycurgus came to the kingdome. He vnderstood within a while after, that the widdow to his brother was great with childe, and being deliuered of a sonne named Charilaus, which signifieth Ioy of the people; hee caused him to be acknowledged for King, giuing him the Gouernment, and the Regencie to his Mother, setting the Crowne vpon his head.

The truly noble minde of Licurgus.

The Empire of the Romanes was neuer held, or commanded by Women. Aristotle, the Genius of Nature, in the second book of his Politiques, and ninth Chapter, telleth vs: That there were some People valiant & courageous, gouerned and commanded by women, Qui sexum in Imperijs minime discerunt (as Tacitus speaketh for them of Great Britaigne:) But he excepteth the Gaules, vnder whom hee comprehendeth the people of Alemane, generally acknowledged by the appellation of Celtes, Κελτοί. They reiected the command of women, ἀκούω Κελτοὺς μὴ γυναικοκρατουμένους διὰ τοῦτο μᾶλλον ἀνδρεῖους εἶναι: Celtas non imperari a Mulieribus, saith the same Aristotle elsewhere: and here obserue out of his Politicks before alleadged. Ὥστε ἀναγκαῖον ἐν τῇ τοιαύτῃ πολιτείᾳ τιμᾶσθαι τὰ θήλεα τῶν ἀρρένων, ἄλλως τε κἂν τυγχάνωσι γυναικοκρατούμενοι, παθάπερ τὰ πολλὰ τῶν στρατιωτικῶν ἐθνῶν γένη, ἔξω ΚΕΛΤΩΝ, ἢ καὶ εἴ τινες ἕτεροι φανερῶς τετιμήκασι τὴν πρὸς τὰς ἄρρενας συνουσίαν.

It cannot otherwise happen in such a politique gouernment, where wealth and all the blessings of Fortune cannot be in any request; and principally, if men be subiected to the Empire and command of Women, as there be too many worthy and warlike Nations that are, the Celtes excepted, &c.

The Sacred Lillies of France neuer stouped to the Distaffe. To that blessed Monarchie may be appropriated (by good and iust cause) the saying of the diuine Wisdome in Saint Mathew: Considerate Lilia agri quomodo crescunt; Non Laborant: Neq;

Mat. 6.28.

Nent. The Lillies of the French field cannot be gathered by a Strangers hand, none but the Princes of the Bloud may haue any power ouer them.

The Salique Law, sole foundation of the Kingdome, excludeth daughters, consequently strange Princes which marry with them: And so Lilia non laborant externorum Principum dominatione. They spinne not, they neuer fall to distaues; The daughters are onely to be seene, and the children descendants of them, can make no pretence by them.

The Salique Law sole foundation of the Kingdome.

And to shew those mens impertinencie, who haue written, that the Salique Law is meerely imaginarie, and not aboue one ancient Author hath made any note thereof; as being onely forged by the French, in fauour of King Philip de Valois, sixt of the name, after the death of King Philip le Long his Cosen, against King Edward of England, before which time, this pretended Salique Law was neuer in practise: It will be approued, that it hath beene many times in vse, vnder the Kings of the first line, as well for generall succesſe of the Crowne of France, as for that of the French Nobilitie in perticular. And therefore it may be very easily knowne, that according to the Salique Law, daughters may and ought to succeed (for default of heyres male) in the Seigneuries and Knights fees comming by descent, as heyre-loomes, that is to say, Purchases or Proprieties from the father and grandfather, and such is the generall custome of the Kingdome.

Obiections against the Salique Law.

Proued vnder the Kings of the first line.

Lands made hereditary from the Father & Grandfather.

But according to the exception specified in the Salique Law, as being the fundamentall conseruatrix thereof; they cannot succeed in all, nor in part of the inheritances and demeanes of the sacred Crowne of France: then consequently, by extreame ignorance in the rights thereto belonging (as wee shall more at large shew in the fourth booke) the Counties of Flanders and Artois, and other of the same nature, being great Fiefes or inheritances of France; ought not to passe, or be from the Lance to the Distaffe, and so (to no purpose) the generall custome of Fiefes be preferred to particulars, which is the Law Salique, and so to be trampled on, to the detriment of the Kingdome.

Appertaining to the Crown of France.

S. Gregory of Tours sheweth vs, that the daughters of Kings of the first line, were excluded from their succession, although deceasing without heyres masles, and their Paternall kindred preferred before them.

The King of Paris Childebert, first of the name, (sonne to the great King Clouis, who caused the Church of Paris to be builded) had two daughters, Chrodesinda and Chrosberga, by his wife Vulthrogotha; and dying without heyres masle, the said daughters succeeded not in the Kingdom of Paris, but their Vnkle by the Fathers side, King Clotharius, first of the name.

Childebert King of Paris.

Charibert, otherwise called Aribert (of whom the Bishop of Poictiers had sung high praises, while he was of great expectation and hope) King of Paris, sonne to the said Clotharius the first; deceasing without heyres masles, left three daughters: Nigerida, married to the King of Denmarke, Berthefleda and Chradielda. The married, and the two other daughters inherited not any part or portion of the heiredome of their Father; which was partaged or diuided by their paternall Vnkles, Sigibert King of Austrasia, and Chilpericke King of Soissons.

Charibert King of Paris.

Guntran King of Bourgongne, another sonne to the said Clotharius the first, had but one only daughter, called Clotielda, whom he married richly, as well in goods as reuenues of his owne purchasing: but yet she had nothing of his Kingdome, and her Father in his life time, adopted for his sonne and successor in his kingdome of Orleans, his paternall Nephew Childebert, King of Austrasia. He had not any apparance at all, why he should depriue his onely daughter of his Kingdome, if the Law thereof had not beene his hinderance.

Guntran King of Bourgogne

Agathias a Greeke author, who liued in the time of the first Kings forenamed, writeth in his first bookes of the Gothes warres; that Thibauld the onely sonne to Theodebert King of Austrasia, (his seate Royall was at Mentz) succeeded in the said Kingdome, albeit he was very yong in yeeres, and vnder the charge of a Schoole-master. And that the custome of the French was such, as the Kingdome was alwaies held by the masles, succeeding one after another, as well in the direct line as collaterall, for the vtter exclusion of women.

Vnder

Succesion in the second line of Kings, from Father to Son.

Vnder the second line, the Kings succeeded from father to Son, without any changing: but onely vnder Charles the simple, for the yonger gouernment of whom, Eude of Anion, his Tutor and Cousin by the Fathers side, prime Prince of the blood of France, was exalted and sacred King, with consent of the generall Estates of the kingdome. Against this Sacring, Baldwin the yonger, Count of Flanders opposed himself, pretending that the Crowne appertained to him, in right of his mother Madam Iudith of France, Aunt to the said Charles the Simple. By finall sentence of the said Estates, Bauldwin was debouted in his opposition, and payed with such money; That according to the Salique Lawe (fundamentall of the Kingdome) the Crowne of France neuer tooke knowledge of women, nor the descendants of them capable to weare it. So, according to the resolution of the States, Eudes was Sacred and Crowned at Sens, by Gaultier, Archbishop of the place.

Bauldwin Count of Flanders defeated in his purpose.

The Lillies of the sacred Field of France, cannot be gathered by a Strangers hand.

Succesion in the third ligne beginning with Hugh Capet.

Hugh Capet, first King of the third Ligne, reigning happily euen to this present: by another decree of the generall Estates of France, assembled at Noyon, was preferred before Charles, Duke of Lorraine, Sonne and Brother to the Kings of France. Because he the said Charles was a stranger to France, and became a contured enemy to the Kingdome, the rest and quiet whereof hee had many times troubled, taking part with the King of Alemaigne, capitall enemy to the French, and so the said Charles was published vncapable of entertaining the Crowne. On the contrary side, Hugh Capet and his Predecessours, Princes of the blood of France, issued of the same stocke as the Emperour Charlemaigne was, he being in all occurrences, exposed to the perils and hazards of war, for maintaining the Order of the Lillie.

The continuance of the Salique law in the third ligne of Kings.

Vnder the third ligne, the Salique Law was carefully kept. King Lewis Hutin, tenth of the name, King of France and of Nauarre, first of the name, left but one daughter, Madam Ioane of France, in her owne right Queene of Nauarre, and Countesse D'Eureux, in regard of her husband. The Duke of Bourgogne his Vnckle, contested against Philip le Long, that the Crowne of France belonged to the said Ioane, and not vnto le Long. At whose Sacring and Coronation, the said Duke of Bourgongne was an opposite, and Madame Agnes of France, daughter to the King S. Lewis, wife to Robert second Duke of Bourgongne, Grand-parents of the said Ioane. By sentence of the Generall Estates, pronounced by Messire Pierre d' Arablay, Cardinall and Chancellor of France, the said Dukes of Bourgongne, and Madame Agnes were frustrated in their opposition, and intercepted by their appeale, from the sacring of the said le Long, conformably to the Law of the Kingdome.

Successor Imperij Francorum Masculus esto.

The Text of the law for succession.

A Verse sometime painted in Letters of Gold, at the feete of the Image of King Phillip de Valois, in the Pallace at Paris.

Charles le Bel, Brother and succor to the said le Long, being dead, left but one daughter, borne after her Fathers death, Madam Blanch, of France. After the death of the said Charles, his Cousine Philip de Valois came to the Crowne of France, whereto the Princes of the Blood are called, be they an hundred degrees off. Against him rose Edward King of England, third of the name, who pretended right to the Crowne of France, and Regencie of the Kingdome, while Queene Ioane, Widow to the said Charles le Bel, went great with childe, and then his preferrence to the Crowne, if she should be deliuered of a daughter: as it happened two moneths after, by the Posthumus Blanche. For the English King alleadged, that he was Nephew to the three last Kings, dying without heires masle, sonne to Madam Isabell of France, sister to the said Kings, and thereby to be preferred before Phillip de Valois, who was but a Cousine to the deceassed, and further off in degree, then he was.

Edward King of England the 3. claimed the Crowne of France.

Notwithstanding all whatsoeuer his Ambassodours could alleadge and say; the Estates Generall of France (iudging according to the Salique Law) adiudged the Crowne to Phillip de Valois, sixt and last of the name, who with his wife Iane, daughter to Robert, second of the name, Duke of Bourgongne, was Sacred and Crowned at Rheims, by William de Trie, Archbishop there, in the yeare of Grace 1328. on Trinitie Sunday. Their entrance into Paris was more magnificent, then any that formerly erly had beene seene: So saith Froissard, where the curious Reader may more at large e acquainted with the whole Order and Ceremonies.

And thus was this cause adiudged, according to the Salique Law, and custome of the ingdome, as it is written by the Emperour Charles, fourth of the name, and in the hiory of his life. Eodem Anno (the first day of February 1327. the yeeres then began the first day of Aprill, with this distinction, before or after Easter.) Obijt Carolus rancorum Rex, relicta vxore prægnante, quæ filiam peperit. Et cum de consuetudine Regi Filiæ non succedant, prouectus est Philippus Filius Socere mei in Regem Franciæ, quia opinquior hæres erat in linea masculina. But there is a fault in these words, Filius Soceri mei, because of all the daughters to Monsieur Charles of France, Count of Valois Father to the said Philip de Valois King) which were nine in number, there was not ny one of them married to the said Charles of Bohemia, Emperor. Contrariwise, the deest sonne to the said Philip de Valois, named Iohn King of France, in the life time of is Father, had espoused Bonna of Bohemia, daughter to the said Charles fourth Empeour. So that the said King Philip de Valois was brother in Law, according to the orinary form of speaking, and King Iohn his sonne, sonne in Law to the said Emperor; herefore in stead of Filius Soceri mei, we should read Pater Generi mei.

A mistake in the Emperors writing corrected.

Otho Bishop of Frisinghen, issued from the illustrious house of the first Marquesses f Austria writeth: that the French did alwaies liue according to the Salique Lawe, eing the foundation of their Monarchie.

Albert of Strasbourg, saith in his Chronicle, Francia à nullo habetur in feudum, & ullus ei per Lineam Fœmineam succedit. Thus you see examples of three Royall lines, nd testimonies of Authors liuing in the third: now see the second.

The donation made to the Church of Basile by the Emperor Charlemaigne. Insuer in Honica duos mansos, & dimidium præter Salicam Terram de nostra propria manu suam manum, vt iustum est, percepit. Hee gaue the choyce and option to the Lombards, to be gouerned by their owne Lawes, or according to the Salique.

The Emperor Lewis the Meeke, or Debonnaire, reduced the Sol of French money, o twelue Deniers, because vntill his reigne it consisted of forty Deniers, whereof we aue already spoken in the third booke of the Emperors Capitularies at the 30. Title. mnia debita, quæ ad partem Regis solui debent, Solidis duodecim denariorum soluantur, xcepta Freda, quæ in Lege Salica conscripta est, illa eodem solido, quo cetera compositiones olui debent, componatur.

In the fourth booke of the Capitularies ordained by the Emperours, Lewis the Debonnaire, and his Sonne Lotharius, at the Title De solutione & compositione, mention is ade of the Salique Law. Vt omnes solutio, atque compositio, quæ in Lege Salica continetur inter Francos, per duodecim denariorum. solidus componatur, excepto vbi contentio tra Saxones & Frisiones exorta fuerit, ibi volumus, vt quadraginta denariorum quantitatem solidus habeat, quem vel Saxo, vel Frisio ad partem Salici Franci cum eo ligantis soluere debet.

Hinchmarus, Archbishop of Rheims, who liued in the times of these Kings and mperors, Lewis the Debonnaire, Charls the Bauld, & Lewis the Stammerer, in the book hich he wrote concerning the life of S. Rhemigius, speaketh thus: In testamento a Beo Rhemigio condito Lector attendat, quia solidorum quantitas numero quadraginta denariorum computatur, sicut tunc solidi habebantur, & in Francorum Lege Salica continetur. Et generaliter in solutione vsque ad tempora Caroli perdurauit, velut in eius capitulis entinetur. Behold most certaine and assured testimonies of the Salique Law, vnder ings of the second Ligne: now let vs mount and ascend vp to the first.

Clouis the first Christian King, hauing driuen on his Conquests of the Gaules, so arre as the Pyrenean Mountains on the one side, and iustly to the Rhine on the other; auised the ancient Salique Law, to be translated out of high Dutch, into the Latine ongue, to the end that it be vnderstood as well of the Romanes and other Nations, s of the French. And that the said Law might be baptized from the name of Barbaous people, such as were the Bourgongnons, Alans, Sueues, Vuisigothes and Vandals nhabiting the Gaules. Hauing thus conuerted the Salique Law into Latine, Clouis dded thereto many Titles; for order to the said Nations, being obedient to him, and liuing after the Salique Law.

The Salique Law traduced out of the high Germane language into Latine.

King Clouis addeth new titles to the Salique Law.

At the 49. Title, that is to say, of things ſtollen, known & conueyed to a third hande he preſcribed a practick rule, how a man ſhould gouerne himſelfe in ſuch a buſineſſe.

Si quis qui Lege Salica viuit, ſeruum aut ancillam, cabellum, vel bouem, ſeu inmentum, ſeu quamlibet rem ſuam ſub alterius poteſtate agnouerit mittat eam in tertiam manum, & ille apud quem agnoſcitur debet adrahamire (to make oath, and pledge faith, whether he had the thing ill taken, by exchange, or buying) & ſi intra Ligerim, aut Carbonariã ſyluam (that is, the Country of Flanders, and places round neighbouring) ambo manet, & qui agnoſcit, et apud quem agnoſciter, in Noctes quadraginta Placitum faciant.

Example by this of his addition. Theft and robbery.

(all delayes or prolongings of Iuſtice, as well in Gaule as Germanie, are granted and counted by nights, and not by daies) & in ipſo placito quanticumq; fuerint, qui rem in tertiatam (put into a third hand thoſe moueables, as to him tearmed a Guardian, and to ſequeſter for the fruits of contentious benefices) vendiderint, aut cambiauerint (by exchange) aut fortaſſe in ſolutionem dederint, omnes intra placitum iſtum commonean-tur (aſſigned & ſummoned) vt vnuſquiſq; cum negotiatoribus ſuis alter alterum admoneat. Si quis vero commonitus fuerit, & aliqua Sunnis (exoine) eum non detinuerint, & ad placitum venire diſtulerit, tunc ille qui cum eo negotiauit habeat tres teſtes, quod enuntiare ad placitum venire debuiſſet, & alios tres teſtes ſimiliter habeat, quod cum eo publice negotiaſſet: hoc ſi fecere exeat ſe de Latrocinio; ille autem qui admonitus non venerit, ſuper quem teſtes iurauerint, erit Latro illius qui res ſuas agnoſcit, & ei ſecundum Legem ipſas componat, & inſuper pretium reddat qui cum eo negotiauit. Ita omnia vbi ſuus Hemallus (the place and dwelling of Iuſtice) ſuper quem res primitus agnita fuerit, aut interita fieri debent. Quod ſi trans Ligerim, aut Carbonariam manet ille apud quem res agnoſcitur, in Noctibus LXXX Lex iſta cuſtodiatur. There needeth a delay or reſpit of three moneths, for ſuch as dwell beyond the Loire, or the Forreſt Charbonniere.

For Homicids and Manſlaiers.

At the Title of Homicides of Noblemen, which is the 43. Si quis ingenuus Francum, aut hominem Barbarum occiderit qui Lege Salica viuit, &c.

For Sureties called by their Creditors.

At the Title of Sureties (which is that of fooles) the 52. the Creditor cauſing the caution and Surety to be called, whom the Law tearmeth Gaſachionem, the demands thus: Rogo te, Iudex, vt hominem illum Gaſachionem meum qui mihi fidem fecit de debito tali denominato ſecundũ Legem Salicam mihi inde eum adſtringas: wherto the Iudge ſhall anſwer: Ego Gaſichiũ tuũ illum in hoc mallo, ſecundũ qd. Lex Salica habet tibi adſtringo.

For Borrowers & Forfeitors.

At the 45. title, which is of things borrowed, and not rendred backe againe: the ſtile for calling the debtour to Iuſtice is thus: Quia res meas noluiſti reddere quas tibi præſtiti, in hoc eas tene Nocte Proxima (the aſſignation on the morrow) ſecundum quod Lex Salica continet, &c. For it is a matter to be obſerued, that the ſtile of actions of Seizure, Acquitting, Renunciation, Acceptation, Poſſeſſion, Nouell diſſeiſin, and whatſoeuer is to be done in Iuſtice, was vnderſtandingly expreſſed by the Salique Law, with reaſonable delayes or prolongings. Each Style or tearme hauing the proper and ſignificant Epithite; which Clouis, Charlemaigne, Lewis the Debonnaire, and Charles the Bauld, and other Kings haue in their Capitularies, left in the high Dutche Germaine tongue, as elſewhere wee haue ſaid, without permitting any paraphraſeby Latine circumlocution. There are an infinitie of proofes in words naturally French, (beſide them rehearſed in the former alleadged paſſages) as Vueregildum, Fine or Amercement; Alode, Franc-Aleud, Eriliz or Heriſchlith, Hoſt abandonne, and an hundred more beſide. Marculphus in the reigne of Dagobert (Reſtorer and Founder of S. Denys in France) had bin Audiencer in the Chancery of France very long time. After the death of the ſaid Dagobert, Clouis ſecond of the name his ſonne, ſucceeded him, who obtained (by his earneſt entreaty, with the purſuit and ſolicitings of the ſaid Marculphus) of S. Landry, then Biſhop of Paris, an exemption of the ſaid Abbey of S. Denys, for him and his ſucceſſors Biſhops of Paris, which exemption continueth to this very day. Marculphus in his aged daies, became a Religious man in the ſame Monaſtery, & reduced into writing, the Stile and manner of iudiciall proceedings (which he dedicated to the ſaid Biſhop of Paris S. Landry) concerning the Chancery of France, which was vſed in his time) according to the Salique Law. King Dagobert, firſt of that name, died in the yeere of Grace 545, the fift of Ianuary; and Clouis the ſecond his ſon 652. So that (anſwerable to S. Gregory of Tours) this Marculphus is one of their moſt ancient Authors. This is the ſame man.

At the manner of weddings, N. filius N. puellulam ingeniam, nomine N. illius filiam per Solidum, & Denarium, Secundum Legem Salicam in portione paterna cum fratribus ſuis filijs meis minime potes accedere There may bee alleadged numberleſſe paſſages, drawne forth of the ancient Formularies, as alſo the Capitularies of Charlemaigne, and his Succeſſors the Kings of France; which we let ſlip in ſilence, to returne to our diſcourſe of King Pharamond. And tell you, that after King Clouis had embraced Chriſtianity, and conquered France, ſo farre as to the Pyrenean Mountaines: hee cauſed to be couched in Latine the ſaid Salique Law, adding thereunto, what ſeemed beſt to rule as well the French as the Romanes, and other ſtrangers dwelling in Gaule. So that in his time the ſaid Salique Law comprehended from the firſt title, which is of Adiournements, to the account of threeſcore and eighteene: his ſonne Childebert the firſt King of Paris, added titles after threeſcore and eighteene, ſo farre as to foureſcore and foure. Clotharius King of Soiſſons, in imitation of Childebert his brother, added ſome titles; where ended the Salique Law, deuided into three bookes, according to the three Kings, Clouis, Childebert, and Clotharius. Charlemaigne in like manner added titles to them: De homicidijs Clericorum: De cauſis admonendis, &c. In the frontiſpeece whereof is this Prologue: Hæc ſunt capitula quæ gloriosiſſimus Carolus in Lege Salica, mittere præcepit. Now we come againe to Pharamond.

The Salique Law ruled the French, Romans, and other ſtrangers in Gaule.

To whom are giuen diuers Armes. Some, Couppe de Gueulles a l'Aigle d'Or, & d'Azur a Lyon rampant d'Or, deſchirant de ſes Armes de derriere la teſte de ceſte Aigle. Which is a deuiſe and no Armes, to ſhew that the French began to vnplume the poore Romane Eagle, by the conqueſt of the Gaules.

Diuerſitie of Armes, as diuerſly giuen to King Pharamond.

Others affirme, that Il portoit des Gueulles a trois Corones, ou Diademes d'Or. Or according to Paulus Æmilius, D'Argent a trois Diademes, & Corones de Gueulles. As willing thereby to ſignifie, that hee had three ſundry Kingdomes and Prouinces: as namely, Franconia, weſtphalia, and Holland on this ſide of the Rhine.

Others ſay, D'Azure a la Pauillee, ou Lys Iaune de Maraiz. To note the ancient dwelling of the olde French, in the Fennes and Mariſhes of Weſtphalia, and among the horned nookes of Rhine. Armes properly emblazoned, and anſwerable to the nature of the water, which remaining ſtill and quiet, receiueth ſo but one colour Ceſtiall, and like the Mariſh Lilly which is yellow, and not white. And in all theſe Armes, Deuices, or Blazons; euery man may abound in his owne ſenſe, and diſcourſe after his manner; for in matters of ſuch ancient note, there cannot be aſſured any certaintie, ſpeaking like to the Shepheard in Virgill.

The Rhine had many horned nookes, or corners.

Non noſtrum inter vos tantas componere lites.

But in mine owne iudgement, I hold that opinion leaſt warrantable, of the Wallons and other Strangers, who emblazon theſe ancient Armes of Pharamond, D'Or ou de Iaune a trois Crapaux de Sable, ou de Synople. And thence would deriue their flouting nick-name of French Toades, as figuring thereby the firſt dwelling of the ancient French, in the Fennes and Mariſhes ſo often before named. For by an innumerable company of Authors of note, which I haue read in my life time; I could neuer finde one onely man to inſtruct me, that Pharamond ſhould beare ſuch a wicked beaſt in his Arms. And euen to this inſtant day, in moſt part of the Prouinces of France, it ſerues for a deteſtable iniury, fit to be inflicted on none, but a man full of all wickednes & infamie. In Gaſcoigne, Languedock, Guienne, & elſwhere, they tearme it Grapault.

French Toads an abuſiue nick-name giuen to the French by the Wallons.

I haue ſeene neere to Bourdeaux, in the Abbey of S. Sorin, a remarkeable Tombe of Stone exalted vpon foure ſmall Pillers aboue the ground. And yet neuertheleſſe; it is full of water at the changes of the Moones, and the pretended Horne or Bugle of Rowland, which he wore and died withall at Ronceuaux, like to the figure of a Toade. Two other alſo of the ſame cunning performance, in the Priory of S. Seuerine, on the hill of Gaſcoigne. And on one of the gates of the towne of Bayonne, towards S. Iohn de Luz, there is an Eſcutcheon charged with three things like Toads; which I iuſtifie belongs to the Lord of Hilliere, Gouernour of one of thoſe two Caſtles, being the Key of France: & neuer were they intended for Toads, but only floure de Luces, wickedly made by the Painter & Caruer. For without wandring any further then to Poiſſy, in one of the Pariſh Churches of our Lady, you may behold at the 4 corners, the likenes of Toads; and yet notwithſtanding they are floure de Luces, ſo ill done, as nothing can be worſe, & ſauor of their pure Antiquity: for my ſelf, I think it a matter hard to be wel Things verified by the Authers owne view.

A difficult thing to form truely a floure de Luce, but by a French man.

made, and represent a Floure de Luce minikinly trussed, but by an excellent Painter, a Frenchman borne, and ingenuous spirit. For a Germane, an Englishman, Spaniard and Italian, can neuer winne honor in proportioning it truly. The Germanes make it double, that is to say, a double floure in point and chiefe. Italians make it with shoots and Sirns, after a new fashion. In briefe, each stranger fashioneth it according to his forme, and so disguiseth it, that if this diuine flowre were not knowne in all parts and angles of this habitable world, there would be need of Painters and Sculptures to imitate the ancient Authors in the noble Science of painting: who by the saying of Pliny in the thirty fiue booke of his naturall history, and the second chapter, hauing begun to draw by the lines, traced on such shadowes as the Sunne yeelded; and not vnderstanding any other cunning, were enforced (that their workmanship might be known) to write vnderneath; this is a man, this is a horse, and this is an Oxe.

CHAP. VII.

Of King Clodion, Sirnamed with the long Haire

AFter Pharamond, succeeded his onely sonne Clodion, Cloion, or Clogion (for all these three names are attributed to him) sir-named the Hairy; because, as some say, he brought vp an ancient ordinance of wearing long haire, to distinguish the French, as well from the Romanes, as other strange Nations, which as then ranne rauaging through the Prouinces of the Romane Empire. Others are of opinion, that hee made restriction of this long haire, tressed and cordonned after the Anticke practise of all times by the Francs-Sicambrians; onely to Princes of the blood Royall, issued from his Grandfather Marcomir, and Ingomer his brother, to the end that they might appeare aboue the French.

There are in the History of Saint Gregory of Tours a great number of examples, how the Princes of the blood might be knowne, by their haire tressed, and bound after a different fashion. But in generall, all the French had a custome to weare long locks of haire; and therefore in the Authors of the Romane history, they are indifferently called Crinigeros; and in their owne Lawes, Crinitos and Crinosos. In the ordinance of King Childebert, made at the Pallace of Attigny in Champaigne, dated the Calends of May, touching incestuous alliances and marriages; it is said. Cognouit hoc vna cum Leudis nostris, vt nullus de Crinosis in cessum vsum sibi societ coniugio, hoc est, ne fratris sui vxorem; nec vxoris suæ sororem; nec vxorem patris sui; aut parentis consanguinei. Si quis vxorem patris acceperit, mortem incurrat. De præteritis vero incestis commentionibus, per præditionem Episcoporum inquirantur emendari. Qui verò Episcopus noluerit audire, & excommunicatus fuerit, perennem condemnationem apud Deum sustineat, & ad Palatio nostro sit omnino extraneus, & omnes facultates suæ legitimis permanant.

The Gaules vsed to weare long haire.

It is a case beyond contradiction, that the Gaules were wont to weare long haire, tressed and bound vp with Ribands of gold; and that their Colonies, as well of Allemaigne as of Greece and Italie, obserued carefully that ancient custome, remarked by Homer in the tenth booke of his Illiades: and by Pliny in his three and thirtieth booke and first chapter. Est quidem apud eundem Homerum Virorum crinibus auram implexam. And Lucian writeth in his Carracon, that among the Egyptians, the sonnes of Noblemen wore their haire tressed and bound vp behinde, with ribands and tissues of gold and siluer, and sometimes of silke. But the Gaules by being subiugated to the Romanes, forsooke this ancient custom, retained by the Francs-Sicambrians constantly.

It was in like vse with the Kings of the first line, and some of the second, who bound with ribands of gold and silke, as well their head-haire, as their beards, which the Kings of the first, second, and third line wore long, vntill King Lewis the young, seuenth of the name, who caused his haire to be cut, in regard of a certaine admonition given him by Petrus Lombardus, Bishop of Paris, whose Sepulture is to be seene in the Church

Church of S. Marcellus at Paris. Long haire, dangling downe so farre as the shoulders, continued vntill the time of King Francis the first, who hauing beene hurt with a fire-brand which fell vpon his head, caused his haire to be shorne, that hee might the sooner bee cured; but suffered his beard to grow on still, which was cut quite away from Lewis the seuenths time. And according to the example of King Francis, they did then weare their head-haire cut short, and their beards long.

King Francis the first, his head broken by a fire-brand.

For commonly the Subiect doth conforme
His fashions, as he sees his Princes worne. But returne wee to Clodion.

He began to reigne in the yeere of Grace, foure hundred and thirty, and his reigne continued eighteene yeeres, as Sigibertus saith: Clodius filius Pharamond Regis Rex Crinitus Regnat super Francos Annis decem & octo.

In the second yeere of his reigne, hee conquered Thoringe, the yeere foure hundred thirty and one, according to the same Sigibert, in these tearmes: Clodius Thoringiam inuadit, & in Dispargo Castello Thoringorum aliquandiu habitauit, where he died. His Father Pharamond began the Conquest in his life time, and had established his dwelling in the Castle of Dispargo, as we haue formerly said.

In the yere 445. the same Author affirmeth (concerning King Clodion) that he sent spies to discouer the Romans condition in the Towne of Cambray. Immediately following after them, he crossed the great Riuer of Rhine, chased the Romanes from the frontires thereof, and ouerthrew them in a ranged Battell, to their great discomfiture; he beleiged and tooke Cambray by strength, and afterward Tournay, crossing all the Forrest Charboniere, so farre as into Artois, and the Riuer of Somme. Clodius Rex Francorum missis Exploratorib. e Dispargo Castello vsque ad vrbem Cameracum transijt Rhenum, & potrito multo Romanorum populo citra Rhenum vsque Ligerim Fluuium habitantium, Carbonariam Syluam ingressus vrbem Tornacum obtinuit, & inde vsque ad vrbem Cameracum properauit, vbi pauco tempore residens, Romanos si quos ibi inuenit, peremit; & exinde ad Somenam Fluuium perueniens, omnia occupauit.

The Romanes held then all that extendure of the Countrey, which is from the frontiers of Rhine so farre as to the Riuer of Loire. They assembled all their Armie into a maine great body, couering this spaciousnesse of ground, to hinder the passage of Clodion. But they were driuen to flight, with a great slaughter of them, which gaue him the meanes to possesse the Countries of the Charboniere Forrest, which comprehended then Tournay, Valentiennes, Monts and Cambray, pursuing still his purposed point, through the spacious fields of Artois; as Sidonius Apollinaris reporteth in the passage of the precedent Chapter.

What a spacious compasse of the Country the Romãs held.

Quo Cloio patentes
Attrebatum terras peruaserat.

And went so farre as to the Riuer of Somme, which Sigebert calleth Somenam, by imitating the Bishop of Poictiers: Fortunatus in the fourth Poem of his seuenth book, speaking of the Riuers of France;

Isara, Sara, Chares, Scaldis, Saba, Somena, Sura:

She is also called Symbra and Somena, taking her fourse neere to the Fountaines of L'Escault, enlarging her selfe and swelling at Vermandois, from whence it maketh passage to S. Quintines, to Peronne, Amiens, Abbe-ville and S. Vallery, beneath which Somme runneth, and falleth impetuously into the lap of the Ocean Sea. Such then were the bounds of Clodions Conquests, according to the testimony of S. Gregorie of Tours, in his second booke and ninth chapter of the history of France; where he further informeth vs, that when Clodion attempted his Conquests, the Romanes enioyed from the forrest Charboniere, iust to the riuer of Loire; beyond which, the Gothes (you must vnderstand the Vuisigothes) held Gaule so farre as to the Pyrenean mountains, and that those people were tainted with the false doctrin of wicked Arrius, when the Bourgongnors (sectators of the same heresie) domineered beyond the Riuer of Rhone, neere to the City of Lyons. The same Historian Sigebert and others do not denie, that Clodion aduanced his Conquest any further then vnto the Riuer of Somme; although Fundius and some other French Annalists haue written, that hee made himselfe master of the City of Maguntia, and that of Amiens, a City heretofore built on the Riuer of Somme, by the Romane Emperours Antoninus the debonnaire, and his Sonne Aurelius, and by them called Somona britis, in regard of the said Riuer, an appellation which was said to be changed into that of Ambianis, Ambianus, ab Ambitu fluminum. But beit howsoeuer, most certaine it is, that the said Clodion conquered the Cambreses, Tourneses, Antois, Henaulte, and the Citie of Cologne, surnamed by the Romaines Agripina. Whereof his Sonnes, and their descendants had the possession, and entitled themselues Kings, vnto the reigne of Clouis, the first Christian King, who exterminated them, re-uniting to the Crowne of France, the Lands which he possessed, as is recorded by S.Gregory of Tours, in the end of his second Booke of the Historie of France.

The honorable conquests of King Clodion, and how farre they extended.

Clodion hauing reigned twenty yeares, or eighteene, according to some writers, dyed in the Castle of Disparch in Thuringe, and was carried to Franquembourg in Franconia, and laid in the Sepulcher of his Ancestors. He left three masle children, Ragnachaire, Regnauld, and Adalberon. But being ouer yong in yeares, to consume the conquest of their Father, and maintaine by power of Armes that yong rising Monarchie: the French elected for their King, the first Prince of the blood, called Merouees, neere kinseman to the deceased King Clodion; because he was the sonne of Richomer, son of Ingomer, brother to Marcomir, father of Pharamond, and so by consequent, Cousine Germaine to Clodion, of whose Sonnes hee was Tutour.

The death of Clodion, and election of Merouees.

Saint Gregorie of Tours affirmeth, in his second Booke and ninth Chapter, that the said Merouees was issued of the Blood Royall, and a very neere kinseman to the said King Clodion.

Sigibert (to small purpose in mine opinion) maketh him his sonne, saying, that in the yeare foure hundred fortie eight, this Merouees, Filius Clodij super Francos regnat annis decem, à quo nimis vtile Rege Franci Merouingi cognominati sunt. And in truth, the Kings which held the Kingdome vnto Pepin le Bref (Authour of the Kings of the second Ligne, called the Carlouingians) descended from Father and Sonne to the said Merouees: And therefore they called the ligne of their Kings, after this Merouees, the Merouingians.

CHAP. VIII.

Of King Merouees.

THE Bishop of Auuergne, Sidonius Apolinaris, in the Panegyricke spoken to the Emperour Maiorian, obseruing the miserable condition of the Gaules, vpon the declining of the Romaine Empire, when so many Tyrants possessed themselues of their Gouernements, by the titles of Emperours (as we haue before declared) and that, in such confusion, they knew not who was their certaine Lord; makes the poore Romaine Eagle to speake in this manner

——mea gallia rerum
Ignoratur adhuc Dominus, ignoraque seruit.

And shewing by what meanes the French possessed themselues thereof, beginning their Conquest in the Panegyricke of the Emperour Aulus his Father in law he saith.

Francus Germanum primum, Belgamque secundum Sternebat.

Enstructing vs, that they began it by the frontiers of the Rhine, and continued it in the possession of Belgicke Gaule, which Cæsar alloweth for the third part of the rich and abounding Gaules: And that the Romans after the Conquest of them (by the same Cæsar) parted and deuided it into many Gouernments, narrow limits and deuisions.

For,

The deuision of Belgicke Gaule.

For, concerning Belgicke Gaule, they deuided in twaine, the first and second In Belgicam primam, & Belgicam secundam.

The containdure of the first.

The first had within her enclosures, Mediomatrices, Leucos, & Viri Dunenses, & huius erat caput & Metropolis Treueris: then of Mentz, Toul and Verdum, of which the Towne and Citie of Treuers was the Metropolitane.

Iurisdictions of the second.

The second had vnder her iurisdiction, Suessiones, Catalaunos, Camaracos, Neruios, Morinos, Attrebates, Ambianos, Bellouacos, & Nouiomagenses, quorum erat Metropolis Durocortorum Remorum; Those of Soissons, Chaalons, Tournay, Terouenne, Arras, Amiens, Beauuais, and Noyon; of which people, the strong Citie of Rheims was the Capitall.

The same Belgicke Gaule was moreouer deuided by the same Romaines, into the first and second Germanies.

High Germanie.

The first, which they called the higher, comprehended Argentoratum, Maguntiacum, Nemetes, Vangiones, cetera quæ Rheno finitimas Regiones: Strasbourg, Magunce, Spire, Wormes, and other Townes planted on the banckes of Rhine.

The containdure of the lower Germanie, & the deuisions therof.

The second and lower Germanie, had within her iurisdiction, Tongros, Neruios, Morinos, Maritimosque Morinorum Populos, Quorum Metropolis erat Agripina Colonia: Those of Tongres, who were no longer of Tournay of Terouenne (raced during the warres of King Fraunces the first, and the Emperour Charles the fift) and the people dwelling on the shoares of the Ocean Sea, the Capitall Towne of this second Germanie, being the Citie of Cologne on the Rhine. This may suffice to vnderstand the passage of the Bishop of Auuergne, formerly reported, concerning the Conquest made by the French: But returne we now backe to Merouees.

The valiancie of this Prince, and the robberies of the Hunnes; compelled the Emperours of the East to accord with him, concerning the Prouinces conquered by the deceased King Clodion, with charge of assistance. For in the time of these proceedings, and the yeare of Grace foure hundred fiftie and one, Attila, King of the Hunnes, assisted with the Kings of the Ostrogothes, Valamer de Ardaricke, of the Gepides, and other Nations of the North, departed from Hungaria with a mightie Armie, which consisted of seauen or fiue hundred thousand men, wherewith he rauaged Treuers and Strasbourg. And on Easter euen, being entred stoutly into the Citie of Mentz: after he had pilled and ransacked it, he consumed it into ashes, putting to the edge of the Sword the Inhabitants thereof; massacring inhumainely the Priests at the Altar. From Mentz, like to an impetuous Torrent, cruell Attila went and sacked the Citie of Rhemes, passing wholly ouerthwart from thence to the towne of Troyes, without doing any harme thereto; but admiring the sanctitie of life led by S. Lupus, Bishop thereof, and forraging the rest of Belgicke Gaule; came to Paris, miraculously preserued by the deuout prayers of the holy Virgin S. Geneuiefue, Patroneffe of the Parisians.

The proceedings of cruell Attila with his armed forces.

Paris preserued from the tyrants cruelty miraculously.

From thence he went impetuously on to Orleans, which he besiedged, and prest so hardly, that it was euen at the next doore to destruction; but for the religious intercessions of S. Aignanus the Bishop, according as other Cities and Townes were, which he had desolated. But in a sudden moment of time, comfort appeared, brought by Aetius the Patritiah; accompanied with Theudo, King of the Gothes, and his Sonne Thorismond, who caused Attila to discampe, pursuing him to the fields of Maurica, from whence (on either side) they departed, to prepare for fight, as it is declared by S. Gregory of Tours, in the second Booke of his History of France, and the seauenth Chapter.

Where hither he giueth vs to vnderstand, that Merouee, succoured with the French (whom first of all he nameth) and the Gothes, fought with Attila, who seeing his Armie in confusion, in a good houre shifted for his owne safetie: there perishing in the day of Battaile (as well on the one side, as other) an hundred and foure score thousand men. Among whom was the King of the Vuisigothes, called by Sigibert, Theierry.

Aetius well satisfied with winning the victory, left Attila to his flight, and to vnderstand himselfe of the French, and the Gothes; gaue them apprehension of their people reuolt, saying to Thorismond, That it behoued him to make speedily for his

his owne Countrey, as fearing least his yonger brother, hearing the tidings of his Fathers death; should possesse himselfe of the Kingdome. Ideo cum velocitate itineris fecit, quasi anticipaturus fratrem, & prior patris cathedram adepturus. Similiter & Attilam Regem dolo fugauit. So the Patrician being alone; rifled (at ease) all Attilaes Campe, returning to Rome heaped with honor, and riehly laden with the spoyles which he had conquered. Thus you see what S. Gregory of Tours saith, concerning the battaile won against Attila, King of the Hunnes. As for the place where it was fought, some say, that it was neere to the Citie of Tolosa in Lauragais. Others say, it was by the Towne of Chaalons in Champaigne, called Catalaunum, on the Plaine whereof is to be seene an Oratorie and Chappell, erected, to serue as a remembance thereof. Others affirme it at Chaalon in Bourgongne, a Bishoprick, and no Peeredome, named Cabillonum. Difficulties grounded on the passage of Sigebert; Conserto Prælio in Campis Cathalaunicis pugnatum ad diremptionem noctis.

Cassiodorus, , speaking of this Battaile, fought in the yeare of Grace foure hundred fiftie and one, in the Consulship of the Emperour Marcian, and of Adelphius, saith. Romani, Aetio duce, Gothis Auxiliaribus, contra Attilam in Campis Cathalaunicis pugnauerunt qui virtute Gothorum superatus accessit. This Authour giueth all the praise and honor of this Battaile to the Gothes (without any speech of the French) in fauour of the Ostrogothes King of Italie, to whom he was a Courtier. And yet notwithstanding S. Gregory of Tours, who was not any long time from this battaile, obserueth perticularly, that the French came to the succour of the Romaines. And all Historians doe agree, that King Merouæus, and Childericke his Sonne, with their French, conducted and made the right wing of the Armie belonging to Aetius.

Saint Gregory of Tours noteth perticularly the place where the said Battaile was fought. Liberata obtentu beati Antistitis (Aniani) Ciuitate (Aurelia) Attilam fugat, qui Mauriacum Campum adiens, se præcingit ad bellum. That the field of Battaile was called Mauriac, or Saint Maurice, I cannot directly say whether (at this day) there is any place so named, or still retaineth the same, betweene Orleans and Bourges: but in mine owne opinion, I thinke, that the battaile was fought on the Plaine and field of Cologne, properly called Campa Catalaunici. For which there is a great deale more apparance and likelihood, then at Chaalons in Champaigne, and neere to Tolosa. For it cannot be credible, that the Armie of Aetius, suffising to raise the siedge of Orleans by cruell Attila, would giue him leasure to winne an hundred miles of ground, as there is from Orleans to Tolosa, and (at his owne pleasure) to spoyle the Lands which the Vuisigothes held from the Riuer of Loire, so farre as to the Pyrenean Mountaines, as we haue said, according to the testimonie of Saint Gregory of Tours. It must be thought, that two such puissant Armies, could not be any long time without comming to handy-blowes, in the neere neighbouring fields of Orleans, which was the victors prize and Trophee. To small purpose then did the Patrician. Aetius, after he had won the Battaile, aduise Thorismond, to come in all haste to Tolosa, for preuention of his Brother; if the Battaile had bin fought neere to Tolosa.

The Armie of Aetius raised the siedge at Orleans.

And lesse likelihood of trueth is there in their saying, who would haue it in the field neere to Chaalons; seeing all the auncient Authors doe agree, that Attila, halfe broken after the battaile won from him: speedily returned the same way he came in Champaigne, trauersing part of the Duchie of Bourgongne (then a Kingdome, where he trampled on the Bourgongnes bellies, & slew their King Gundichaire, who would haue hindered his passage) to win Italie, which he rauaged soone after.

The consent of all ancient Authors concerning Attila after the Battaile.

Priscus Panytes, a Greeke Author, and who was Secretarie to Theodosius the yonger, Emperour of the East, hee repotteth (better then any other Historian) the perticularities of the spoyles made in the Westerne Empire, by cruell Attila, hauing bin sent Ambassador to him by the said Emperor Theodosius, as himselfe witteth.

Priscus Panytes an Ambassador sent to Attila from the Emperour Theodosius.

Attila being resolued to forradge the Westerne Empire, Valentinian quickly leuied an Armie, whereof he made his Lieutenant General Aurelius, an Auuergnac by nation, a Senatour of Rome, and Prefect of the Gaules Pretorium (who afterward was was Emperour of the West) to follow and to fight with Attila. who had his Armie compосed of diuers people, specified by the said Panytes, and drawne out of his relations, by the Bishop of Auuergne, in the Panegericke spoken of the said Auitus: who after he left the charge of Prefect to the Gaules, returned home to his Countrey house.

In campos se Belga tuos.

He placeth in this band the Thoringians and Bructeres, people of Alemagne, inhabiting on the slimie Riuer of Necar. Attila with his Armie, consisting of fiue hundred thousand men, had already rauaged Alemagne and Franconia, pilled Tongres, and raced it from the top to the bottome, and burnt Treuers, without finding any soule to resist against him. At that time Merrueus betooke himselfe to guard the Gaules, and therefore prepared a great number of vessels in the Forrest of Hercynia: So say Panytes, and the Bishop of Auuegne.

Fiue hundred thousand men in the Armie of Attila.

Prorumpit Francus, cecidit cito secta bipenni

Ibant Pellitæ post Classica Romula Turmæ.

It is generally knowne, that the Romaine Historians called the Kings of France Reges Pellitos; because it pleased them to weare Garments richly Furred, yea, preciously with Furres of Ermines, Letices, Menuuaire, the Sable Martin, and the Starnie Genettes. Already had Belgicke Gaule serued as the Theater, whereon Attila made presentation of his bloody Tragedies, putting all to fire and sword: hauing sacked the Citie of Rhemus, died red with the blood of the chiefest Inhabitants, and of their Bishop holy Nicasius, and of his sister Eutropia. As much hee would haue done to the Citie of Troyes, if the Prelate thereof had not with-held the blow: to goe and discharge his rage and barbarous furie on the Citie of Orleans, inuested with his whole Armie, and to be made desolate. But the good Bishop of S. Aignanus remedied the extremity, by his feruent prayers to God, for the conseruation of his little flocke: as also the sudden succour of Aetius, whom he went to seeke, so far as the Towne of Arles in Prouince.

The Kings of France vsed to weare rich Furres in their garments.

Earnest prayer hath affwaged the violent furie of Bloody tyrants.

His part being so secured, the King of the French, Merouæus, and Theodrricke of the Vuisigothes, in this common cause, and each one to conserue his Conquest: tooke part with the Romaines, although they had bin sollicited to ioyne with Attila, who thought himselfe sure enough of their Armes. So saith Priscus Panytes.

Freculphus, Bishop of Lysieux writeth in his Chronogtaphie, that at the siedge of Orleans, the Patrician Aetius, and the Kings of France and Aquitaine, Merouæus with his sonne Childericke; Theodoricke and Thorismond his sonne, gaue so rough a charge on the Armie of Attila, a braue and expert Capraine: that he iudged (at the first blow of proofe) he could not stay long without fight. Which made him resolue vpon the Battaile, and which was hotly deliuered him, without any more vaine marching In Campis Catalaunicis.

Auitus, contrary to the attempt of Attila, wonne Merouæus, King of the French, to his side; acquitting to him (in name of the Emperour Valentinian) that which his prede-

The French ioyne willingly with the Emperours forces.

Predeceſſour Clodion had made conqueſt of, belonging to the Romaine Empire, on this ſide the Rhine.

He preuailed in the like manner with the King of the Vuiſigothes, Thierrie or Theodoricke, whoſe ſeate Royall was then at Toloſa; which the Biſhop of Auuergne, in the Panegyricke of the ſaid Auitus, calleth (for honor ſake) Palladiam Toloſam.

Palladiam implicitis manibus ſubiere Toloſam.

He needed not any great diſcourſe, to animate him in ſo doing, becauſe (as the Spaniſh Hiſtorians ſay) cruell Attila had bin incited and perſwaded to come thundring on the Gaules, to exterminate (principally) the Kingdome of the Vuiſigothes of Aquitaine: by the King of the Vandales in Spaine Genſericus, father to Hunericus. Who hauing taken to wife one of the daughters to the ſaid Theodoricke the Vuiſigoth; vnder couler and ſuſpition, that ſhe would haue giuen him poyſon: cauſed her noſe to be cut off, and ſo deformed, ſent her to King Theodoricke her Father; who beſide had intereſt to preſerue Aquitaine, which the Romaine Emperours had giuen to his Predeceſſours, when they could no longer keepe it themſelues.

Genſericus King of the Vandales in Spaine.

A contrary opinion where that bloody Battaile was fought.

The ſame Spaniſh Hiſtorians ſay, that this memorable battaile againſt Attila, was fought in the fields of Maroch; without ſpecifying where the fields of the ſaid Maroch are. And moreouer, beſide them which dyed on that bloody day, the night before, Merouæus with his French, had giuen a Camiſado to the quarter of the Gepides, wherein more then foureſcore and ten thouſand men were ſlaine in the place. Thus you ſee what hath bin written by diuers Hiſtorians, Greekes, Romans, Spaniards and French, concerning this Battaile againſt ſtout Attila. Now to Merouæus againe.

Valentinian, third of the name, ſo wrought in his youth (fearing leaſt Aetius ſhould aſpire to the Empire) that he put him to death, without ſubiect or any occaſion whatſoeuer. And the ſame Valentinian (ſometime after) being in Campus Martius*, ſeated on his Throane, and making an Oration to the Romaine people; Scylla, the caruing Squire to the ſaid Aetius, ſtealing behinde him; ſtoutly kild him. So ſaith Saint Gregory of Tours, in the ſecond Booke and eight Chapter of his French Hiſtorie.

* A Field neere Rome by Tiber for the vſe of all manly exerciſes.

Procopius in the firſt Booke of the Vandales Hiſtorie, deſcribeth theſe ſad accidents more perticularly. Affirming, that the death of Aetius happened by the contriuing of Maximus a Romaine Senatour, deſcended of the race of the tyrant Maximus, whom the Emperour Theodoſius the elder cauſed to dye, as we haue before related. This Maximus had a wife peereleſſe for beauty and modeſty, of whom Valentinian became ſo ſtrongly enamoured:

That he lou'd her a thouſand times more deere,
Then his owne life, or ought elſe n're ſo neere.

Where Vertue is conſtant, all affaults are impertinent.

But all his paſſions and fiery flames, hardened the yce of her faire and chaſte reſolution: when he perceiuing, that his loue ſuites and ſearches proued vaine and of no effect, determined to compaſſe his deſire by a diuelliſh inuention. He ſent for Maximus, to play with him at the Dice for a certaine ſumme of Gold, and Maximus looſing, ſet his gold Ring as a pledge to Valentinian. And hauing loſt it too, Valentinian compaſſed the meanes, to ſend it (as a token to the wife of Maximus, in her hurbands name commanding her ſpeedily, to come viſite the Empreſſe Eudoxia. She knowing the token, and crediting the meſſenger; readily obeyed, and came to the Pallace, where ſhe was receiued by the Court Bawdes (ready to all euill, vnprofitable for goodneſſe, the plague and vtter ruine of Princes) who ſeeming as if they conducted her to the Empreſſes quarter, to ſalute her: brought her to Valentinian, where, by the meanes of his incarnate deuils, he compaſſed his pleaſure by force and violence, like vnto another Tarquine,

Nothing more deteſtable then ſuch Court diuels.

This Chriſtian Lucrece, being returned home to her houſe, ſat downe and bemoaned her miſery, with vehement deteſtation of her husband, whom ſhe thought had bin ouer-prodigall of his and her honour. And making her ſad complaint to him;

him; Maximus was ſo affronted with horror and ſhame (being a man of high courage and ſpirit) that he immediately vowed to be reuenged. For hardly can men of vnderſtanding reſolue (with the leaſt patience whatſoeuer) to endure Acteons title. But there are ſome, that being banquerout of honor; will willingly claw the head with their owne nailes, at the baſe name of a Cuckolde; to deriue benefit thereby, or elſe to cloude their owne weakeneſſe.

The difference between truely Noble, and baſe borne natures.

Maximus pondering on the reuenge of his wiues honor, foyled by the lubricitie of Valentinian (Princes, learne by other mens examples, to bridle and ouer-rule your vngouerned appetites) gaue Valentinian aduiſe, to put to death the Patrician Aetius: becauſe it was whiſpered in his eares, that he would vſurpe the Empire of the Weſt, and (to that end) had intelligence with barbarous Nations. Valentinian, a yong Prince, followed the counſell of this Achitophell, without making proofe of his fidelity, or the vnfaithfulneſſe of Aetius, who neuer had conſpired againſt him. He ſlew him with his owne hand, ſo ſaith Caſſiodorus in his Chronicle, the yeare foure hundred fiftie and foure; the ſaid Aetius being Conſull of Rome (created by Valentinian) with Studius, named by Marcian Emperor of the Eaſt.

In this manner Valentinian, bad councelled (like to another Reboboam) by putting Aetius to death; did cut off his owne right hand from the left. Caſſiadorus, in the place before alleadged, ſaith Aetius Patricius, in Palatio manu Valentiniani Imperatoris extinctus eſt. The Biſhoppe of Auuergne, deteſting the Authour of this murder, ſaid:

Aëtium placidus mactauit ſemiuir amens.

With him was ſlaine the learned Boetius, Præfectus Prætorium of Rome (of whoſe workes we haue a good part, and ſome Hymmes in Latine of Elpis his wife, which are ſung in the Church to this preſent day.) Aetius, ſome ſhort while before his death, had practiſed the ending of Attila, like vnto that of Holophernes; for he being gorged with wine and foode, and ſleeping in his bed; was ſlaine with a knife, by the hand of a woman, that ſhould haue lien with him. So (at one time) happened the death of Valentinian, and totall ruine of the Weſt Empire.

Attila ſlain by in his bed by a woman.

Marcellinus Comes writeth in his Chronicle, that the death of Aetius was the loſſe of the Weſt Kingdome, in theſe tearmes. Aetius Patricius, magna Occidentalis Impery Salus, & Regis quondam Attile terror, à Valentiniano Imperatore cum Boetio amico in Palatio trucidatur, atque cum ipſo Heſperium cecidit Regnum, nec hactenus valuit reluari.

For in the yeare of Grace, foure hundred fiftie fiue, Valentinian being Conſull for the eight and laſt time (with Anthemius) was ſlaine, by the meanes of Maximus; whoſe wife dyed with conceit of griefe, in regard ſhe had bin ſo monſtrouſly diſhonored, which by Froiſſard and Monſtrelet is tearmed Deflowred. Her death happened in the ſaid yeare fiftie fiue, the ſixteenth of the Calends of Aprill. Marcellinus Comes, and Caſſiodorus writeth thus. Valentinianus Imperator Occiditur in Campo Martio ab amicis Aetij, dolo maximi per Oſcilan & Tranſtilam Aetij Satellites, iam percuſſo Heraclio Spadone, Valentinian, being thus ſlaine, Maximus poſſeſſed himſelfe of the Empire, and tooke to wife Eudoxia, the widdow of Valentinian; creating as Conſtable and Colonell of his Infanterie, the Præfect of the Gaules Prætorium Auitus. As wee learne by the Biſhop of Auuergne, in his Panegyricke ſpoken to the ſame Auitus.

——— Sed perdita cernens
Terrarum ſpatia Princeps iam Maximus, vnum
Quod fuit in rebus Peditum, Equitumque Magiſtrum
Te ſibi, Auite legit,

And he gaue him charge to worke a peace, firmely ſet downe for confirmation of the Lands, already conquered on the Romaine Empire by ſtranger Nations: Which he did, acquitting himſelfe worthily in his charge, as well to Merouæus, King of the French, as to them of the Bourgongnons and Vuiſigothes.

Maximus, being cleare-ſighted outwardly, for maintaining himſelfe in the Empire;

The malice of a woman is implacable.

pire; was yet ſtarke blinde to himſelfe, ſo ſaith Procopius. For he could not containe his tongue, but one night reuealed his maine ſecret to his wife Eudoxia, concerning his practiſes, and compaſſing the death of Valentinian. His wife ariſing from him about the breake of day, diſpoſed her ſelfe to be reuenged on him, and wrought ſuch meanes; that ſhe ſent ſome truſtie friends of hers into Affrica, to Genſericus, King of the Vandales, offering him the Empire of the Weſt, if he would come ſpeedily, and reuenge the death of her husband Valentinian.

Preſently he ſet ſaile for Italie, and got poſſeſſion of Rome without any reſiſtance. Maximus was ſurprized vnawares, and beaten downe with blowes of ſtones, wherewith he was mangled in pieces, as being no way able to helpe himſelfe. According as the Biſhop of Auuergne writeth, in his Epiſtle Ad Serranum, the ſecond Booke.

And afterward, as a remarkeable leſſon to well aduiſed Princes, neuer to ſerue their owne turne with ſtrange ſuccour, vnder colour of taking reuenge: which (ordenarily) teareth the eyes out of the bodies and mindes, of them that ſeeke after ſuch aſſiſtance. For Genſericus robbed and burned Rome, carrying her into Affrica, that called him to her helpe, with her two daughters Eudoxia and Placida; as alſo the Treaſure of the Weſterne Emperors. So ſaith Procopius in his ſecond Booke of the Vandales warres.

Thirtie dayes after the death of the Tyrant Maximus, the Legions of Gaule exalted Auitus to the Empire: whereof he had the enioying, vntill the yeare after foure hundred fiftie ſixe, hauing reigned but ten moneths and eight dayes: and then conſtrained for his diſordered life, to renounce the Empire, as he did at Placentia. As is written by S. Gregory of Tours, in his Hiſtorie of France, the ſecond Booke and eleauenth Chapter. After his death, the Empire was vacant ten moneths and fifteene dayes; next whom ſucceeded Maiorian.

Now, while theſe tumults continued in the Weſt Empire, Merouæus ſat not with his hands benummed, or armes croſſe-foulded: for, taking his owne aduantage, and occaſion by the fore-locke, he poſſeſſed himſelfe of all that extendure of the Countrey, which is betweene the Riuers of Soinme and Seine, and eſpecially of the Citie of Paris. So that he was the firſt of the French Kings, that boldly affirmed Gaule to be a Kingdome, which happened (according to the Romaine Hiſtories) in the yeare of Grace foure hundred fiftie ſixe, Ioannes and Varanes being Conſuls. The ſaid Merouæus, to preſerue the memories of the Kings his Predeceſſours, and his owne: ordained, that all that which they had ſubdued from the Rhine, ſo farre as to the Riuer of Seine, and that which afterward he wonne in Gaule, ſhould be called France. He dyed in the yeare of Grace foure hundred fiftie nine, hauing reigned ten yeares, and had his buriall at Cambraye.

Merouæus the firſt King that made Gaule a Kingdome.

The firſt entitling of France.

CHAP. IX.

Of Childericke, Sonne and Succeſſour to King Merouæus,

HE had for his Succeſſour, his Sonne Childericke, a generous Prince, and of great hope in his Fathers life time. William the Breton, ſpeaking of Clodion ſaith.

At ille
Regia decedens Merouæo Sceptra reliquit,
Is Childericum genuit, Ille Clodouei Regis Pater extitit.

But ſo ſoone as he ſaw himſelfe abſolutely ſeated in his Throne Royall, and of command with full power: he cauſed the French to looſe their good hope conceiued of him; by abuſing wiues and Maides, which appeared liking to him, drowning himſelfe in all vices and lubricities. Whereat the French being iuſtly offended; rebelled againſt him, and purſued him to death. Which cauſed him to leaue France, and withdraw (for his owne ſafety) to the King of Thuringe his kinſman, named Biſſinus, with whom he remained eight whole yeares. This retreate of his happened (according to the ſupputation of Sigibert) in the yeare of Grace foure hundred threeſcore and one; the third yeare of his reigne. He had a faithfull Councellour (an vnſpeakeable treaſure for a Prince) named Widomarus, who oftentimes had blamed his licentious life, which guided him to vtter ruine; by whoſe diſcreete aduiſe, he gaue way awhile to the Frenchmens furie, with aſſured promiſe of working his peace, ſo ſoone as occaſion did offer it ſelfe. And for aſſurance of his returne into France, the wiſe Councellour deuided a Crowne of Gold betweene them, which ſerued as a token to that effect. So ſaith S. Gregory of Tours in his Hiſtory of France, the ſecond Booke and the twelfth Chapter.

A notorious ſinne, when Kings grow forgetfull of their royall dignity.

Faithfull Councellours are Iewels about Princes.

During this time the French, being vſed to liue at all times vnder gouernment of Kings, elected a Romaine Senator ouer them, named Count Gillonus, as much to ſay, as Gouernor of the Soiſſons, and of ſome other Townes, which the Romans yet held in Belgicke Gaule, and ſo farre as to the Riuer of Loire, as formerly hath bin reported to vs by S. Gregory of Tours. This Gillonus had bin made Maiſter of the Horſe, and Gouernour of the Gaules by the Emperour Maiorian, and he ſeeing himſelfe exalted to this Royall dignitie; laboured the fauour and friendſhip of the Viſigothes Kings, to maintaine himſelfe therein, if the French ſhould chance to change, as they did afterward. For many of their principall perſons, were depriued of their liues by his politique practiſes; others deſpoyled of their goods, and all of any command, the Viſigothes onely being preferred: to whom Count Gillonus had giuen Narbona in Septimania, which at this inſtant time is called Languedocke.

Count Gyles, by ſome Authors of credit

Widomarus taking hold on this diſcontentment of theirs; wunne the loue of the French on the behalfe of his Prince, and (with one conſent) they accepted him againe to be their King: So that the halfe Crowne was ſent him, to ſerue as an aſſured teſtimony, that his peace was firmely made with them.

The loyall dealing of a true harted Councellor.

Childericke returned into France, reſolued on his better behauiour, in the yeare of Grace foure hundred ſixtie and nine. Cum Egidius iuſto grauius Francos opprimeret (ſaith Sigibert) perpendens Vuidomarus eoſdem Francos Poenitere ſuper electo Hilderico, reuocat eum clam miſſo diuiſi aurei ſigno, egitque vt electo Egidio, ille reſtitueretur in regno.

While his eight yeares continuance was with Biſſinus, King of Thuringe; he had wonne the amorous fauour of Queene Baſſina (whereof was diſcerned no outward appearance, or that this Woman, depriued of his preſence, was become extraordinarily affectionate towards him) and in ſuch violent manner; that ſhe forſooke her husband, and went into France to her gueſt Childericke. Who preſſing her to tell him, what had induced her to leaue the King her husband; ſhe made him this anſwere. That ſhe was compelled thereto, by a certaine foreknowledge which ſhe had of his valour, aboue all the Princes of his age, and that ſhe complained not of her croſſing the Sea, to ſeeke ſuch a worthy man as he, who had not his equall in the world. And therefore, meerely moued by her owne good opinion of him, ſhe had paſſed the Rhine, and made ſo long a voyage, onely to dwell with him. Which Childericke accepted, making her his wife, and in this marriage he had Clouis his onely Sonne, and two daughters, Albofleda and Lanthilda. The Hiſtories of Germanie doe report, that this Baſſina had experience in the Art of Diuination, and to foretell matters to come: Shewing to the King her husband Childericke thoſe Kings that naturally ſhould deſcend of him. Which ſerued as a ſubiect to the Prince of French Poets, to feigne this Nigromancie in the fourth Booke of his Franciades, Childericke purpoſing to recouer his Kingdome, leuyed a potent Armie to make ſeizure of Gillonus, who kept himſelfe ſometime in his vſurpation, by aſſiſtance of the Viſigothes, and vntill the yeare foure hundred threeſcore and fifteene. Then Childericke ouercame him in a ranged Battaile, with ſuch a diſcomfiture of his men; as he could hardly get forth of the presse, and gaue Soissons, where he left himselfe, without stirring any more all the rest of his life. Franci post Vandalos, & Alanos, post Gothos, & Hunnos incessunt Gallias, non vt habitare eas diuptibus, sed vt sibi sint habitationi perpetuo, qui capta Colonia Agrippina, & Fugato Egidio Duce bellis multis Romanorum occidunt; so Sulpitius telleth vs. Childericke making good vse of his victory, vn-nested the Romans from the Citie of Cologne: which he gaue (for his good seruice) to his Cosine Sigibert, second sonne to Sigmacaire, sonne to King Clodion in the title of the Crowne.

The Imperiall Citie of Treuers wonne from Count Gillonus.

And afterward, hee conquered from the same Gillonus the Imperiall Citie of Treuers, so many times wonne and reconquered by the French and Romaines, that it was the aime and but of either strange Nation, to make open sacke and spoyle thereof. This Conquest happened in the yeare of Grace foure hundred threescore and sixeteene, according to the testimonie of the same Sigibert, who but toucheth it in his passage along, thus, Franci Treuerim Ciuitatem super Mosellam ceperunt.

Childericke being become Maister of the Realme of France, so farre as to the Riuer of Seine (some few Townes excepted) went and besiedged the Citie of Paris, renowned in the time of Iulius Cæsar, and the well affected abiding of Iulian the Apostata, exalted to be Emperour therein. The Inhabitants whereof, who feared the furie of an Idolatrous Prince and Pagan, and seeing it at the point of surprizing, and their goods put to spoyle and pillage: had no other recourse but to Saint Geneuefue the Virgin, acceptable in Gods grace from her tender youth, endued with singular beauty of body, but much more glorious in the endowments of minde; issued forth for safetie of the people and Citie, shee being the tutelarie Patronesse thereof, and obtained of Childericke a peaceable entrance, in the yeare of Grace foure hundred threescore and eighteene, as is affirmed by Suryus, in the first Tombe of his Saints Historie, according to Saint Fregory of Tours in the Tract which he wrote De Gloria Confessorum, Chapter foursecore and eleauen. Childericus Rex Francorum, tametsi non esset Christiana Religione initiatus, Virginem hanc sanctissimam singulari veneratione prosequutus est. Nam cum aloquando quosdam reos capitis extremi animi sententia decreuisset occidere, ne Sanctæ Genouefe precibus plecti posset ut misericordiam, ex Vrbe egressus, iussit portas occludi. At vbi S. Genouefe renuntiatum est, Regem eos necandi gratia extra Oppidum processisse; mox illis veniam precatur, & festinabyt. Atque aduenienti illa ad portas obseratas, consternatis stupefactis, custodibus, quæ sint quoddam tubentis imperium, reseratæ sunt; sicque cœptum carpens iter, vbi ad Regem peruenit, ne miseri illi capite plectentur, obtinuit. Ita illi iam iamque perituri, à præsentissimo mortis discrimine sunt liberati. Occurrences which daily continued, by the feruent prayers of that holy Virgin, vpon the most pressing necessities of the Realme of France and Paris her capitall Citie.

Childericke a Pagan and no Christian Prince.

Childericke in farther pursuite of his fortune, possessed himselfe of the Towne of Sens, and the whole extendure of the Countrey, which reacheth frm Paris along the Riuer of Seine, and remounting so farre as to them of Marna and Yonne, in turning to Orleans, a faire and strong Citie, seated on the Riuer or mouth of Loire, of which it receiued name. Ex Ligere quippe sibi congruo flumine agnomen habet indutum, dicturque Aurelliana, quasi Ore Ligeriana, eo videlicet quod in ore eiusdem fluminis ripa sit constituta, non vt quidam minus cauti existimant, ab Aurelliano Augusto, quasi eam ipse ædificauerit, sic vocatam, quin potius ab amne, vt diximus, quod rectius veriusque illi congruit. This we learne from the Monke of Clugnye, Glaurus Rodolphus, in his Historie of France, the second Booke and fift Chapter. They likewise are deceiued, which beleeue Orleans to be the Genabium of Cæsar: because it is Gien vpon Loire, a Towne whereof one Subbrub retaineth (yet to this day) the first name of Genabium.

Childericke makes Vse of the aduantage of his good fortune.

This Citie was wonne by the said Childericke, from a Romaine Captaine, named Paulus, who being not able to defend it; made his retreate to the Towne of Angiers, whereof he was likewise Gouernour. As we are enstructed by Saint Gregory of Tours, in his second Booke and eighteene Chapter: Childericus Aurelianis pugnas egit. Which happened in the yeare of Grace foure hundred and fourefoursecore, at which time a Saxon Captaine, named by Gregory of Tours Odouaricus, departed from his Countrey of Saxonie into Alemaigne, with a fleete of his followers, being Shipt vpon the Ocean Sea (pursuing the fortune of others of that Nation, who in short time after became possessours of Great Britaigne) and made their entrance by the mouth of Loire, forradging the Prouince of Anjou, and the Towne of Angiers. Odouaricus, cum Saxonibus Andegauos venit. So saith Saint Gregory of Tours, in his second Booke and eighteene Chapter; and possessed himselfe of those Isles, which make on the Riuer of Loire, and of the Villages belonging thereto, from Angiers, so farre as Orleans.

King Childerick pursueth after Odouaricus.

Childericke, being vnwilling to endure, that these new-commers should paire his nailes, or haue any pertaking with him: departing from the Citie of Orleans, followed in the pursuite of Odouaricus, against whom Gillonus, Gouernor of Soissons, had sent succour to Count Paulus, Gouernour of Angiers. But in the heate of these proceedings, Gillonus being dead at Soissons, left there (as his Successour) his Sonne Syagrius, so that the expected succour wanted feete to come. By which meanes, Odouaricus and his followers made hauocke at their pleasure, all about the Towne of Angiers, compelling Count Paulus, and those of the Villages of the Riuer of Loire, to send him hostages. This was done in the yeare of Grace foure hundred foursecore and one.

The Romaines shut vp in Gaul yeelde to ioine themselues with King Childericke.

The yeare foure hundred foursecore and two, Count Paule requested assistance of King Childericke, against the said Odouaricus and his Saxones. For the Romaines being detained and shut vp in Gaule, without hope of seeing Italie any more: betooke themselues to ioyne with King Childericke, a Prince very valiant and generous, who receiued them into his protection and safeguard, permitting them to liue, habite themselues, and gouerne according to the Romaine manner, persieuering in the Orthodoxall Religion, so saith Procopius, in his first Booke of the Gothes warres. And that which moued the Romaine Legions, to surrender themselues rather to Childericke, then to the Bourgongnons and Vuisigothes, was, because they iudged the rule of Childericke more milde and sweete (although he was an Idolater and Pagan) then that of the Bourgongnons and Vuisigothes, who were infected with the Heresie of detestable Arrius, no beast being more cruell and bloody, then an Heretique against a Catholique; for their Dominion was tyrannicall, and not to be endured. This also was the occasion, that the same Romaines, whose dwelling was vnder controule of the said Vuisigothes and Bourgongnons, coueted nothing more, then to change their Maisters, and liue vnder the French. S. Gregory of Tours in his Historie of France, the second Booke and three and thirtieth Chapter, hath a Tract very remarkeable, following in these words.

No beast more tyrannous, then an Heretique against a Catholique.

Interea cum iam terror Francorum resonaret in his partibus, & Omnes eos Amore Desiderabili cuperent Regnare, Sanctus Aprunculus Lingonicæ Ciuitatis Episcopus, apud Burgundiones cœpit suspectus. Cumque odium de die in diem creseeret, iussum est vt clam gladio ferirctur. Quo ad eum perlato nuncio, nocte à Castro Diuionensi per murum dimissus, Aruernos aduenit, &c.

The Romans liuing among the Gaules.

Saluianus, Bishop of Marseilles in Prouence, in his fift Booke De Vero Iudicio, informeth vs, that the Romaines among the Gaules, affected rather to put themselues into the protection, and be in subiection to the French, then to their owne Gouernours. (This worthy man liued in the time of Merouæus, and of his Sonne Childericke.) Because, saith hee, each Romaine Gouernour, would fley off the skinnes of his owne Nation, and eate them to the very bones. Franci hoc scelus nesciunt. Itaque illic Romanorum omnium votum est, ne vnquam eos nesse sit in ius transire Romanorum; vna & consentiens illic Romanæ phalangis oratio, vt liceat eis vitam quam agunt agere cum Barbaris. Hinc accidit vt ad Francos potius, quàm ad Gothos, Hunnos, Burgundiones, Sueuos, vel Vandalos, quos omnes Gallias inuadentes Arianæ hæresis comitabatur, Gallorum Audia se conuerterint, quòd Catholicis populis tutior fides esset apud Gentiles, licet veræ Religionis ignaros, quàm hæreticos Catholicæ Religionis peruersores, atque persecutores. This Tract is very remarkeable, whereof I my selfe haue seene the practise at Mont-pellier, Nismes, Niort, Rochelle, and other Townes of the Kingdome.

And the same Saluianus obseruing the bountie of the French, and what singuler affection they extended to their guests, against whom they neuer knew what it was, to vse treason or perfidious dealing (which couered their imperfection, of being ouer-ready in speaking, or too much, and so, by consequent, very subiect to lying, as the Scripture saith: In multiloquio non desunt vanitas, atque mendacium.) This learned Bishop, making paralels of other strange Nations, with that of the French, saith, there was not any nation of the world more detestable, then that of Affrica; in his seaueth Booke of the Iudgements of God. Paganæ ac ferinæ Gentes & si habeant specialiter male propria, non sunt tamen in his omni execratione digna. Gothorum gens perfida, sed pudica: Alanorum impudica, sed minus perfida: Vranci mendaces, sed Hospitales: Saxones crudelitate efferi, sed castitate veneranda: Omnes quippe gentes habent sicut peculiaria mala, ita etiam quædam bona. In Afris penè omnibus insunt omnia mala: inhumani, impuri, ebrioſi, falſiſſimi, fraudulentiſſimi, cupidiſſimi, perfidiſſimi, & obſcoenis libidinum omnium impuritate, & blaſphemijs addictiſſimi.

A maker or vn-maker of Kings by the Nations.

If then the Nation of the French was beloued, and desired of the Orthodoxe Romaines and Gaules, although they were ingulphed at that time, euen in the depth and hell of Paganisme, honouring (as their Gods) Forrests, Riuers, Birds, Beasts and Idoles, fabrickt according to the representation of elementary bodies, & offering Sacrifices to them (as S. Oregory of Tours informeth vs in his Historie of France, the second Booke and tenth Chapter: by farre greater reason were they then, when they embraced the Faith of Iesus Christ.

Childericke thus followed by the French, and the Romaine Legions being also vnder his obedience; pursued the Saxons conducted by Odouacrius, whom he ouertooke neere to Saumur, as I haue red in an auncient Manuscript Chronicle, at S. Bertrand de Comenges, in the hands of a learned Diuine of that Church, named Sarton) and made a terrible slaughter of them: not onely on firme Land, but likewise in the Iles belonging to the Riuer of Loire, being couered ouer with dead bodies. So that the Saxon Odouacrius appeared no more in Gaule; but the Iles which hee had vsurped, remained onely to the French: As it is noted by S. Gregory of Tours in his Historie of France, the second Booke and nineteenth Chapter. *His itaque gestis inter Francos & Saxones Bellum gestum est. Sed Saxones terga vertentes, mult the Bourgongnons(who at that time domineered in Gaule, in all that extendure of the Countrey, which at this day is called the Dutchie and Countrie of Bourgongne) with the Kings whereof, this yong Syagrius had contracted such habitude and frequencie; that although he was a Romaine by originall and birth, instructed from his yongeſt yeares in good Letters, and eſpecially the readings of Cicero and Virgill, to vnderſtand eloquence and Romaine Poeſie (in both of which his great Vnckle Syagrius, the ordenary Conſull of Rome, had ſo excelled, as to preſerue the memorie of him, they erected his Statue of Braſſe) yet neuertheleſſe, as miſpriſing the Romaine tongue; hee addicted himſelfe wholly to the Germaine, ſuch as the Bourgongnons there ſpake, and wherein he was ſo expert, that hee pronounced it better then the Alemans themſelues, ſo that they ſtood in feare of faltring before him. And to doe him the greater honour, they named him the Solon, and Interpreter of their Lawes, whereat the Biſhoppe of Auuergne made a mockerie. Aeſtimari minima poteſt, quanto mihi, ceteriſque ſit riſui, quoties audio, quod te præſente formidet facere linguæ ſuæ Barbarus barbariſſimus. Adſtupet tibi Epiſtolas interpretanti curua Germanorum ſenectus, & negotijs mutuis arbitrum te diſceptatoremque deſumit. Nouus Burgundionum Solon in legibus diſſerendis, nouus Emphion in citharis, ſed tricordibus temperandis, amnis, frequentaris, expeteris, oblectes, adhiberis, eligeris, decernis, audiris. And in the end, ſhewing the folly of ſuch giddie-headed Courtiers, as affect rather to imitate, and counterfeit the geſts and ſpeech of ſtrange Nations, then to follow their owne, ſeruing (by thoſe meanes) for tales and laughter to euery one; hee counſelleth him to forſake that vicious humour. Reſtat vt cuſtodias hoc temperamentum, vt iſta tibi lingua teneatur, ne ridearis, illa exerceatur, vt rideas.

Syagrius the famous Conſull of Rome.

A diſcourſe whereto while worth hath him and is much affected

Clouis hauing proclaimed warre againſt the ſaid Syagrius, went to meete with him on the Plaines of Soiſſons, accompanied with the King of Cambray Ragnacaire, Sonne to Ragnacaire, the eldeſt Sonne to Clodion, King of France, and, without conteſting or bargaining vpon bare words; fell to handy-blowes, with ſuch aduantage to the part of Clouis, that hee wonne the victory, famous by the taking of Soiſſons, and flight of the Romaine Syagrius, who thinking hee had aſſured Bourgongne for his ſafe retreate; was expulſed thence by King Gondebauld, who feared to incurre the enmitie of Clouis, a youthfull Prince, wholly addicted to warre and courage. So that he was conſtrained to ſhelter himſelfe in the Court of Alaricus, King of the Vuiſigothes, at Toloſa, to whom Clouis in all haſte ſent his moſt faithfull Counceller Aurelianus, to ſay boldly from him: that either hee muſt deliuer him his enemy, or elſe prepare for warre. Alaricus greatly dreading the French, and doubting leaſt hee ſhould haue to deale with them ſooner then hee would; as it was the ordinary cuſtome of the Gothes, to liue alwayes in diſtruſt and feare, (ſo ſaith Saint Gregory of Tours) according to the nature of Heretiques, ſleeping with open eyes, and attentiue eares: He deliuered Syagrius (bound hands and feete) to the Ambaſſadour of Clouis, who within a ſhort while after, and without making any rumour thereof, rid the world of him. And ſo by his death, the Romans had no longer any command, place, or retreate in all Gaule.

The victory of King Clouis againſt the Roman Syagrius.

The end of the Romans command in Gaule.

Hic finis fatorum Romuli?

During this firſt warre of Clouis: there were many Churches robbed and ſpoyled by the French (as yet Idolaters and Pagans as well as their King.) Among others, they robbed one, wherein there was a Cuppe or Challice, of great and admirable worth, with the Caſket and Ornaments thereto belonging. The Biſhop of the place, ſent certaine of his Clergie men to the King, with humble entreatie, that he would be pleaſed, to reſtore the Veſſels & Ornaments of his Church, or, at the leaſt, that great Cup or Challice. The King commanded the ſaid Meſſengers, tv follow him ſo far as Soiſſons, at which place, all the ſpoyles and booties won in war, were to be ſhared and diuided among the Souldiors; and there (very willingly)

Spoyles won in war Ꝑared among the Souldiors.

ly) he would deliuer them the Cup they demanded, if it happened to his lot & partage. Being come to Soiſſons, the whole bootie was laid in a heape together, and the King made his requeſt to the troopes of Horſemen, in theſe tearmes: I pray you, O my braue and generous Warre-fellowes, that by way of right, and, as out of ſhare, you would giue me this Cup (pointing to that which the Biſhop had ſent to requeſt of him.) Immediately, the men of beſt iudgement in the company, returned him this anſwere. All the bootie heere, and all our goods are yours, euen as iuſtly as our liues (Moſt excellent King, full of all glorie) diſpoſe at your good pleaſure of all that is heere before you; for it appertaineth not to vs, to doe any thing contrary to your Will. At theſe words, one in the troupe; enuious, mutinous, raſh, and full of ſpleene, cried out in a fooliſh brauerie (lifting vp a Battell-Axe which he held in his hand, & letting it fall rudely on the Cup) and out-facing the King, replied: You ſhall haue nothing heere, except by lot and partage it fall to your ſhare. All there preſent, ſtanding as confounded with amazement, at the affronted impudence of this Gallant: the King endured the offence patiently, and taking the Cup vp, being bruiſed and battered as it was, deliuered it to the Biſhops deputies, awaiting fit time & opportunity, to make him know and feele what iuſtly belonged to his ouer-bold behauiour.

The beſt companies are not free fró one or other degenerate mindle among them.

At the yeeres end, the King made a generall Muſter of his Horſe-troupes in the field of Mars, to ſee in what condition they were accouſtred. Going himſelf in perſon throughout all the rankes & quarters of his troups; he came at laſt to him that had ſo raſhly offended the yeere before. How happens this? quoth he, Is this fit furniture for a Horſe man? There is not any man in the Army ſo much out of order, nor ſo badly armed as thou art: for this Lance of thine is not worth any thing; thy ſword is ruſty in thy ſcabberd, and this Battell-axe fit for no imployment. And as he ſpake the words, he raiſed vp the Battell-axe, and let it fall ſo heauily on his head, that he puſhed it in peeces, a iuſt payment in his owne coyne, ſaying. So didſt thou at Soiſſons the yeere paſt, vpon the Cuppe which was freely giuen me. The miſerable wretch lying there dead, and iuſtly puniſhed for his boldneſſe: it ſerued as a leſſon to the heads of Regiments, and a meet example for due obedience and honour to Princes, and after this was done, he diſmiſſed his Armie.

Raſh & ſaucie rudeneſſe very royally recompenced.

This act of Iuſtice, and puniſhment ſo exemplarly made, raiſed great hope in the Religious Catholikes: that God would (one day) open the eyes of this great Prince, and let him vnderſtand the vnprofitable ſeruice of his falſe gods, by breaking them in peeces, and giuing true worſhip to Ieſus Chriſt. According as it came to paſſe 9. yeres after; when making profeſſion of the Orthodoxall Religion, hee repaired his former offences committed during his Paganiſme, in robbing & burning Churches, rebuilded by his command, and richly endowed. Particularly that of Rheimes, which he ſtored with Riches, exquiſite Ornaments, endowments and great Signeuries: as it is declared in the Hiſtory of the Church at Rheimes, compoſed by Hincmarus the Arch-biſhop, and Floardus the Arch-Prieſt thereof.

Good beginnings are no meane encouragement to vertuous mindes.

Particularly (I ſay) hee enriched that Church, in fauour of Saint Rhemigius, whom hee affected with a fatherly loue, heaping honour and wealth vpon him, becauſe hee made him know the way to ſaluation, Baptizing and Sacring him.

For that Cup before remembred, Clouis gaue one of Siluer to the fore-ſaid Saint Rhemigius, as hee wrote himſelfe in his Teſtament. Aliud Argenteum Vas decem librarum; quod mihi ſæpe nominatus Dominus, illuſtriſque memoriæ Hludouicus Rex (quem vt prædixi) de Sacro Baptiſmi fonte ſuſcepi donare dignatus eſt, vt de eo facerem, quod ipſe valuiſſem; tibi Hæredi meæ Eccleſiæ ſupra memoratæ iubeo thuribulum, & Imaginatum Calicem fabricari, & Epigrammata quæ Lauduni (Laon in Laonnois, where Saint Rhemigius erected the Cathedrall Church) in argenteo ipſe dictaui, in hoc quoque inſcribi volo, quod per me faciam, ſi habuero ſpatium vitæ.

Clouis hauing made his firſt eſſay and attempt, againſt Syagrius; at the inſtant requeſt of his Mother, who much deſired to reuenge her ſelfe on the King of Thuringe Baſinus, for blazing euill Rumors abroad of her: hee vnderrooke the Warre of Thuringe, wherein he had the victory, making the Kingdome Tributary, and ſubiect to the Crowne of France, commanding the people there, to bee afterward gouerned and ordered according the Salique Law.

Clouis conquered Baſinus K. of Thuringe.

This

This hapned in the yeere of Grace, foure hundred foureſcore and fourteene, and the tenth of his reigne.

Three yeeres after, he re-conquered that which his Father had wonne on the Riuer of Loire, and after laid a long ſiege to the Caſtle of Meleun, a place then thought to be impregnable, which he gaue as a gift, and the whole Prouince about it, to his Loyall Counceller Aurelianus. For he the ſame yeere (ro wit, foureſcore and ſeuenteene) had managed the marriage of King Clouis his Maſter, with Clotilda, the Princeſſe of Bourgongne.

The race of the Kings of Bourgongne from Athanaricus the Tyrant.

Of the blood and race of Athanaricus, a King cruell and bloudy againſt Chriſtians, was borne Gondericus, King of Bourgongne, who had foure ſonnes, to wit, Gondebauld, Godegiſillus, Chilpericus, and Godomarus. Gondebauld the eldeſt ſonne, ſlew his Brother Chilpericus, and threw his Wife into the Riuer of Roſne or Rhene, with a great ſtone about her necke, and there ſhee was drowned. Chilpericus left two daughters, the eldeſt whereof being named Mucurna, was by Gombauld made a religious profeſſed Nunne: and as for the youngeſt called Crothilda, hee kept her neere vnto himſelfe.

The faireſt bodies doe vſually contain the faireſt ſoules.

Aurelianus, who oftentimes went and came into Bourgongne for his Maſter, hauing ſeene the young Princeſſe, endued with exquiſite beauty of body, and ſo (conſequently) of the ſoule, (for, according to the teſtimony of Diuine Plato, within the faireſt bodies doe ordinarily dwell the faireſt ſoules) made ſuch report of her to his maſter, that he reſolued to make demand for her of the King of Bourgongne, as accordingly Aurelianus did. Gombauld durſt not vſe any deniall; but hauing affianced her, after the ancient cuſtome of the French, he brought her into the City of Soiſſons, where the marriage was ſolemnized with all magnificence. So ſimply ſpeaketh S Gregory of Tours, in his ſecond booke and eight and twenty chapter; without ſpecifying what was the ancient cuſtome of Marriages obſerued by the Gaules and French.

Fredegarus the Scholaſticke, in his Hiſtory of France, obſerueth the ſame particularly, by this notable paſſage: Clodoueus Legatos ad Gondebaldum dirigit, petens vt Chrotilde neptem ſuam ei in coniugium ſociandam traderet. Quod ille denegare metuens, & ſperans amicitiam cum Clodoueo inire, eam daturum ſpopondit Legati offerentes Solido, & Denario, vt Mos erat Francorum, eam partibus Clodouei deſponſant.

Maides thus bought with the price of one Sol and one Denier (the ancient cuſtome whereof is yet ſtill retained at Paris, on the wedding day, to giue to the wife thirteene peeces of gold or of ſiluer, or a thirteene penny-peece at the leaſt) is in the Salique Law called in the old French Language, that is to ſay, High Dutch, Druchies: At the fourteenth title De Rapt, or rauiſhment of maides, the tenth Paragraphe. Si quis puellam, quæ Druchte (deſponſata) ducitur ad maritum, in via adſalierit, & cum ipſa violenter Mœchatus fuerit, VIIII. Denarios: qui faciunt ſolidos C C, culpabilis iudicatur.

Reaſons yeelded, why the husband bought his wife.

This Sol, and this Denier of ſiluer, was giuen to the Father of the Maide, to the Vncle, or to her neereſt Kinſman, to ſhew that ſhe was bought. And to the end that ſhe ſhould not expect to command her husband, but to obey him, and to doe him ſeruice. Becauſe, that by the meanes of this buying, it was publiquely vnderſtood, that the husband had power of her, both in life and death, as wee ſhall hereafter declare more at large.

Moreouer, euen to this day in Turkie, as well as in the Eaſt, as alſo the Eaſt & Weſt Indies, he that hath moſt daughters, doth enrich himſelfe by them.

Widdows alſo to be bought in their ſecond marriages.

In like manner, in the Salique Law, Widdowes comming to bee ioyned againe in ſecond marriage; he that was willing to eſpouſe her, ſhould enter bond and couenant, to pay vnto her neereſt Kinſman, a certaine ſumme of Deniers, which ſhe called Reippus in the Thioſte Language: that is to ſay, three Sols and one Denier of ſiluer. Si quis Homo moriens Viduam dimiſerit, & eam quis in coniugium voluerit accipere, antequam eam accipiat Tunginus vel Centenarius Mallum indicent, & in ipſo mallo Scutum habere debent, & tres homines cauſa tres demandare; & tunc ille qui viduam accipere vult, cum tribus teſtibus, qui adprobare debent, Tres Solidos Æque Penſantes, & Denarium Habere Debet, & hoc facto, ſi eis conuenit, Viduam accipiat.

At the ſecond Paragraphe of the ſame fortie ſixe Title De Reippis, hee that eſpouſed the the Widdow without paying this price, ſhould pay to the neereſt kinſman of the partie deceaſed, the Amercement ſpecified in the Law. Si vero iſta non fecerit, & ſic eam acceperit, ille cui Reippus debetur LIDs. qui faciunt Solidos LXII. culpabilis iudicetur.

At the third. Si autem quæ ſuperius diximus, omnia ſecundum Legem impleuerit, & Tres Solidos & Denarium ille cui Reippus detur acceperit, tunc eam legittime accipiat. And this arrerage of dutie, appertained to the Parents of the deceaſed, from degree to degree, euen to the ſixt knee, Vſque ad ſextum genuculum, as the Law it ſelfe ſpeaketh. And for want of kinred in the ſaid ſixt degree, this Reippus belonged, and was payed to the Kings Houſhold or Exchecquer; or to the Lord Feodall and Fee-farmer, and the Amercement before ſpecified. Si autem nullus niſi poſt ſextum genuculum proximus fuerit, in Fiſcum ipſe Reippus, vel cauſa quæ inde orta fuerit, colligatur.

The forme and ſtile of Contracts and marriage of the Ancient French, was preſcribed and taught vnto vs, by the Monke of S. Denys Marculphus. N. filius. N. puellam ingenuam nomine. N. illius. N. filiam, Per Solidum & Denarium Secundum Legem Salicam, & antiquam conſuetudinem deſponſauit.

The French hated Bigamy or ſecond marriage.

Now the reaſon why more Ceremonies were vſed at the marriages of Widdows, then of maides, was: becauſe the French (very ſeldome and rarely) ioyned againe in ſecond marriages; for they abhorred Bigamie, and plurality of Wiues: So wee are inſtructed by the Noble Romane Hiſtorian Tacitus, in the Tract which he wrote, De moribus Germanorum. Second marriage being alwaies exempted, eſpecially on the Womans ſide, as branded with the crime of impudicity, or of lubricitie. Melius quidem adhuc ea Ciuitatis (ſaith Tacitus) in quibus Tantum Virgines Nubunt, & cum ſpe, votoque uxoris ſemel tranſigitur. Sic vnum accipiunt maritum quomodo vnum corpus, vnamque vitam, ne vlla cogitatio vltra, ne longior cupiditas, ne tanquam maritum, ſed tanquam matrimonium ament. The whole deſire and ambition of maids, was, to be but once maried. She receiued her husband, to liue the reſt of her life with him, as one and the ſame bodie, and one and the ſame life. Her thoughts had no further expectation (after the death of her Spouſe) to combine againe a ſecond marriage. She had her heart, and the eyes of her body and minde, onely fixed vpon her houſhold affaires, and nurtriture of her children: Suæ quemque mater vberibus alit, nec ancillis, aut nutricibus delegantur. They tooke as great delight, in nurſing their children with their owne milke, as bringing them into the world.

The renowme of Maides to be but once married.

It was of this people that the great Tertullian ſpake: Monogamia apud Ethnicos ſumme inhonore eſt, & inſolentibus, & inauſpicijs prior eſt Vniuiræ locus, & ipſa Flaminia non niſi vniuira eſt. And to keepe the perpetuall fire in Rome (introduced by Numa Pompilius, in imitation of the Perſians and Iewes) they tooke none for Veſtalls, but ſuch as were borne of Father and Mother no Bigamies. Tacitus at the end of his ſecond Annales, ſpeaking of the daughter to Domitius Pollio, preferreth her before the reſt: Non ob aliud, quam mater eius in eodem coniugio manebat, becauſe ſhe had neuer conſented to a ſecond marriage.

And although it was the ordinary cuſtome among the wiues of the French, to haue their armes diſcouered, and their breaſts (as white as ſnow) bare, as Ammianus Marcellinus ſaith, which rather prouoketh deſire to women in an vntemperate man, then otherwiſe: yet ſo it was, that euery man contented himſelfe, without changing his owne fruite-basket; for Tacitus ſaith: Singulis vxoribus contenti ſunt. Alſo this was the reaſon, why the husband ſerued as a mirror and example to his wife, for making her modeſt.

Concerning a wife taken in the act of adultery, and her puniſhment.

And therefore ſo few Adulteries were noated among the French: Pauciſſima in tam numeroſa gente adulteria. And if the Husband tooke his Wife in the fault; he himſelfe, without any reſpect of her extraction, wealth, or age, acted his owne reuenge, and without any hinderance of the world. And hee that was moſt mercifull, ſatisfied himſelfe (hauing taken his Wife in the act) with ſhauing of her haire, and then ſtripping her naked in the preſence of her kindred and friends, thruſt her forth of his dores, and (in that manner) made her to walke about the City, that is to ſay, whipping her with rods, in ſight of all the neighbours. Acciſis crinibus nudatam coram propinquis expellit domo maritus, ac per omnem vicum verbere agit: publicatæ enim pudicitiæ nulla venia venia, non forma, non ætate, non opibus maritum inuenerit. Maides that had once made forfeit of their honor, and suffered the Cat to be ouer-freely familiar with the cheefe, could neuer make their part good, were she neuer so gilded with gold, or graced with the excellency of beauty. Nemo enim illic vitia ridebat, nec corrumpere, & corrumpi seculum vocabatur, saith Tacitus: It was not so then, as now in these times, when Riches is preferred before a Maid, (how infamous soeuer, or deriued from a Mother, that her life hath beene talked of) with her vertue and good manners. And what excuse serueth for all this? why, thus goes the world.

Cæsar speaking of the Marriages of the Ancient Gaules, setteth downe this in his sixt booke, De Bello Gallico. That men laid downe in a masse or heape, so much money as they receiued in marriage with their wiues; that the profit of the summe should be reserued, and remaine to the suruiuer of the two people married. Viri quamas pecunias ab vxoribus dotis nomine acceperunt, tantas ex suis bonis æstimatione facta cum dotibus communicant: huius omnis pecuniæ coniunctim ratio habetur, fructusque seruantur: Vter eorum vita superarit, ad eum pars vtriusque cum fructibus superiorum temporum peruenit.

The husband had equall power of his Wiues life and death.

Moreouer, that the Husband had equall power of the life and death of his Wife, as ouer their children. So that the Husband chancing to dye, vpon the least suspition to be had of his death so suddenly happening; the Parents and Kindred of the defunct, might put his widdow to the racke and torture, euen as if shee had beene a simple seruant. And if they discerned in her any euill demeanour, after shee had endured all kindes of punishments and tortures, they would commit her to be burned aliue. Viri in vxores sicut in liberos, vitæ, necisq; potestatem habent. Et cum pater familias illustriore loco natus discessit, eius propinqui conueniunt, & de morte, si res in suspitionem venit, de vxoribus in seruilem modum quæstionem habent, & si compertum est, igni, atque omnibus tormentis excruciatas interficiunt.

The case not so among the French, as it was with the Gaules.

Concerning this which Cæsar wrote of the Gaules, it was not common to the French, for the Maides portion and dowry set apart, with the profit: for in the case of first dying, it appertained to the Husband, or the Wife, because they gouerned themselues both after one manner. The husband pre-deceasing, might by his Testament or donation, among deeds of gift; giue and leaue to his wife the third part of his goods, gotten in the time of their marriage.

The Monke of Saint Denys Marculphus, in his Formularie of Law-pleadings, saith: Quod pariter stante coniugio adquisiuimus, prædicta Coniux nostra tertiam partem habeat. The Author of the prosecution or supply of S. Gregory of Tours, in his fourescore and fift chapter, speaking of the Treasure of Dagobert, saith: Humbertus Pontifex vrbis Coloniæ, & Pippinus Maior-domus cum aliquibus primatibus Austriæ à Sigoberto directi villam Compendium (Compaigne) vsque perueniunt, ibique thesaurus Dagoberti, iubent Nanthilde, & Clodouco instantia Aganis Maioris-domus præsentatur, & aqualance diuiditur: Tertiam tamen Partem de Qua Dagobertus Adquisierat, Nanthildis Regina Recepit.

The good housewifes portion.

This third part is called in the French Capitularies, Pars conlaborationes, the part of labourage or good huswiferie of the wife, in the time of her marriage. In the fourth booke and ninth Title, the Ordenance speaketh thus. Volumus, vt vxores defunctorum post obitum Maritorum Tertiam Partem Conlaborationis, quam simul in beneficio conlaborarunt, accipiant, & de his rebus, quas is qui illud beneficium habuit, aliunde adduxit, vel comparauit, vel ei ab amicis suis collatum est, has volumus tam ad Orphanos defunctorum, quàm ad vxores eorum pertinere. So that by this Ordinance, the third part should extend to the gettings and winnings, and Deeds of gift executed in the donors life-time; and by reason of death, the Testamentary Legacies, howbeit, before, vnder the first Ligne of the French Kings, this third part did not extend but onely to the moueables, and not at all to the immoueables. But returne we now to the ancient Ceremonies of marriages.

Marriages anciently contracted in three seuerall maners.

The buying of Wiues was in practise, not onely in strange Nations, but (by degrees) among the Romanes; for it is generally knowne, that the Ciuilians obserue Marriages to be formerly contracted in three seuerall kindes; two wherof were common with the French, Vsu, Confarreatione, & Emptione. The last was the most excellent and solemne, for the ancient Pagans beleeued, that the gods and goddesses vsed the same, in contracting Alliance and Mariage together. Horatius.

Teque sibi generum Thetis emat omnibus vndis.

Concubinage or keeping a harlot.

As for the other Ceremonie (the third was not done to this purpose) to speake plainely, was true Concubinage; which yet concluded in marriage at the last, after long vse and familiarity, which men then had with women for some space of time, maintaining them at bed and boord, as we vse to say.

To lodge together, eat and drinke,
Is meerely marriage, as I thinke.

Of Marriage termed Vsage.

But especially if they had any issue, which by marriage were legitimate. That manner of marriage by vsage, and tearmed Vsus by the Ciuill Lawyers, was practised by the ancient French (as yet it is to this day) and designed of them by this phrase of speaking: Nubere ad Morganaticam. Mention is made thereof in the second booke, De Feudes, at the nine and twentieth Title: De Filijs natis ex Matrimonio ad Morganaticam contracto. It was deriued from the ancient Salique Law, saith the Text at the same Title. Yet notwithstanding, I neuer read it in the Salique Law, but rather in the * Ripuarie (which was the ancient forme of proceeding before Pharamond) at the nine and thirtieth title, and in that of the Alemans, the sixe and fiftieth title. And this name of Morganatica, is deriued of Morgangheba, mentioned in the said Ripuarie Law.

Morganaticall, Matrimonie. *A Law agreeing with the Salique, both in substance and date.

This was the gift to buy pinnes withall, which the husband gaue to his wife, the morrow morning after the Nuptialls, as the price of her Virginity, and remembrance of their combined Alliance.

So Saint Gregory of Toures noteth in the ninth booke of his Historie, in the treaty betweene the Kings of France, Gonthran and Childebert the second. That the saide Kings gaue to their Spouses certaine Townes and Villages, to buy them pinnes and other pleasures, on the morrow morning after their wedding. De Ciuitatibus vero, hoc est, Burdegala, Lemouica, Cadurco, Benarno & Begarra, quas Gailesuindam Germanam domine Brunechildis, tam in dote, quam in Morganegiba, hoc est, matutinali dono, in Franciam venientem, certum est adquisisse.

All Nations obserue some ceremony in contracting marriage.

There is not any Nation in the world, how barbarous or badly gouerned soeuer it be, but hath some Ceremony or other in contracting marriage. The people of the West Indies haue their chiefe Priests, whom they call Papas, and they, after diuers Orisons and Prayers, according to their manner, take a corner of the Cloake or Mantle of the future Spouse, and tie or fasten it to a corner of the Brides Vaile; to let them vnderstand, that they are conioynd together by the bond of marriage. So writeth Iosephus Acosta, in his naturall history of the West Indies.

Those of the East Indies, and of China, are amply described by Hieronymus Osorius, and other Portugall discouerers of those people. And of further date by Iean Huges de Linscot, Hollander, and Francis Pyrard de Laual, a Frenchman; whereof Aimonius the Monke setteth downe the particularities, in his Historie of France, the first booke and third chapter.

The Christian speeches of Q. Chrotilda to her vnbeleeuing husband Clouis.

Saint Gregory of Tours telleth vs in his second booke, and nine and twentieth chapter, that Clouis had by his second wife Chrotilda, a sonne, the first borne, and shee desiring to haue him baptized in the Church, catechized her husband in this manner: The Gods which you worship, are but Gods of straw, who can neither doe seruice to themselues, nor to any other: For they are eyther hewne out of wood, cut out of stone, or made of Mettall, and the names which you impose on them, are of mortall persons, that neuer were Gods. As one called Saturne, who saued himselfe with his Father (that did eate his owne children) for feare they should be chased out of their dignity. Another named Iupiter, what was he but a most infamous man, the lewdest of all that could be lewd? Addicted wholly to Sodomie, Incest, and Whoredome; without abstaining from the knowledge of his own sister, making his vaunt in the Poets, that she was his sister and his wife.

Aſt ego quæ diuum incedo Regina, Iouisque
Et Soror, & Coniux.

What power haue your pretended Gods Mars & Mercury? They were rather Deuils, Sorcerers, & Magitians, then any diuine perſons. Good Sir, theſe abeare all this Cauillation of Dwells, & beleeue in him, who by his word alone created Heauen & Earth, the Sea and all that is in them, which (before that Word) had ſtill his being or ſubſiſtance. It is he only who made that great Eye of the world, the Sunne to ſhine, and fixed in the Heauen Cloudes of Diamonds, thoſe glorious twinkling Starres which giue luſtre to the night. Hee filled the Waters with Fiſhes ſweetly ſwimming, and ſtored the Earth with millions of creatures, as alſo the Ayre with Fowles, in number numberleſſe. By the very turning of his eye, are the fields diapred with flowres, & made golden coloured with Haruеſts, the trees laden with fruits, & the Vines dangled with blacke cluſters of grapes. He fabricked and made all man-kinde, and by his bountifull hand all creatures are nouriſhed and maintained; yea hee hath communicated himſelfe to Man, and heaped on him all fauours and bleſſings.

The vnchriſtian anſwere made by King Clouis to his Queene.

To theſe and the like holy remonſtrances, Clouis did long time lend a deafe eare, & perſiſting in his fond beleefe, anſwered his wife: That all things were created by the command of his gods, and as for hers, hee was without power, and was not begotten of the gods ſeede.

Chrotilda neuertheleſſe perſiſting in the Catholike faith, vſed the like good Counſell to her husband daily, concluding to haue her firſt-borne ſonne Chriſtened in the Church of the Orthodoxe Chriſtians. She commanded the Church to be moſt richly hung with Tapiſtries, euen the beſt that could be had, to the end, that exterior ceremonies might induce King Clouis to beleeue; but all exhortations preuailed not with him. The ſonne was baptized, and named Ingomer; but it came to paſſe that he died, being as yet In Albis; and in thoſe daies when the Catechumenes were clothed in white. Immediately was Clouis vp in Armes againſt his Wife, reproaching her God with impuiſance, and that (queſtionleſſe) the child had liued, if it had not beene vowed and conſecrated to her God, whereas now it died by being baptized.

Ingomer the firſt ſonne of King Clouis died a Chriſtian.

The Queene tooke all patiently, yeelding thankes to God, the omnipotent Creator of all things, that he had beene ſo gracious to her, to place the firſt fruits of her womb in his heauenly kingdome, for which ſhee did not a little reioyce, and ſo much the rather, becauſe ſhee well knew, that yong infants dying in the ſtate of Innocencie, are Angels before God.

Chlodomer the ſecond chriſtened ſonne of King Clouis.

The yeere following, ſhe was deliuered of another ſonne, who at the Sacrament of Baptiſme, was named Chlodomer, (Agathias the Greeke Author, who liued in the time when Clouis had his children, ſaith, that the eldeſt of them was named Childebert) who falling likewiſe ſicke, Clouis (according to his former) reputed it as dead already. It can happen (quoth he to his wife) no otherwiſe with this childe, then it did with the other: for it being baptized in the name of your Ieſus Chriſt, without all doubt it muſt needs dye. But the Queene was ſo earneſt in prayers, ſighes and teares to God, that the childe recouered health: whereupon ſhe ceaſed not night and day, her continued exhortations to her husband to forſake his falſe gods, and take knowledge of the true God. But ſhe could not preuaile, Clouis continued obſtinate in his wrong beleefe, vntill a certain time afterward, when, being troubled with affliction, he made his recourſe to that God which his wife adored, and which followeth in this manner.

The Hiſtory of the warre of King Clouis with the Alemanes.

In the yeere of Grace, foure hundred foureſcore and nineteene, Adalaricus King of Suaba, and Adalagerion, King of Bauaria, ioyned their powers together, ſtomacking (very grieuouſly) the aduancement of the French in Gaule, determining to withſtand any further proceedings, and to make a Conqueſt of their parts. Being come into the field with a mighty power, they paſſed the Rhine, putting to ſacke and ſlaughter all the Territories of Cologne, (the King whereof was called Sigebert, who was made lame of one leg, on the day of Tolbiac) & had his recourſe vnto Clouis his neereſt kinſman, as wee haue formerly ſaid, who preſently went to giue him ayde and aſſiſtance.

The Kings of the Alemanes and Clouis met to fight a furious and bloudy battell, in in the place called Tolbiac, In the ſame Territory of Cologne, & neer to the Rhine. At the firſt meeting and ioyning, the two Armies fought with equall aduantage: but the Alemans being the farre greater number, the French ſide began to diſhearten, and fall into diſorder; with a great ſlaughter of them. Clouis then called to memory, the God which his wife Chrotilda ſerued, & in his greateſt diſtreſſe, lifting vp his eyes to heauen (though they were full of teares, and his heart aking with griefe) ſuddenly he entred into this prayer.

The furious and bloudy battell fought at Tolbiac, neere to the Rhine.

The Prayer of King Clouis, vttered in his greateſt extremity.

IEſus Chriſt, who my Wife Chrotilda auoucheth to be the Sonne of the liuing God, and (as ſhe ſaith) hath all power of giuing ayde and ſuccour to the afflicted, and victory to all ſuch as put their whole truſt in thee: From the depth of my ſoule, I implore thy fauour, and the glory of thy ſupport. With proteſtation, that if it be thy pleaſure to giue me the honour of this battell, and the day againſt mine enemies, whereby I ſhall know in this need and extremitie whereto they haue brought me, the power and aſſiſtance, which all the people that worſhip thee, confeſſe to be in thee: I will henceforth beleeue in thee, & cauſe my ſelfe to be baptized in thy name. For I haue called vpon mine owne Gods, who are both dumbe and deafe, and I finde by proofe, that they are very farre off from mee, immooueable, and without vigour, to ſuccour ſuch as haue affiance in them. And therfore I ſhape my courſe to thee, O Lord Ieſus Chriſt, with firme purpoſe to abiure thoſe Idolls; deliuer mee therefore from this dangerous paſſage.

A Note well worthy the obſeruation.

His Prayer being ended (ſaith S Gregory of Tours) the Alemanes began to bee ſwallowed in among the French, being reuiued againe with freſh forces, who purſuing the point, ſlew the two Kings their enemies in the field: ſo that the remainder of the Armie, caſting downe their Armes, yeelded themſelues to Clouis. And after that day, the Alemans were reduced vnder the Lawes and obedience of the Kings of France, without any means of recouery, or making a diſtinct part to themſelues. So ſay Beatus Rhenanus, and his Countrymen, in their hiſtories of Alemaign, and Ioannes Auentinus, who deſcribeth the particularities of this memorable day, in his Annales of Bauaria.

Clouis ouer-heaped with victory, returning home into Gaule; made diſcourſe at large to his Wife, of the extremity whereunto hee was brought; the hazard of his owne and peoples liues, being vpon the point of flight: and that by calling on the name of Ieſus Chriſt, the honour and renowne of the victorie remained vnto him.

At theſe good tidings, the Queene ſent for ſecretly into the Court, S. Rhemigius, then Biſhop of the City of Rheims, to inſtruct the King in the Chriſtian Faith. Clouis willingly granted thereunto for himſelfe, but yet drew backe from embracing it without diſſembling: becauſe the French were wholly Idolaters, and could hardly like changing from their Idolatry. Libenter te, ſanctiſſime Pater, audiam, (ſaid Clouis to S. Rhemigius) ſed reſtat vnum, quod Populus qui me ſequitur, non patitur relinquere Deos ſuos: ſed vado, & loquor eis iuxta verbum tuum. Clouis hauing made an Oration to his Armie, for giuing them the firſt taſte of knowing the only God, whoſe power had granted the deſire of Clouis: the people with one voyce began al to cry; We renounce our mortall gods (O moſt mighty and milde King) and are reſolued to adore and follow the onely and immortall God, whoſe goodneſſe S. Rhemigius hath preached to vs.

Clouis yeelded faintly to become a Chriſtian.

The peoples generall renoncing Idolatry.

This being reported to the Biſhop, as one ouercome with vnſpeakeable ioy and gladnes, hee cauſed the Font of Baptiſme to be prepared, adorned the ſtreets & places of paſſage to the Church, with rich and coſtly hangings. Within the Church, it was beautified with fine white cloathes, bathing tubs, and ſuch other veſſels as ſerue for Baptiſm; beſide Incenſe & exquiſite perfumes, and ſuch ſtore of illumined waxe lights, as made the Church looke bright like the Sunne, and ſo filled with ſweete odours, that ſuch as entred thereinto, were rapt with admiration, as imagining themſelues tranſported into the ioyes of Paradiſe.

The Biſhops preparation for the Baptiſme.

The King marching along first of all, required the holy Bishop to giue him Baptisme, and so presented himselfe at the Font; euen like a new Constantine, being fully resolued, to cast off the olde leprous skinne of his Idolatry, and take a new one by washing and bathing himselfe in the true Riuer of Iordane, and so hee entred the Font in pompe, and greatnesse of courage. But S. Rhemigius gaue him this precept.

The Kings coming to the Font.

Mites depone colla Sicamber,
Adora quod incendisti, incende quod adorasti;

The Bishops words to the King.

Embrace the Faith of Iesus Christ in all humilitie; Adore that which heeretofore thou hast burned, and burne that which thou hast formerly adored. The King hauing confessed one Almighty God in Trinitie, was baptized in the Name of the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost; being annointed with Sacred Oyle, and the signe of the Crosse.

Of them that were baptized after the King.

After the King, more then three thousand men of his Armie were then baptized. Albofleda his sister was also baptized, who presently after passed out of this life into a better. His other sister Lanthilda, infected with the detestable Heresie of Arrius (as then the Bourgongnons and Vuisigothes were) was likewise re-baptized, after she had confessed the equality of the Sonne and holy Ghost with the Father.

Thus you see what as yet we haue obserued, of the Sacring and Baptisme of King Clouis, which hapned on Easter euen, beginning the Secular yeere fiue hundred: according to the ancient Annalist, S. Gregory of Tours, in his History of France, the second booke, and one and thirty chapter.

In further pursuing the life of this great Prince, he telleth vs, that the Kings of Bourgongne, Gombaula & Godegisilus, brethren, held that extendure of the Countrey, which lieth about Rhosne, and beyond Saosne, Rhone and Soane, and the Prouince of Marseilles, which is the maine Prouince. These Kings, as well as their people and subiects, were infected with the impious heresie of Arrius. These two Brethren being in contention, and at strife each with other, Godegisilus finding himselfe to be the weakest, and vnderstanding the victories of King Clouis; sent his Ambassadors secretly, to require his assistance, and to call his brother King Gombauld, to an equall portition of the lands betweene them, or else to deriue such annuall tribute from them both, as hee should please to impose vpon them. Clouis took hold of the offer, & forthwith raised a potent Armie, which instantly marched into Bourgongne. Gombauld seeing an Army entred on his land, made recourse to his brother Godegisillus, intreating his strong troups to assist him, knowing nothing of the treaty betweene him and Clouis. He had very goodly promises of succor & supply, while Clouis proceeded stoutly on in his purpose. These three Princes being in field, and comming neere to the Castle of Dijon; Clouis gaue offer of battell to Gombauld, who presently accepted it, thinking to be seconded by his brother. They fought vpon the Riuer of Ouische, and Godegisillus being ioyned with Clouis, God knowes what a slaughter was made in the Army of Gombauld; the most of them were hewn in peeces, and himselfe forced to flight towards the Riuer of Rhosne, & seek for safety in Auignion. This battell was fought in the yeere of Grace 501.

The two brethren Kings of Bourgongne.

Clouis taketh aduantage of the two brothers warre, but pretended traitor to the other.

Godegisilus recommendeth himself to Clouis.

Afterward, Godegisilus went to make his entrance in triumph at Vienna (in Dauphine) as if he had been peaceable possessor of his brothers kingdom, whom Clouis (in the meane while) pursued, and besieged him in Auignion, only to rid the world of him; because he had promise of the half of his kingdom, lying neerest to France.

Gombauld apprehending the issue, both of this siege, & likewise his life, detesting the treason of his brother, laboured to draw Clouis to partake with him: which hee did by meanes of mediation, and aduise of his faithfull Counseller, named Aredius, who, to bring his enterprise to full effect, went and yeelded himselfe to the seruice of Clouis, feigning (purposely) to be come from Auignion, & had left there Gombauld who by his speeches) wanted both succor and friends. This Aredius, hauing insinuated himselfe into the good liking of Clouis, by such faire parts as made him acceptable, began (on a day) to discourse on the siege, which seemed to grow irkesome to Clouis. And taking Occasion by the fore-top, for doing good seruice to his Master, he gaue him counsell to stand no longer wilfully vpon the Siege, which might [illegible] respite of time, then he had reason to afford; in regard of the potent Castle, and strength of the wals.

Aredius loyal seruice to his Master.

He

He thought it fitter for him, to attempt another course, and try whether Gombauld would speake French or no, and yeeld himselfe tributarie to King Clouis: who allowing the motion to be good, sent the same Aredius to his Prince Gombauld, who agreeing vpon an annuall tribute, satisfied and contented Clouis for his warre-charges, giuing him assurance for keeping his promise afterward faithfully.

Successe of sieges are doubtfull, when they last ouer-long

Gombauld hauing taken breath a while, refused to pay the tribute to Clouis, and bringing an Armie secretly into the field, went directly to Vienna, to infest his brother Godegisilus. The siege drawing on in length, and the Prince fearing to be famished, sent forth all vnprofitable mouthes, and the vnseruiceable baser people: Among whom was the Conduit-maker of the Citie, who had charge of the water-pipes, and their courses of passage. This man, offended to bee thus thrust out among the rascalitie: prouided and made meanes for Gombauld, that he should enter into the Citie, onely by those water-conueyances; as hee did, this Fontenier seruing as his guide and conduct. At a Conduit head hee made way for him and his Armie, and so passing along couertly vnder the ground, suddenly arose with such aduantage, that he surprized Godegisilus, who had taken refuge with his Arrian Bishop in their Synagogue, and there they both were beaten downe. The French which were in Garrison at Vienna, kept themselues strongly within a Tower: but being narrowly pressed, yeelded vpon safety of their liues, Gombauld sending them in exile to Tolosa, the abiding of Alaricus, King of the Vuisigothes. The Senators of Bourgongne were all put to the sword, for taking part with Godegisilus, whose kingdome and Seigneuries the said Gombauld possessed, and that is it which properly is called Bourgongne. This Gombauld was author of the Bourgongnons Law, called by his name (to this present) Gombette, very neere to that of the Romanes, whom he highly fauoured. There is therein a Title of Duells and Combats, and other proofes by fire, water, and the crosse: against which, the Archbishop of Lyons, named Agobardus or Agobo, wrote a remarkeable Treatise, inserted amongst his other workes (at this day to be seene) by the deceased Papyrius Massonus.

Gombauld breakes promise with Clouis, and besiegeth his brother Godegisilus.

Necessary members in a City are not rashly to be excluded.

The Law Gombette, so named of Gombauld.

Alaricus, King of the Vuisigothes, perceiuing that Clouis in greatnesse increased daily: desired to make him his friend, and sent his Ambassadors to him, to mediate an enter-view betweene them, for contracting brotherly league and alliance together. The place of enterview was made choise of, in an Iland belonging to the Riuer of Loire, neere to the Towne of Amboise, in the Dioceese of Tours. There the two Kings met, conuersed and dined together, and hauing afterward contracted peace betweene them; each returned home to his Kingdome. This enterview happened in the yeere of Grace, fiue hundred and sixe, according to the supputation of Sigibert.

A League of Peace between the two kings, Clouis and Alaricus.

This Alliance was but of slender continuance; because Clouis, perceiuing that Alaricus had fought it for feare of the French (euery where victorious, and to make no more Warre on him) then any friendly amitie indeede: sent to defie, and proclaime Warre against him; except he would forsake Aquitaine, and all that he possessed in Gaule, which could not obey two Maisters, nor two Sunnes to shine vpon them. Alaricus then made his abiding at Poictiers, and Clouis hauing his Armie ready for the fight, marched straight to Poctiers, trauersing ouer Tourraine, where (on paine of death) hee prohibited the taking of any thing from Churches, and sanctified places in the City and territory of Tours, in memorable reuerence of S. Martin, the second Apostle of the French, to whom he sent Offerings, and receiued assured hope by diuine Soothsayers, of winning victory against the Vuisigothes, so saith S. Gregory of Tours. Huncmarus writeth in the life of Saint Rhemigius, that Clouis, before he went to fight with the Vuisigothes, came and receiued the fatherly benediction of Rhemigius, and vndoubted hope to returne with victory, as also a Bottle of Wine, which lasted so long as the Warre endured, to his no little admiration. As he would haue passed the Riuer of Vienna with his Armie, he could by no possible meanes finde any Foord; which yet in the night-time was strangely shewne him. For he hauing spent the whole night in prayer; euen at the point of day, a goodly Hinde stood before him, and entring into the Riuer, serued as guide to him and the whole Armie, which passed ouer without encombrance:

Clouis sendeth defiance to Alaricus.

Clouis encamping in the night time neere to Poyctiers, a flame and piller of fire was seene issuing from forth the Church of S. Hillarie, and lighting directly vpon the Campe: which serued as an assured presage, that the hand of heauen was his Lanthorne and guide, to haue the vpper hand and victory ouer those Arrian heretiques.

Clouis camped neere to Poictiers.

The two Armies ioyned in the new-shorne fields, within fiue miles of Poictiers, at a place called Vogledim, the French making fiercely vpon the Vuisigothes, shewed good experience of their valour: and the enemies constrained to flie confusedlie; Alaricus was met by Clouis, who slew him with his owne hand, enioying the intire victory with the head of his enemy, and the whole Campe, with the spoyles thereof, which he carried with him to his Kingdome.

The Visigoths vanquished, & Alaricus slain by Clouis.

The particularities of this famous battell, were the death of Alaricus, slaine by the hand of the chiefe of the contrary part; which the Romans expressed in these tearmes of Optima Spolia. Clouis had vnder his Coronet fighting with him, his Cousin Chlodericus, Sonne to the King of Cologne Sigebert the Lame, who performed wonders in the battell of Tolbiac. After the death of Alaricus, two of his followers sought to reuenge it on Clouis, purposing to haue his life likewise, by piercing their Launces thorough both his sides. But such was the goodnesse of his Cuirace, that it withstood the stroakes, and his horse being full of courage, carried him speedily out of the crowd. The most part of the Senators and Noblemen of Auuergne, conducted by Apollinaris, Gouernour of the Country, were put to the edge of the sword.

The memorable occurrences of that notable battell.

Gesiticus, the bastard sonne of Alaricus, seeing his father slaine in the field, immediately fledde, and sauing himselfe in Narbona, was there proclaimed King, whereof he held the title foure yeere, or thereabout.

The bastard sonne of Alaricus proclaimed himselfe King.

Clouis making good vse of his victory, sent his sonne Theodoricke to possesse himselfe of Auuergne, Albigeois, Rouergne, and the neighbouring Countries. Also to besiege Carcossona, where the forces of the Ostrogothes King of Italie, named Theodoricke too, were, but hee dislodged them thence. In the meane while, Clouis wonne Gascoigne and Guienne, but chiefly Bourdeaux; whence he caused to be brought from Tolosa (the capitall City belonging to the Kings of the Vuisigothes) the treasures of Alaricus and his predecessors. Afterward hee went and besieged Angoulesme, the walls whereof (euen miraculously as it were) fell at the sight of the Banner of France. And so this Prince, couered ouer with Lawrells of Victory and Triumph, came to yeeld thankes to God in the City of Tours, vpon the Tombe of S. Martin. This battell of Vogledim was fought in the yeere of Grace, 507. but by some, 509. in the 25. yeare of King Clouis his reigne.

Theodoricke, sonne to King Clouis.

The Kings of the Vuisigoths their chiefe Citie.

While hee soiourned in the City of Toures (this is recorded in the yeare fiue hundred and eight) the Emperor of the East, named Anastasius (a coniured enemy to the Ostrogothes and Vuisigothes) hearing tidings of the Victory won by Clouis, sent his Ambassadors to him, to congratulate his happy successe, with presents and rich ornaments, which the Romane Emperors vsed to send and giue to victorious Princes.

Anastasius Emperour of the East, sendeth Ambassadors to Clouis.

The passage in Saint Gregory of Tours, is corrupted through ignorance, concerning the Title of Patrician and Consull, in regard that of Patrician, was inferior in honour to that of Consull: And in the Consulary Fasts, the name of Clouis is neuer read, in quality of a Consull ordenary, or extraordinary, as it remaineth to be obserued.

Clouis entertained the Ambassadors of Anastasius with Triumphes in the Church of S. Martin at Tours, cloathing himselfe with the Ornaments sent him, and wearing on his head a rich Crown of gold, sumptuously adorned with precious stones, such as the publique seruant of the Common-wealth weareth, when he entreth triumphally into the City of Rome.

The royall entertainment of the Emperors Ambassadors.

In thus manner he set forward from the Pallace of S. Martin, mounted on a goodly Courser, vnto the great Church of the City, giuing largesse to the people all the way, in bountifull summes of gold and siluer, which hee threw abroad with his owne hands, in signe of Royaltie and reioycing.

Within

Within a while after, Clouis remoued to Paris, which he made the capitall City in the Kingdome of France: so saith S. Gregory of Tours, in his second booke, and 38. chapter. Egressus autem à Turonis Parisios venit, ibique Cathedram Regni Constituit. He builded his Pallace on the Mount of Paris, vpon the olde foundation whereof was erected the Abbey house of S. Geneuiefue; which Pallace was adioyned thereto by Clouis and his Queene Chrotilda, at the instant request of S. Geneuiefue (which Virgin liued aboue fourescore yeeres, and had seene the reignes of Meroueus, Childericke and Clouis) of most royall construicture, with a goodly Church (called by Gregorie of Tours Basilicam) in memory of S. Peter and Paule, the chiefe of the Apostles, where the foresaid Virgin had sometime erected a Chappell and Oratory, which Dionisius Areopagita (remaining then at Paris) had dedicated to the Apostles his Masters, and there vsually hee exercised his deuotions, and S. Geneuiefue chose her buriall to be there, rather then in any other place.

Now, there is euident appearance, that Clouis elected Paris for the Capitall City of his kingdome, rather then Tours, Orleans, Rheimes, or Soissons, where formerly he had made his abiding: because, ouer and beside the commodity of sixteene Riuers, which by diuers passages came to bury themselues in the great Riuer of Seine, and made Paris to abound with all benefits, for the maintaining of so great a people: This City stood in the nauell or middle of his Monarchie, for he enioyed (in full possession) from Paris, so farre as to the Pyrenean Mountaines, holding Poictou, Anion, Aquitaine, part of Largiedock, Albigeois, Quercy, Rouergne, Auuergne, the Forrests of Beaulieulois, with Lyons, and all that appertained to the Kingdome of Bourgongne, beyond the Riuer of Rhosne, and on this side Saosne.

The reason why Clouis made his choise of Paris, rather then any other Citie.

The large extent of the lands belonging to Clouis.

On the North side he held the two Belgiaes, so farre as to the Riuer of Rhine, and beyond that in Alemaigne, all the said Country of Suaba, Alsatia, and the most part of Swetia; whereof, next and after the battell of Tolbiac, hee made a State, in Title of the Duchie of Alemaign, ordaining for Gouernor of the whole body, a Duke, & Countes in each other Country. All the great Realme of Bauaria was likewise vnder the Soueraignty of France; for after the death of Adalagerion (happening at Tolbiac) Clouis gaue this State to the Sonne of the said King, named Theodon, with the Title of Duke only: as also charge and condition, to hold it in Fiefe and Liege homage to the Crowne of France, without any other addition at all, of Honour.

Or Halsatia.

Bauaria vnder the soueraignty of France.

The greatnesse of King Clouis his Conquests, may be knowne by the partition which he made to his foure sonnes after his death, diuiding his kingdom into foure equall portions. Ad qua Lance, saith Gregorie of Tours, in his third booke and first chapter. Childebert, as eldest of his legitimate children, had to his lot and partage by preference, the City of Paris. Clodomire, Orleans: Clotharre, Soissons, as Capitall Cities of their Kingdomes; comprehending the whole extendure from Seine to the Pyrenean Mountaines, and part of Belgicke Gaule. As for Thierry, eldest sonne to Clouis (but by his Concubine before marriage) hee had that of Mentz, the Kingdome whereof contained the Duchie of Alemaigne beyond the Rhine, and some places on the hither side, with the homage of Bauaria. This Realm was called Austrasia. This Thierry or Theodoricke, returned from chasing the Vuisigothes out of Languedock, when Clouis establisshed his royall seat at Paris; till then, Clouis had the commendation of a valiant & iust Prince, sought to by strange Princes for friendship, and feared of his neighbours. But when he saw himselfe at rest and repose; hee soyled his renowne and reputation with such a foule staine of oyle: as all the Machiauelists and historians, that sought to conceale it from publique shame, could not deuise to wipe it out. For, to enlarge his greatnesse further vpon his owne kinred, he caused them to be slaine and massacred one after another; without leauing any one of them aliue, that could concerne him in kindred. He began with the descendants of Clodion, the sonne of Pharamond.

How Clouis diuided his kingdome to his foure sons.

The kingdom of Austrasia.

In what manner Clouis lost his fame and reputation.

We haue formerly obserued, that Sigebert, tearmed the Lame, one of them that was King of Cologne; whose sonne was named Chlodericke, who fought valiantly on the day at Vogledim: Clouis sent secretly some of his familiars to the said Chloaerick, to stir him on in contriuing the death of his father, who had (as we vse to

A son instructed by Clouis to murder his owne father, which within a while after he did to say) one foote already in the graue, offering him the meanes, and his friendship for supporting him in his fathers kingdome.

The Prince being desirous to reigne, resolued to doe it, as hee did immediately after: for Sigibert being on a day gone forth of the Citie of Cologne, and past ouer the Rhine, to hunt in the forrest Boucane :. As he reposed himselfe after dinner in his Tent or Pauillion, Childericke most inhumanely massacred him. So soone as he sent newes of his Fathers death to Clouis, he also entreated him to send some of his trustiest followers, to take such portion of the defuncts treasures, as should stand with his owne liking, which accordingly he did. As Chlodericke shewed the deputies from Clouis, the precious moueables of his father one after another; he brought them to a great Chest: In this Chest (quoth hee) my Father hoorded vp his gold and siluer. And as hee stouped his head into the chest, to ransacke it to the very bottome, one of Clouis his followers (who had the watch-word giuen him) gaue him such a stroke with an axe on the head, as made his braines to flye about the roome, and he lay sprawling on the ground.

A iust reward for men that would kill his father.

Clouis being aduertised of his death, went in all possible haste to Cologne, where he caused the people to be assembled, and like a hungry Lion, couered with the Foxes skinne, made before them this goodly Oration.

The Oration of King Clouis, spoken to the people of Cologne.

I Like to mee good people. As I was rowed for my delight vpon the Riuer of Escauld, Chlodericke, sonne to my Cousin Sigibert your King, perswaded his Father, that I was desirous to haue him kill him. Which hee hauing fully setled in his braine, ouer-ruled him to part out of Cologne, and flie for safety into the Forrest Boucone, where the said Chlodericke murdered his father. And hee himselfe, vainely shewing his Treasures to idle companions, was deformedly slaine in the same place. Of both which murders I sweare to you, that I was altogether innocent. For can it be possible, that I should haue so cruell and fellon ous a courage, as to shed the blood of my neerest kindred? There is not any likelihood or appearance. But seeing it hath thus come to passe, I would aduise you (if so it might stand with your liking) to choose me for your Prince, and commit your selues into my safeguard and protection.

As Pilate was in washing his hands.

The men of Cologne being quickly contented, accepted him as their King, crying with shouts of ioy, and clapping of their hands, Vive le Roy; exalting him vpon a shield, and carrying him three times about the whole assembly: So saith S. Gregorie of Tours. Vn plaudentes tam palatis, quam vocibus, eum Clypeo exactum super se Regem constituunt. And so Clouis became enriched with the riches and kingdome of Sigibert.

With whom he caused to keep company, Chararick or Ararick King of Haynault, another kinsman of his. He called to mind, that when hee won the battell against Syagrius, King of Soissons, he had requested the ayd of his Cosin Ararick, who indeede came with his Armie; but he kept himselfe aloofe off, doing nothing, like a Neuter, attending who should haue the better of the day, to ioyne then with him, and require his friendship. And as neutrall people are alwaies reputed and held to be enemies and traitors, according to the common saying; Qui pro me non est, contra me est: So Clouis, keeping a choake-Peare in his pocket for this Prince, came and besieged him, and hauing so narrowly constrained him, that both hee and his sonne yeelded to his mercy, with safety of their liues: he caused them to be bound and manacled, their haires shauen off, (because they ware them long, like Princes of the bloud of France appointing Ararick to be a Priest, and his sonne a Deacon. And as Ararick grieued and complained of his hard fortune, his sonne, plucking himselfe by the small-increasing locks of his head, comforted him in this manner. These tender twigs of a tree yet fresh and greene, will not die altogether, but spring againe as formerly they did: Oh would God were so well pleased, that the author of this our disgrace might as soone be quite cut off.

Ararick King of Haynault Cousin to Clouis.

How Clouis dealt with Ararick and his sonne.

A comfort to miserable men in their misfortune.

These words being reported to Clouis, he sent them solemne threatnings: and (soone soone after) putting them both to death, possessed himselfe of their Kindome, and what treasures else they had beside.

Ragnacaire, King of Cambraye, had couragiously assisted him against the same Syagrius the Romaine, King of Soissons, Sonne and successour to Gillonus, as Saint Gregory of Tours speaketh in his second Booke, the twenty seauenth Chapter. Super Syagrium Romanorum Regem Clodoueus cum Ragnacario parente suo, quia & ipse Regnum tenebat, veniens, campum pugnæ præparari deposcit. This Ragnacaire was a very debosht and so infected with whoredome, that he would make no spare of his very neerest kinswomen. He had for his principall minnion and Councellour, a famous Pander and Bawde, named Pharao, on whom he bestowed all whatsoeuer was giuen to him; commonly vsing to say, This is for me, and my Pharao. Which animated the French Subiects of his Kingdome against him, whereof Clouis being aduertised, and liking well their discontentment, he wrought so with the chiefest of them, that hee would deliuer him their King, giuing them a certaine number of Weapons, Armours, Bauldrickes and Girdles for Knights, of pure Gold, but Clouis made them of guilded Brasse, and so sent them to them, marching on his Armie in the meane while, to besiedge Cambraye. Now, as Ragnacaire sent to discouer the forces of Clouis; those men themselues, that had made marchandise of him, when hee desired to know the enemies number and condition: they payed him with his owne ordenarie words; They are not enow for you, and for your Pharao.

Ragnacaire and his Pander Pharao.

Ragnacaire bound and sold by his owne Lords.

Vpon this contempt of his enemy, accompanied with his Brother Richarius, Ragnacaire went to meete with Clouis: who as speedily droue his Armie into disorder, and he thinking to withdraw out of the presse, was taken by his owne people, with Richarius his Brother, and both of them (being bound hands and feete) were so presented to Clouis, who conuerting his speech to Ragnacaire, vsed these words. Why hast thou bin such a base and contemptible villaine, to shame our Race, and suffer thy selfe to be taken, bound and manacled, as in this case thou art brought before me? Thou shouldst rather haue torne thy selfe in pieces. And, as he spake these words, he cleft his head in twaine with an Axe. As much he did to his Brother, reproching him, because he had giuen him no better assistance; but permitted him (as also himselfe) to be so basely bound, like to a thiefe and malefactor.

Both the Brothers deuided bound & Clouis.

The death of Ragnacaire & his Brother Richarius.

After the death of these two Brethren, the Merchants and sellers of their liues, hauing discouered how well they were recompenced, and with a false kinde of paiment: made their complaint to Clouis, who returned them this answere. Such men as haue basely betraied their Lord and Prince, deserue to haue no better paiment. Well may they content themselues, that they haue their owne liues saued, onely by my goodnesse and clemency: whereas contrariwise, they should iustly be tortured with torments and corrections, as a due recompence to their villanie and treason. And thus, by the death of these two Brethren his Cousines, he possessed himselfe of their Treasures and Seigneuries, both of the Cambresis, and them of Artois, with other places vnder their obeysance.

The answere of King Clouis to the sellers of their Lord and Maister.

These two before named, had yet another Brother named Ricomer, to whom, for his faithfull seruices and succours, against Odouacrius and his Sesnes or Saxons; Childericke, Father to Clouis, had giuen the gouernment of Mans: Clouis caused him to be slaine, and enioyed all his possessions. As much did he to other Kings and great Lords, who were the neerest in kinred to him; as Saint Gregory of Tours telleth vs in these tearmes. Interfecit & alios multos Reges, & Parentes suos primos, de quibus zelum habebat ne ei Regnum auferrent, & ita Regnum suum per totas Gallias dilatauit. This passage giueth vs clearely to vnderstand, that he fought wholly to exterminate the race of Clodion, before whose Children, Merouæus, Grandfather to Clouis, was preferred in the arising Kingdome of Gaule. And declareth the ignorance of Richard of Vassebourg, and an infinite number of false Historians, who deriue the very greatest houses of Europe from the descent and ligne of Clodion, to giue them the greater aduantage of Precedency and honor (meerely imaginary, and set downe in painting) aboue the Monarches of the Lillie, and to bring their naturall and legitimate possession, within compasse of compromise; it being continually perpe-perpetuated from twelue hundred yeares hitherto, without any let or intermission.

Herein likewise may be seene their impertinency, who for more honoring the Kings of the second and third Ligne, descended from Ansbert, called the Romaine Senatour (albeit a Gaule borne by Nation, and a great Lord in Austrasia, which is Lorraine) doe fetch his birth and originall from the said King Clodion: feigning his transport from thence to Rome, where he was made a Senatour, to auoide the furie of Clouis, wholly bent to the totall ruine of his collaterall kinred. Being also vterly ignorant, that in those times, Rome had not any Emperours, and that both it, and all Italie, were subiected vnder the command and Seigneurie of the Arrian Ostrogothes, and of their King Theodoricke. They knew not, that this Ansbert (howsoeuer named the Senatour) was a naturall Gaule, as we haue already said, and so shall doe elsewhere, and no Romaine: And that the whole power of the Romaines in Gaule, was quite quenched by Clouis, according as wee haue formerly obserued.

Of Ansbert the Romaine Senatour, and his Originall.

Proued to be a Gaule borne, and no Romaine.

Clouis, to make yet a further discouery, whether he had any more kinred or no; being one day in good company, and feigning to complaine for the death of them, who had bin dispatcht out of the world by himselfe; spake thus. Vnhappy man (quoth he) as I am, to be thus left alone, like vnto a poore Pilgrime among Strangers, I haue not one kinsman left to helpe me, if any disaster of Fortune, or whatsoeuer else inconuenience should happen vnto me. But he spake not this, saith S. Gregory of Tours, as grieuing that he had bin the death of his kinred: but rather in mallice and deceit, to try if any more remained aliue, that he might likewise be rid of them: Hoc non de mortuis Parentum condolens; sed dolo dicebat, si forte potuisset adhuc aliquem reperire, vt interficeret.

The diligence and practise of King Clouis.

And to shew the Iustice Diuine falling vpon him, hee dyed in the floure of his age, being not fiue and forty yeares old, fiue yeares after the Battaile of Vogledim. He reigned but thirty yeares, departing out of this life into another, the yeare of Grace fiue hundred and fourteene: an hundred and twelue yeares after the death of Saint Martin, which happened the sixteenth yeare after the Councell held at Treuers, the eight of the Empire of Arcadius and Honorius. Whereupon it is to be noated, that the Gaules began their yeare on the night of Saint Martin in winter (an Antiquitie obserued to this instant, in the Courts of Parlement in France) accounting the Reigne of their Kings, from the death of the said Saint Martin of Tours. Clouis was buried in the Church builded by himselfe on the Mount of Paris, now dedicated to Saint Geneuiefue. And Chrotilda passed the yeares of her widdowhood at Tours, seruing in the Church of Saint Martin, and comming to Paris oftentimes. In the yeare fiue hundred and twelue, according to the testimony of Sigibert, Clouis caused the first Councell of Orleans to be held, to bring the French Church againe into her luster and splendour.

The death of King Clouis, in the very floure of his time.

We haue bin enforced to continue the Originall of the French, so farre as to the end of the life and Reigne of Clouis, for the better clearing of our History, which (vntill his time) was wonderfully intricated: there being very few Historians, that would take any paines, to make an exact enquirie; as accounting that for coine of the best allaye, which they receiued from Hunibauld, Trithemius, and other reporters of Fables and Lies. Come we now to the Sacring and Baptisme of King Clouis, and to the holy Bottle or Viole.

The Conclusion of the Originall of France.

CHAP

Of the Miracle of the Holy Bottle or Viole, and other things happening at the Sacring of King Clouis. Of the Armes and Banner of France; And that of S. Denis in France. Of curing the disease called the Kings Euill. And of the Kings Regall Prerogatiue.

THere are some French Historians, who haue passed ouer with silence, many particularities of the French History: As those of the Holy Bottle; the Banners of France, and of S. Denis, and curing the disease of the Kings Euill, reserued onely to the Kings of France. Or else they haue put them to compromise, or doubtfully called them in question, because all the reason they can alleadge, is: that S. Gregrery of Tours, the onely ancient Historian of France, hath spoken nothing of them in his History. I thinke the most part of these Pyrroniste Historians, and a number of such as will credit nothing, except it be set downe in sacred Scripture; will make as little account of these particularities, although they had bin written by S, Gregory of Tours: as they doe of the miracles reported by him in the same History, and in his workes De Gloria Martyrum, & Confessorum.

Matters omitted by diuers Historians.

Some kinde of people will not credit any thing.

Were it nothing else but the credence of our Fathers, who haue giuen them vnto vs, and left them by tradition from hand to hand, and from one age to another, for memories and remembrances; surely it were sufficient. But because the curious doe couet more illumination, and to see by a perfect light indeede: we will set downe good proofe in writing, by faithfull witnesses, and by experience, which shewes it selfe daily to the eyes of the world. And we will begin with the particularities of King Clouis his Sacring, and of the Holy Viole or Bottle.

So soone as the tydings were known, of the Battaile at Tolbiack, S. Vast, Bishop of Arras, Diuinely inspired, concerning the vowe which Clouis had made to become a Christian: went to meete him in the Village of Toull, on the frontiers of Austrasia. Vast accompanying the King, to bring him to Rheims to the great S. Rhemigius, the light for doctrine and sanctity of life, to all the Prelates of his time. It chanced, that at passing the Riuer of Aisne, in a small Hamlet, then called by the people of the Countrey Vngise, neere to the Borough of Reuly, a blinde man came and presented himselfe to S. Vast, coniuring him by the name of God, to take pitty on him, and to giue him sight. S. Vast made his prayer in these words.

The vow of King Clouis at the battaile of Tolbiacke to become a Christian.

Sweete Lord Iesus Christ, who art the onely light, and who didst open the eyes of a more man borne blinde, that beleeued in thee: open the eyes of this man here, to the end, that all the French people here present, may beleeue, that thou art the onely God, who worketh wonders in Heauen, and on Earth.

The Prayer of S Vast.

And making the signe of the Crosse on the blinde mans eyes, and touching them with his hand; immediately he gaue him sight, to the great amazement of the King, and the whole Armie. As it is written by Albinus Flaccus, in the life of the said Bishop, reported by Surius in his first Tome, vnder the sixt day of the Moneth of February.

To bedewe this new plant, with cleare water of Celestiall Doctrine, S. Solenne, Bishop

Bishop of Chartres, ioyned himselfe on the way with S.Vast, as Sigibert informeth vs, vnder the yeare foure hundred and nintie, and both of them together, pertaining in one and the same holy desire: prepared Clouis to receiue Baptisme, by the hand of S.Remigius at Rheims.

Being there arriued, the Church was prepared with rich Ornaments, Waxe lights and Torches, Floures and Perfumes, as also the Fonte. The Sacring was preceded with an infinitie of Miracles, as is written in the Buls of Pope Hormisda, in the Legation sent by him to the said S.Remigius, throughout the Kingdome of France; as is reported by Surius, in the life of the said Rhemigius, vnder the thirteenth of Ianuary, in these tearmes. Vices nostras per omne Regnum dilecti, & spirituales Filij nostri Ludouici, quem nuper, adminiculante superna gratia, plurimis, & Apostolorum temporibus æquiparandis signorum Miraculis prædicationem salutiferam comitantibus, cum gratæ integra conuertisti, & sacri dono Baptismatis consecrasti.

Hincmarus, Archbishop of Rheims, who liued three hundred yeares after S. Remigius, (for he had seene the Kings and Emperours Charlemaigne, Lewes the Debonnaire, Charles the Baulde, and Lewes the Stammerer, second of the name) in the life of the said S.Remigius, obserueth these Miracles, whereof this is the first.

As the three Bishops, the King, the Queene, and the chiefest French Lords were set in the Church, hearing the holy discourse of the chiefe Priest S.Rhemigius; God, willing to shew visibly, what he had promised to his seruants, at all such times as they met together in his name, that is, To appeare among them: Suddenly filled the whole Church with so great a Light, that the bright splendour thereof exceeded the glory of the Sunne. And in the midst thereof was heard a voyce, distinctly and well formed, which pronounced these words: Pax vobis, Ego sum, Nolite timere, manete in Dilectione mea. Peace be with you, it is I the God of Peace that speaketh to you; be not affraide, perfist in louing mee. Which being said, the Light ceased, and so sweete pleasing a smell remained in the Church, that it appeared clearely and sensibly, that God, the Author and Father of Peace, was descended there. And the light was so piercing, as not one of the Assistants, except S.Rhemigius, durst behold it, and the face of the said holy Bishop, became so luminous and resplendishing; that it surpassed in clearenesse, all the Tapers and Torches burning in the Church, whereat the King and Queene being astonished, fell downe at the Bishoppes feete (as in a place of safety) full of feare and terrour, with that that they had seene.

The first Miracle that appeared.

The other Miracle, was likewise full of admiration, reported by the said Hincmarus, and Floardus, Archdeacon of Rheims (he liued but little aboue an hundred yeares since) in the first Booke of his Historie of the Church of Rheims, and thirteenth Chapter, was that of The holy Viole or Bottle, brought by an Angell, in the forme of a Doue, or white Pidgeon. These come from those Authors, who haue filled the breaches and pits of the History, written by S.Gregory of Tours, which we haue maimed and imperfected by iniury of time, or malice of men, in more then a thousand places. For example, in the election of Pharamond to be King, and his Eleuation, in the tenth Booke. At the Sacring of King Clouis: In the deduction of the Kings of Bourgongne, in the third Booke, and all the following reports, places and passages very defectuous. Which are easie to be supplyed, as well by the Authors formerly alleadged, as by the Monkes Sigebert, Aimoinus, as also other ancient Annalists, and Chroniclers.

The second Miracle.

The History of S.Gregory of Tours defective in many places.

But to iudge of the whole Cloth, by a scantling thereof, and to shew that S.Gregory did not silently let slip the Miracle of the said holy Bottle: wee will here produce the testimony of the Centuriatours of Germanie, called of Magdeburg, who haue this Author more intire, then they in France haue. Behold then what they say, concerning the Sacring and Baptisme of Clouis, at the beginning of the fift Age, that is to say, the yeare of Grace fiue hundred, in the fift Chapter of their fift Centurie. Vbi hemigius Clodoueum Baptizasset, non affuit Chrisma, sed ait Gregorius Turonensis, & Henricus Erfordiensis, Columbam ore attulisse Vas Chrismate plenum. Thus you see the passage of S.Gregory of Tours.

Behold them then of Hincmarus and Floardus, in the places before alleadged. Cui- rius Chrisma ferens a Populo interceptus, ad Fontem pertingere, penitus est impeditus. Sanctificato denique Fonte, nutu diuino, Chrisma defuit. Sanctus autem Pontifex Rhemigius oculis ad Coelum porrectis, tacite traditur orasse cum lachrimis. Et ecce subito Columba ceu Nix aduolat candida, Rostro deferens Ampullam Coelestis doni Chrismate repletam, cuius odoris mirabili respersi Nectaro inæstimabili qui aderant, super omnia quibus antea delectati fuerant replentur suauitate. Accepta itaque Sanctus Præsul Ampulla, postquam Chrismate frontem Clodouei conspersit, species mox Columbæ disparuit. As the Clarke which brought the Holy Oyle to Baptise Clouis, would haue come to the Font; the affluence of the people hindered his passage. The Font being hallowed, by Gods permission, the Oyle could not be brought. Whereat S.Rhemigius being much amazed, he lifted his eyes vp to Heauen, praying in teares, that this Act so importing his owne glory, might not be intermitted; to the contempt of the Catholique Religion, scandale of Christians, and the losse or shipwracke of so many Pagan soules, euen now at the gate of their saluation. But behold, presently appeared a Doue, whiter then Snowe, bringing and holding in her beake a little Viole of Glasse, very thicke, full of a sweete smelling balme, but of a ruddie colour, and which with admirable sauour, rauished the spirits of all the Assistants into such an extasie, as if they had bin rapt vp into the ioyes of Paradise. And the holy Bishop, rendering thankes to God, tooke and receiued with his hands, this sacred gift sent from Heauen, and annointed therewith the forehead of King Clouis. Which being done, the Angell of Heauen, in the forme of a Doue, vanished; leauing with S.Rhemigius, this precious Gage of Holy and Celestiall Oyle, reserued from twelue hundred yeares, to this day, to Sacre the most Christian Kings of France, the onely famous Monarchs of Christendome.

Experience hath made vs know the truth of this Miracle, at the Sacring of our Kings, from the Fathers to their Sonnes, and from Ligne to Ligne: euen to our King Lewes, thirteenth of the name, whom God preserue to infinite ages. Of whose Sacring, we will set downe the authenticall Acts, at the end of the Tract of this Order.

This Miracle of the Holy Viole or Bottle, hath bin obserued by Historians of three Lignes of our Kings, Strangers and French. Vnder that of the Capets (who Reigned aboue sixe hundred yeares hitherto.) Testimony is to be had of all them which haue written, namely of William the Breton, in the first Booke of his Philippides, that is to say, the life of King Phillip Augustus, second of the name, called the Conqueror, Grandfather to the great King S.Lewes, ninth of the name.

Srrange and French Historians haue noted this Miracle.

At sacer Antistes erecto lumine sursum
Cum manibus meruit sacra per supplicamina sacrum
Cœlitus emitti cum Sacro Vase liquorem.
Ipso Rege palam, cunctisque videntibus ipsum
E Cœlo missus quem detulit Angelus illi,
Quo Rex Sacratus fuit idem primus, & omnes
Post ipsum Reges Francorum ad Sceptra vocati, Quando Coronantur, alco sacrantur eodem.

S.Thomas Aquinas (who liued in the time of the King S. Lewes) in the second booke, which he composed of a Princes gouernment, and the last Chapter, maketh honorable memorie of our Kings Sacring, and of the gift of Grace by them receiued from Heauen, to cure the disease of the Kings Euill. Sanctitatis Sacræ Vnctionis argumentum assumimus ex gestis Francorum, & beati Rhemigij super Clodoueum Redem ex delatione Olei desuper per Columbam. Quo Rex Præfatus fuit inunctus, & inunguntur Posteri: & ex signis, & portentis, ac varijs curis apparentibus in eis ex Vnctione radicit. Which he meaneth of curing the Kings Euill, and the Armes of the Sacred Kings of France, sent from Heauen, because all of them tread in the same dance with the holy Bottle.

Ioannes Ludouicus Viualdis, of Monte Reale in the Kingdome of Naples, Doctor and professour in Diuinitie, of the Dominicane Order, in his Royall worke, discoursing the Miracles which happened at the Sacring of the said Clouis, saith. Ea die qua Clodo- Clodoueus à sancto Antistite Rhemigio vnda Sacri Baptismatis perfusus est, quam mirabilia facta esse perhibentur. The same day as [Clouis was Baptized by the Bishop, S. Rhemigius; foure Miracles then happened.

Nam primo Clodoueus erutus de potestate tenebrarum, translatus est in Dei lumen, & Regnum per Baptismatis Sacramentum, Spiritus Sancti factum est Templum.

Secundo, cum in tanto Mysterio Sacrum Chrisma deesset, illico Columba candore Niueo resplendens de Coelo lapsa est, quæ rostro Sacram Ampullam Chrismatis plenum attulit, Ampullum, quo Antistes Regem liniuit. Quæ Ampulla, ob memoriam tanti Sacramenti in Rhemensi Ecclesia vsque in hodiernum diem reuerenter conseruatur. Et inde Francorum Reges in sua Coronatione inunguntur. A qua Sacra Vnctione puto omnes Francorum Reges diuinum munere, accepisse virtutem curandi quoddam genus infirmorum, sola impositione manuum.

Et quia dignum erat, vt Clodoueus ob meritum tantæ pietatis, aliquod perenne memoriale susciperet, ideo tertium admirabile subiungitur. Nam tria Lilia Aurea in nitido colore Saphiri, miro splendore micantia à superis transmissa sunt.

Baptisato autem Clodoueo non solum quartum mirabile, sed plurima sequuntur. Nam illico Francorum Populi, Fide recepta, baptizantur, Idolorum Templa destruuntur, & Ecclesiæ in honorem Christi restaurantur; ac denique tota Gallia in qua sunt Prouinciæ multæ, & Regiones magnæ, ac diuersarum gentium Nationes, tam in vita, quam in moribus admirabiles, quæ tota ambulabat intenebris, eo quòd relicto vero Deo, Idola multa, & vana sequebatur, Christianæ Religioni aggregata est. Et tunc quidem vaticinium Isaiæ completum visum est, quod dicitur; Populus qui ambulabat in tenebris, vidit lucem magnam.

The Armes of France brought from heauen to Clouis

The same Author, discoursing on the Armes of France, brought from heauen to Clouis, saith. Huic Clodoueo, quia Mysterium Incarnationis Christi mente suscepit, Tria Lilia Aurea de Cœlo delapsa sunt, vt tota Christiana Religio palàm cognosceret nobilissimam Familiam Francorum Principum fore electam ad tuendum diligentius facta mirabiliora Ecclesiæ Dei, &c. I passe ouer in silence that which Robertus Gaguinus, Minister generall of the Mathurins of Paris, hath said of the said Armes, in the first Booke of his Historie of France, to auoide reiterations of one and the same subiect.

The ancient Armes of the Gaules and French.

In the former Booke, according to the testimonie of Latinus Pacatus, Sidonius Apollinaris, and Tacitus himselfe, we haue obserued, that the Lyon rampant, and the Shippe, were the proper Armes of the auncient Gaules and French; so that they might be tearmed common Armes to both the Nations. Besides which, the Kings of France, Predecessours to Pharamond, and his Successours vnto King Clouis, had other perticular Armes; to wit, D'Argent a Trois Corones, & Diademes de gueules: For it is meerely a lye to speake of Toades, as we haue said.

The Armes of King Clouis.

The Chronicle of the Abbey of Besse, a Manuscript, which I haue, saith, that Clouis Portoit en Blazon & Deuize, l'Escu de Gueulles a trois Croissants d'Argent, the Symbole of Excellence and Nobilitie: And some of his Successours, Kings, bare the same, as wee shall approue in the Order of the Shippe, and of the double Cresceut.

After that Clouis had receiued the Shield of Azure, and the three Floures de Luces of Gold, from Heauen, as they say: The Kings his Successours would no longer haue those Armes. They of the first Ligne bare but three Floures de Luces onely. They of the second Ligne, descended from Martell, Les porterent sans nombre: howbeit, before Pepin le Bref was exalted to be King of France, his Predecessours, Ils portassent que de Guelles a trois Aigles d'Or. Charles Martell tooke sixe, auec le chef de France. Pepin forsooke his auncient Armes, Et prit Seme de France, sans nombre. For the Kings of France his Successors, continued vntill the last King Lewes, who did nothing, because he reigned but one yeare.

Of Pepin le bref and his Predecessours.

Hugh Capet the prince of all of the third Ligne.

Hugh Capet, chiefe of the Kings of the third Ligne, and his Successours, Kings, bare likewise Seme de France sans nombre: vntill the vnhappy reigne (and fatall to France) of Charles the fixt, who is said to be the Author, for reducing the Shield of France to three Floures de Luces onely, according as they were vnder the first Ligne. The yeare of this change is vncertaine, because some will haue it in the yeare foure hundred red and twelue, and others foureteene; yet all to no purpose: for Froissard, Monstrelet, and the Chronicle of Maister John Iouenall de's Vrsins doe noate, that at the entrance of Queene Isabell of Bauaria, wife to Charles the sixt, at Paris in Anno 1389. there was before the great Court, a Bed all couered with Tapistrie of Azure, with Floures de Luces of Gold, representing the Throane of Iustice, belonging to the Kings of France, most richly adorned. In the midst whereof was a Hart, in greatnesse resembling that at the Pallace, wholly white, and made most artificially: about the necke whereof hung the Armes of the King, to wit, L'Escu d Azur à Trois Fleurs de Lys d Or, very sumptuously wrought.

The Entrance of Queene Isabell of Bauaria

Robert the valiant Marquesse and his descendants.

The Predecessors of Hugh Capet, as namely Robert the valiant Marquesse; and his Sonnes and descendants, Counts of Anion and Maine, who made their ordenarie abiding at Chasteau-Neuf in Anion (before King Eudes, who was Count of Paris, and his descendants to the said Capet) Portoient pour Armes & Banneres de Gueulles à huict Bastons Fleurennez d'Or à la Bordure de France: So saith the Manuscrip: Chronicle (which I haue) of Monstier-Neuf at Poictiers. These Armes are properly called Escarbeucles Pommettees & Fleurettees d'Or. Wherein Feron is abused in his Constables of France, who giueth to the descendants of the said Robert, D'Or à Aigle de Synople.

Armes proper the Kings of Paris onely.

Now, here is a thing to be especially noated, in regard it hath not bin common; that vnder the Kings of the first and second Ligne, there were none but the Kings of Paris onely, which bare D'Azur à Trois Fleurs de Lys d'Or, ou sans nombre, during the second Ligne; the other caried but Color and Mettall. For my Manuscript Chronicle of Monsiur Iean de France, Duke of Berry, teacheth me, that the Kings of Austrasie, Portoient Bande D'Or, & d Azur de six Pieces.

Kings of Soissons.

The King of Soissons Portoient Eschiquete d'Or, & d'Azure.

Kings of Orleans.

And those of Orleans, called of Bourgongne: Portoient l'Escu d'Azur, seme de Cailleux à Or. They carried in their Mantles a bordure of France, to shew, that they were issued of the most Noble blood of the world. The Effigies of King Clothaire the first, enterred at S. Mard de Soissons, hath one of the Shooes Tout parsemé de France. And in the same place, the figure of King Sigibert the first, hath his Coate Armor so named. And these are of the first Ligne.

Concerning them of the first Ligne.

The Kings vnder the second ligne.

Vnder the second, there were none likewise but the Kings of France, Qui portassent le Lys. For the Kings of Aquitaine, Sonnes to Charlemaigne, and their descendants, Porterent Fuzele d'Or et d'Azur. So saith the Chronicle of Monstier-Neuf.

The Kings of Germanie.

The King of Germanie, descended of Lewes the debonnaire: Portoient d'Or fasce de Trois Pieces d'Azur.

The Kings of Italie.

The Kings of Italie, descended of the said Debonnaire: Portoient de Gueulles à Aigle d'Or, à la Bordure componce d'Or & d'Azur. So saith the Chronicle of Berry.

The Kings vnder the third ligne.

Vnder the Kings of the third Ligne, there were none but their elder Sons (I meane their assured and certaine Successors) that bare of France. Their other Sonnes, they are but onely Mettall and Colour in diuers Brizures: Or else they tooke the Armes of their Wiues, according as it was conuenient for them to ioyne in Marage.

Armes borne by reason of the wife.

I finde, that Monsieur Hugh de France, called the Great, Brother to King Phillip the first, Count of Vermandois by reason of his wife; Porta d Or Eschiquete d'Azure, the Armes of Hebert, Count of Vermandois, his Father in Law. The said Monsieur Hugh placed fiue Floures de Luces in the chiefe of the said Armes; by especiall priuiledge from King Phillip his Brother: So I finde it recorded in the Chronicle of Berry.

The Armes of the Countesse of Dreux.

It is found likewise, that the wife of Monsieur Robert of France, Brother to King Lewes the yonger, Countesse and heire of Dreux, as also of Brenne: Portoit D'Azure Eschiquete d'Or à la Bordure de Gueulles.

Difference of another wifes Armes.

It could not be in the same manner with Monsieur Peter of France, the other brother to the said King Lewes the yonger, who (by contract of marriage) tooke the Sirname and Armes of his wife Isabell, heire to the house of Courtnay: Qui portoit d'Or Trois Tourteaux de Gueulles.

Monſieur Phillip of France, Count of Bologne, Sonne to King Phillip Auguſtus; Porte de France au Lambeau de Gueulles.

Monſieur Robert of France, Count of Artois, brother to S. Lewes: Porta pareillement de France au Lambeau de quatre pieces de Gueulles Caſtellees d'Or de douze pieces.

Princes bearing Armes by eſpeciall priuiledges.

Monſieur Alphons of France, Count of Toloſa, Porta party de France, & de Toloſe. Monſieur Charles of France, King of Sicilie, Count of Anion and of Maine, Porta Pareillement de France au Lambeau de Gueulles, mouuant du chef. Theſe two laſt were likewiſe brethren to the King S. Lewes. All the ſaid Princes bare of France by eſpeciall priuiledges, which the Kings their Brethren gaue vnto them, and not otherwiſe.

The firſt king of France that gaue his brethren ſuch liberty.

And S. Lewes was the firſt of the Kings (ſo ſaith the Chronicle of Berry) that, in imitation of ſome of his famous Predeceſſours, permitted to his Brethren, and his Sonnes: to beare Eſcutcheons and Banners of the Floures de Luces of France, with Briſures and differences; although they bare the Floures de Luces for ornament onely (ſaith the Chronicle) and not as Armes. But returne we now againe to our former diſcourſe.

Denis Areopagit a the Saint of France, as Saint George of England.

King Clouis enſtructed carefully, that the Faith of Ieſus Chriſt ſhould be preached in Gaule, and namely at Paris, by the Great S. Dionyſius, or Denys Areopagita, the firſt Biſhop of the Pariſians, who was taken as their Saint and Tutelarie Patron, and his Iupiter (not he whom the blinde Idolaters adored, but the great God of Heauen and Earth, whom the Gaules Apoſtle S. Denys preached) and his Warde.

Mon-ioue turned to Mon-ioye Saint Denys

Cry or ſhoute; Mon-ioue Sainct Denys; in time (which corrupteth all things) changed from Mon-ioue, to Mon-ioye. As if one ſhould ſay, that the conſideration of the wonderfull power of God, preached by Saint Denys; was the whole ioy, comfort and contentment of King Clouis, which made him vnconquerable, and heaped with the victories of all his enemies, ſpeeding neuer the worſe, by the deuout prayers of the Gaules Apoſtle Saint Denys. And let it not be forgotten, that from

The King of Armes of France Mon-ioye.

King Clouis, the King of Armes of France, hath euermore to this very day, retained the Sir-name of Mon-ioye.

The Banner of S. Denys.

Moreouer, in reuerend remembrance of the ſaid Denys Areopagita, Protector of the French Empire; the Kings ouer and beſide the Banner of France) cauſed to be carried in Battaile, that belonging to the Abbey of S. Denys in France. Which they tooke with many Ceremonies, when they receiued it from the Altar; and gaue it to be carried and defended, by one of the moſt valiant Knights of the Kings Court. As Rigordus writeth in the life of Phillip Auguſtus.

But it behoueth eſpecially to obſerue, what difference there was betweene the Banner of France, and that of Saint Denys: very many times confounded together, and taken one for the other, by ignorants in the French Hiſtory, and their Antiquitie.

The difference betweene a Banner and Standard, in their true forme and fa-

In the precedent Booke we haue already ſhowne, what difference there is betweene that called a Banner, and the Vexillum de Suger: becauſe Banners, Penons, Enſignes and Lance-Flagges are of ſquare forme, without any cutting. Whereas Standards (which are properly the Vexilla of the Romaines) are made in point, or round, and cut with two points, tailes, or tongues, like to our Standards. The Vexillum was moreouer made, according to the faſhion of Banners in Pariſh Churches, ſquare in forme, but cut beneath in many pieces; like to the Gonfanons in Italie, and the Armes of the Counts in Bologne.

The Banner of France.

The Banner of France (ſuch as thoſe Monarches carry to this preſent day) is of Veluet Violet-Blewe Celeſtiall, two wayes ſemed with Floures de Luces imbrodered more full then ſparing. As it is deſcribed by Rigordus, the Monke of Saint Denys in France, Phyſition and Chronicler to King Phillip Auguſtus, in the life of the ſaid Conquerour, ſpeaking of the Battaile of Bouines. Signum Regale, Vexillum Flore Lily diſtinctum.

In like manner we ſee (euen to this day) the Canopie Chaire of State; the Tunique or Dalmatique; the great Cloake Royall, yea, and ſo farre as to the regard Sandales and Buskins of thoſe Sacred Monarches: Semez de Fleurs de Lys ſans nombre. The Chronicle of Iuuenall des Vrſines, ſpeaking of the returne of Charles the firſt from from his Sacring, performed at Rheims, ſaith: That he entred Paris, cloathed with a very rich Robe, Toute ſamee de Fleurs de Lys d'Or.

And as at S. Denys in the Quire, we ſee it wholly garniſhed with cloathes of Violet Veluet, ſemed with Floures de Luces of Gold, for the Sacring and Crowning the Queenes of France, and at Noſtre Dame de Rheims, for the Kings: Euen ſo at their buryings and Funerals, the Churches were round hung with adornments of Violet Veluet, embrodered with Golden Floures de Luces numberleſſe; and not as now adayes, with Serdge or Blacke Veluet. The Duke of Berry (in his Chronicle) maketh mention thereof; ſpeaking of the Obſequies and Funerals of Philip de Valois, and of Charles the fift, Alanus Chartierus, ſpeaking of that of Charles the ſeuenth, ſaith: The Canopie was but of blew Linnen Cloath, painted with Floures de Luces. Which hee ſpeaketh the rather, to noate the mecanicall couetouſneſſe of Lewes the eleuenth.

Adorning Churches for Funerals of Kings and Queenes.

Hearſe-cloths and Paules to couer Coffins.

As for the Coffins & Beeres of the Kings, they were (till the time of King Frances the fift) couered with a large Hearſe-cloath, or Paule of Violet Veluet, all ouer ſemed with Floures de Luces, and without number, of rich Gold embroderie: And not of Blacke Veluet with the white ſattin Croſſe. Armes onely for fixeteene Eſcutcheons of France: So ſaith the manuſcript Chronicle of the Chancellor du Prat, ſpeaking of the Funerals of King Lewes the twelfth: All theſe impertinences proceeded from the ignorance of Maiſters of the Ceremonies, and Criers or Proclaimers, who would haue matters to be heard, though themſelues (indeede) did not vnderſtand any thing.

Princes of the Blood being Sons of France

Moreouer, this is to be marked, that the Mantles or Cloakes of Dukes, Princes of the Blood, and eſpecially the Sonnes of France; are indeede of Violet colerd Veluet. But as the Dalmatiques of the ſaid Sonnes and Princes of Blood, ought not to be but of Crimoſin or Red Sattin, and their Buskins and Sandales of the ſame: Euen ſo vpon their Dukes Cloakes, there ſhould alſo be but Vne Bordure de trois Fleures de Lyz de front, & de large, ou quatre tout au plus, & trois apres en Eſchiquier, & encore tranchees des Briſures marquees en leurs Armes. There is not any but the King, and the Daulphine, a King deſigned from his birth, that ought Porter les Sandales, la Dalmatique, & le Manteau Royal, ſemez de France, ſans nombre.

Concerning the Eſcutcheon of France.

As for the Eſcutcheon of France, without all queſtion to the contrary, it was more famous and venerable: Seme de Fleurs de Lys ſans Nombre, qu'eſtant reduict a trois. And it ſhould be obſerued by Painters and Engrauers, that like as the Sonnes of France, and Princes of the Blood, Nont point autre Cimier ſur leur Timbre tarré de front, que la ſeule Fleur de Lys double: Euen ſo their Armes ſhould be ſuſtained, and haue two Angels for Supporters, if (for pleaſure or deuiſe) they haue no other perticulers. As in the Glaſſe windowes of the Gray Fryers, we ſee the Armes of Mont-penſier, hauing two white Greyhounds for Supporters. As wee ſee in them of the Royall Ligne of Bourbon, in the Glaſſe windowes of the Chappell, in the Caſtle of the Louure at Paris.

Concerning the Creſt and Supporters.

For others, be they Princes, or great Lords, and Officers of the Crowne, euen the very chiefeſt: Ne doiuent auoir des Anges pour Supposts, (if they haue not eſpeciall priuiledge from the King, who is the onely diſtributer) Partant pour enquerir. And as for the Kings priuie Scale, it onely is ſuſtained and borne vp by one Angell: but the Armes of France ſhould be ſupported by two Angels, and neuer were they made otherwiſe, but vnder Charles the ſixt, who tooke two flying Harts for his deuiſe and ſupporters. Not for the dreame reported by Froiſſard, but as a notable remembrance, of that which happened in the yeare 1380. He being then hunting at Senlis, a Stagge or Hart was found, that had about his necke a Chaine of guilded braſſe: he prohibiting, that any ſhould kill it, but onely lay ſnares to take it aliue, as accordingly it was done. And vpon the Coller of the Chaine was engrauen theſe words; Cæſar hoc mihi donauit. And thereupon, the King (by his owne meere motion) ſo altred his Armes, and bare for his deuiſe A Hart flying, with a Crowne of Gold about his necke. And euery where as his Armes were fixed, Harts in like manner ſupported either ſide; as we finde in the Chronicle of the Vrſines. But now let vs come to the Banner of S. Denys.

Of the Kings priuie Seales and Armes of France.

The reaſon why the King altered the Supporters of his Armes.

The great Oriflambe of France or Banner of S. Denys.

It was made of Sendall, that is to say Taffata, or other Red Silke Tiffred; three times semed with Flames of Gold, whereby it tooke the name of Oriflambe, and vulgarly in the Hiſtory of the Lord de Ioinuille, and other Hiſtorians: The Banner of S. Denys: Vexillum Beati Dionyſij, which was that deſcribed by William the Breton, in the eleauenth Booke of his Philippides.

Aſt Regi ſatis eſt tenues criſpare per auras
Vexillum ſimplex Cendato ſimplice textum
Splendoris rubei: Letania qualiter vti
Eccleſiana ſolet certis ex more diebus.
Quod quum flammas habeat, omnia, vulgariter aurea nomen
Omnibus in bellis habet omnia Signa præire:
Quod Regi præſtare ſolet Dionyſius Abbas
Ad bellum, quotiens ſumptis proficiſcitur Armis.

The Oriflambe borne before king Philip de Valois the firſt.

The great Annales of S. Denys, deſcribing the Battaile of Caſſell in Flanders, won by King Phillip de Valois, ſixt of the name, informeth vs, that before him was carried the Oriflambe; Faſtened to the top of a Lance, of Vermillion colour, in manner of a Gonfanon, with two tailes, hauing Strings and Taſſelles about it of Greene Silke. And thereby we iudge, that the Banner of Saint Denys was of diuers faſhions, that is to ſay, ſometimes ſquare, as Banners are in our Pariſh Churches: And then againe like to our Standards, with two points or tailes, as it is deſcribed in the former Booke.

Of whatſoeuer faſhion this Banner of S, Denys was made: they obſerued an auncient cuſtome, that in ſuch voyages as the Kings vndertooke, as well within as without the Realme, to fight with enemies, namely in their voyages, beyond the Seas: the Kings cauſed the Banner of S. Denys to be hallowed, as they took it from off the Altar, with Ceremonies of extraordinary deuotion.

The Banner of S. Denys hallowed on the Altar.

Suggerius, Abbot of the ſame place, in the life of Lewes the ſeauenth, and the yeare 1147. ſaith. In hebdomada ſecunda poſt Feſtum Penteceſtes, prius ordinatis rebus, adiit Peregrinationis (in the voyage beyond the Seas) venit Rex, vt moris eſt, ad Eccleſiam beati Dionyſij, à Martyribus licentiam accepturus, & ibi poſt celebrationem Miſſarum, Baculum Peregrinationis (the Pilgrimes Staffe,) & Vexillum Beati Dionyſij, quod Oriflambe Gallice dicitur, valde reuerenter accepit, ſicut mox eſt antiquorum Regum Francorum quando debent ad bella procedere, vel votum Peregrinationis adimplere.

The ſame Author, ſpeaking of the Frenchmens ouerthrow by the Turkes, in the ſaid voyage beyond the Seas, ſaith. Faciebat Antegardam illa die Gaufridus de Ruceio, vnus de nobiliorib. Barenibus Prouinciæ Pictauenſis qui regebat Regis Bannieram. Quam Præcedebat Prout Moris Eſt Vexillum Beati Dionyſij, Quod Gallice dicitur Oriflambe. Thus you ſee there was difference betweene the Banner of France, and that of S. Denys, which marched alwayes in the head of the Armie, and after it, the Banner of Fance, followed by the Enſignes and Flagges of the Lords and Commons. And the Lord of Ioinuille obſerueth in the Life of S. Lewes, that the ſaid King did expreſſely forbid his whole Armie, from deſcending before Damieta, vntill the Banner of Saint Denys was brought on Land from the Ships.

The Order of the Banners marching in warre.

At the voyage beyond the Seas, vndertooke by King Phillip Auguſtus, the greateſt King that hath reigned to this day, vnder the third Ligne, in the yeare of Grace 1190. at S. Iohn Baptiſt, went to take the Banner of S. Denys, and two more, which he had cauſed to be hallowed, from off the Martyrs Altar. Rigordus, Monke of the ſaid Abbey, Chronographer and Phyſition to the ſaid Philip Auguſtus, in the Life of the ſame King, writeth thus.

Philippus Rex ad Eccleſiam beatiſſimi Martyris Dionyſij, cum maximo comitatu venit, cauſa licentiam accipiendi. Conſueuerant enim antiquitus Reges Francorum, quandcunque contra hoſtes arma mouebant, Vexillum deſuper Altare beati Dionyſij pro tutela, ſiu cuſtodia, ſecum portabant, & in prima Acie pugnatorum ponebant. Quod videntes Aduerſarij, & cognoſcentes territi, multotiens terga dederunt. Ideoque Chriſtianiſſimus

Rex ante corporum ſanctorum Martyrum Dionyſij, Ruſtici & Eleuthery humiliter ſuper pauimentum marmoreum in oratione proſtratus Deo, &c. Tandem cum lacrimis ab oratione ſurgens, Sportam, & Baculum Peregrinationis, (the Scrip and Pilgrims Staffe) de manu Guillelmi Rhemenſis Archiepiſcopi Auunculi ſui reuerenter accepit. This Archbiſhoppe then, Legate of France, had the ſirname of Champagne, and was brother to Alix de Champagne, Mother of the ſaid Phillip Auguſtus, and was nicknamed the Chardinall with the white hands. This was the man, who by decree of the generall Parlement, King Lewes the ſeauenth, his Bother in Law, ſitting on his Throane of Iuſtice, in the Pallace of the Biſhop of Paris Morice: preuailed in his ſuite, for Sacring the Kings of France in the Church of Rheims, as we ſhall haue cauſe to relate more at large elſewhere.

The Cardinal with the white hands.

The ſame Rigordus, ſpeaking of the Battaile at Pont de Bouines, wonne by the ſaid King Phillip Auguſtus, behinde which Bridge he was on the day of Battaile, fought on the morrow after the Feaſts of S. Iames and S. Chriſtopher, in the yeare 1215. ſaith. Clamatur vbique per campos Arma, Arma Viri, clangunt Tubæ, reuertuntur Cohortes, quæ iam Pontem tranſierunt, Reuocatur Vexillum Beati Dionyſij, Quod omnes præcedere in Bello debebat.

And in another place. Interea aduenium Legiones Communiarum, quæ fere vſque ad hoſpitia proceſſerant, & Vexillum B. Dionyſij, & accurrunt quantocyus ad aciem Regis, vbi videbant Signum Regale, Vexillum videlicet Floribus Lily diſtinctum. Thus we diſcerne the difference, betweene the Banner of S. Denys, and the Royall one, which Rigordus affirmeth to be ſemed with Floures de Luces. Whereas that of S. Denys, was made but of ſimple Red Sendall, as it is deſcribed by William the Breton, ſpeaking of this Battaile of Bouines, loſt by the Emperour Otho, Iohn without Land, King of England, and Ferrand of Portugall, Count of Flanders, in regard of his wife. The ſame Breton, conuerting into Verſe, that which Rigordus wrote in Proſe, informeth vs; that after the ſaid Banner of S. Denys, marched the Banner of France, carried before the King.

Ante tamen Regem ſignum Regale tenebat
Montmiracenſis vir fortis corpore Galo.

William de Nangis, deſcribing the deſcent of the King S. Lewes, into the Port of Damieta in Ægypt, ſaith. Rex cum Legato Sacraſanctam Crucem Domini triumphalem, omnium, & apertam in quodam vaſello erat, Præcedente quoque iuxta ipſos in alio Vaſello B. Dionyſij Vexillo Fratribuſque Regis, cum cæteris Baronibus, Baliſtarys, & Militibus circumquaque comitantibus.

The ſame Author ſpeaking of the ſecond Voiage beyond the Seas, of the ſaid King S. Lewes, camped before the Citie of Carthage in Affrica, after that the Chriſtian Armie was deſcended to the Port of Thunis: writeth in the life of King Philip the hardie, the fifteenth Chapter. Vexillo igitur Sancti Dionyſij erecto, omnibuſque rite diſpoſitis, prout moris eſt ad bellum præcedere, ſonantibus tubis, noſtri milites in hoſtes primæ Cohortis inſeruntur.

From time to time, and Reigne after reigne, thoſe ſacred Monarchs neuer marched to warre, were it without or within the Kingdome, againſt their enemies: but the Banner of S. Denys, the Gaules Apoſtle, marched alwayes in the head of the Armie. As it is obſerued in their great Chronicles, and Authors diſcourſing on the Hiſtorie of France, as Froiſſard, Alanus Chartierus, and others.

The Chronicle of Iuuenall des Vrſines, in the Reigne of Charles the ſixt, and Anno 1381. ſaith. The King went to S. Denys, to viſite the Saints bodies, and performe there his Offerings: he cauſed to be hallowed the Oriflambe by the Abbot, and gaue it to Meſsire Peter de Villiers the Elder, who tooke the accuſtomed Oath, and kept it almoſt a whole yeare.

The Flemmings rebel againſt their Lord Count Lewes.

The Flemmings turning rebels againſt Lewes their Count, Father in Law to Monſieur Phillip of France, tearmed the hardie, Duke of Bourgongne: the ſaid Count requeſted King Charles the ſixt, his Soueraign Lord, to lend him ſuccor, whereby he might reduce his rebellious ſubiects to their duety & obedience. The King hauing leuied leuied an Armie, and being in readineſſe to march away: went to S.Denys, where he was worthily welcomed by the Abbot, and Religious brethren of the place. On the morrow morning, Maſſe was ſolemnely ſung, and a Sermon preached by a reuerend Diuine, the holy Reliques being ſet vpon the Altar. Then the King according to the laudable manner of his Predeceſſours, without Chaperon, and without Girdle, performed his prayers, deuotions and Offerings, as his Lords did the like. Which being done, he cauſed the Oriflambe to be brought, which he deliuered to an aged Knight, a valiant Gentleman, named Meſsire Peter de Villiers, the elder, who tooke the Oath, as in ſuch caſes is required, and then the King returned to Bois de Vincennes. This was in the yeare 1382.

Two ſtrange accidents happening at the ioyning of two Armies.

In which yeare the King being ready to giue battaile to Philip Arteuelle and his Flemmings, at Pont de Commines; two things happened, which ſeemed to be ſomewhat marueilous. The one, there came ſuch a flight of Rauens, which engirt the Hoaſte on either ſide, as it was wonderfull; neuer ceaſing their flickering and flying about it. The other, that for the ſpace of fiue or ſixe dayes, the Ayre was ſo darke, and charged with ſtormes; that hardly could one man ſee another. When the King knew that the Flemmings came to fight, he made a kinde of promiſe; that he would fight with them, cauſing his people to march, & the Oriflambe to be diſplayed. No ſooner was it diſplayed, but (as the Storie ſaith) the Aire immediately cleared, and became as faire and bright, as euer it had bin ſeene; ſo that the Battels ons plainely ſaw each other. The firſt accident was reputed almoſt miraculous, in regard of that great flight of Rauens, creatures which (of their owne naturall diſpoſition doe hate blood and ſlaughter, as a thing ordenarily happening. But the ſecond obſeruation chanced on the day of the ſame Battaile.

The ſecond fire great accident on the day of Battaile

Arteuelle and his Flemmings encountred the French ſo furiouſly, that they retired backe diuers paces. Which the French perceiuing, they made a ſhoute, and out-cry, ſo loud as poſſibly they could: Noſtre Dame, Mont-Ioye, S. Denis, On them, On them. At this War-crie the ſtrength of the French redoubled in ſuch manner: that the Flemmings (faint hartedly) recoyled, brake their rankes, and in few houres were quite diſcomfited. So that there remained ſlaine on the ground, fortie thouſand on the Flemmings ſide, with their firebrand of ſedition Arteuelle himſelfe: And of the Kings followers about, three and fortie perſons.

What the King did after the day of Battaile

After this Battaile, the King and his Vnckles went to the Church of S. Denys, tooke the Oriflambe, himſelfe being bare headed, and without Girdle, and going before the Altar in great deuotion, deliuered it to the Abbot and gaue to the Church a goodly Pall of Cloth of Gold: So ſaith the Chronicle of the Vrſines.

The men of Gaunt reuolted from their allegiance.

In the yeare following, three hundred foureſcore and three, the men of Gaunt being againe reuolted, to aide the Engliſh; the King reſolued to goe fight with them. He departed from Paris, and came to S. Denys, where he heard Maſſe, receiued the Oriflambe, and gaue it to Meſsire Guy de la Trimouille, a very valiant Knight: who receiued the Sacrament, and ſwearing the ordenary Oathe, tooke it.

How the Oriflambe ought to be carried in warre, and when.

The yeare 1386. when King Charles enterpriſed the Conqueſt of the Kingdome of England, at his departure from Paris; he went to S. Denys in France, where he performed his prayers and Offerings. He fell into a doubtfull deliberation, whether he ſhould take the Oriflambe with him, or no. For he ought not to take it, but for defence of the Kingdome; and not when he intendeth to conquer new Prouinces: So ſaith the Chronicle of the Vrſines.

Now, it is to be noated, that the Kings of France doe cauſe it to be newly hallowed, when they march in perſon againſt their enemies. Otherwiſe, when the warre is performed by Lieutenants; then there is carried no Oriflambe at all

Bearing the Oriflambe an Office of the Crowne

And the order of bearing this Standard or Banner of S. Denys, was created in title of an Office belonging to the Crowne (as we learne by the ſame Chronicle) in Anno 1397. At this time there happened a great alteration of Officers, becauſe many were ſlaine in the Battaile of Hungaria (loſt at Nicopolis, by the folly of Iohn of Bourgongne, Count of Neuers, eldeſt Sonne to the Duke of Bourgongne Phillip the Hardie, in the yeare 1396.) And then was made Conſtable of France, Sancerre, who before before had beene Marſhall; Meſsire Iohn le Maingre, otherwiſe called Boucicault, was made and ordained Marſhall; Meſsire Iacques de Bourbon great Chamberlaine; and Meſsire Hutin d'Omont appointed to carry the Oriflambe.

So by the death of Meſsire Guy de la Trimouille, ſlaine on the day at Nicopolis, the ſaid d'Omont had the Office of bearing the Oriflambe. So that the faction of Bourgongne (fatal and vnfortunate to France) hauing conſtrained King Charles the ſixt to goe and beſiege Bourges, to ruinate the Princes of his bloud, his Vnkles and Nephewes of Berry and of Orleans, in the yeere 1411. the ſaid D'Omont, after he had receiued the Sacrament, and taken the Oath in ſuch caſes required; receiued the Oriflambe from the Kings owne hand, and reſtored it againe the yeere following, into the Abbey of S. Denys.

The faction of Bourgongne fatal to France

The Regiſters of the Court do report, that in the yeare of our Lord 1414. in the moneths of February and March, there aroſe a wonderfull winde, ſtinking and full of nipping colds, whereby the inhabitants of Paris (without diſtinction of age or quality) were ſo troubled with Rheumes, that it cauſed ſtrange Coughes in the Parliament Iuriſdictions, and namely that of the great Chamber, and du Chaſtelet; whereby they ceaſed for a time, and not a man was ſeene to walke.

A very noyſome and dangerous winde.

This ſickneſſe cauſed the death of many, and particularly of the ſaid Hutin d'Omont, a worthy valiant Knight, in whoſe place there was choyce made of another.

So that in the ſaid yeere, the King marching to the Siedge of Compeigne (called Karnopolis and Karolopolis by the King and Emperor Charles the bald, who cauſed it to be compaſſed with walls) vſurped by Iohn Duke of Bourgongne. There the King cauſed an aſſembly of his Councell, to know to whom it ſhould be deliuered: For it was a cuſtome obſerued at all times, to giue the bearing of the Oriflambe to a Knight, a man Loyall, Wiſe, and Valiant. And becauſe the Lord d'Omont (who had vſed to carry the Oriflambe) was dead; by election, choyce was made of Meſsire Guillaume Martell, Lord of Bacqueuille, to whom was deliuered the Oriflambe, according to order, who greatly excuſed himſelfe in regard of his olde age. But then was granted to him, as an ayde and aſſiſtant, his eldeſt ſonne, and another goodly gentleman, named Meſsire Iohn de Betas, Lord of Sainct Cler; who were appointed as Coadiutors to the ſaid Lord de Bacqueuille.

Compeigne called Karnopolis and Karolopolis.

A new election made of the Oriflambe-bearer.

In like manner the Romane Emperours, when they marched forth to Warre, cauſed to be carried before them their Imperiall Banner, compoſed of Red ſilke, which their Hiſtorians called Diabeſtion, Diuum Velum, Labarum, and by the particular word Flammeum, either for being ſemed with flames of gold in embroydery; or by finiſhing (as all Standards ought to doe) in two points, or tailes, when it waued in the ayre, then the two tailes ſeemed like a flame of fire. On the top of this Labarum, was exalted the Cypher and Monogramme of our Redeemer Ieſus Chriſt, in Greeke letters of pure gold, entoured with a rich Crowne of precious ſtones: So ſaith the Chriſtian Poet Prudentius.

Signabat Labarum.

It is generally knowne, that the ſacred Monarches of the firſt Ligne, did beare ſo much honor and reuerence to the reliques of great S. Denys Areopagita, and his companions S. Ruſticus, and S. Eleutherius, the firſt Apoſtles of the Gaules; that they held them for defenders and protectors of the holy Kingdome of France, as Rigordus hath obſerued in the life of Philip Auguſtus, Anno 1195. Rex Philippus non ſine mor Patroni, & defenſoris Sacri Francorum Imperij B. Dionyſij, quàm citius potuit ad Eccleſiam Beatiſsimi Martyris properauit: vbi pro gratiarum actione Deo, & Martyribus pallium ſericum pretioſum, in pignus charitatis, humiliter ſuper Altare obtulit.

The firſt Apoſtles of the Gaules.

So that they made choyce of their buriall in the Church dedicated to the ſaid holy Martyrs, long time before Dagobert (whom the vulgar fondly would haue to be the founder thereof) according to the teſtimony of S. Gregory of Tours in his hiſtory of France, compoſed long time before the reigne of the ſaid King Dagobert, who was no more then a repairer of the said Abbey. Thither they made recourse, as well in their sicknesse, as when they went forth to Warre: and then they caused to be taken downe the Shrines wherein their ashes were kept.

King Lewis very grieuously sicke.

S. Lewis falling sicke very dangerously, the yeere of Grace 1244. in the Moneth of December, the Saturday before S. Lucie; all France made publique prayers for his recouery to health. But particularly they of the Abbey of S. Denys in France, (where is the common Mansoleum of those Sacred Monarchs) contributed so holy an action. For the fryday before the Feast of Christmasse, the Abbot caused the Shrines of the holy Martyrs to be taken forth of their Screenes and Vaults, and carried them in procession, wherein went bare-footed, the Bishops Charles of Nyon, and Peter of Meaux, the Abbot of S. Denys Odo Clementis, and all his religious brethren, followed by an vnspeakeable number of Burgesses of Paris, and of all sexes. And the very same houre of extracting the said holy bodies, the good King Saint Lewis returned from death to life.

Mathew Paris, a Monke of Saint Albanes in England, who liued at the same time, recordeth it in these words, vnder the yeere 1248. Hoc Anno multi Nobiles Angliæ proponentes iter arripere Hierosolymitanum cum Christianissimo Rege Francorum, quem miraculosè à portis Mortis, vel potius ab ipsa Morte, Dominus dignatus est reuocare, & reuiuificare.

William de Nangis, in the life of the said S. Lewis, the twentieth chapter, speaking concerning the extraction of the said holy bodies, saith. Dum ista parabuntur, auditum est Parisijs, quod pro salute Regis Beatorum corpora Martyrum, quæ nunquam nisi solummodo pro salute Regis Franciæ, vel Regni sui periculo extrahuntur.

When the Kings were marching to Warre, the said extraction of these holie Bodies was peformed; and oftentimes they remained still vpon the Altar, vntill their returning backe.

Rigordus, in the life of King Philip Augustus, Anno 1191. when the said Philip sayled beyond the Seas, to beliege Acres, saith. Hoc Anno octauo Kalendas Septembris consilio Domini Guillelmi Rhemensis Archiepiscopi, & Adelæ Reginæ, & omnium Episcoporum, corpora Beatorum Martyrum Dionysij, Rustici & Eleutherij, cum purissimis Vasis Argenteis, in quibus diligentissime sigillata continebantur sunt extracta et super Altare posita, vt ibi omnes fideles ad tam Sanctum spectaculum conuenientes, cum gemitu & suspirijs pro sancta Terra liberanda, & pro Rege Francorum, & Vniuerso Comitatu suo puras manus cum Moyse leuantes ad Dominum preces funderent.

This was practised as well vnder the reignes of King Francis the first, as of King Henry the second his Sonne. Francis the first, going and returning from Italie, as we read in the Manuscript Chronicle of the Chancellor Du Prat, in these words. The King being at Lyons, in Iune Anno 1515. ready to passe into Italie, to conquer his Duchie of Millaine; sent to S. Denys in France, to the end that the Holy Bodies might be descended, as was wont to be done when the Kings of France went in person to any War so off. And the fifteenth day of October, 1516. the King returning to Paris from his iourney of Italie, went to Saint Denys in France, to giue thankes to God, and to haue the Holy Bodies put in their places againe, which had beene descended, when the said King passed ouer the Alpes.

The like was done in the time of King Henry the second, in An. 1552. the 28. day of Aprill: the Cardinall of Bourbon, Abbot of the said Abbey, caused the Bodies to be taken forth in the Kings absence.

The Ceremonies at setting vp of the Shrines into their places.

But concerning their replacing, it was alwaies done in presence of the King, and when he was returned home again. At this Ceremony, the King was clothed in his Royall Ornaments, the Crowne on his head, the Sword naked, the Scepter Royall, and the Rodde or hand of Iustice, carried before his Maiesty, by Princes of the Blood bare-headed; and for want of them, by the very greatest Lords of the kingdome, followed also by the Court of Parliament, in their red robes, the Chamber of Accounts, the Generalls of the Aydes, the Vniuersitie and the Hostell of the Citie. Because, before replacing the said holy Bodies, Procession was made, two Bishops bearing each of them three Shrines of the holy Martyrs, after which followed the Clergy, the King, and his Soueraigne Courts.

In

In ancient times (meerely in deuotion) Princes of the bloud were bearers of them, and the Kings themselues of that of S. Denys, with their eldest Sonne. We haue the testimonies of King Lewis le Gros, sixt of the name (reported in his life by the Abbot S. Denys Suggerus) and of Lewis the yonger, his Sonne; and of Philip de Valois, according to the great Chronicle.

The Romane Emperors after Constantine the great, going in publique to solemn Festiualls, and on dayes of honourable disporting; carried a Crosse of gold in the right hand, and another as the Crest or Timbre of their Tyarus: So saith Curopalates, and the Christian Poet Prudentius.

Ardebat summis Crux addita Christis.

How highly the signe of the Crosse hath been honored in France.

The Monarchs of the Lillie, haue so honored this marke and Symbole of mens saluation, that all their Monie is stamped therewith. Their Monagrammes, Ciphers and Signatures are made in a Crosse, as is obserued in the Treatise, concerning the principall Officers of the Crowne of France.

When they marche in publique, or in ranged Battell against their enemies; it hath beene ordinarily their custome, to haue a Crosse high hly exalted borne before them. As that of their Oratory and Chappell, finishing in a Foure de Luce, ouer the Coape of S. Martin, the second Apostle of the Gaules.

A piece of the true Crosse sent to King Lewes.

King Lewes the Debonnaire, Emperour, hauing receiued from him of the East, named Basilius (in the yeare of Grace, eight hundred threescore and twelue, and the moneth of Ianuary) a small peece of the true Crosse; hee caused it to be richly set in gold and precious stones, and had it carried before him. So saith Nithardus, and the Chronicle of Laureshеim.

Theganus, Archdeacon of the Metropolitane Church of Treuers, and Nithardus sonne to Angilbert and Bertha, daughter to the King and Emperour Charlemaigne, obseruing the dispositions of the said Lewes the Debonnaire, and of his Sonne Charles the Bauld, by the bloody factions of a distempered League, doe tell vs: That the Bauld being in the field, and seeking to passe the Riuer of Seine, where she loseth her name in the Ocean Sea, his rebellious Vassailes which kept the passage therof, acknowledging the Crosse borne before him, whereon they had sworn to him the oath of fidelitie; were surprized with such a dreadfull feare, that immediately they forsooke the Foord and bankes of Seine, leauing them freely to the King. Who came to S. Denys in France, there rendering thankes vnto God, and to his holy Apostles add Protectors of the Holy and Sacred Kingdome of France.

The Crowne of Thornes pawned to the K. of France.

In the yeare of Grace 1240. Baldwine Emperour of Constantinople, being narrowly pressed with want of money, to furnish the Warre then much importing him; aduertised the King S. Lewes to furnish him with meanes. And for assurance thereof, he would send him The Crowne of Thornes, which the Iewes planted on the head of the Sauiour of the World; which the King most willinglie accepted, and with all his heart.

The true Crosse where on Christ suffered, brought to Paris.

The yeere following, the True Crosse (which after the death of the Prince of Sarrazins Saladine, had beene kept in the Citie of Damieta, vntill the most vnfortunate day when the City was first conquered, and afterward lost and conquered by the said Sarrazins) was brought to Paris. Saint Lewes King of France, and Queene Blanch of Castile, his Mother, made no spare of their goods and liuelode, to gaine this vnspeakeable Treasure. It had been pawned first to the Venetians, for an hundred and fiftie thousand pounds of siluer, by the two sonnes of Iohn de Brenne, King of Ierusalem, to warre vpon the Greekes.

The Royall assembly at presentation of the Crosse.

The Emperour Baldwin afterward engaged it againe, and finally wrought the meanes that it was released from the said Venetians, by the King S. Lewes, who vpon good-Friday, Anno 1241. caused the said true Crosse to be brought into the Abbatall Church of S. Anthonie des Camps lez Paris, at the entrance whereof was prepared a Theater, whereon the King, the Queenes, Blanch his Mother, and Margaret of Prouence his wife, and his three brethren mounted; with the Archbishops, Bishops, Prelates, Princes and great Lords of the Kingdome, & an infinite number of people assisting the Ceremonie. The King and whole company, melting themselues into teares of ioy, receiued that precious gadge of our Redemption, which he raised vp vpon the said Theator aloft, to let the people see it, the Prelates singing with chearefull voyces, Ecce Crucem Domini. After adoration done thereto, the King, bare-footed, cloathed in a Coate of plaine Cloath, vngirt, bare-headed, and hauing fasted three dayes before (imitating the good Emperour Heraclius, when he returned victorious from the Kingdome of the Persians) carried the true Crosse from S. Anthonies, to the Cathedrall Church of our Lady in Paris. Followed by the Queenes and the Kings three Brethren on foote likewise, who carried the Crowne of Thornes, highly exalted to be seene of the people, brought into the Kingdome the yeare before, the chiefe Lords of France sustaining the Kings Armes, and the Princes his brethrens.

of

The King himself carried the Crosse.

This memorable Processiō hapned in the Church of Paris, al the Bels in the City ringing, & praier being perfected, the King (in the same Order of Ceremonie) came from the said Church, to his own great Pallace in the midst of the Citie. Reuersus est Rex ad matus Palatium suum, quod est in medio Vrbe, deferens Crucem suam gloriosę, Fratribusque eius Coronam, consequente Prælatorum ordinata Processione, qua nunquam visa fuit in Regno Francorum solemnior, aut iucundior. Alwayes bearing the Crosse, and his brethren after him the Crowne of Thornes, all the Prelates and Cleargy following in an orderly procession, the most solemne and ioyfull that had euer beene seene in the Kingdome of France, thus speaketh Mathew Paris, whereto hee addeth this remarkeable tract, for the greatnes and precedency of the holy & sacred kingdome of France. Vniuersi igitur, & singuli Dominum, qui Regnum Francorum pra omnibus alijs specialicomplectitur dilectione consolatur, & tuetur (Spanish writers, answer to the passage of this Englishman!) iunctis manibus glorificarunt: That God comforteth, guardeth, and maintaineth the Kingdome of France, which hee affecteth with an especiall loue aboue all the Kingdomes of the world. Sic igitur Dominus noster Iesus Christus Rex Regum, & Dominus Dominantium, cuius iudicia abyssus multa, in cuius manu corda sunt Regum, dans salutem quibus vult; ipsum Regnū Francia his tribus dotauit, & ditauit in breui tempore beneficijs preciosis. That God had in small time enriched and endowed the Kingdome of France with three precious benefits; the Crowne of Thornes; the Crosse of our Lord Iesus Christ (he might haue added the steele head of the Lance that pierced his side, and the Spunge which sucke vp the Gaule and Vineger, which are likewise in the holy Chappell of the Pallace at Paris; and one of the foure nailes, wherewith hee was fastned to the Tree of the Crosse, which is at S. Denys in France) and the body of the most happy Emond, Archbishop of Canterbury in England (that is S. Edme of Pontigny in Bourgongne; where euen to this instant day, he is to be seene in flesh and bones, without any iot of impairing) and Confessour, shewing daily infinite strange myracles.

The 3. great Blessings bestowed on France.

A Chappell purposely builded for the Reliques.

The King of France then (so proceedeth on our Monke) caused to be builded neere to his Pallace, a Chappell of royall structure, wherein hee enclosed these precious Reliques of our redemption. Moreouer, the said King had his Chappell adorned with the Cloake of our Lord, the head of the Lance, and the Spundge, with innumerable other precious Reliques; in honor and reuerence whereof, the Pope hath granted forty daies of true pardon, to all such as goe to say prayers and meditations, in the said holy Chappell of the Pallace at Paris. Vnde Dominus Papa concessit omnibus eas adeuntibus in Capella Parisiensi orandi causa, Quadraginta dierum relaxationis. As much auoucheth William of Nangis, in the life of the King S. Lewis, and the twelfth chapter.

The said King S. Lewis caused to be enchased in gold, a part of the said true Crosse, which is to be seene in the holy Chappell, called The Crosse of Triumph and of Victory, and he carried some part thereof with him whersoeuer he went, and at solemne feasts, himselfe shewed it to the people.

The following Kings obserued the example of King Lewis.

By his example, the Kings his descendants obserued the same laudable custome, when making their entrance into Paris, they went to render thankes to God in the Cathedrall Church thereof, where they shewed to the people that Crosse of victory. Alanus

Alanus Chartierus, describing the entrance of King Charles the seuenth, called the Victorious, telleth vs, that his Maiesty arriuing at the Porch (Paradisus in the Capitularies) of the Church of Paris, tooke the accustomed Oath, for conseruation of the Rights and Priuiledges thereof, betweene the hands of the Bishop of Paris: which being done, he entred into the Church, within the body whereof were three Arches, couered with great burning Tapers, which shewed the structure of the faire Temple so admirably, and as cleere as at noone day. Hauing said his prayers, and Te Deum being sung, he went to suppe and lodge at the Pallace in the wonted manner. On the next day in the morning, being Wednesday, the 13. of Nouember, Anno 1437 the King went to heare masse in the holy Chappell, and shewed there to the people, the true Crosse, and the head of the Speare, wherewith our Lord was pierced on the Tree of the Crosse.

This custome obserued by the most Christian Kings, in shewing the true Crosse to the people of Paris, on the morrow after their entrance; was deriued from their yeerely meeting on good Friday, at the said holy Chappell, for shewing the true Crosse to the people, in honor and reuerence which they bare to the holy Hieroglyphicke of our Redemption. For, after that the King S. Lewis had receiued the true Crosse, from the Treasury of the Latine Emperors of Constantinople (as wee haue said) and p'aced it in the holy Chappell of his Pallace, by him newly builded, as yet is to be seene: he and the Kings his successors, went to adore it yearelie on good-Friday, and soone after they shewed it to the people, at the trauers of a grate, or lattice made in an yron cage, at issuing forth of a Chappell in the Quire, fronting on the South-side of the Pallace. As it is seene on Palme-Sunday (when the Church of Paris goeth on Procession) then prepared on a Table, couered with a faire white cloth, and two lighted Tapers on both sides of the said true Crosse, when it is adored by the Cleargy and people.

Whence the custome was deriued.

Prouision made because it should not be touched.

This latter custome is taken forth of the Registers belonging to the Court of Parliament, in Anno 1423. wherein is an Order, whereby the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, for his Nephew King Henry of England, sixt of the name, chalenging his title to France) had power to shew the true Crosse to the people of Paris, and these are the words of the said Act. The Duke of Bedford, by the absence of the King his Nephew, and representing his person, shall shew on good-Friday the true Crosse to the people, as the Kings of France vsed the same day to doe. This was during the beginning of the most miserable and vnfortunate reigne of King Charles the seuenth, who reconquered his Kingdome by the point of the sword, and was victorious ouer all his enemies.

The Duke of Bedford regent of France for the King of England.

Passe we now to the disease called the Kings euill, and curing thereof, reserued to the Monarchs of the Sacred Lillie of France: for thereof it was that so excellently spake S. Thomas Aquinas, in the passage before alleadged, concerning the holy Viole or Bottle, and sacring the Kings of France.

King Clouis made experience thereof, on the person of one of his ordinary household, one whom he affected, named Lanicetus, whom he made whole and sound from that foule and infectious disease. And the Kings his Successours, euen to this very day (after their Sacring, but not before) shewed by experience, that this Celestiall grace is infused into them, yea, and continued, from the day of their Sacring, vntill the houre of their deceasse.

The Kings Euill, and how the King of France vsed to cure it.

Petrus Blesensis, Archdeacon of Somersetshire in England, but borne, and buried at Blois, the yeare of Grace one thousand two hundred, vnder Philip Augustus, in his hundred and fiftieth Epistle, speaking of the Kings Euill, hath these words. Fateor quod sanctum est Domino Regi assistere: Sanctus enim, & Christus Domini est, Nec in vanum accepit vnctionis Regiæ Sacramentum. Cuius Vnctionis virtus si ignoratur, aut in dubium venit, fidem eius plenissimam facit defectus inguinariæ pectis, & curatio Scrophularum. This wicked foule disease, hath many Latine and Greeke names, Cherades, Sodelle, Strumæ, Scrophulæ, and other beside.

Clouis and the Kings his Successors, touching their throates that were so diseased, vsed but these words, as all other Kings doe to this day: The King toucheth thee; but God cure thee. S. Lewes, ninth of the name, added thereto the signe of the Crosse, which which the Kings his Predeceſſours had not vſed to doe. As we learne by Guillaume de Nangis, in the liues of S. Lewes, and of his eldeſt Sonne Phillip the Hardie, King of France, third of the name. In tangendo infirmitates, quæ vulgo, Sodellæ vocantur, ſuper quibus curandis, Franciæ Regibus Dominus contulit gratiam ſingularem, pius Rex (ſpeaking of S. Lewes) modum hunc, præter cæteros, voluit obſeruari. Cum enim alij Reges Prædeceſſores ſui tangendo ſolummodo locum morbi, verba ad hæc appropriata, & conſueta proferrent, quæ quidem verba Sancta atque Catholica ſunt, nec facere conſueuiſſent aliquod ſignum Crucis, ipſe (S. Lewes) ſuper conſuetudinem aliorum hoc addidit, quod dicendo verba ſuper locum morbi, ſanctæ Crucis ſignaculum imprimebat, vt ſequens curatio virtuti Crucis potius attribueretur, quæ Regiæ dignitati. And yet notwithſtanding, I haue ſeene ſome ſuch diſeaſed perſons handled by the Kings Henry the third, Henry the Great, of famous memory, and King Lewes the thirteenth, now reigning, who did onely touch the Euill, pronouncing the words before remembred.

The ſigne of the Croſſe added by the king S. Lewes.

Iacobus Valdeſius, a Spaniſh Doctor, in a Tract which hee wrote concerning the dignity of the King and Kingdome of Spaine, is compelled to ſubſcribe to the truth, touching the excellency of the Kings of France, in healing this dangerous diſeaſe. Howbeit, according to the naturall diſpoſition of his Nation, which in ſo wretched a ſickneſſe cannot exceed the true meanes indeed: he laboureth ſubtilly, to tarniſh and deface the glory of the French to his vttermoſt, anouching, that the power of this curing, proceeded not by the purity and ſweetneſſe of the ayre of France, but contrariwiſe, by heauenly grace and fauour giuen to the Noble Kings thereof. Non deſunt qui detrahere gloriæ Gallorum velint, id euenire dicentes occaſione aeris Gallici curandis Strumis ſalubris, & ita omnes aerem mutantes, & ad regionem Gallicæ venientes, valetudinem recuperare. Sed ego ſentio id accidere gratia conceſſa a Deo optimo maximo eius obſequio deditis Regibus Galliæ, & fidelibus, præſertim Diuæ Ludouico, adeo quod in oppido Poblete (that is a Burrough and Monaſtery, ſeated on the frontiers of Arragon and Catalogna, where the moſt part of the Kings of Arragon are enterred) in regione Hiſpaniæ Catalauniæ, vbi brachium veneratur Diui Regis Ludouici, quos laborantes Strumis tangit, brachium illud ad ſanitatem reducit. But this Author (ignorant in the French Hiſtory) is miſtaken, alleadging S. Lewes to be the firſt King that cured the Euill: the paſſage of Nangis before anouched, proueth the contrarie.

That it is done more naturally in Italy and Spaine then in France.

In referring this cure to the temperate ayre of France, is a great abſurdity, becauſe the ſame hath beene done as well in Italy as in Spaine, which Prouinces are ſtuffing, and wondrous hote.

In Italie, the Continuer of Enguerran de Monſtrellet, in his Hiſtory of France, and the Italians Paulus Iouius, and Guichardin, ſpeaking of the entrie of King Charles, eight of the name, into the City of Rome, as he went to re-conquer his Kingdom of Naples. The King (ſaith the Continuer) ſhewed himſelfe to haue power then ſo ſumptuous and magnificent, euen in the Citie of Rome, that hee cauſed to be erected threm foure payre of gallowes, commanding to be hanged, ſtrangled, and beheaded certain theeues and malefactors, in the field of floures (In Campo Floris:) Others likewiſe were beaten, whipt, their noſes and eares cut off, and ſome ſuch delinquents drowned. To declare, that as the true eldeſt Sonne of the Church, and moſt Chriſtian King, he had all the high and loweſt meanes of Iuſtice within Rome: like as in the City of Paris, and other of his Kingdome of France.

After this moſt remarkeable Tract, followeth that concerning the touching or handling the Kings euil. On the Tueſday next enſuing, being the twentieth day of Ianuarie, Anno 1493. the King heard Maſſe in a place called the Chappell of France (that is of S. Lewis) where he handled and healed the diſeaſe of the Kings euill; which when the Italians beheld, they were neuer ſo ouercome with wonder.

Arnoulle Ferron, Counceller in the Parliament of Bourdeaux, in the life of good King Lewis the twelfth, called Father of the people, writeth, that this Prince hauing made his entrance into the City of Geneway, as being Soueraigne Lord thereof: the people of Geneway admired nothing more, then to ſee him cure ſuch a diſeaſe, onely with the touch of his hand: Mirati ſunt illi Regem Strumis ſolo remedio mederi.

The

The Chronicle of Anthony du Prat, Chancellour of France, in the life of King Francis the firſt, telleth vs, that after the battell of Marignano, (in the field of Saint Bridget, a place famous for the ouerthrow and buriall of ſixeene thouſand and fiue hundred Switzers, ſlaine there in the field) King Francis became Maſter of his Duchie of Millaine, and Seigneury of Geneway, Cities whereinto hauing made his entrance, he went to Bologna le Graſſe, where Pope Leo de Medicis, tenth of the name then remained. The King ſoiourning ſome few daies at Bologna, departed thence the fifteenth day of December, Anno 1515. Vpon which day of his departure, hee handled & healed the diſeaſed of the Kings Euill, in the Chappell of the ſaid Popes Pallace, to the great amazement of the Holy Father, and the Italians that came to ſee the wonder. Among the reſt, a Biſhop of Polonia was cured, who came (expreſſely for that effect) to Millaine, and from thence to Bologna, with commendatory Letters from the King of Poland, his Lord and Soueraigne Prince.

A Biſhop of Poland cured of the Kings Euill.

After the vnfortunate day at Pauia, ſo fatall to France, by ſurprizall of the ſame King Francis, and that great Prince tranſported into Spaine, where hee was vſed like a Barbarian, and with all rigour, by Charles the fift, his Vaſſall and Liedgeman for the Counties of Flanders and Artois. The ſaid King (rendring good for euill) healed all Spaniards infected with the loathſome diſeaſe (wherewith thoſe people are troubled beyond all other in the world.)

The bad entertainment of the King, and his goodneſſe extended to the Spaniards, was ſole ſubiect to the learned Laſcaris, to make this Epigram, whereby hee touched (to the quicke) Charles the fift for the ingratitude, ſmall reſpect and honour by him offered to the Aſculapius of his people, his Prince and Soueraigne Lord.

Ergo manu admota ſanat Rex Charadas, eſt que

The Epigram of Laſcaris againſt Charles the fift.

And now we come to the Kings Regall Right and Prerogatiue.

S. Gregory of Tours, in the ſecond booke and thirty eight chapter of his hiſtory of France, ſpeaking of the Preſents which King Clouis receiued from Anaſtaſius, Emperour of the Eaſt, ſaith that Aſcenſo equo, aurum, argentumque, & itinere illo quod inter Portam Atrij, & Eccleſiam Ciuitatis eſt, præſentibus Populis manu propria ſpargens, voluntate benigniſsima erogauit. Hauing receiued them in the Church of S. Martin in Tours, he mounted on horſeback, and cloathed in the Ornaments of the Emperour of the Eaſt, with the Diademe on his head; hee threw (with his owne hand) gold and ſiluer to the people, from the Church porch of S. Martin, vnto the great Church of the City. He had learned this behauiour of the Romane Emperours, who vpon the dayes of their Coronation gaue very liberall Largeſſe to the people.

Curopalates, in the booke concerning the Officers of the Court of Conſtantinople, obſerueth that ancient cuſtome, that the new Emperour appointed, going to the Church to be Sacred and Crowned, mounted on a Theater (prepared for the purpoſe) at the Porch of the Gate Royall, where hee diſtributed his Largeſſe of pieces of new Cloth, being of his colours and Liueries, with ſome pieces of gold or ſiluer. Nouus Imperator aſcenſo Triclinio, quod Thomaites appellatur, ſpectans verſus Auguſtale, vbi ſtat Populus, ſimul & milites, per aliquem Senatorij Ordinis virum (antequam ſe videndum exhibeat) Populo Miſſilia iacit, Epicombia dicta, Segmenta videlicet expanno, in illorum vnoquoque ſunt nummiſmata aurea tria, argentea totidem. And afterward, he was ſhewne to the people, exalted vpon a Shield, as wee haue ſaid in the precedent booke.

After the ſolemne Feaſt for the ſaid Sacring and Coronation, there is yet a further Largeſſe giuen to the people, by a Senatour appointed to doe it; which is continued for the ſpace of eight or ten daies, during the Ceremonies of the ſaid Coro-

A further largeſſe to the people of 8 or 10. daies continuance.

Coronation, more or leſſe, according to the benefit of time, and ſeaſon of the yere. The firſt day thereof, the new Emperour comming to his Pallace, preſenteth himſelfe to all them of his Court, vpon a place highly exalted, hauing the Maſter of his Wardrobe with him, or chiefeſt Gentleman of his Chamber, who holdeth in his Cloake skirt many peeces of gold and ſiluer, which the Emperour gripeth with his owne hands, and diſtributeth to the Princes and Lords of his Court, as alſo to their children, the people then preſent, and to all his Officers.

Saint Gregory of Tours hath not obſerued (or elſe wee come farre ſhort of this paſſage in his Hiſtory, as well as of other more beſide) that Clouis hauing vnderſtood that this Emperour Anaſtaſius of the Eaſt, to be infected with the Hereſie of Eutiches the Magician, Acephales the Manichean, and rooted in all impiety (for he was ſlaine with a clap of thunder, and his body beaten into powder) ſent the Crowne of Gold (whereof Anaſtaſius had made him a preſent) to Rome, and made an Offering of it on the Altar of Saint Peter the Apoſtle.

The ſtrange death of Anaſtaſius, the Emperor of the Eaſt.

Sigibert auoucheth this to be in the yeere of Grace, fiue hundred and ten. Clodoueus Rex ab Anaſtaſio Imperatore codicillos de Conſulatu, & Coronam Aueam cum gemmis, & Tunicam Blatteam (Blatta ſignifieth a Scarlet Robe, which the Romanes called Tyrian Purple, and Sidonius Apollonaris, in the Panegyricke ſpoken vnto Maurian, ſaith:

Pontus Caſtorea, Blattam Tyrus, æra Corinthus, accepit. Ipſe vero Rex miſit Romæ S. Petro Coronam Aureum cum gemmis, quæ Regnum appellari ſolet. As much ſaith the Monke Aimonius, in his firſt booke and 24. chapter of his hiſtory of France.

These words vſed by Sigibert, Regnum appellari ſolet, doe inſtruct vs, that in perpetuall memory of the piety and deuotion of Clouis, (on behalfe of the Church) the Crowne was religiouſly kept in the Treaſury of S. Peter. And that, For Excellency, the Realme of France was called Regnum, and her Monarch Rex, without any other addition, as we ſhall heereafter ſhew more at large in another Chapter.

A Kingdome and King.

The greatneſſe and riches of S. Peters Patrimony, came not by the imaginarie donation of Conſtantine the Great, as the Greekes, to get ſome precedencie in honor ouer the Latine Church, haue falſly ſuppoſed: and, among other Authors, Photius, Patriarch of Conſtantinople in his Nomocanon, Theodorus Balſamo, and ſome other Italians, as Auguſtinus Eugubinus, in hatred and enuy, which he bare (without reaſon) to the French, would make men beleeue.

Hunc fabulam longi temporis mendacia finxit.

And that Honor is due onely to the moſt Chriſtian Monarchs of the Floure de Luce, the moſt iudicious are forced to confeſſe. Anaſtaſius, Maiſter of the Romane Librarie, in the life of Pope Hormiſda, ſaith: That Clouis gaue great Gifts and Preſents to the Confeſſion of S. Peter: And among the reſt, the Imperiall Crowne which Anaſtaſius, Emperor of the Eaſt, had ſent vnto him. This is alſo the opinion of Joſephus Stephanus, Epiſcopus Oriolanus, in the Treatiſe which he wrote De Coronatione Summi Pontifici.

It was the ſame Clouis, who at the motion of the Romane Emperors, with-held the Royall Prerogatiues concerning the Inueſtitures of Biſhops, and Soueraigne Patronages of Archbiſhoprickes, in his owne Kingdome.

As concerning Inueſtitures or Enſtallments, Sigibert writeth in the yeere fiue hundred, that Clouis gaue great heritages and goods to the Church of Rheimes. Floardus, in his Hiſtorie of the ſaid Church, ſetteth downe the number of them; of all which goods, Clouis retained the homage to himſelfe, and to the Kings his Succeſſors. Saint Rhemigius ſeeing himſelfe ſtored with more riches then was needfull for his Church, gaue part of them vnto the Church of Laon, which which he erected for a Cathedrall Church. And the firſt Biſhop was named Genebaudus, inueſted into the ſaid Biſhopricke by Clouis, Per Annulum & Virgam, with a Croſier and a Ring, as the Romane Emperors did.

The maner of inueſting Biſhops.

Of Elections to Biſhopricks and Abbeyes.

It is generally knowne, that the Elections to Biſhopricks and Abbies, were anciently made in France, by voyce and ſuffrages of the people and Cleargy, and were afterward agreed vnto by the Kings, who very often (without any regard of thoſe Elections) placed others at their owne will, taking, (ordenarily) Prieſts and Chaplaines out of their Oratory and Chappell; of whom, after their Inueſtiture, they receiued the Oath of Allegiance, which continueth yet to this day, the Kings Regall right being open for the King to this day, and the ſaid Oath taken.

In the fift Councell of Orleans, it was namely decreed, that Eccleſiaſticall perſons ſhould not make any vnder-hand ſute, for election to the ſaid Biſhoprickes and Abbeyes of France, without the will and conſent of the King. Vt nullus Epiſcopatum donis, aut comparatione liceat adire, ſed cum voluntate Regis iuxta electionem Cleri, Plebis, &c. with prohibition giuen to the Comprouinciall Biſhops, not to conſecrate them vpon the paine of excommunication; as appeareth in the eight Article of the firſt Councell of Paris.

And according to theſe Decrees of the Gallicane Church, we ſee in S. Gregorie of Tours his third book, and ſeuenteenth Chapter, that Omnatius, Dionyſio Epiſcopo apud Turonos decedente, tribus annis præfuit. Hoc iuſſu Chlodomiris Regis ordinatus eſt: And in the following bookes we reade, that Theodorus Proculus, and Diniſius were promoted to the ſaid Biſhopricke of Tours, by the command and nomination of the King.

In the ſixt booke and ninth chapter, Dumnolus, Prior of the Monaſtery of Saint Laurence at Paris, which at this preſent is a Pariſh, was made Biſhop of Mans, by command of King Clotharius. And after this Dumnolus (by his fauour and recommendation) the Abbot Theodulphus (the Abbots in Cathedrall Churches being in thoſe times ſuch as now adaies wee call Decanos, Deanes, as Archdeacons or Country Deanes at this preſent, were tearmed anciently Chorepiſcopi) was admitted Biſhop of Mans by the ſaid King Clotharius.

In the ſame booke and ſeuenth chapter wee vnderſtand, that Biſhops choſen and conſecrated without the conſent and will of the King, were depoſed, and others enſtalled in their places. Dynamius, Gouernour of Prouence and Languedocke, for the King of Bourgongne-France Gonthran, eſtabliſhed in the Biſhopricke of Vſez (after the death of Ferreolus) one named Albinus. Gonthran offended at the boldneſſe of his Lieutenant, who had arrogated to himſelfe the Right truely Royall: deprined and diſmiſſed Albinus from the ſaid Biſhoprick, which he gaue to Iounus, formerly Gouernour of Prouence. Albinus ex præfecto per Dynamium Rectorem Prouinciæ, Extra Regis Conſilium, ſuſcepit Vticenſem Epiſcopum, quo non amplius quam tribus fruitur menſibus, & Iouinum qui quondam Rector Prouinciæ fuerat, Regium de Epiſcopatu præceptum accepit.

Biſhops choſen and conſecrated without the Kings conſent, depoſed, and other inſtalled.

These examples, taken from an hundred more, may ſuffice (in mine opinion) to ſhew, that from all Antiquitie, and from the time of the firſt Chriſtian French Kings, the Inueſtiture in the Biſhoprickes of France, was reſerued by the Kings in due right of Soueraignty, and not by grant or conceſſion of Pope Adrian, made to King Charlemaigne, as Gratian the Monke, and ſome other Italians after him haue imagined. For it is a caſe euident & notorious, that Clouis hauing embraced Chriſtianity, made reſeruation of all ſuch markes & rights of Soueraignty, as the Chriſtian Emperors vſed to haue; namely, that of Inueſtitures, and Rights Royall: vpon which ſubiect, we ſay, that Pope Boniface, eight of that name, howſoeuer otherwiſe, one of the learneſt and worthieſt men that held the City of Rome, next to Pope Innocent the third; was ill informed in the particularities of the French Hiſtory, and Soueraigne Prerogatiues of the holy and ſacred Luces Monarchs; when he ſought to draw into arbitrement and compromiſe, the Regall Right of Philip le Bel, King of France and Nauarre, in the yeere of Grace 1301. And the ſaid Philip le Bel had good reaſon to anſwere him, that In Temporalibus, hee knew not any Prince in the world, who could any way command him. And that hee held his his Kingdome of none but God, and by his Sword, and that the Regalities, that is to say, vacant Prebendaries, and fruits of vacant Bishoprickes in his Kingdome, appertained to him Iure Regio, As due Rights to his Crowne. Ecclesiarum & Prebendarum vacantium collationem ad Francorum Reges, Iure Regio, pertinere, & fructus earum posse percipere.

What the Right Regale is Psalm. 24. 1.

Regale is a Right, which the most Christian Kings haue by reason of their sacred Crowne, aboue all the Bishops of, or in, the Kingdome of France: Domini est terra, & plenitudo eius, to enioy the Reuenues of the said Bishoprickes, and dispose of the vacant Prebendaries, in what part soeuer of the Kingdome they are, by death of the Bishop, all the while, and so long as the See shall be vacant, and vntill such time as a new Bishop (prouided in the place of the deceased) hath sworne to the King the Oath of Allegiance. In like manner is it of the Bishops, honoured by the Pope with the Cardinalls Hat, whether they haue any title or no; because by this dignity, Fiunt noui Homines Papæ, The Pope hath made them new men.

The Honor of the Cardinalls Hatte.

How the Right Regale extended it selfe in elder times.

Anciently, the Right Regale extended it selfe, not only on the Benefices, whereof the Bishops disposed, but also on all the moueables, cheuisance and riches of the said Bishops, either deceasing or changing the See, if they made not an authentical Testament, wherein they ought (first of all) to demand the Kings power; for otherwise they could make no Will, and all their moueables appertained to the King, who to receiue them, deputed ordinarily men of his Court and House. I will alleadge some few examples, deriued from a million of other.

The Borough of the Abbey S. Remy at Rheims.

King Clouis (as wee haue already said) gaue store of inheritances to the Church of Rheims, and to the Archbishop S. Rhemigius: among other, hee gaue the Borough of the Abbey, called S. Remy at Rheimes, with charge of taking the Oathe of fidelitie to him, and to the Kings his successors, all the Inhabitants and abiders in the said Borough.

In the Registers of the Court of Parliament at Paris, is that which was giuen to King Philip Augustus, by the hands of his deputies, at receiuing the Regales of the Archbishop of Rheims, whereof heere followeth the true tenure.

The tenure of the Regale.

HOmines de Burgo Sancti Rhemigij Rhemensis fecerunt Domino Regi fidelitatem sub hac forma. Ipsi conseruabunt pro posse suo, bona fide, vitam, Corpus, & membra Regis, honorem Regni, & omnia iura Regis. Præsente Petro de Nongento, tunc Abbate, Raulfo Priore consanguineo suo, Monachi præsentes Garnerius Orillardus Camerarius domus, Nicolaus Anis, Garnerus Suessionensis, Petrus Capellanus Abbatis, & plures alij. Hanc fidelitatem pro Domino Rege receperunt Magister Boso Clericus eius, & Robertus de Lesga. Actum Rhemis dum ipsi custodirent Regalia post decessum Alberici Archiepiscopi Rhemensis Anno Domini Millesimo, Ducentesimo, Decimo Octauo, Mense Martio, aut Capellam Abbatis.

In the same Registers is the donation made by the said King Philip Augustus, of certaine Acres of Vines, being in the Vineyard of Argentoeil, neere Paris, to the Bishop of Senlis, for augmentation of the Regales of the said Bishopricke.

Et hoc ferimus in augmentum Regalium Nostrorum de Siluanectis. Actum Parisius Anno Domini Millesimo Ducentesimo Decimo quinto, Mense Augusto.

Other Decrees of the Kings Regale.

In the same Registers are the Arrests and Decrees of the Regales of Rouen, and Suffragan Bishops of Normandie, and the Bishopricke of Arras, the Capitall City of Artois, adiudged vnto the said King Philip Augustus. There are likewise those of Guyenne, that is to say, of intire Aquitaine, and of Bourgongne, although these Prouinces were held by Princes of the Blood, and great Lords that had them in subalterne Soueraignety. And none of the Bishops of them were exempted, but by especiall grace and priuiledge, which the Kings gaue them.

Subalterne Soueraignety.

In some certaine Dioceses, the Kings taxed the Bishops subiects, during the Regale, Regale, and at their will: except other speciall grace and fauour had bin granted. The Church of Paris was one of this number, as we vnderstand by a Decree of the Parlement Court, in the time of King Phillip Augustus; which, during the Regale, after the decease of the good Bishop Maurice (vnder whom the Church of Paris was finished) taxed the Customes at two hundred fortie and so many pounds. But in fauour of Eudes de Sully, Cousine Germaine to the King (whose Picture and Tombe is to be seene in Potin, placed betweene the doore of the Quire, and the Pulpet in the Church of Paris) the Bishoppe, successour of Maurice, and the Pulpet in the Church of Paris) the Bishoppe, succeessour of Maurice, the custome was reduced to the summe of threescore Parisian pounds: A very remarkeable Decree, the tenure whereof here followeth, to serue as a light to Posteritie.

The Church of Chartres, one of the most famous in Christendome, was subiect to these Regales from all antiquity. So that the death of the Bishop thereof happening, the Countes and the people diuided and made pillage of the Bishops Pallace, vntill such time as Count Henry, otherwise called Stephen, who by Letters vnder his priuie Seale, wherein Adela (that is Alix) his wife, and his children were vnder-written; acquitted this bad custome to the Bishops of Chartres, in fauour and contemplation of the learned Bishop Yuon, famous for his writings, which wee haue vnder his owne hand. And vpon it the King his Soueraigne interposed his authoritie, Leures the Deuout, seuenth of the name, whose Letters Patents you may heere reade, as they are registred in the said Court.

Another Charter granted to the said Count

The Charter of the said Count Henry Stephen of Chartres, registred after this, is very remarkeable, which neuerlesse we will passe ouer, becausse it would seeme too long and tedious.

The same King Loüis the yonger, called the Deuout, and vulgarly the Piitifull, exempted or gratified (for the same subiect) the Church of Laon by his Letters Patents registred at the Parliament, as heere you may reade.

Of the same Kings Letters Patents, is to be seene in the said Court Registers, concerning his Regall Right in the Bishopricke of Menda in Geuaudan, a Suffragan Bishopricke belonging to the Archbishopricke of Bourges, the Primacie of Aquitaine. The Bishops of the said place (it is a small Towne, seated neere the Riuer of Oi, on all sides engirt with Mountaines of the Seuenes in Languedocke, betweene the Bishops of Montpellier, Nismes, Puy in Velay, and *S. And therefore they made solemne Festiuals, with a Scepter of Gold carried before them, which likewise they would lay vpon the Altar, when they celebrated in Pontificalibus. Vnto this day, they beare the title of Counts of Geuaudan, and in their Episcopall house (beside other places in the Citie of Menda) are to be seene many Armes of the Bishops thereof, couered with a Counts Circle or Crowne. Others haue aloft a Miter, on the one side, an Helmet on the other, and a Crosier in the midst, to shew, that they were Lords Spirituall and Temporall of the Countrey. But afterward, the King became Maister thereof; were it by consent of the Bishops of the place, or by some other manner. This small Citie of Menda hath for Armes L'Escu d'Azur à vne M. à l'Antique (as one would say Mimatus) & vn Soleil d'Or en Chef, & pour Deuise a l'entour: Tenebræ eam non comprehenderunt. But now the case is altered, becausse it being ouercome with Heresie, it hath proued to be the ruine of the Citie, and the Bishoppes Church, one of the richest in France. Here are the Letters Patents of King Lewes the seauenth, sent to the Bishop Aubert, who did him homage for the said Countie of Geuaudan.

Ludouicus Dei Gratia Francorum Rex: Adelberto Venerabili Gabalorum Episcopo, & omnibus Successoribus suis in perpetuum. Longe est à memoria omnium mortalium nostri temporis, quod aliquis Episcopus Gabalorum ad curiam Antecessorum nostrorum Regum Francorum venerit, & eorum subditionem agnouerit, & fidelitatem eis fecerit, quamuis tota terra, illa aditu difficilima, & montuosa, in Episcoporum potestate semper extiterit, non tantum ad faciendum Ecclesiasticam Censuram, sed ad iudicandum ingladio, super illos quos culpa sua monstrabat sic redarguendos. These were no common fauours of the Kings, but to perticuler persons

This was a great Priuiledge, and could not be common to all the Bishopricks in France, and these relinquishings of the Regale, were but to perticulers, and, as personall. For we finde that King Phillip Augustus his Sonne, who wonderfully augmented his Kingdome, by an infinitie of requisitions: tooke these Regall Rights from the Lords that had vsurped them, as in possession and absolute enioying.

An Inquisition made concerning the Right Regale.

In the Registers of the Court, there is found an Inquisition made by the Kings Attourney Generall, and the Vidame de Chaalons in Champaigne, who pretended to be in possession thereof, by the Bishops death. Enquirie being made on either side, by the Iudge of the Inquisitions, giuen by the Bishops of Paris, and Meaux, Lotharre de Cremont, Rodolphe, Arch-Deacon of Bourges. Master Godfrey de Poissy, and Nicolas de Chartres, Councellers, and Knights by Learning, the Count de Beaumont, the Count de Ponthieu, Simon de Montfort, Guillaume de Barres, Guillaume de Garland, Gautier Chamberlaine of France, B. de Roye, Phillip de Lens, and Nicolas le Chat, Councellers and Knights at Armes; it was said. That the Regales ouer the Cathedrall Churches in the Kingdome of France, appertained to the King onely in common right; that they were without compasse of perscription. and no way communicable, to any other then the Royall person. The Vidame de Chaalons was frustrated in his cause, and he condemned in a merciament to the King (Phillip Augustus) vpon a day named, as hee was, and you may behold the Act. *Notum &c. quod Vicedominus Catalaunensis fecit emendam Domino Regi apud Castrum nouum super Ligerim, de illis mobilibus quæ caperat apud hæredes Domini Episcopi Catalaunensis; Testibus Decanis Aurelianensis Ciuitatis, & Magistro G. de sancto Lazaro, & G. The Verdict giuen by the Iurie.

So that the new Bishops were bound immediately after their election, to come and take the Oath of fidelity to the King, and to acknowledge, that that the Regale Prerogatiue appertained to him, in right of his Crowne, as here you behold an example, concerning the Bishopricke of Mascon.

Notum,

Notum &c. Quod ego Electus Matisconensis veniens ad Dominum nostrum Philippum illustrem Regem Francorum, potestatem habens à Decano, & Vniuerso Capitulo Matisconensi, per litteras eiusdem Decani & Capituli patentes, videlicet quod quidquid facerem in presentia Domini Regis ratum haberent, & in perpetuum obseruarent; Recognoui ius Domini Regis Francorum quod habet in Regalibus Matisconensis Ecclesiæ, scilicet quod mortuo Episcopo Matisconensi, vel quotiescunque sedes Matisconensis vacauerit, omnia Regalia, & omnes prouentus Regalium existentes in Regno Franciæ, libere sunt Domini Regis Francorum, sicut Episcopus libere possidebat. Et si quis Episcopus Matisconensis decesserit intestatus, quod omnia tam mobilia, quam prouentus omnes sunt domini Regis Francorum integre, & absolute. Quia vero Decanus, & Capitulum Matisconense contradixerunt Nuntio Domini Regis Francorum, Odoni scilicet Clementi Archidiacono Parisiensi Clerico suo Regalia, & mobilia in Morte E. Episcopi, ego emendaui pro Decano, & Capitulo, & Dominus Rex Francorum hanc emendam misit in summonitione sua. The publique acknowledgement of the elect Bishop of Mascon.

So that vpon the refusall which was made by the Deane and Chapter of Mascon, to the Archdeacon of Paris, Eudes, Clearke of the Chappell to the said Phillip Augustus, of the Regales, as well in vacant Prebendaries, as the moueables of the last deceased Bishop: the said King reuoked the power of electing a new Bishop. And yet he restored to them (at their owne charge, to make amends to him, according to his owne liking; as is specified in the Letters Patents, sent to the said Deane and Chapter, in such manner as followeth.

The King reuoked the power of the electing a new Bishop.

Philippus Dei gratia Francorum Rex. Nouerint vniuersi præsentes pariter & futuri. Quod quotiescunque Episcopus Matisconensis moritur, vel quotiescunq; Sedes Matisconensis Ecclesiæ vacauerit, & Capitulum Matisconense a nobis licentiam de electione faciendæ requisierit, eidem sine contradictione eligendi licentiam concedemus. Si vero Episcopus eiusdem Ecclesiæ intestatus decesserit, omnia mobilia, quæ ipse, vel per se, vel per alium in Regno nostro possidebat, libere, & integre nostra erunt. Si vero idem Episcopus nostra licentia testamentum fecerit per testimonium bonorum virorum de mobilibus quæ ipse in vita sua possidebat, nos contra idem testamentum nequaquam veniemus. Præterea sciendum est quod omnia Regalia, & omnes Prouentus Regalium post mortem Episcopi Matisconensis, quandiu sedes dicta vacauerit, vbicunque sint in Regno nostro quiete, & pacifice possidebimus; & nos eadem Regalia in eo statu, & puncto post quam ad manum nostram deuenerint, sine violentia contrectabimus, quomodo prædecessor Episcopus Matisconensis ea contrectauerit. Quod vt firmum sit &c. Actum Parisius Anno Domini Millesimo Ducentesimo Primo, Mensis Aprilis, Regni nostri Vicesimo quarto.

The Regales of Langres Bishopricke giuen to the Deane and Chapter, and vpon what reason.

The same Philip Augustus, during the warre which he had against the elected Emperour Otho, Ferrand of Portugall, Count of Flanders, and Iohn & Richard, Kings of England, Vncles to the said Otho: gaue the Regales of the Bishopricke of Langres, to the Deane and Chapter of the said Bishopricke, & power to elect a new Bishop, without attending his permission: in contemplation or regard of this, that Langres was a Frontier Citie of the Kingdome of France, vpon the marches & limits of Lorraine, & because (of this neere neighbouring) it was exposed to the rauages, courses and robberies of enemies to the Crowne. With charge neuertheleſſe, to keepe the moueables of the deceased Bishop, for him that should succeede him. Who immediately after his election, came to the place where his Maiesty as then resided, to take the Oath of allegeance, & also to acknowledge, that he held the Regales of his Maiesty. This priuiledge was giuen to the said Church of Langres, in regard of the war, & not by being a Ducall Peerdome, as some haue written. For it was & should be common to fiue other Ecclesiasticall Peerdomes, Rheims, Laon, Beauuais, Chaalons and Noyon; and yet notwithstanding, we haue before reported the contrary. These are the Patents of the said King Philip Augustus.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Rod, called the Hand of Iuſtice, borne by the Kings of France onely: Of their Throane, and Great Seale: Of the greatneſſe of their Court of Parlement: Of the Peeres and Chancellers of France: And of forraigne Princes who haue voluntarily ſubmitted to the Iudgement of the Parlement of Paris.

Iuſtice the Queene of all vertues whatſoeuer, in what manner figured by the Druides.

IVSTITIA ante eum ambulabit, & ponet in via greſſus ſuos. The Queene of Vertues, that cleare and bright-shining Aſtrea, Iuſtice, whom the wiſe Druides repreſented by a Rod of excellent beauty, her garments long, and of Azure blew, celeſtiall colour, thickely powdered with ſtarres, with the Creſcent of a Moone at her feete, the Symbole of Nobility, holding in her right hand a Ballance, and the other full of eares of Corne, the noate of Abound lance. This Diuine and heauenly Virgin, the ſigne whereof is the aſſured Horeſcope of France, & hath euermore ſerued as a Lanterne and guide to the Monarches of the Lillie, whoſe ſteps haue, at all time, bin ruled and diſpoſed in the wayes of Iuſtice.

Of whom the Romans borrowed Royalty.

The Romaine Emperours borrowed of the Perſians, the noates of Royaltie, and the Perſians learned them of the Iewes, being kept and reſtrained in ſlauery among them.

In Media flowing into Tigris by the borders of Perſia.

The capitall Citie in the Kingdome of Perſia, was named Suſa, which in the Syriake tongue and Eaſterne, ſignifieth Floure de Luce. It was thwarted with the great Riuer Choaſpis, of which water (and none other) the Kings of Perſia vſed to drinke, in whatſoeuer place they were. At one Paraſangue of Suſa (a Paraſange containeth threeſcore Stades, which make ſeauen thouſand fiue hundred Paces, amounting to two miles, or thereabout, at foure thouſand paces for a Mile) was a Village called Perſepolis, for excellency, and therein was a Temple dedicated to Pallas, the goddeſſe of Armes, and named Paſargadis: in which Temple the Monarches of the Perſians were crowned.

The Coronation of the Perſian Monarches, and in what manner performed.

At which Coronation were aſſembled the Princes and Lords of the Kingdome, the Prieſts and the People. The high Prieſt (in the language of the Countrey, called Surena) receiued the Prince whom he was to Crowne, at the entrance of the Gate: and put on him the Caſſocke and long Cloake or Mantle, which was worne by their auncient Cyrus. Then he preſented him (to feede on) a Turtle-Doue and a Cake, compoſed of Figges and Turpentine, and gaue him to drinke a Cup of Wine or Breuage, mixed with Milke and Vinegar. Afterward, he laid both his hands on the Princes head, inuoking their great god Mitra (for ſo the Perſians called the Sunne) whom hee ſupplicated, to make happie and proſperous the reigne of this Prince, to dilate and extend the bounds and limits of the Perſian Empire, and to make him agreeable, beneficiall and beloued of his people.

The morall meaning vnderſtood by the Cake and Wine.

He gaue him then to vnderſtand, that the Cake thus brought him to eate, and the Breuage or drinke prepared for him, compounded of things very contrary, ſome ſweete and other bitter, ſignified; that Royaltie, which gaue men Soueraigne power to command ouer other, was a thing very ſweete and acceptable: neuertheleſs, was confexioned with bitterneſſe and croſſes, that very ſeldome did the pleaſure exceede the paine and trauaile. And therefore he ought to be very carefull and reſtiue, not to ſuffer himſelfe be led and ouer-come with voluptuous pleaſures and delights, which doe too eaſily ouer-rule Princes, that haue no ſuperiours to reproue them, and reſtraine their deſires from exceeding reaſon. Becauſe the ſafetie of his kingdome, and repoſe of his Subiects, ſhould be the full ſcope and principall end, of all the actions of his life, onely to the end, of maintaining and conſeruing them in peace, entreating them with mildeneſſe, as a good Shepheard is carefull of his Flocke. Moreouer, hee ſhould haue engrauen liuely on his heart, theſe fiue words, Salus Populi Suprema Lex Eſto. A Sentence, which Princes (borne to rule other People) ought to vnderſtand from their tender youth: as well as that Lane one of King Lewes the eleauenth; Qui neſcit diſſimulare, neſcit regnare.

Fiue words fit to be vnderſtood of Princes.

These aduertiſements giuen, the Surena placed on the head of the new King, the Diademe, and the Perſian Tiara, called Sidaris, round, yet pointed aboue like a ſugar-loafe. And in this manner he leadeth him, to ſit downe in the Throane and Chaire of Gold, belonging anciently to Cyrus, where the chiefe Surena, the Princes and Lords adore him, couched and proſtrated on the ground: As we learne of Xenophon, Arianus, Quintus Curtius and Plutarch, in the liues of Cyrus, and of Alexander the Great. Perſas quidem non pie ſolum, ſed etiam prudenter Reges ſuos inter deos colere Maieſtatem enim Imperij ſalutis eſſe tutelam. For they knew not how to do honour enough to the Prince.

Now, like as God had commanded Moyſes, that fire ſhould night and day be conſerued in his Sacred Temple: euen ſo the Kings of Perſia neuer went abroade in publique, but they cauſed to be carried before them, Veſſels and Caſſolets of Gold and Siluer, full of fire, maintained with Incenſe and Perfumes, as alſo moſt aromaticall Odours. And Xenophon in the Inſtitution of Cyrus, the eight Booke, writeth; that in the Oratorie and Cabinet of the Kings of Perſia, was maintained vpon an Altar (deſtenied for the ſame ſubiect) a perpetuall fire: And the like in the Hales of Preſence, and Chambers of the ſaid Kings, where Suiters and Supplicants required grace and pardon; were diſperſed Aromaticall ſauours and perfumes. This Cuſtome was taken from the Iewes, who vpon their Feſtiuall dayes, and other beſide, when they made Expiations for the ſinnes of the People: by offering in the Golden Altar ſweete Sauours, prepared by King Salomon before the Propitatorie, and Arke of the Couenant. That Altar was called Altare Thimiamatis.

The Order obſerued among the Iewes on certaine daies.

Thimiama is a Greeke word, which ſignifieth Euaporation, Suffumigation, and perfuming with Incenſe. Thima was a Wood of admirable ſmell, whereof the Pagans made their pretended gods, and neuer would it be worme-eaten. And this Thimiama of the Hebrewes, was not onely compounded of the Incenſe named Thus, and otherwiſe Lebona, but alſo of ſweete ingredients of Perfumes, more exquiſite and precious, beaten and made in ſuch a manner and faſhion, as the fume aſcended wholly aloft and vpright, without any diſperſion here and there. This compoſition was called by the Rabbines Retoreth, interpreting the Verſe of the hundred and fortieth Pſalme. Dirigatur oratio mea, ſicut incenſum in conſpectu tuo, and hereupon they nominated theſe ſweete kindes of Sauours, Aromaticall ſpices.

The Wood whereof the Pagans made their gods.

Pſal. 104. 2.

God imployed to his owne ſeruice, the Element of Water, for drowning the old World. But his Iuſtice being ouer-paſt, he promiſed to the Patriarch Noah, neuer to make any more vſe thereof, but the Element of Fire. And he did the like of his Angels, conuerting them into fiery formes; as is deſcribed by the Pſalmiſt, and the Apoſtle. Facit Angelos ſuos ſpiritus, & miniſtros ſuos flammam ignis.

Act 2. 3.

In Exodus we reade, how he conducted his People thorow the Deserts of Arabia, vnder the forme of an enflamed Pyramide. Præcedebat eos per columnam ignis. To the Law-giuer Moyses, hee spake in a flame of fire, issuing forth of the burning Mountaine. Reuelat se in flamma ignis ex ipso Rubo. At the first Sacrifice of the high Priest Aaron, he appeared in a flame of Fire. In a wall of Fire, as in Zacharie the second Chapter. And in fiery Tongues vpon the Apostles, and Disciples assembled together in Ierusalem on the day of Penticoast. And this was the reason why he did forbid, that any Sacrifice should be offred to him without Fire. And this was the perpetuall Fire maintained night and day without quenching (after it had bin Sacred and kept carefully; vntill the time of the King of Iuda Manasses, carried as a miserable captiue into the Kingdome of Persia in Babylon, the capitall Citie of Assyria, builded in former times by Nabuchodonosor: and not by Semiramis, as Herodotus hath written, and the Greeke lyers, who haue falsified the Sacred History.

King Manasses carried captiue into Babylon.

To the said Assyrians and Persians, came the Doctrine and knowledge of the perpetuall Fire: but veiled and not discouered by the Iewes their slaues. And these Nations of the East, iudging the Sunne to be the Author of that perpetuall Fire, tooke it for God himselfe, and for an assured Symbole of Diuinitie. The Throne whereof they beleeued to be seated, and planted iustly in the midst of the Sunne, enstructed by the Iewes to such beleeuing. and the saying of the Royall Psalmist In Sole posuit Tabernaculum suum. Whereunto the Apostle conformeth himselfe, saying, In Sole Deus habitat, suum domicilium habet, vnde glorioſe illustris maiestatis suæ nitus apparet. And the wise man to the same purpose teacheth vs, that the Sunne is Vas admirabile Excelsi, & opus ipsius. This is the reason, why the Persians, Assyrians, Medes, Ægyptians, and other people, as well in the East-Indies, as those of the West, vnto this day doe adore the Sunne, which the Persians vnderstand by the name of Mithra, and Sacrifice to him in the bottome of a Caue, as we learne of the great Tertullian, in the Treatise which he wrote, De Corona Militis, seeking thereby to hide the misteries, which the Iewes had taught them.

The East Nations haue euermore adored the Sunne.

Diuers Nations that adore the Sunne.

They represented this pretended god Mithra, round compassed with flames of Fire, and the beames of the Sunne, according as our Painters doe, and to him they sacrificed Horses wholly white, without spot of any other colour, and likewise Cockes altogether white: creatures which Psellus and the Naturalists affirme to be Sunnie, swift, and very prompt of flight and course, and so consequently, acceptable offerings to the Sunne, the fountaine of light; admirable for his three qualities, his luminous beautie; his force and efficacie of heate; and his promptitude and swiftnesse of course.

Placat equo Persis radijs Hyperiona cinctum,
Ne detur Celeri victima tarda Deo.

The same Persians carry the figure of the Sunne in their Guidons, Standards, Flagges, and likewise on their Shields and Targets; as Xenophon writeth, and Tertullian in his Apologetickes. Ad Persas si forte deputabimur, licet solem in linteo pictum non adoremus, habentes ipsum vtique in suo clypeo, quod innotuerit apud nos Orientis Regionem precari. He answered the Pagans, who rumourd abroad, that the Christians worshipped the Sunne, after the manner of the Persians; because from the breake of day, they sent vp their prayers to God, as offering themselues to him in the beginning of the day (yea, and at midnight, Media nocte surgebam ad confitendum tibi, saith the Royall Prophet; which Plinie obserued of the Christians in the Primitiue Church, in one of his Epistles written to an Emperour of that time, that persecuted them, and martyred many) and that their Oratories were inclined towards the Sunne rising. Tertulian declareth to them, that the Christians had no correspondencie with them, setting downe good reasons, why our Churches are ordered toward the East. Because they worshipped but onely one God, and they themselues were Idolaters, in adoring the creature for the Creator by a diuellish instigation, punishable with fire, kissing their hands, and eleuating their at the rising of the Sunne; Ad Solis ortum vibrantes. As the noble King of Edom, Iob, mirrour of patience, reprehended the Gentiles of his time. Si vidi Solem cum fulgeret, & Lunam incedentem clare. Et latatum est in abscondito cor meum, & osculatus sum manum meam ore meo. Quæ est iniquitas maxima, & negatio contra Deum altissimum. A custome practised by the inhabitants in the West Indies. For they of Peru and Mexico, in adoring the Sunne and the Moone, put their Gloues on their hands, and then lift them vp towards heauen: as is recorded by Iosephus Acosta, in his naturall Historie of the Indies, where also he obserueth the behauiour of the people to be such, in making their prayers to those false Deities: that they open their hands, and kisse them, making a certaine sound and muttering with their lips, which is answerable to the saying of the holy Patriarch Iob.

Iob 31. 26. 27 28.

Now, it was an ordenary matter among the people of the East, to adore the Sun, for the very greatest of their Deities. The Rabbines expounding the third Chapter of the Historie of Hester, write, that the Minion of Ahasuerus, Haman, to the end he might be honored, quite contrary to the Princes of that great Monarchs Court (euen in arrogancy and remarkeable vanitie, which euermore waites on such, as from base and low degree, are exalted to the chiefe fauours and dignities of a Kingdome) wore a Chaine of Gold about his necke, whereat hung the Idole of the Sunne, round engirt with beames of Gold. So that the people seeing this Shittle-cocke passe by them, as Fortunes Tennis-ball, and plaine mirrour of inconstancie and vobilitie, wearing vpon his brest, the Idole of their great god Mithra: they fell on their knees presently to the ground, kissing their hands, with all humiliation of their bodies. Thus was he honored in an extraordinary fashion, and farre from the common rule or practise.

The East Indies held the Sun to be their greatest Deitie.

A notable example of Hamans pride, in coueting a peculier honor to himselfe.

The Persians published abroad, that the Armie of Cyrus was preceded by a flame of Fire, to make him knowne as Monarch of the world, this was deriued from the Iewes, as already wee haue said. Ammianus Marcellinus testifieth in his Romaine Historie, speaking of the Persians, Medes and Parthians. Feruntque etiam (si iustum est credi) ignem cœlitus lapsum apud se sempiternis foculis custodiri, cuius portionem exiguam vt faustu præisse quondam Asiaticis Regibus aiunt,

When the deceasse of a King of Persia happened, all the lighted Fires (so carefully preserued night and day in the Pallace) were extinguished, and afterward none in euery chiefe Family, maintained on their perticular houshold Altars, as Xenophon informeth vs: to expresse their intire griefe and mourning, for the death of their Prince; according to the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus, in the seauenteenth Booke of his Antiquities. And those Fires were not kindled againe, till after the Coronation of a Successour in the Empire; when the Surena lighted a new Fire, obseruing such Ceremonies therein, as is described by Plutarch in the life of Numa Pompilius, the Author of this pretended Diuine Fire, which hee appointed to be kept by Vestall Virgins, without quenching, in imitation of the Iewes.

The Ceremonie of carrying Vessels full of Fire before the King of Asia, was common to the Ynguas of the West Indies, and to the Samorins of the East. Iosephus Acosta, in the fift Booke of his Indian Naturall Historie, the fourth Chapter, and other following, reporteth, that the dwellers in Mexico and Peru doe adore the Sunne, which in their Language they call Pinchao, kissing their hands, and babling with their lippes, as wee haue said. And that before the Idole thereof (which in Peru they name Viracocha, and at Mexico, Vitzilipuztli, that is to say, God supreme, most high and most great) was maintained night and day a perpetuall Fire.

How the people were admitted to salute their Kings.

Gonsalo Ferdinando d'Ouiedo, at the discouery of this new Spaine, obserued the same thing, and by way of addition, saith: That the people of the Indies in the West, were neuer admitted to salute their Kings, till first they had throwne strong gummes and Aromaticall Perfumes, into the Cassolet and Brazeraine burning continually, planted (for that purpose) on the right hand, in the Haule of Presence.

And our fore-named Acosta, discouering the presages, fore-runners of the losse and ruine of the King of Mexico Motecumacin, sheweth, that the Kings of that rich Prouince, caused ordenarily to be carried before them, lighted Torches, & flaming Lampes, compounded of incredible costly Odours and Perfumes.

In what manner the Fable is obserued among the Indians.

Moreouer, that in all those Countries, the people maintained a perpetuall Fire. And from one Iubilie to another, which they kept after the Iewish fashion, from fiftie to fiftie yeares, the last night whereof; they quenched all their Fires, brake and defaced all their Houshold-stuffe and Goods, being assuredly perswaded, that the World was come to his finall period. And so consequently, they had not any more needs of Fire nor light, neither of any Furniture for feeding: but they must all dye that very night; which they spent in horror, and certaine expectation of death. But when they beheld the breake of day to appeare; as ouercome with vnspeakeable ioy and gladnesse, they would all issue forth of their doores, beating Drums and Tabers euery where, and sounding their other Instruments for warre, Fifes and Trumpets, in signe of reioycing, because their great God Vizil puztli had prolonged their time, to behold yet another Age. And the first day, their Papas, or high Priest walked about their Townes and vtmost limits, with a generall Procession: wherein the people assisted, with giuing of thanks, that they were spared to see the beginning of another new world. The Procession being ended; with great and solemne Ceremonies the new Fire was kindled, to burne both day & night before the Idole of their great God: and thither the people went, to take some for kindling their owne Fires.

Procession vsed among the Indians.

Hieronimus Osorius, a Portugaze, Bishop of Sylues in the Algarues, in the fourth Booke of his Portugall Historie, writeth; that (in his time) the King of Benomotapa a Kingdome of very great extendure, and which maketh part of Ethiopia beyond the Cape de bona Speranza) caused vsually to be carried before him, the noates of his Royalty. The first whereof was a Mattocke, hauing the handle of Iuorie, and two small Iauelins, crossed into a Saltour. By the Mattocke hee gaue his Subiects to vnderstand, that they ought to addict themselues to labour & husbandrie, the most innocent and happy life that any man can wish to leade, and his iustest Reuenewes, all that the earth yeelded. One of the Iauelins serued him as a Scepter, and the other he vsed in stead of a Sword.

The King of Benomotapa, and his noates of Royalty.

This King had vnder his obeysance, many Princes and great Lords his Vassalls, whose Sonnes he educated in his Court; as well to accustome, fashion and ey them to his seruice, as to containe their Fathers, within the compasse and tearmes dutie and obedience, he hauing their Sonnes in hostage. Euery yeare, at a certaine day beginning their yeare, he sent his Couriers or Posts, to carrie them new Fire, whose houses when the Posts were arriued: all their former Fire was quite quenched, which belonged to the precedent yeare. And they that were subiect vnder them, when they kindled new fire; they were to fetch it from their Lords houses, which was performed with great Ceremonies, and publique reioycing. And whosoeuer of the Princes and Lords, that refused to take and receiue the new Fire: warre was instantly made on them by the rest, as on him that entred into rebellion, & so should be punished for his treacherie.

New Fire sent yeerely to the Princes and Lords from the King.

Euen so the Romaine Emperours, be it that they deriued it from the Kings of Persia, or them of Iuda, ouer whom Augustus and Tiberius commanded (as ours their owne Vassailes after great Pompey: they vsed as a noate of their Excellence and Soueraigntie, when they went forth in publique, or made their entrance in Triumph, to haue borne before them, vpon their Battaile-Axes, in forme of halfe-Pikes, Vessels and Censers of Gold and Siluer, like to the bottomes of Lamps, filled with prouision, and maintained with Oyles, Perfumes and Aromaticall confitures.

The Romaine Emperours vsed the noate of Royalty & Soueraigntie.

Pertinax being exalted to the Empire, refused the honor, to haue Lampes of Perfumes carried before him; vntill the Romaine Senate had agreed to his Renuntiation, so saith Herodian in his life. Neque Ignem sibi præferri, neque ... principatus insignia passus est attolli, donec Senatus sententiam scisciteretur. And the same Historian, speaking of the Emperour Gordianus at Carthage in Affrica, discouering the markes of the Empire (whereof hereafter we shall say something) speaketh thus. Sequebantur cum Virgæ Laureatæ, quo insigni Principes à priuatis dignoscuntur, prætereaque Ignis de More deferrebatur. This Honor and priuiledge was granted to women, and sometime to the Romaine Emperours Sisters. The same Herodian, in the life of Commodus, speaking of his eldest sister Lucilla, to whom Sella Imperitoria sedere in theatro, & Ignem de more præferri patiebatur. Which was not permitted to their Fauourites; for the same Authour speaking of Martia, whom Commodus loued better then his lawfull wife, saith. Sic, vt præter Ignem, omnes honores illi, velut Augustæ tribuerentur.

God had commanded Moyses, that the Sancta Sanctorum, should be engirt with Veiles and Curtaines; because it should not be daily exposed to the peoples sight. The same was practised for the Benches and Seates of Iustice of the Iewes, which they called Sanhedrins. For before the Pretorium of the Iudges, called Camera, & Domus Iudicij, and by the Hebrewes Gazith, the Councell Chamber; there were Custodes or Curtaines, which were very seldome drawne: because sacred and holy things, such as Iustice is, ought not to be seene of the common people, or in any manner to be prophaned.

Concerning Seates of Iustice among the Iewes.

And so the Kings of Persia had their Imperiall Throane of pure Gold, couered and Veiled with Curtaines of Tyrian Purple, and of Crimosine Silke. For, when any spake to them with words of Crimosine Silke, that is to say, in tearmes of excellence and honour, and with all reuerence: their faces were Veiled (as we reade in the Historie of Iester of King Ahasuerus) Necdum verbum de ore Regis exierat, & statim aperuerunt faciem eius. The Rabbines explicating this passage, say, that in the Chamber of Honor, and Hall of Ptesence, belonging to the Kings of Israell and Iuda, before the Chaire and Throane of them, hung Curtaines, and ordenarily, when any one spake to them in publique, their faces were veiled and hidden, and that from them the Kings of Persia tooke the practise. Which the Subiects also did, in honor of their Princes, not daring to looke them fixedly in the face, no more then the Sunne: because they are liuing Images of the Diuinitie, and the best affected Sons of great Iupiter, saith Homer. It was an extraordinary fauour, when the said Kings of Persia spake to any one bare faced.

The Kings of Israel & Iuda

——— Satis est potuisse videre.

So spake the God of the Bucoliques in Virgill. And so the Children of Israell at the Mountaine of Sinai, learned to see God with feare of death, and by his vision, the face of Moyses being become resplendantly shining; he spake to the people, his face being veiled.

In like manner, the Throanes of the Kings of China, of Motecuma, of Mexico, and of Atabalippa of Peru, were veiled and couered with Curtaines: so speake the Histories of the Indiaes, and of China, meaning of the Yngas.

Throanes of the Indian Kings.

The Romaines had the same practise, in the person of their Emperours, of their Altars, the Statues of their pretended Gods, and Councell Chamber.

Concerning Counsell, there are many Law-passages, and namely in the fift Law De Naufragijs, at the Code, de submersis Nauibus decernimus vt lenato ... causæ istæ cognoscantur. That is to say, that the causes of this nature, wherein many persons associated haue interest: they were pleaded, iudged, and terminated in full Audience, and not with a closed doore. Oppanso velo, as Tertullian speaketh. Vpon this Law, the light of Ciuill Lawyers, Iacques de Cuiaux, obserueth many Antiquities. Of those Curtaines is mention made in the last Law De Officijs diuers. Iudic. vnder the name of Secret. Sciant Principes, & Cornicularij, & Primates officiorum, & Iudices etiam, ternas libras auri de suis facultatibus erundas, si honoratis viris (quibus etiam Consistorium nostrum ingredienda facultas præbetur) Secretarij Iudicium non potuerit ingressus. In the fift Law de Proximis sacro. Scrinij at the Code. And the Ordonance of the Emperour Constantine. Non sit venale Iudicis Velum, non ingressus redempti, non infame licitationibus Secretarium.

There is an excellent passage, concerning those Veiles and Curtaines, in Chambers of Iustice, in S. Basile the Great, in the Epistle ad Eusebium. In the Ecclesiasticall Historie of Eusebius, the seauenth Booke, Chapter 32. And in the third Booke De Gubernatione Dei, written by Saluianus, Bishop of Marseilles. Intra ianuas non modo illustrium potestatum, sed etiam Præsidum, aut Præpositorum non omnes passim intrare præsumunt, nisi quos aut Iudex vocauerit, aut negotium taxerit, aut ipsa honoris propry dignitas introire permiserit. Which passage referreth it selfe to the fift Law before alleadged.

Of Statues, Tertullian in Apologetico. Solis Sacerdotibus adire licentium, & conspectu ceterorum velo oppanso interdicebatur. Apuleius, in the eleauenth of his Metamorphosis, speaking of the goddesse Isis. Ac dum velis caudentibus reductis in diuersum, Deæ venerabilem conspectum apprecamur. And of himselfe, in the said Booke. Sic ad instar Solis exornato, & in vicem simulacri constituto repente velis reductis in conspectum Populi errabam. Those that were on the Marches, and publique places, were veiled at such time as they performed Iustice, or some dismall and Tragicall act, besmeared with humaine blood, as we vnderstand by Dion. Claudius delectabatur gladiatoribus, & præsertim Meridianis. Ideo plerosque seruos, qui dominos sub Caio aut Tiberio calumniati erant, hoc modo perdebat. Eorumque tantus fuit numerus, vt Augusto statuum eo loci positam iusserit transferri, ne aut semper aspiceret cædes, aut semper Velum mutaret.

Of Altars, there are an infinitie of passages in Plautus: we will rehearse but this following.

——— Querulo
Isti sunt qui in fanis, & in facellis obseruant Vela.

And Lucretius in his fift Booke.

Nec pictas vlla est, Velatum sæpe videri

Paulinus ad Cytherium.
Tunc & discusso nudata altaria Velo

Of Emperours, Suetonius in the life of Vitellius. Idem miri in adulando ingenij primus C. Cæsarem adorari instituit, quum reuersus è Syria non aliter adire ausus esset, quam Capite Velo, circumuentesque sic, deinde procumbens. The Emperour Tiberius, making the Speech and Funerall Oration, for his Sonne Drusus, had his face Veiled; Vt à Funere oculos suos auerteret: So saith Seneca De Consolat. one ad Marciam. And this was as well in regard of the Emperours quality, as of the chiefe Priest, to whom it was permitted to assist in Funerals, according to the ordonance of God in the Mosaicall Law. Lampridius setteth it downe for an example of great familiaritie and priuacie, in the Emperour Alexander, because that Saluidatur quasi vnus de Senatoribus, Patente Velo. In this manner Princes gouerned themselues, by borrowing Diuine Honors, for imploying them to their owne vse; and namely Fire in Lampes carried before them, but now abolished. Yet to this day, they retaine the practise, of making their pompous Entrances in night time, with lighted Torches. And on dayes of publique receiuing, to haue lighted Lampes, lighted Lanthornes in their Windowes, and at the doores of their houses, a custome likewise taken from the Persians and Easterne Kings.

Princes imployed Diuine Honours to their owne vse.

For, ouer and beside that which wee learne from Xenophon, and Plutarch in the life of Cyrus: we reade in the Historie of Iudith, and third Chapter, that Holofernes, Lieutenant Generall to the King of the Assyrians, was receiued by the Assyrians into the Citie of Damas, with the light of Torches, flaming Lampes, Chaplets of Floures, and sound of Musicall Instruments. Cum Coronis & Lampadibus, ducentes choros in tympanis, & tibijs. As much was done at the entrance of Antiochus, King of Ægypt, into the holy Citie. Magnifice ab Iudæis susceptus susceptus est cum facularium luminibus, & laudibus. Augustus would neuer enter into any famous Citie, but in the night-season: So saith Suetonius in his life. And the Ceremonies of strewing Floures, and other greene Hearbes along the Streetes, and decking Gates and Doores with branches of diuers goodly Trees, and beautifying Windowes with burning Lampes, filled with Balmes and costly Perfumes; was learned (as meerely borrowed) by the Romaines, of the Easterne people. Herodianus, in his first Booke, describing the entrance of the Emperor Commodus into Rome, saith, imperatorem faustis omnibus, acclamantibusque, & coronarum, florumque sparsionibus excepere.

As for Lampes in Windowes, Persius;

——— Vnctaque fenestra
Dispositæ pinguem nebulam vomuere Lucernæ.

But much more apparantly Iuuenall, in his sixt Satyre.

Hic nostrum placabo Iouem; Laribusque paternis
Thura dabo, atque omnes Violæ iactabo colores:
Cuncta nitent, longos erexit ianua ramos,
Et matutinus operiatur fenestra Lucernis.

Tertullian, in the Treatise which hee wrote De Corona Militis, declareth, that the Romaine Emperours, and Kings on the Earth, worne their Crownes in the forme of the Sunne-beames: because they were as Sunnes, and flaming Lights to their people.

Lux publica Principis Ignis.

Because that

Commonly we see the conquered Prouince
Shapes manners by the same mould of the Prince.

Crownes Royall had their circle enamelled with Colours of the Bowe fixed in Heauen. Velleius Paterculus, in his second Booke, speaking of Octauius Cæsar, saith;

Aduentanti Romam immanis amicorum occurrit frequentia, & cum intraret vrbem, solis orbis super caput eius curuatus æqualiter, rotundatusque in colorem arcus, velut coronatus tanti mox vir capiti imponens conspectus est.

Suetonius in the life of the same Augustus, saith Videre visus est Filium mortalium decore ampliorem, cum fulmine & sceptro, exuuijsque Iouis optimi maximi, ac Radiata Corona super Laureatum currum bissenis equis candore eximio trahentibus.

Where he remarketh to vs, that the Triumphall Chariots and Waggons of Kings and Princes, were drawne by Horses absolutely white, which are dedicated to the Sunne: the Chariot whereof is represented by Poets, to be drawne by such creatures. And thence ensued the custome, that Kings and other Princes of the world, are ordenarily mounted on white Horses; on those dayes when they appeare in greatest brauery. The Chariot of the Sunne drawne by white Horses.

Plinie in his Panegyricke, Horum vnumsi præstitisset alius illi, iamdudum radiatum caput, & media inter Deos sedes aurostaret, & ebore. And the Panegyricke spoken to Maximianus; Trabeæ vestræ triumphales, & fasces Consulares, & Selbe curules, & hæc sequiorum stipatio, & fulgur, & illa Lux Diuinum Verticem claro orbe complectens, vestrorum sunt ornamenta meritorum pulcherrima, & Angustissima.

We finde, that the Kings of Israell were (by title of excellence and honor) called of their people, The Lampes of Israell. The Princes and Captaines attending on King Dauid, seeing that hee had runne the fortune of life, going himselfe to warre against the Philistims; would no longer suffer him to goe with them: Iam non egredieris nobiscum ad bellum, ne Extinguas Lucernam Israel. And their reason was very pertinent, because the Scripture speaketh in the same Booke, That the life person of the King, is reputed of greater worth then an hundred thousand men. Kings of Israel called the Lamps of Israel. 2 Reg. 21. 17. 2 Reg. 18. 3.

men. Wherefore he ſhould not daily (as we ſay) expoſe himſelfe to the hazards of warre, and aduenture like to a Captaine or Souldiour; the loſſe of them is not of ſuch importance, as the very leaſt accident that can happen to a King, who is the Lampe and light of her Kingdome. Princeps eſt Lucerna Regni ſui; the maine Lanterne of the people of Iſrael.

A King's life ſhould not be expoſed to perils of war

Now, concerning the French, they honour their Kings and call them Sires, of the auncient Gauliſh word. Σείν, Σείος, which ſignifieth the Sunne: becauſe thoſe Monarches haue bin ſaid to be truely the Suns, not onely of France, but of all Chriſtendome, which will laſt ſo long as their Kings endure. They are the ſacred ſupporters of the Catholique Religion; Colimus Reges noſtros ſicut homines à Deo ſecundos, & ſolo Deo minores: They depend immediately vpon none but God onely.

The Kings of France called Sires of an ancient Gauliſh word.

Plutarch, in the Treatiſe which he wrote, concerning the defect of Oracles, very apely compareth the Kings and Princes of the world, to a lighted Lampe, hanging in the midſt of a Haule, it delighteth all the by-ſtanders with the light. But then men muſt not behaue themſelues like diuers kindes of Flyes, who ſporting pleaſantly thereat, flye ſo oftentimes about it, that in the end they are ſcorched with the flame, as we vſe to ſay in a common Prouerbe; Kings are not to be taunted, or riſen againſt, no, nor troubled in their State. Fire is the Symbole or Hieroglyphicke of Royalty: Sic cum Igne. Sic cum Principe: Such as preſume ouer-neere to the Fire, burne themſelues: and they that ſtand too farre off, feele no warmth at all.

An eſpeciall noate well worth the obſeruation.

Sothen we may ſay, that as a bright-burning Lampe, is ioy and comfort to all the beholders: the like we ſay alſo of a Prince, that ſo long as he liueth, he is the admirable Lanterne to his people, the holy fire and ſacred flame, by the ſplendor whereof, Mutatur pro cella Maris in auram, & ſilent fluctus eius.

Concidunt nubes, fugiuntque Venti.

What gentle horror at the ſight of a Prince.

His very name onely ſtilleth troubles and ſeditions. But ſo ſoone as this bright Lampe is extinguiſhed, the Land ſeeth it ſelfe obſcured with darkneſſe, and pitchie cloudes. As the Eclipſe of the Sunne happening, by little and little the Ayre is darkened, altred into ſullen lookes; and the Subiects troubled, being (without a guide expoſed to the windes of ambition, of all diſorder and diſobedience. Becauſe at all times, and as often as there is no Maiſter in the houſe, all is in confuſion: where contrariwiſe, his very preſence ſerueth as an ornament, and keepeth all within compaſſe of duety. And this is the reaſon, why the extinction of theſe faire Lights, the death of great Princes; is ordenarily foregon by extraordinary Starres, and Comets of a fiery nature, which appeare in heauen, as Auant-Courreurs, or their quite quenching.

Strange Starres foretelling the death of Princes.

Nunquam viſus impune Cometes.

The Romaine Emperours, beſide thoſe Lampes of Fire, liuely deſcribed by Apuleius in the eleuenth Booke of his Mileſians, deſcribing the order of the Proceſſion of Iſis, ſaith. Quorum primus Lucernam præmicantem porrigebat lumen, non adeo meis illis conſimilem, quæ veſpertinas illuminant epulas, ſed aureum cymbium medio ſui patore flammulam ſuſcitans largionem) cauſed alſo to be borne before them, The Eagle, The Scepter, And the Hand or Rod of Iuſtice; which in the times of peace, were kept in the Temple of Saturne, at the Capitole of Rome. And in warre, in a Tent or Pauillion (in forme of a Temple) which they called Ad Principia, cloſe ioyning to the Tent Pretoriall. And when as the Emperours or Lieutenants Generall made Orations to the Souldiors (they tearming that Oration or ſpeech Militarie Adlocutionem) ſome one or other fetched out of the Ad Principia, the markes or noates of the Empire, The Eagle, The Hand of Iuſtice, The Lampe and The Scepter, which either were fixed, or brought to the Tribune, at the Orations. Then were there to be ſeene an infinite number of Medales, or ſtamps of Auncient Coines, and among the reſt, that of the Emperour Galba, whereof here you may behold the Figure.

The Hand or Rod of Iuſtice in ſeruice.

Adlocutionem the Militarie Oration.

Of all the Princes of Chriſtendom, there is not any one, but the King of France onely, that beareth this Hand or Rod of Iuſtice. He carrieth a Scepter of pure gold in the right hand, which is alſo common to other Princes: but, in the other, hee carrieth the Hand of Iuſtice, that is, a Rod of a Cubit in height, hauing on the top thereof a left hand wide open, wholly of Iuorie (and not of gold or ſiluer) to ſhew the integrity that Iudges ſhould obſerue, in rendring Iuſtice equally to euery one, without hatred or fauour, and any acception of Prince or Vaſſaile, Rich or Poore. And this is the reaſon, why this Rod and Hand of Iuſtice is called Æquitatis Iudicium, the marke and Hieroglyphicke of Equity, by Apuleius in his Mileſians, as a moſt remarkeable paſſage. For there hee rendreth a reaſon, why this Iudex and Symbole of Iuſtice, is rather, the left hand then the right. Quartus Æquitatis oſtendebat iudicium, effigiatam Manum Sinistram porrecta palmula: quæ gemina Pigritia, nulla calliditate; nulla ſolertia prædita, videbatur Æquitati magis aptior, quàm dextera. The left hand (ſaith hee) being not imployed to the working of many diſhoneſt actions, or violent, without Art, Deceit, or Induſtry; is much more proper to repreſent and ſignifie the Rudder or Sterne of Iuſtice, then the right hand.

No Prince beareth the Hand of Iuſtice but the King of Frãce onely.

This Hand of Iuſtice, which Saint Clemens Alexandrinus, in the ſixt book of his Obſeruations inward calleth Cubitum Iuſtitiæ, The Cubit of Iuſtice, was framed all of Iuorie, which white like ſnow, is the note of the brightneſſe of the faire Virgin Aſtrea. And euery one knoweth, that the teeth of an Elephant are Yuory; and therfore Propertius called them, Libici nobile dentis opus.

Among all foure-footed Beaſts, the Elephant is obſeruable for his deuotion and Pietie, loue to his Gouernours, and likewiſe for his Equity: as we learn of Ariſtotle and Plutarch in their bookes De Animalium. Plinie in the eight booke of his Naturall Hiſtory, reporteth wonders: Intellectus illi ſermonis Patrij, Imperiorumque obedientia, Officiorum quæ didicere memoria, Amoris, & Gloriæ voluptas; imo verò (quæ etiam in Homine rara) Probitas, Prudentia, Æquitati: Religio quoque Syderum, Soliſque, ac Lunæ veneratio. The French Lucretius, Du Bartas, in his ſixt dayes worke, ſetteth him downe, as the Generall of all foure-footed creatures.

Du Bartas in Sextieſme Iournee.

The

Kings of Israel carried the hand of Iustice.

The Kings of Israell carried (with their Scepter) this Hand of Iustice, to say the Rabbines, who describe it ; Virgam Eburneam, An Tuorie Rod ; Virgam Regni ; Virgam Directionis ; Iosh, Sceptrum Rectitudinis, Æquitatis, & Iustitiæ : The Rod of Right and of Equity, and of Iustice of Astrea.

And from the Iewes, the practise passed among the Ægyptians ; before the King and the President of Iustice, this Hand of Iustice was carried. Clemens Alexandrinus, in the place before alleadged, saith : That there was borne before them, that is to say, before the King, and the high Priest, the Intendant of Iustice (named by Diodorus Siculus Prince of the Iudges, Princeps Iudicum, and by Elianus in his fourth booke of Diuersities, Princeps Sententiæ) the notes and adornments of the Priesthood, as also of Royaltie : namely, this Hand or Rod of Iustice, and the Chalice for Sacrificing, and the bearer of them was called ϖολιαρχ. Clemens in the forequoted Booke, reporteth more particularly the full manner and order of proceeding. And Diodorus Siculus, in the second booke of his Antiquities, who obserued, that the Prince of Priests, and Iudges of the said Ægyptians, wore vpon his breast a precious stone called Veritie, which they had borrowed from the High Priest of the Iewes. Aelianus in the passage formerly alleadged, saith : Iudices apud Ægyptios ydem quondam fuerunt, qui & Sacerdotes. In his Princeps erat sententiæ Maximus natu, & in omnes statuendi ius habebat. Eum omnium hominum esse iustissimum, & syncerissimum portebat, qui circa collum imaginem ex Saphyro gemma confectam gestabat, quæ vocabatur Veritas.

The Prince of the Druides had the hand of Iustice before him.

The Prince of the Druides had it borne before him, as the marke of his Principality, and he had the guard and managing of Iustice, euen ouer the Kings & Princes of the Gaules : who gaue strong hand to the execution of Iustice, and commands deliuered from the Druides, to whom they were euen as Ministers and seruants. As it is obserued by Dion of Prusia in Suidas, in these remarkeable words.

Celtæ habent Druidas Diuinationis, Sapientiæque studiosos, sine quibus nihil est licitum Regibus facere, aut consulere ; ita vt si quis rempenitus consideret, Druidas regnent, Reges autem sententiæ sint administri, & serua. For it is not for Kings and Princes of the earth, to reigne and command absolutely after their owne fantasie, and by an immoderate power ; but to reigne in all assurance, to gouerne himselfe, and rule his Estate, by Councell of the wise, and according to Iustice.

How Kings & Princes ought to reigne.

According as the Kings of France vsually haue done, who at all times haue beene commended for loning Iustice ; because they take the Scepter thereof at their Sacring, Coronation, and at receiuing thereof, the Prelate that Sacreth and Crowneth them, saith :

The words of the Prelate, at Sacring and Crowning the kings of France.

Accipe Virgam Virtutis & Æquitatis, qua intelligas mulcere pios, & terrere reprobos, errantibus viam dare, lapsisque manum porrigere, dissperdasque superbos, & releues humiles, vt aperiat tibi ostium Iesus Christus Dominus noster, qui de se ipso ait. Ego sum ostium : per me si quis introierit saluabitur. Et ipse qui Clauis est Dauid, & Sceptrum domus Israel : qui aperit, & nemo claudit, claudit & nemo aperit, sit tibi adiutor, eduxit vinctum de domo carceris, sedentem in tenebris, & vmbra Mortis : vt in omnib. sequi merearis eum, de quo Dauid Propheta cecinit. Sedes tua, Deus, in sæculum sæculi, Virga Æquitatis Regni Tui, & imiteris eum qui dicit. Diligas Iustitiam, & odio habeas iniquitatem, propterea unxit te Deus, Deus tuus lætitiæ ad exemplum illius, quem ante sæcula unxerat præ participibus suis Iesum Christum Dominum nostrum, Amen.

Mention also is made of the Ornaments for their Kings, and namely of the Hand of Iustice, in the history of Sugerus Abbot of S. Denys in France, speaking of the Sacring of Lewes le Gros, sixt of the name : Diademate Regni gratanter coronatus ; nec non & Sceptrum, & Virgam, &c. Wherin it is euident, that they are mistaken, who haue written, that Charles the fift was the first King of France, that (at his Sacring) receiued the Hand of Iustice.

Of the great Seale and Throne of Iustice.

These Monarchs then, as they are the onely Kings of Christendome, who (beside their Scepter) doe beare the Rod and hand of Iustice : so are they likewise the onely Princes, who are figured by their cloathed Royalty, and in peaceable habits ; whereas other Princes make themselues to appeare Armed, and mounted on horseback, like to S. George.

That

The golden Chamber of the Parlament house.

That is called the Throne of Iustice, when the King comes in person into the golden Chamber of the House of Parliament at Paris, about great and serious affaires of the Kingdome. Then is it, when the said Chamber is hung and adorned with rich violet Veluet, very thickly powdred with Floures de Luces of gold, in costly embroydery, and the great Canopy of the same ouer the Throne Royall, garnished with sumptuous pillowes to sit on, and to support the feet of his Maiesty, assisted with the Princes of his Bloud and Parliament, in their red Robes, as Peeres and Officers of his Crowne. On the contrary Seale to the said Great Seale, are the Armes of France crowned, sustained and supported by two Angels ; and the same is also allowed to the lesser Chancellours of France.

Concerning the Seales of the first Kings.

In some of the Charters of the first Kings, their Seales haue beene stamped with the sole visage of the said King, as halfe faced, that is to say, onely halfe of the countenance, which the Latines tearme Luscam Imaginem, as we see on Teslons, and other peeces of gold and siluer, euen so low as to the Doubles, a Money of France. And the Seale thus engrauen, was cut somewhat deepe inward, that the face appeared swelling fully vpward ; as hath beene obserued in that of King Childebert, first of the name, Founder and endower of the Church of Paris, in his Charter kept to this very day, and in other of the Kings his Successors, which haue beene seene in the same manner presented.

Kings of France onely seale with white waxe.

The Kings of France onely haue sealed at all times with white waxe, whereas other seale with greene, or red, or yellow, and some with blacke. King Lewes, the eleuenth of the name, by his Letters Patents, renewed from the twenty eight day of Ianuary, 1468. and to the moneth of May 1469. granted by an especiall priuiledge to the Duke of Anion Rene, King of Sicilie & Ierusalem, Count of Prouence, and to his heyres in direct Ligne (which went not farre, being ended in a daughter married in the House of Lorraine, and in regard of her, the Dukes of Lorraine haue retained to this day, the Armes and Title of Kings of Ierusalem and Sicilie) to seale with white waxe, as well in the Kingdomes of Ierusalem and Sicilie, as in his lands in France.

The Throane and Seate of Iustice.

The Throane and Seate of Iustice, ordenary to the most Christian Kings of France, is the Parlement of Paris, called (for Excellency) The Court of Peeres, and Parlement of France ; albeit there are seuen other in principall Prouinces of the Kingdome, which we shall elsewhere speake of more conueniently.

Parlements vnder the second Ligne.

It is obserued in the second booke, concerning the Officers of the Crowne of France, and the tenth Chapter, that the Estates and Parlements general of France, vnder the Kings of the second Ligne, met and held but twice in the yeere onely, according to the testimony of Hincmarus, Archbishop of Rheims, drawn from the narration of the Abbot of Corbie Alard, who liued in the time of Charlemaigne, Emperour of the famous French.

Parlements vnder the third Ligne now reigning.

Vnder the Kings of the third Ligne, at this instant happily reigning, the Parlement hath beene diuersly changed, according to the occurrences and necessitie of the affaires of France, and as they walked foot by foot, with the Princes & Lords that were possessed of the Prouinces, and Successors to them, who had compassed their affaires (as some say, fishing in troubled waters) vnder the declining of the Kings, descendants from Charlemaigne. Which is meant of two Thrones of Iustice, held by the Kings Lewes the Deuout, & Philip Augustus, called (by good right) the Conquerors Sonne : both of them held in fauour of the Church of Mascon, and Bishop thereof, against the violences of the Count of Vienna. The first was held at Chaalon-Cabillonis, in the yeare of the Word Incarnate, 1166. the nine and twentieth of the reigne of Lewis the Deuout, being set downe in eloquent tearmes, as followeth.

Two thrones or seates of Iustice.

The tenure of the Rule set downe in the Court concerning K. Lewes.

DEr longam Regum absentiam sine disciplina, & fræno iusti regiminis longo tempore dissoluta fuit terra Burgundiæ, & illis qui in ea erant alicuius potentiæ licuit impugnare, & inter se decertare, & pauperes opprimere, & Ecclesiarum bona vastare. Nos propter tantam indignitati malitiam, & zelo Dei commoti, terram Burgundiæ cum copijs Regni interuenimus obtentu faciend vindictas, & reformandi pacem in patria. Notum itaque facimus facimus vniuersis, præsentibus, & futuris, quod cum sederemus Cabillonis ad iudicandum super negotys, & ad cognoscendum causas diuersas, inter alias audiuimus querimoniam Ecclesiæ Matisconensis contra Comitem Girardum Vianensem, & ipse non potuit asserere, se super Ecclesiam aliquid iuris habere, siue in Episcopi, siue in Capituli terris, aque Hominibus: And that which ensueth.

The other proceeding of K. Philip Augustus.

The other of Philip Augustus, for execution of the said Arrest before specified, was with raising a maine Armie against the same Count Gerard of Vienna, in behalfe of the Bishop and Chapter of the Church of the said Mascon; and was given Apud Petræpertusum, Anno Incarnati Verbi Milleſimo Centeſimo Octuageſimo Regni autem Anno primo: which sheweth, that according to the occurrences, the first Kings of the third Line, went to hold their Parliaments and seats of Iustice, with a strong Armie; where the accused were constrained to be by Law, and to obey the Decrees which were signed by the King, & sub-signed by the Officers of the Crown. For those of Lenes the Denout, had the signatures of Thibault, Count of Blois, and Champaigne, of Master of the household; of Guy de Boutieller; of Matthew the Chamberlaine, and of Raoull, Constable.

Parlements held by armed power.

Foure Parlements holden yeerly in time of peace.

Vnder the Reign of King Lewes, called Sanctus, when France was in her flourishing estate, and the Princes and Lords werie of fouple nature, rancking with the tearmes of duty and obedience: the Parliaments were ruled and assured at certaine seasons of the yeere. For in times of peace, foure Parlements were holden yearly, or three at the least. And the same was vsed vnder the reigne of his sonne, Philip the Hardie, third of the name.

No Parlement in some yeeres by reason of warre.

In the time of Philip le Bel his sonne, King of France and Nauarre, they were reduced to two yeerely, according to the ancient custome; one in Winter, and the other in Sommer, during peace; and but one in Winter during warre. It appeareth neuertheleſſe by the Registers of the Court, that by hinderance of warre against the rebellious Flemmings, there was not any Parlement during some yeeres. And the King by his Ordinance, dated the Monday after mid-Lent, Anno 1302. set downe in the Register of ancient Orders of Parlement, fol. 45. appointed that two Prelates, and two Councellers Layicks, should dispatch causes most pressing and attending the Parlement. Quia verò multæ magnæ causæ in nostro Parlamento interueniebant personis & magnas aguntur, ordinamus & volumus quod duo Prælati, & duæ aliæ bonæ, & sufficientes laicæ de nostro Consilio, vel saltem vnus Prælatus, & vna persona laicæ, causa deliberandi, & audiendi istas causas continuè in nostris Parliamentis existant.

Especiall Ordinances of K. Philip le Bel.

In the same Ordenance, the said King Philip willed, that for the commodity of his Subiects, there should be two Parlements at Paris, two Exchequers at Roane, and extraordinary Sessions, called Great dayes, at Troyes in Champaigne, and a Parlament at Tolosa.

Præterea propter commodum Subiectorum nostrorum, & expeditionem causarum, præcipimus ordinare, quòd duo Parlementa erunt Parisius, duo Scacaria Rothomagi, & duo Trecenses bis tenebuntur in Anno, & quod Parlamentum apud Tolosam tenebitur, & gentes prædictæ terræ consentiant, quod non appelletur a Præsentibus in Parliamento prædicto.

Of causes appealed to the Court of Auditors.

The Ordinance of the King Saint Lewes, speaketh expressely, that causes should be appealed in the Audience, according as they are in the Rolles, and that they should be concluded, before any other be appealed, without Checquer-play, as the Prouerbe was in those times, or calling on the nayle; that is to say, calling other cases, and then leaping from one cause to another, without determining any. Deputati ad causas audiendas, partes duarum, vel trium causarum coram se faciant exponi, & quasque fuerint & quantum ad diem pertinet, expeditæ, alias non audiant introduci, illis expeditis, aliæ audiantur, & sic fiat quousq; totum sit expeditum.

Court Registers vnder K. Philip le Long.

In the Registers of Decrees of Parlement, beginning Anno 1320. vnder the Reigne of Philip le Long, fift of the name, King of France & Nauarre, in the Arrest or Order of the Court of Bologne on the Sea, (who was a Counceller of the Parlement) pronounced the tenth of Nouember, in the said yeere 1320. it is shewn that that the Lords of the Parliament of Paris, had their cause commised in the said Parlement, which was held to be of such esteem and greatnesse, that the very chiefest Lords of France laboured to haue themselues receiued as Councellers of the Court; and hauing that priuiledge, they did account it for the prime Ranke of Honour.

And this is the reason, why we see at S. Quentins the picture of Herbert, Count of Vermandois (vpon the Tomb) attired in his Robe and Cloake, furred with Ermines, as a Counceller of the Court: and at the Church of S. Iohn at Dyon, in the great glasse window of the Quire, the foure last Dukes of Bourgongne, cloathed and habited in the same manner.

Gentlemen of the Parlement exempted frō calling to Combats.

In the same Register is also to be seen, that the Gentlemen of the said Parlement were exempted from being appealed to Combats: for in the Order or Decree dated the sixt of Ianuary, in the said yeere, 1320. Mesire Guillaume de Marsilly, a Counceller in the said Parlement, was appealed to Combat by Iohn Remilly, vassall and household seruant to Alix, Lady of Arsis, Aunt to the King; who charged the said Marsilly for being corrupted with money, in Commission of a Processe depending in the said Court, betweene the said Lady and Henry of Lancaster. Answere being made, that there was no place for Combat; as well, because that formerly hee had beene accused and absolued, as also by being a Counceller in the Parlement, he stood clearely exempted.

The Order enacted by K. Charles le Bel.

Charles le Bel, fourth of the name, King of France and Nauarre, made his Ordenance, to rule the said Parlement of Paris, as is to be seene in a Rolle and Register of Priuy Councel for the said King. Hee fuerunt ordinata in consilio celebrato apud Asnerias (Asnieres neere to Royaumont, an ancient house of pleasure, belonging to the King S. Lewes) videlicet die Lunæ ante Ascensionem Domini, Anno Milleſimo Trecenteſimo Viceſimo Secundo, qui incipit.

Primo mandatum est per Regem Magistris Inquestarum, quod non recedant quousque Cancellarius venerit Parisius. Et id est mandatum Domino Thomæ de Marafountaine, & Domino Erardo l'Alamant, & quod illi duo dicant hoc idem alijs de Parlamento.

The triple composition of the Parlement.

Item ordinatum est eadem die per Dominum Regem in Consilio suo, Presentibus Domino de Valesio, Domino Roberto de Attrebato, Episcopo Vinariensi (Viniers at Seuenes) & Domino Ioanne de Cheichemon, & alijs de quibus videbitur, ordinat de Magistris Inquestarum qui remanebunt: & idem de illis de Requestis, & qui adiungentur eis, & qui ibunt ad commissiones vsque at futurum Parlamentum. Which approoueth, that the Parliament was composed of the great Chamber for the audience; of the Iudges for Enquests, and of Commissaries for Requests.

And which more particularly may be vnderstood from the Register, concerning the ancient Ordinances of the said Parlament, there is (among the rest) that of King Philip de Valois, sixt and last of the name, which was made the eight day of Aprill Anno 1342.

The Ordinance of K. Philip de Valois.

Item, that when our said Parlement shall be ended, we will send our said Chanceller, the three Masters Presidents of our said Parlement, and ten other persons, as well Clearks as Layicks of our Councell, such whom we shall please; who shall ordaine (according to our will) of the said Parlement, as well of the great Chamber of our said Parlement, and of the Chamber of Enquests, as the Requests for the Parlement to come. And they shall be sworne, that they shall name vnto vs, the most sufficient persons which are in our said Parlement; and shall tell vs, what number of men will suffise for the said great Chamber, Enquests, and Requests.

Concerning the Masters of Requests.

Item, that hence-forward, we will not make any Maisters of Requests of our said Household, vntill such time as they shall be come to the number of sixe; three Clearks, and three Layickes. And of the said Maisters which at this present are: there shall bee but foure, that is to say, two Clearkes, and two Layickes, which receiue any thing in household; but only in the manner as the Maisters of Requests of our said Household were wont, and haue accustomed to receiue in ancient times.

Vnder King Iohn, Sonne and Successor to the said Philip de Valois, in the Register of Decrees of Parlement, beginning Anno, 1351. there is an Order set downe for the Abbot, religious persons and Conuent of Vendosme. Wherein it is exprefted

ſed that the Count of Vendoſme was a Councellor in Parliament, in the great and ſecret Councell for the King, and that the cauſes of Councellers, as well of the ſaid Parliament, as the great Councel; by an eſpeciall priuiledge, ought to be treated on in the ſaid Parliament, and not elſewhere, and ſo it was adiudged.

An Order for Lords & Gentlemen of Parlement

In the Regiſter of Letters, and orders of Parliament, beginning the Moneth of February, Anno 1356. in the Commiſſion of the fourth of Iuly, 1357. for M. Reynauld Dacy, Aduocate for the King in the ſaid Parlement; it is expreſſely ſaid, that the Gentlemen and Lords of the ſaid Parlement, are not obliged to plead any where elſe, but in the ſaid Parlement, if they will haue right and Iuſtice there.

A condemnation for threatning the kings Aduocate in Parlement.

In the Regiſter of Orders of Parlement, beginning in Anno 1360. in an Order bearing date the foure and twentieth day of Iuly 1361. M. Iohn Paſtoureau, Aduocate for the King in the ſaid Parlement, pleading and concluding againſt a Partie: the Sonne of the ſaid Partie being preſent at the pleading, threatned him in open Audience. He was condemned in a thouſand pounds Fine to the King, and in an hundred pounds to the ſaid Paſtoureau. Which Order imported, That the ſaid Sonne had dared to quench the light of Iuſtice, in her principall Candleſticke, that is to ſay, the Parlement, which is the Capitall Court of the Kingdome.

No perſons to be impriſoned that haue ſuits in Parlement.

In the ſame Regiſter are two Orders, giuen the ſeuenth, and one and twentieth of Auguſt, 1361. whereby appeareth, that ſuch as come to plead in the ſaid Parlement, are in Safeguard and ſafe conduct thereof; and are not to be impriſoned for debts, cauſe, or any ſubiect whatſoeuer, without appointment of the ſaid Parlement; except it be for debt of expences for the belly, during the awaiting and purſuing his affaires in the ſaid Parliament. There are diuers other Decrees made, concerning the ſame priuiledge, dated the one and twentieth day of May, 1365. and the ſixt of Ianuary, 1365.

Vnder King Charles the fift, called the Wiſe, Sonne and Succeſſour to the ſaid King Iohn, in the Regiſter of the ſaid Parliament, beginning in Anno 1365. is an Order, dated the ſeuenteenth day of Ianuary in the ſaid yeere, 1365. for Thibault de Morcuill, which ſheweth; That ſuch parties as ought to appeare perſonally in Parlement, are to haue (during their iourney) all their other cauſes to ceaſe, and be intermitted before all other Iudges whatſoeuer.

In the Regiſter of Acts or Orders of Parlement, beginning 1366. by Decree dated the twenty fiue of Nouember in the ſaid yeere, the King then ſitting on his Throne of Iuſtice: Thibault, Lord of Bedox was condemned in fine to his Maieſtie, which preſently he remitted to him. And the ſaid gift was ſigned by the Regiſter or Pregnotarie of the Parliament, and not by any Secretary of the Finances.

High treaſon to kil a Counceller of Parliament.

In the Regiſter of Acts of Parliament, beginning 1368. there is one dated the twenty ſeuenth of Iune, 1369. for matter of murder and aſſaſſinate, committed on the perſon of M. Emery Doll, Counceller of the ſaid Parliament, whereby it was approued, That it was the crime of high Treaſon, to kill a Counſeller of the ſaid Parliament

The Declaration of the Parlement.

In the Regiſter of Councell of Parlement, Anno 1475. it is declared, that the eleuenth day of Nouember in the ſaid yeere, Monſieur the Chanceller came to aduertiſe the Court for going to the Baſtille, to heare the confeſſion of the Conſtable of S. Paul, to whom for his rebellions and diſobediences, King Lewes the eleuenth directed his Proceſſe. And the ſaid Parlement declared, That there was not any Lord in the Kingdome ſo great, Except the King and Monſieur le Dauſphine, but ought to come and appeare at the ſaid Parlement in Perſon, when it was ordained for him.

And this is witneſſed by a Lion abaſing his head, and the tayle betweene his legges exalted ouer the gate and entrance of the great Chamber, by the Parquet des Huiſſiers thereof. So that by this illuſtrious and Soueraigne Parlement, are ordered and determined the principall affaires of the Kingdome.

In the Regiſter of Parlement Councell, beginning Anno 1482. the ſecond day of Aprill in the ſaid yeere, King Lewes the eleuenth ſent vnto the Parlement, the Oath which hee tooke at his Sacring, exhorting the ſaid Parlement to performe good ned good Iuſtice, according as the King had promiſed to doe by his ſaid Oath, which he purpoſed to keepe: and the Oath is there Regiſtred downe.

Kings & Princes repreſented in Scripture.

It is not then to be wondred at, if Kings and Princes in the ſacred Scriptures, are miſtically repreſented by the Tree called an Oake, and that God himſelfe (who honoureth them with the Throne and Scepter, according to his owne good pleaſure) did communicate or impart himſelfe to the ancient Patriarches, vnder the Oake of Mambre. Becauſe in like manner, as the Oake couereth & defendeth from the ayres iniury, ſuch as commit themſelues to the ſhelter of his branches, his leaues and fruites being apt for paſturing and nouriſhing the creatures of the earth: euen ſo the Parlements of France are Oakes with exalted heads, vnder whoſe branches the people are couered from the very ſtrongeſt violences, which conſtraineth them to yeeld obedience to their Prince.

How the Greeks & Romanes honored their Emperours and Captaines.

Plutarch in the life of Coriolanus writeth, that the ancient Greekes and Romanes honoured their Emperors and Captaines, with Crownes made of Oaken leaues, which alſo they beſtowed on a Burgeſſe and Cittizen, who had ſaued the life of another in a ranged battell: and this was giuen as a note of honor, becauſe this Tree was conſecrated to Iupiter, the fauer and defender of Cities, that is to ſay the conſeruation of men. Moreouer, the Oake (among all other Trees) is that which beareth the very faireſt fruit, and amongſt thoſe cultiue and domeſticall, the very ſtrongeſt and durable. Beſide, at the beginning, men made their bread of Acornes, and their drinke of hony. Alſo, to the ſaid Emperors and Captaines, being Victors, they gaue a ſufficient part of Beaſts and birds, and likewiſe the Miſſell-toe of the Oake, whereof they deuiſed to make Glew for the catching of them.

Acorns, mens bread, & their drinke hony.

Parlements protectors of the King, State and people.

Now it plainely appeareth, that Parlements are the true conſeruatours and protectors, not onely of the people, but alſo of the State and perſons of our moſt Sacred Kings, who ought to haue all ſubmiſſion and obedience rendred to them by their ſubiects. Whom likewiſe (as by an equall Ballance) they ſhelter and defend from vnreaſonable willes in the Prince; becauſe they make a moderate and equall harmony, by the Queene of all vertues Iuſtice.

Princes ought to be zealous defenders of their people.

By good and iuſt cauſe is it then, That the Parlements of France are compared to Oakes. But when Princes (by bad Councell) miſ-prize the authority of them, whereof they ought to be zealous defenders, as being exalted to the Royall dignitie, to rule and gouern their ſubiects by Iuſtice; they cut off the right hand from the left. If they refuſe the holy remonſtrances of their Parlements, vnder colour, that they are not to meddle with affaires of State, but onely with the act of Iuſtice, and lend a deafe eare, when they are aduertiſed of euill gouernment; it is an aſſured Prognoſticke fore-warning, of the intire decadence of the kingdome.

Princes are examples, good or bad, for their people.

Theſe great Oaks are neuer ſmitten with the lightning of the Princes contempt, but as ſoone followeth that of the people, who rather imitate the Princes example for the worſt, then for vertue, which neuer bringeth harme to any Kingdome. As hath beene obſerued by examples in the laſt troubles, when France being gouerned by Strangers, was euen at the point of totall ruine, if the King (whoſe minoritie was ſo long time abuſed) had not boldly vndertaken to ſteere the ſhippe.

Sæpe malum hoc nobis, ſi mens non læua fuiſſet,
De cælo tactas memini prædicere Quercus.

Now come we to the Peeres of France.

The firſt Inſtitutor of the Peeres of France.

In the third booke of Officers of the Crowne, and the ſecond Chapter, mention is made that King Robert the Deuout inſtituted the Peeres of France, in the yeere of Grace 120. the 24. yeare of his reigne. And the firſt cauſe iudged by thoſe ancient Peeres, was that of Richard Duke of Normandie, ſecond of the name, for the Caſtle of Dreux and the appurtenances, againſt Eudes Count of Chartres. It is likewiſe there ſaid, that a Peere of France was aſſigned by a Peere, aſſiſted with two Knights, and thereon reported in the following Chapter, the Decree giuen againſt Ioane, Counteſſe of Flanders, to the benefit of Iohn de Nelle; giuen at the Caſtle of the Louure in Paris, by King Lewes, eight of the name, holding his Court adorned with Peeres, Anno Dom, 1224. We shall now relate here another remarkeable matter, giuen by King Philip Augustus, the reading whereof will giue vs to vnderstand, that the number of the Twelue Peeres was from thence assured, and the Ceremonies which were to be obserued for calling to Iustice a Peere of France, and here followeth the subiect of the said Order.

The number of the Peeres of France.

Henry le Large, or the liberall, Count Palatine of Champaigne and Brie, espoused Madame Mary of France, daughter to King Lewes the seuenth, and by her hee had two sonnes, and one daughter, Mary of Champaigne, wife to Baldwine Emperour of Constantinople, and Count of Flanders.

Henry Count Palatine of Champaigne.

The eldest sonne was Henry, who tooke to wife Hermenzeta, daughter to Henry Count of Namur, deceasing without issue. Henry seeing himselfe to be a widdower, went in the voyage to the Holy Land with King Philip Augustus, by whose fauour he espoused in second marriage, Isabell, Queene of Ieruſalem, sister to Baldwine fourth of the name, King of Cyprus and Ieruſalem; who in her first nuptialls had married Geoffrey de Tholon, from whom she was separated. In the second, she had to husband, Conrade, Marquesse of Montferratt, and in the third, Henry of Champaigne, of which marriage issued two daughters, the eldest whereof was Madame Alix, Queene of Cyprus; and the other was Madame Philip, Wife to Eyrard le Brenne. And of this marriage came Thibault de Brenne. The said Henry died at Acres, in the yeare M. C. X C V I I. as Rigordus writeth in the life of Philip Augustus. Temporibus istis Henricus Comes Tracensis Rex Hierosolymitanus, apud Achon decessit, cui in Comitatu Trecensis successit Theobaldus Frater eius.

Isabel, Qu. of Ieruſalem.

The second sonne to the Count of Champaigne Henry le large, was named Thibault, who had to Wife Madame Blanche of Nauarre, Sister vnto the King of Nauarre Sancio the Strong, eight and last of the name. And in this marriage was borne Thibault, sixt of the name, who in right of his Mother was King of Nauarre, and as his owne inheritance, Count Palatine of Champaigne and Brie.

Thibault, second sonne to Henry le Large Count of Champaigne.

Eyrard de Brenne pretended on behalfe of his Wife Philip of Cyprus, second daughter to King Henry of Cyprus, eldest sonne of Le Large; that the Countries of Champaigne and Brie appertained to him, and not to Blanche of Nauarre, Mother and Guardian in Wardship of Thibault the sixt: whom hee procured to be called before King Phil p Augustus, in his Court of Parliament furnished with Peeres, to be receiued in homage for the said Counties, whereof they were debauted by solemne Order (whereon grew the question) considering the generall custome of the great Fiefes of France. And here followeth the same Decree of the Court, quoted 23, as it was taken out of the Register.

Philip, second daughter of the K. of Cyprus.

The Order agreed on solemnely by the King and Peeres in Parlement.

PHilippus Dei Gracia Francorum Rex, &c. Nouerint Vniuersi præsentes pariter, & futuri; Quod cum dilecta, & fidelis nostra Blanca Comitissa Campaniæ citata esset per Ducem Burgundiæ, Matheum de Monte-Maurencij, & Wilelmum de Barris, vt in Curiam nostram veniret iuri paritura de querelis quas Erardus de Brena, & Philippa quæ dicitur vxor eius, contra eandem Comitissam, & eius filium proponebant, & super eo quod ipse Erardus, & eadem Philippa petebant a nobis, quod nos reciperemus eiusdem Erardi homagium de Comitatu Campaniæ, sicut Comes Henricus Nepos noster, quem ipsa Philippa patrem suum esse dicebat, inde saisitus fuerat. Tandem apud Melodunum in nostra presentia constituti prædicta Blanca Comitissa Campaniæ, & Theobaldus Filius eius ex una parte: & prædicti Erardus de Brena, & Philippa ex altera, requirentes super hoc sibi fieri iudiciam. Iudicatum est a Baronibus nostris, videlicet a Rhemensi Archiepiscopo, Willelmo Lingonensi, Willelmo Catalaunensi, Philippo Beluacensi, R. Nouiomensi Episcopis, & Odone Duce Burgundiæ Paribus Regni Nostri, & aliis multis scilicet willelmo Com. Pontiui, Roberto Comite Drocensi, R. Comite Britanniæ, Guidone Comite Sancti Pauli, Willelmo de Ruppibus, Senescallo Andegaui, Willelmo Comite Iouiniaci, Ioanne Comite Belli-Montis, Roberto Comite de Alenconia, & etiam quibusdam Episcopis videlicet Antisiodori, Carnotensi, Syluanectensi, & Lexouiensi, nobis audientibus, & iudicium approbantibus. Quod hommagium Erardi de Brena, vel dicta Philippa, de Comitatu Campania nullatenus recipere debebamus, quamdiu Comitissa Blanca, & Theobaldus Filius eius vellent ius suum facere in Curia nostra, & persequi: & quod vsus, & consuetudo Franciæ talis est, quod ex uno aliquis saisitus est de Feudo per Dominum Feodi, Dominus Feodi non debet alium recipere in Hominem de eodem Feodo, quamdiu ille qui saisitus est de Feodo per Dominum Feodi, venit, & paratus sit ius facere in Curia Domini Feodi, & persequi. Et quia Comitem Theobaldum quondam Nepotem nostrum, Patrem istius Theobaldi, per assensum Baronum nostrorum, nullo contradicente, recipimus in hominem de Comitatu Campaniæ, & Briæ, sicut Pater eius Comes Henricus tenens, fuerat, & post decessum dicti Comitis Theobaldi, recipimus Blancam Comitissam de eodem Comitatu in fœminem nostram, sicut de Baillio, & præterea Theobaldum filium eius, saluo Baillio, & præterea Theobaldum filium eius, saluo Baillio Matris suæ, nullo contradicente, de iure non debemus dissaisire Blancam Comissam, vel Theobaldum filium eius de Comitatu Campaniæ, & Briæ, quamdiu parati essent ius facere in Curia nostra, & persequi. Et ipsi coram nobis, & alijs Baronibus nostris semper obtulit. Hoc autem Iudicium factum fuit, nihil amplius quæsierunt de prædicta Comitissa, & eius filio, & sic sine die recesserunt.

This Order giuen at Melun, is dated in the Moneth of Iuly, 1216. And this sentence is very remarkeable, that the Court representing the Kings most sacred person, rendreth a reason of the Iudge, which is likewise practised in the pronouncing and proclaiming of criminall Iudgements, where demonstration is giuen to the people for some reparation of forfeits, wherein the criminall are condemned. To shew, that the Kingdome is ruled by Iustice open to the whole world, and not enthralled vnder the yoake of a voluntary and absolute power, which hath no other language, but I will haue it to be so, tyrannicall words.

The Court presenteth the Kings Royall person.

Sic volo, sic iubeo, sit pro ratione voluntas.

The absurdity of tyrannicall power.

And this great Equity declareth it selfe in Propositions of Error, when the Court decreeth much rather to retract her Sentences and Iudgements, confessing freely that she hath erred; then to doe any iniustice.

It behoueth moreouer to obserue, that from the time of King Philip Augustus, the number of the Peeres of France was firmely ordered to be Twelue. This is iustified by the Historian of England, Mathew Paris, Monke of S. Albanes in England, who lued in the time of the King S. Lewes. This Author informeth vs, that about the affaires of the Holy Land, wherein the said King Lewes then was: Queene Blanche his Mother, at that time Regent of France, to deriue some commodities from the King of England, Henry the third; would needes render to him the Duchy of Normandy, which by decree of the said Phillip Augustus, and his Court furnished with Peeres, had beene confiscated from King John without Land, for causes whereof we shall speake hereafter.

At what time the number of the Peers was concluded on.

Against this restitution opposed themselues, the Princes of the Blood, the Peeres and Parlements of France, by these remarkeable Tracts. Si velit Domina Blanchia hoc facere nunquam Regni Francorum Vniuersitas hoc concedet. Absit enim vt duodecim parium Iudicium, quo iuste abdicatur Rex Anglorum, vt priuatur Normannia, cassetur, & pro friuolo habeatur. And it was sent to tell the King of England, on behalfe of the Princes and Pernage (that is to say Baronage) of France, with a dreadfull oath: Quod antequam Rex Angliæ sperata reciperet, oporteret eum necessario per mille lancearum cuspides, & post earum fragmenta, per totidem gladios cruentandos transitum facere militarem.

Opposition of France against restoring the Duchy of Normandie.

The King S. Lewes, conferring with the King of England Henry the third, who was come expressely to visit him at Paris, in the yeere 1254. O vtinam ait Rex Francorum, Duodecim Pares Franciæ, & Baronagium mihi consentirent certe amici essemus insolubiles. Mathew Paris.

Dux Normannia primus inter Laicos, & digniſſimus. Dux Aquitaniæ, Dux Burgundiæ, Comes Flandrenſis. Comes Campaniæ, & Comes Toloſæ, qui dicitur Sancti Ægidij. But this Order is changed, the Duke of Bourgongne being Deane of the Lay Peeres, and not he of Normandie, and the ſame of the Eccleſiaſticks.

The Chancerie is the chiefe Office in France.

The chiefe of the Parlements of France, and of all the Iuſtices, and Soueraigne Chambers in the Kingdome, is the Chancerie; which the Abbot of Corbie Alard, by good right calleth Cancellarium Summum. Already hath been ſaid ſufficient, concerning the Dignity of the Office, in the ſecond booke of the Officers of the Crowne, and the fourth Chapter. Onely we will adde in this place, that which is obſerued in the Court Regiſters, vnder the reigne of the great King S. Lewis, ninth of the name, concerning the Rights of the Chancery, and them belonging to the Chancellor.

The Seal of Parma much as the Fountaine, and Lyon.

Gifts and benefits belonging vnto the Chancellor.

The Chancellor taketh for himſelfe, his horſes and ſeruants on horſebacke, a Pariſian Sol daily for Oates and for all other things; but excepteth his Clerke and Seruant which ware in his Chamber at the Court, and feede there. Their wages were double at foure good feaſts of the yeere, and when the King had his priuate lodgings in the Countrey. Theſe Chancellors had Liueries alſo, as other Clerks of the Kings, and Liuerie of Candles, ſuch as were conuenient for his Chamber, and for his Notaries to write by. Sometimes the King gaue him a Palfrey (that is a Hackney or ambling beaſt) for his owne ſaddle & riding; a horſe for his Clerke, and a Sumpter horſe for the Regiſter. Of Letters which haue duely threeſcore Sols for the ſealing, the Chancellor hath tenne, and his portion of the common Chancerie, as the other Clerkes belonging to the King. And when this Chancellour lay in Abbeyes or other places, where he ſpent nothing for horſes; it was abated to him in his wages or allowance.

In the time of K. Philip de Valois.

In the Regiſter for Acts and Orders of Parliament, beginning Anno 1343. Philip de Valois then reigning, in the Order of Guillaume de Quernes, the one and twentieth day of May, 1344. is declared, that vpon refuſall made to the Biſhop of Auranches by the Chancellor, to ſeale him certaine Letters; the ſaid Biſhop cauſed them to be re-written, and ſealed with the Kings priuy Seale, but the ſaid Letters were declared to be of no worth.

The Kings are poore in Court for Calling in abſence of the great Seale.

In the Regiſter for Acts of Parliament, beginning Anno 1348. there are two Letters Patents of the ſaid King Philip de Valois, dated the fourth and ſixt of January, in the ſaid yeere 1348. whereby is declared, that becauſe the King had ſent his Chancellour in iourney about his affaires, hee appointed, that in abſence of the great Seale which he carried with him, they ſhould ſeale with the Seale Chaſtelet de Paris, and counter-ſealed with the Signet of Parlement. Yet to this effect, that the ſaid Seale and Signet ſhould be deliuered to M. Peter de Hangeſt, and Foulques Mardoull, Clerks Councellers of the ſaid Parlement, to whom he committed the truſt for thus doing. And yet notwithſtanding, from thoſe times then, there were Maiſters of Requeſts in the Kings houſhold, to whom at this preſent appertaineth the keeping of the Chancery Seale of the Pallace (neuertheleſſe diſcerned by the name of the leſſer Chancery, becauſe the greater is in the Court of the King, where the great Seale repreſenteth the image of his Maieſty, ſitting on his Throne of Iuſtice, and is kept by the Chancellour, or keeper of the Seales) from moneth to moneth following, according to the order of their reception.

The Chancellor ſworne on the day of his Enſtallment.

It is not any long time ſince, that the Chancellours of France being choſen; on the day of their enſtalling, tooke their Oath in the Court of Parliament at Paris, as is iuſtified (from time to time) in the Regiſters thereof. An Oath wholly anſwerable to that which (at this inſtant) the Chancellers and Keepers of the Seales doe take before the King. And the ancient Oath importeth, that they ſhall not take any garments, penſions or gifts of any other Prince, but onely of the King.

It remaineth now to ſhew, for the concluding of this chapter, to the honour and preheminence of France: that the famous Monarches thereof haue bin continual renowned, for rendring of Iuſtice in an vpright ballance, and according to Equity, without regard either to the weake or ſtrong.

Of vpright Iuſtice in the Kings of Frãce to ſtrãge Princes.

Strange and forraigne Princes haue ſought, and ſubmitted themſelues to the iudgement of their Parlements, euen in their affaires of greateſt importance. And from the time of the firſt Ligne of their Kings, forraigne Writers foretold an eternall continuance to that Monarchy, for Iuſtice to be there ſincerely rendred.

The Chronicle of Laureſheim, vnder the yeere eight hundred and three (followed by the Monke Aimonius, in the fourth booke of his hiſtory of France) reporteth that King Lewis the Debonnaire, holding his Parlement in May (which was the firſt of the yeare, as we haue already ſaid) there came thither from ſtrange Prouinces, two Brethren, Kings of Vuiſſes, who with franke and free good will, ſubmitted themſelues to the iudgement of the ſaid Parlement, to which of them the Kingdome ſhould belong. The elder of theſe two Brethren was named Meligaſtus, and the yonger Celeadractus.

A difference betweene two brethren for a Kingdome, adiudged by the Parlement of France.

Now, albeit the Cuſtome of the ſaid Kingdome, adiudged the Crowne to the eldeſt, according to the right of Primogeniture, allowed and practiſed by the Law of Nature, and of later memory, in the perſon of the laſt dead King Liubus, father commune to theſe two Contendants: yet notwithſtanding, in regard of the Subiects vniuerſall conſent of the Kingdome, who for the cowardiſe and want of gouernment in the elder, had giuen the Crowne to the yonger, for his valiancie and diſcreete carriage; by ſentence, the Kingdome was adiudged to him, and the eldeſt did him homage, with oath of allegiance in the ſaid Parlement. Obſerue here the words ſet downe in the ſaid Chronicle.

MEnſe Maio conuentus ibidem habitus eſt, in quo inter ceteras Barbarorum legationes quæ ſua ſponte venerunt, duo fratres Reges Vuiſſorum controuerſiam inter ſe de Regno habentes ad Regis præſentiam venerunt: quorum nomina ſunt Meligaſtus, & Celeadractus: erant enim filij Regis Vuiſſorum Liubi, qui licet cum fratribus ſuis Regnum ſuum ſtatuſum teneret, tamen propterea quod natu maior eſſet, ad eum totius Regni ſumma pertinebat. Illo occiſo, commiſſo cum Orientalibus Obotritis prælio, Vuiſſi filium eius Meligaſtum, qui maior erat, Regem ſibi conſtituunt: Sed cum eius ſecundum ritum gentis commiſſum ſibi Regnum parum digne adminiſtraret, illo abiecto, iuniori fratri Regium honorem detulerunt, quam ob cauſam ambo ad Regis Imperatoriſque præſentiam venerunt. Quos cum audiſſet, ſtatuit vt iunior frater delatam ſibi a Populo ſuo poteſtatem haberet, &c.

A difference betweene the Pope and Emperor referred to the Parlement of Frãce & there ended

Vnder the third Ligne, then reigning Philip Auguſtus, by good right called the Conqueror; Pope Innocent the third, and the Emperor Otho, fourth of the name, being in variance for the forme and tearmes of the Oath of fidelitie, which the ſaid Emperor ſhould make to the Pope; they referred it to the iudgement of King Philip in his Parlement furniſhed with Peeres, and here enſueth the ſubiect of their contention.

The 5. ſonnes of the Emperor Barbaroſſa

The Emperor Fredericke, ſirnamed Barbaroſſa, firſt of the name, left fiue ſonnes, Henry who was Emperor after him, and by the Popes fauour and furtherance (as we ſhall ſhew elſewhere) eſpouſed Conſtance a profeſſed Nunne, already well ſtept into yeeres, the onely daughter to Roger King of Naples and Sicilie, ſo that by her he had the ſaid Kingdome. Fredericke deceaſing in Syria (and Otho, Count of Bourgongne and Palatine of Beſançon; Conrade, Duke of Suaba; and Philip, who was King of the Romanes after his Brother.

This Emperor Henry, sixt of the name, the eldest sonne of Barbarossa, was a capitall enemy to the Church and Popes, who had aduanced him, as it is a common custome. So that dying in Anno 1198. some Princes of Germany elected in the Empire, Philip, brother to him deceased. Against whom Pope Innocent the third made opposition, he succeeding in the Papall seate, by the death of Pope Celestine the third, happening the sixt of the Ides of Ianuary, in Anno 1197.

The causes of the Popes opposition in this case.

The causes of this opposition in Pope Innocent, are specified by the Historiographer to King Philip Augustus, named Rigordus, vnder the said yeere, 1197. and set downe in these tearmes.

Eodem Anno Henricus Romanorum Imperator obyt qui eo tempore per tyrannidem suam Sciciliam sibi subiugauerat, & multos viros magnos, & nobiles ibidem peremerat, & contra Religionem Christianam, Archiepiscopos, & Episcopos trucidauerat: contra Ecclesiam Romanam, sicut & prædecessores sui, semper tyrannidem exercuerat. Qua de causa Innocentius Papa Tertius in promotione Philippi Fratris sui aduersarius fuit, & omnes fautores eius excommunicauit, & Othoni Filio Ducis Saxoniæ viriliter adhæsit, & Aquisgrani in Regem Germaniæ coronari fecit.

Otho crowned King of Germany by the Pope.

So that by the fauour of the said Pope Innocent, this Otho, fourth of the name, eldest sonne to Henry the proud, sirnamed the Lyon, Duke of Saxonie, & Bauaria, slaine by Fredericke Barbarossa, was crowned King of Germanie, in the Cittie of Aix le Chapelle.

But hee made some exception, concerning the forme and tearmes of the oath of fidelitie, which the said Otho should sweare to the Pope. And not being able to agree of themselues; both Parties submitted to the Iudgement of King Philip Augustus, and of his Court of Parliament furnished with Peeres. So that by Order giuen at Melun in Iuly 1204. the forme of the said Oath was prescribed and Registred in the Parliament Register at request of the said parties, and sent vnto Otho, to render it to the said Pope Innocent, who sent assurance and Certificate to the said Parliament, for registring it (being performed) in these words.

Exception against the oath to the Pope.

INnocentius Episcopus seruus seruorum Dei, Charissimo Filio nostro Philippo Francorum Regi Christianissimo, Salutem, & Apostolicam benedictionem. Absque dubitatione meueritis, quod secundum formam à vobis, & Curiæ Regni vestri Paribus præscriptam, habetur apud nos iusiurandum Charissimi Filij nostri Othonis Romanorum Regis Illustris auea Bulla munitum, nobis, & Ecclesiæ præstitum.

Ego Otho Romanorum Rex, & semper Augustus, tibi Domino meo Innocentio Papa, & Ecclesiæ Romanæ spondeo, polliceor, promitto, & iuro quod omnes possessiones, honores, & iura Romanæ Ecclesiæ, pro posse meo, bona fide protegam, & ipsam ad eas retinendas bona fide iuuabo. Quas autem nondum recuperauit adiutor ero ad recuperandum: & recuperatarum, secundum posse meum, ero sine fraude defensor: & quæcumque ad manus meas deuenient, sine difficultate restituere procurabo. Ad hanc autem pertinent tota terra quæ est de Radicofano, vsque ad Ceperanum; Exarchatus Rauennæ; Pentapolis; Marchia; Ducatus Spoletanus; terra Comitissæ Mathildis, Comitatus Bricenorij, cum alijs adiacentibus terris expressis in multis priuilegijs Imperatorum, à tempore Ludouici Pij Francorum, & Romanorum Imperatoris Christianissimi. Has omnes pro posse meo restituam, & quietè dimittam, cum omne iurisdictione, districtu, & honore suo. Veruntamen cum ad recipiendam Coronam Imperij, vel pro necessitatibus Ecclesiæ Romanæ ab Apostolica Sede vocatus accessero, de mandato summi Pontificis ab illis terris præstationes accipiam. Præterea adiutor ero ad retinendum, & defendendum Ecclesiæ Romanæ Regnum Siciliæ. Fidelitatem Domino meo Innocentio Papæ, & successoribus tuis omnem obedientiam, & honorificentiam exhibeo, quam deuoti, & Catholici Imperatores consueuerunt Sedi Apostolicæ exhibere. Stabo etiam ad consilium, & arbitrium tuum de bonis consuetudinibus Populo Romano seruandis, & exhibendis, & de negotio Tusciæ, & Lombardiæ. Et si propter negotium meum Romanam Ecclesiam oportuerit incurrere guerram, subueniam ei sicut necessitati perfluauerit in expensis. Omnia verò prædicta tam iuramento, quam scripto firmabo, cum Imperij Coronam adeptus fuero. Actum Aquisgrani, Anno Incarnationis Dominicæ Millesimo Ducentesimo Quinto, mense Martio, Regni nostri Septimo.

But this Emperour kept not his Oath, for the Emperour Phillip being slaine in the yeare 1208. by a Count Palatine, whom Rigordus calleth in the Germaine tongue Landanga, for these are his words. Eodem anno quidam Comes Palatij, qui Germanica lingua Landanga vocabatur, ideſt, Comes Palatini, Philippum Romanorum Imperatorem interfecit. Quo mortuo Otho Filius Ducis Saxoniæ per niduſtriam, & auctoritatem Innocentij Papæ Imperium obtinere nitebatur. The Historie of Germanie write, that he was murdered by Otho Palatine of Vuitlispach, to whom the said Emperour had affianced his daughter, and yet notwithstanding, married her to his competitor Otho) Phillip being then dead at Babemberg, Otho was crowned Emperour by the said Pope Innocent the third, in the Citie of Rome, in Anno 1210. And at the said Coronation, he renewed his former Oath, as Rigordus noteth in the same yeare. Exegit Papa ab eo in ipsa Coronatione iusiurandum de patrimonio, & iure beati Petri indemniter ei, & Ecclesiæ Romanæ in pace dimittendo, & contra quoſtibet defendendo.

The Emperor slain by Count Landanga.

Otho crowned Emperour in Rome by the Pope.

And forasmuch as Phillip Augustus impeached this Coronation, because hee was his mortall enemy, and fauoured the part of Iohn without Land, King of England, his Vncle by the Mothers side, and the Counts of Flanders, of Bologne and Auuergne, his rebellious Vassailes: Pope Innocent added to the Oath this clause. Si militer & consilio tuo, & mandato parebo de pace, & concordia facienda intere me, & Regem Francorum. Hereupon he gaue his Seale to the said Pope, by a publique instrument: but the very same day after his Crowning, he violated his faith so solemnely sworne, as Rigordus thus relateth. Receptoque iureiurando, & instrumentis publicis ſuper hoc confectis, & Imperiali caractere confirmatis, eodem die quo Coronam ſuſcepit, contra iuramentum temere veniens ſignificauit Papæ ſe non poſſe ei dimittere caſtra, quæ ab Anteceſſoribus ſuis aliquib. temporibus fuerant poſſeſſa. So that at his parting from Rome, he possessed himselfe of Castles and strong places, which were the patrimonie of S. Peter. As Aquapendente, Radicosani, S. Quirice, Montefiascon, and of all Romania. And pursuing on his fortune, in Apouillia he became Lord of all that, which Fredericke, Sonne to Henry the sixt Emperour had enioyed, and afterwards of the Cities and Townes, the Churches de-meanes and dependances.

Another addition to the Oath.

So he was excommunicated by the said Pope Innocent the third, who deliuered his Vassailes and Subiects in the Lands of the Empire, from the Oath which they had sworne to him. And consequently, of this Fulmination it followed, that the Lands-Graue of Thuringe, the Archbishops of Maguntia and Treuers, the Duke of Austria, the King of Bohemia, and many other Princes and great Lords of Germanie and Italie, as well of the Church, as Layicks, forsooke his seruice.

Otho excommunicated by the Pope.

Whereupon, in the yeare 1211. by the councell and power of King Phillip Augustus (to whom Pope Innocent the third, in imitation of his predecessours in the holy Seate had recourse) the Princes of Germanie elected for their King the said Fredericke, second of the name, sonne to Henry the sixt: who being aided with meanes, and the forces of France, went to Rome, where he was well receiued by the Pope. From thence he passed by Sea, and landed at Geneway, going ouer the Alpes, and made his entrance at Constance, where the Herbingers had before marked the lodgings for Otho: who was constrained to make his retreate to Brissac, and from thence he was expulsed. Fredericke (the same yeare) went so farre as to Vaucouleurs, to parley with Augustus, who sent (on his behalfe) his eldest Sonne Lewes, accompanied with great Lords of France, where a new alliance was sworne. And afterward, Otho lost both his honor and power, being vanquished by King Phillip Augustus, in the Battaile fought neere Tournay at Bouuines, Anno 1214. Returne we now to the Parlement of Paris, and Princes Strangers, no way Iusticiable to the Crowne of France; which yet voluntarily haue submitted their differences, to be censured by the iudgement thereof.

Fredericke, second of the name chosen King.

Otho ouercome in the Battaile at Bouuines.

William Rishanger, Monke in the Abbey of S. Albane in England, continuer of the Historie of Mathew Paris, obserueth vnder the yeare 1263. that the King of England, Henry the third, and the Barons of England, who made warre vpon him: commited their whole difference and quarrell, to be iudged by the Parlement of France. Vt Pax reformaretur inter Regem Angliæ, & Barones ventum eſt ad iſtud, vt Rex & proceres ceres se submitterent Ordinationi Parlamenti Regis Franciæ (in the time of S. Lewes) in præmissis prouisionibus Oxoniæ. Nec non pro deprædationibus, & damnis vtrobique illatis.

Igitur in crastino S. Vincenty, congregato Ambianis populo pene innumerabili. Rex Franciæ Ludouicus eorum Episcopis, & Comitibus, aliisque Francorum proceribus solemniter dixit sententiam pro rege Angliæ, contra Barones, statuis Oxoniæ, prouisionibus, ordinationibus, ac obligationibus penitus annulatis. Hoc excepto, quod antique Charte Ioannis Regis Angliæ Vniuersitati concessæ, per illam sententiam in nullo intendebat penitus derogare. In this Parlement at Amiens, were present the King of England, Henry the third, Queene Eleanor his wife, Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury, Peter, Bishop of Hereford, and John Maunsell: and on the Barons of Englands side, a very great number of choice elected Lords, who (the same yeare) repassed backe into England, after the Parlement, as the same Monke speaketh. Eo tempore redierunt à Francia, qui Parlamento Regis Franciæ inter fuerant, Rex videlicet Angliæ Henricus & Regina Eleonora, Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis Bonifacius, Petrus Herefordensis, Ioannes Maunsel, &c.

A number more might be here alleadged, of the like nature, concerning this distribution of Iustice, which renowned the Kings of the first Ligne, euen by the pennes of strange Writers. Agathias, the Greeke Authour, in his sixt Booke of the Gothes warres, deliuereth two diuers passages, in honour of the French, concerning Iustice and Equitie, the two maine props and Pillers assured of any Estate.

Where Iustice flourisheth in true Splendor, the Kingdome is most happy.

THe French are all Christians, and their Cities gouerned by Bishops, and Priests. Among all the Nations descended from Allemaigne; they follow and professe the true opinion. They obserue and solemnise dayes of Feasts, as we doe. Among all other People, they are adorned with good manners, very ciuile and courteous: and there is not any thing in them (in regard of vs) which maketh them strangers, but their garments, and Language. Smooth enough I. commend them infinitely, by reason of their vertues, and namely for that of Iustice; for they vse it equally to euery one. And therefore it is not to be wondred at, if they winne much, and make themselues mighty. Because in what place soeuer Iustice flourisheth among men; it is an infallible rule, and without all question to the contrary, that onely and principall Vertue, maketh the State and Monarchie to be most happy, firme and stable, and to remaine in longest continuance.

The same Author (as we haue formerly obserued) liued in the times of the Kings Sonnes and Successours to Clouis, the first Christian King, and saith afterward: Very hardly can that Monarchie fall, or see it selfe brought into such calamitie; as is to be surmounted by her enemies. For the French being addicted to the Vertues of Iustice and Pietie, by a commendable manner and course of life: first, they vanquish and ouercome themselues, and next, all the neighbours about them.

So the Monarchs of the sacred Lillies of France, excell all Kings and Princes on the Earth, for greatnesse and excellencie, euen as the Sunne doth all the Starres of heauen: their Iustice and Pietie so singuler, hath wonne them the ranke of precedency and honor, and their Throane of Iustice, is luminous and wholly shining with glory and magnificence. Thronus Regis Lily est sicut Sol in conspectu Dei, & sicut Luna perfecta in æternum Dominatio eius.

To them may aptly be appropriated that Prophecie of the diuine Wisedome. Dilexisti iustitiam, & odisti iniquitatem, propterea vnxit te Deus, Deus tuus Oleo lætitiæ, præ consortibus tuis. For, among all the Princes of Christendome, there is none, but onely the Monarch of the Lillie, that is Sacred with Oyle sent downe from Heauen, or with more Ceremonies. For the Kings of Spaine are not Sacred, but sworne onely, and acknowledged for heires to the Kingdome, by such meane actions, as merit not to be registred downe in writing. So the Sacred Lillies of France doe surpasse in greatnesse and excellencie, the glory and magnificence of the great King Salomon, and all the Princes on the earth.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Excellencie and Precedencie of the Kings and Kingdome of France; aboue all them of Christendome beside.

Primogenitum posui eum, Excelsum præ Regibus Terræ. Psal. 89. 28.
I will make him my first borne; higher then the Kings of the Earth.

How to iudge of the Honor of Kings Precedency.

ALthough to Iudge soundly the honor of Precedencie, betweene Kings, Princes, and great Lords, cannot be deriued as an essentiall cause, by Blazons of their Armes, which they may varrie, and paint according to their owne fancies, or the diuers occurrences of their Battailes and Conquests: yet notwithstanding, in regard that the vulgar sort make Trophees of them, and (according to worldly apparance) draw antiquitie of Nobilitie, by the matter of Escutchions; we will begin honestly, to shew briefely (leauing a taske so serious, to others of more able performance) with the Armes of our most Christian Kings, which are, The Lillie floures of Gold, in a field Azure.

We wil begin with the subiect of Armes, becaus such as are desirous to shew the greatnesse and excellency of the Catholique Kings of Spaine, and to make them march, not onely equall with the most Christian Kings, but imagine also, that they haue a Precedency aboue them; among other reasons, call in question, and maintaine, that this imaginarie Precedency, deriueth it selfe from their Armes of the Kingdome of Ouiedo, or of Leon, which they would gladly haue to be thought to be the first and chiefest Prouince of Spaine, conquered from the Moores by the Prince Dom Pelagius. In memory whereof, he and his Successors, Kings, haue carried to this day, D'Argent au Lyon rampant de Sable: And that the Armes of Spaine were miraculously brought from Heauen by Angels. Thus is written by Iacobus Valdesius, a Spaniard by Nation, in a Treatise which he made, concerning the dignity of the Kings and Kingdome of Spaine: And by one Augustino Cranato, a Romaine, in a Tract Of the Precedencie of the Kings of Spaine: which this named Author pretendeth to iustifie by Arguments, badly grounded, and reasons so vnedged and impertinent, as they doe not deserue any answere.

The principall Prouince in Spaine.

They haue imitated, and formed the miracle of their Armes, (pretended to be sent downe from Heauen) from the truth of the Historie of the King of France, Clouis, first of the name. For the most part of the Armes of the Prouinces of Spaine, doe answere to their names; which declareth nothing miraculous in them. Leon hath a Lyon; Gallicia a Cup, couered in forme of a Challice; Castille a Castell; Granado an Apple of Granado, Pomo de Granado, a Pomgranate, and so of others. Concerning them of Arragon, they came from the Kings of France. And Dom Pelagius, who conquered the Realme of Ouiedo, or Leon, could, nor cannot be qualified, the first King of Spaine, because he had deriued example from fighting with the Moores vsurpers and possessors thereof, by the faint-hartednesse of the Vuisigothes Kings) of Dom Garcia Ximenes, a French Prince, and Count of Begorre, first King of Sobrarre, or Nauarre, to whom the Armes appeared in heauen, which he should take, as markes of his Conquest.

Foure notes of strength and power.

Salomon obserueth in his Prouerbes, that there are foure things, seruing as Symboles of strength and power. Tria sunt quæ bene gradiuntur, & quartum quod incedit viriliter: The Lyon, the Cocke, the Ramme, and the King. Leo fortissimus bestiarum ad nullius pauebit occursum. Gallus succinctus lumbos, Et Aries. Nec est Rex qui resistat ei. The Cocke, mounted on his Spurres, chanteth victoriously, by preference aboue all the creatures of the earth; so say the Philosophers and Naturalists, God hauing giuen him such light and power: As we learne from the wise King of Edom,

Pro. 30. 30. 31

Iob 23.17. Edom, and mirrour of patience, the Patriarch Iob. Quis dedit Gallo intelligentiam?

Differences of honor in the Cock & Lyon

If then preferrence iudgeth it selfe, by Armes and Blazons of creatures without reason; the Cocke must march first, and not the Lyon. And if that is giuen to the Lyon; it must then be common to the most part of the Germaine Nations, and of the North; who beare it in their Armes. And the ancient Gaules (before them all) had it for their Ensigne, with the Ship, as we haue already related in the first Booke.

But yet (by your leaue) some Tracke of precedencie and honor (moreouer) may be fetcht from Armes charged, and diapred with Eagles, Lyons, Buls, Vnicornes, Harts, or Horses, &other creatures; which contrariwise we learn by Iosephus, the most learned Hebrew Historian, in the life of the King of Israel Salomon. That this Prince committed great offence towards God, by hauing imployed as vtensils of his sacred Temple, Buls to sustaine the brazen Sea of Expiations and Lauings, and of Lyons also, to serue as ornament to his royall Throane. Deum suum proprium (saith Iosephus, speaking of Salomon) non solum illicitis vxoribus iugiter inhonorabat, sed etiam ante hæc peccauerat, & circa Legum custodiam iam deceptus fuerat, quando Bouum Æneorum similitudines fecit, quos Mari subiecit, & Leonum quos in suo Solio Regali decoris causa disposuit. Non enim hæc facere fas erat, dum optimum, & familiare paternæ gloriæ, & Virtutis habuisset exemplum, quod ei propter Dei pietatem fuerat relictum. That Salomon offended all his dayes his owne God, running after Idolatrie, the sinne of sins (as Heresie is the name of sinne, wherewith God punisheth depraued soules) not onely by medling and conioyning with strange wiues; but before that, hee had committed very great offences, preuaricating the Law of God, because he placed in the Temple, to support the Sea, Buls of brasse, and Lyons to vphold his Throane royall, they seruing as reliefe and ornament thereto. For Salomon should haue gouerned himselfe, by the module and example of King Dauid his father, the mirrour and glasse of a true Christian, fairely polished with glory and vertue, as also singuler pietie: who neuer taught him, to place in the Lords Temple, pictures and representations of Buls, Lyons, or other creatures. So farre proceedeth Iosephus.

Iosephus describing the life of King Salomon.

Heresie is detested the cause & punishment of sinne.

Salomon far-ued greatly from the steps of his father Dauid.

God commanded Moises to place Lillies and Pomegranets in his Temple, but not Beasts. And from thence is it, that the Spanish writers before named, should haue drawne some tract of aduantage, in fauour of their Catholique King; and not from an vntameable Beast, the fiercest of all other creatures. In like manner, it is taken in the sacred Scriptures, for the Hieroglyphicke of cruelty and tyranny, as is said of Lucifer: Leo rugiens, qui circuit quærens quem deuoret. The most vniust creature of all other on the earth, in the deuiding of his prey, for hee will haue it alone by himselfe: to verifie the deuision of the Cormorant (whose nature is) All on one side, and nothing on another. He will neuer let loose his hold, and the wise Politician durst neuer trust him.

The Lyon more vniust then any other creature, for deuiding his prey.

——— Quia me vestigia terrent
Omnia te aduersum spectantia, nulla retorsum.

Those Spanish Historians, might (I say) much more properly, haue deriued the excellencie of their Catholique Kings, from the Pomegranate (Entre en pointe dans leurs Armes) which in the holy Scripture, is the noate and Symbole of Loue, and of royaltie: whereof the Rabbines sing wonders, explicating this verse of the 45. Psalme. Instimbrys aureis circumamicta varietatibus: It beginning, Eructauit cor meum verbum bonum.

Those Spaniards attribute the marke of Loue and Royaltie. Psal. 45.16.

They say, that the Mantle Royall of the Kings of Israel and Iuda, was of Cloath of Gold, damasked with Apples of Granada; Apples which likewise were imitated by order and Symmetrie, beneath the Ornament of the Iewes high Priest. This fruite is the Symbole of Royaltie, because it weareth a Crowne on the top.

The Pomegranate carrieth a Crowne.

And of Loue, because that among the same Hebrewes and Ægyptians; Loue was crowned, to shew the force and perfection thereof. Because the passion of Loue is so

The passion of Loue is aboue all other.

so mighty and powerfull, that it tameth and ouer-maistreth all other in men: And Loue being so contenting in it selfe, deserueth to be truely crowned, and obserued by the same noate of the Pomegranate.

To helpe the bitternes of the Pomegranate tree.

The Naturalists doe hold, that to take away the bitternesse of the Pomegranate tree; it behoueth to cut the barke, and fixe therein a splinter or slice of the Pine tree: which, by a soueraigne and naturall power, sweeteneth the Pomegranate tree, and cleareth it from bitternesse and sharpenesse.

Among the Ægyptians, the Pine tree was the Hieroglyphicke of death: because this tree being but once cut, lopt or plashed, it neuer buddeth or sprouteth againe, it is of such an exceeding cold nature. So saith Plinie. And therefore dead bodies among the Ægyptians, Greeks and Romans, were crowned with Pine tree branches, when they carry them to the graue. And the man that died without issue, was figured by this barren and vnfruitfull tree.

At Picea emittat nullos quod stirpe stolones, Illius est iudex qui sine prole perit.

Saith Alciat in his Emblmes.

We could adde to the nature of the Pomegranate, a thousand and a thousand rarities: the search whereof we leaue to the Spaniards, because it concerneth them. For we will come to our Lillie, the ornament of the Armes, belonging to our Kings and Monarches, the most renowned in the world, and Precedencie adiudged to them by Blazon of Armes. Nouices in that Noble Science, doe well know, that Argent and Sable (whereof the Armes of Leon consisteth) haue euermore bin held, for the most abiect mettall and couler that are in Armes.

Concerning the Armes of Leon.

The Pomegranate, as we haue already said, is the Symbole of Royaltie; And the Lillie, the Floure of Floures, is of the Diuinitie, of whitenesse and puritie; Of a Loue most compleate in all perfection, Charitie and Benediction. And this was the reason, why God commanded, that this Floure chosen and elected among all Floures, should namely be represented in his holy Temple, as it is written in Exod. 25.37.

The Lillie is the Symbole of Benediction, because by that which we learne from the Hebrewes, there are two kindes of Benedictions or blessings. So say the Rabbines, in the first Booke of the Talmud, at the Chapter of them entitled Massechot Berachor, that is to say, Of Prayers and Benedictions. The one of them was performed by the high Priest, and that was the most excellent, and the perfection of Benedictions. The other, euery Father of a Family exercised in particuler, two seuerall times in the day at the least, namely, at Euening, and in the Morning: and this was called the common Benediction, which was performed in this order. The Father of the Family stood obliged, twise in the day (at the least) to say by hart and audibly, these words taken out of Deuteronomie: Heare O Israel, the Lord our God is God only. In vttering which words, he lifted his head vp towards heauen, then he bowed it downe to the earth, and afterward turned it to the right hand, and then to the left, in forme of a Crosse.

Two kindes of Benedictios

Deut. 6.4.

But that of the high Priest was done otherwise. The Sacrifices being ended, he turned himselfe to the people, and hiding his face with the Palme of both his hands, and swing somewhat backeward; in proffering the Benediction, he spake these words, as they are written in Numbers 6.24. The Lord blesse thee, and keepe thee. As he vttered the word Adonay, The Lord; he ordered the three great fingers of his right hand, after the fashion of a Floure de Luce, so say the Rabbines, and so shewed it to the people. This was the Symbole of the Sacred Mysterie of the Trinitie, noated in the first Chapter & the first Verse of Genesis. This Benediction he performed (say they) according to that which is written of the Worlds Creation by the Prophet Esay. Quis mensus est pugillo Aquas, & Cœlos palmo ponderauit? quis appendit Tribus Digitis molem terræ? Esa. 14.10.

In what manner the Benediction was performed by the high Priest.

It is generally knowne, that the Crosse is applicated to Benedictions, because it is the Symbole of our Redemption; and therefore it is exalted on all Churches of Christen-

The Crosse exalted on all Churches of Christendome

Christendome. But this is a matter very remarkeable, that from the time of the Apostles, all Crosses finished in Floures de Luces. As it is obserued by Hieronimus Osorius, Bishop of Sylues in the Algaraes, in his Historie of Portugall, discoursing on the Crosse of the Apostle S. Thomas, martyred in East India, in the Kingdome of Narsinga, and in the Citie of Malipur, aunciently called Calamina, at this present S. Thomas, after that the Portugales had there found the body of the said holy Apostle of the Indians; the Author setteth downe these words. About the yeare 1548. there was found on the hill of Malipur, a Crosse cut in Stone, on the top whereof was the figure of a Pigeon, the Baze being planted on a tuft of Hearbes, which spread abroad in length and largenesse. The top, the Baze, and the Armes, had the ends cut in fashion of Floures de Luces. As much is written by P. Gouean the Portuguize, an Hermet of S. Augustines Order, in his Historie of the Indiaes. S. Thomas (saith he) was slaine, & transpierced with a Launce, as he made his Prayer before a Crosse, the forme whereof he had engrauen in a Stone, and figured like to the Crosse, which the Bretheren D' Auis vsed to weare. We shall shew you that Crosse in the Armes of Portugall. So though at this day it be not so, the Crosse finishing in Floures de Luces; yet not in France onely, but thorow all parts and corners of the earth, where the Faith of Iesus Christ had bin planted, this fashion of the Crosse was in vse, and practised from the yeare threescore and fifteene, when the said S. Thomas so dyed by Martyrdome.

Loue full of perfect charity

The Lillie is the Symbole of such a Loue, as is altogether filled with perfect charitie. Salomon was the most wise, learned, rich, and potent, of all the Kings that had bin before him, or euer shall be. Makeda (so is shee called in the Relations of the great Negus of Aethiopia, to the King Dom Emanuell of Portugall, reported by Damianus a Goes, in his Æthiopian Historie: Iosephus and the Rabbines name her Nicaula, in his Iewish Antiquities) Queene of the higher and lower Æthiopia, of Saba, the East Indians and part of Ægypt, came expressly from Countries so farre remote, to heare the wisedome of the said Salomon. She was rauished with admiration, seeing his Prudence so admirable, the magnificence of his Court, Pallace and proud buildings, as also his sumptuous treasures. But all the glory and magnificence of this great King, was nothing, in comparison of the Lillies beautie. Considerate Lilia agri quo modo crescunt, non laborant, neque nent; Dico autem vobis, quoniam nec Salomon, in omni gloria sua, coopertus est sicut vnum existis: So speaketh the same Wisedome. Affirming the Lillie to be more excellent, and to surpasse in glory and magnificence, that great King Salomon.

The Queene of Saba that came to see King Salomon.

Mat. 6. 26. 29

The Lillie, an ornament Royall, and the principall flouret in the Crowne of the said Salomon, a King, who, beside that which his Father King Dauid had left him, conquered by him from the King of the Ammonites, Ammon, who put him to death, and raced his capitall Citie Rabbath for hauing violated the Law of Nations, on the persons of his Ambassadours, as it is in the second Booke of the Kings. His Crowne weighed a Talent of Gold (which amounteth to sixe hundred Crownes) garnished with precious Stones, and namely a Sardonixe, of inestimable value; so saith Iosephus. Beside this Crowne, I say, King Salomon foreseeing a farre off, as perniciously enstructed by that wisedome, which he had desired of God at the beginning of his Reigne: caused another to be made of admirable workemanship. To wit, a Garland of pure Gold, semed with Lillie Floures, enterlaced with a circle of Thornes, naturally growing in the Countrie of India, hauing this deuise enamelled round about the circle of the said Garland: Victoria Amoris; The Triumph and Victorie of Loue. Makeda hauing seene the Kings Cabinet, garnished with so many singuler rarities, and among them this Crowne, with the fashion and deuise thereof, she desired him to acquaint her with the interpretation.

2 Reg. 12. 30

The answere of king Salomon to the Queen of Saba

Salomon made her answere, that among all the Floures, whereof God had given expresse command to the great Law-maker Moyses, to adorne and enrich the Vessels of his Temple withall: he had made choice of the Lillie, a Floure which ordenarily receiueth his springing and growth among Tornes, as delighting to dwell with Thornes, and so much the rather, because the more it is pricked with Thornes, the finer I of this admirable Floure is the more sweete and pleasing. And that by the Floure, was denoated or signified a Sacred Virgin, the Lillie of the Vallies, who [illegible] issue of his seede, that should produce a childe without blemish, the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, who should take delight to repose himselfe, and be nourished among the Lillie Floures. That this great King should loue his people with a loue so feruent, and a fire of Charitie, surpassing that of the most violent loues: whereby he should expose himselfe (and of his owne free will) to death, to giue his people eternall life. And that on the day of his death and Passion, instead of a Crowne of Gold, his head should be crowned with sharpe pricking Thornes. In which manner, triumphing ouer death; he should haue against him a most famous victorie, noated by that deuise, Victoria Amoris, The Victorie of Loue.

Purity & chastitie denoated by the Lillie.

The Lillie is the Symbole of Puritie and Chastitie, and in the holy Scripture, the blessed Virgin is represented by the Lillie. So are we enstructed by that great light of the Church, S. Hierome, in his Epistle Ad Rusticum Monachum: And in them which he wrote Ad Demetriadem, & ad Eustochium. According to the Naturalists, the Lillie being of a most cold qualitie, hindereth conception, as it is obserued by Rabbi Aben-Ezra, vpon the thirtieth Chapter of Genesis, expounding that passage of the Mandrakes, found in the Field by yong Ruben, and gaue them to Mother Rachell, the figure of the blessed Virgin. The Lillie odoriferous of the Vallies, and wherewith the whole world hath bin embalmed. Mandragoræ dederunt odorem suum. So be reth the Ierusalem Thargum, explicating this passage in the seaueneth of the Cantacles, by that of the first, where the holy Ghost, speaking of the fruite of the Virgin Mother, saith of him: Dilectus meus descendat in hortum suum, ad aquulas Aromatum, vt pascatur in hortis, & Lilia colligat. And in holy Scripture, the mirrour of Chastitie Susanna, is defined by the name of Susan, which signifieth the Lillie Floure: as the chiefe Citie of the Persians bare that name for excellencie. Euen so, the Lillie excelled the glory and magnificence of the great King Salomon.

The figure of the Floure de Luce.

The Lillie Floure, or Floure de Luce (so speaketh Nicolaus Agidius, in the admirable life of the King S. Lowes) hath three Leaues or Flourets; the greatest in the midst, signifieth the Catholique Faith, firmely kept and defended by the Kings and Kingdome of France: since such time as King Clouis, first of the name, made profession therof, and the French, by his example. The two other Flourets, standing lower to represent (saith he) Nobilitie and Iustice, two bodies of the State, euermore prepared to maintaine the Faith Catholique.

We may say moreouer, that our Lord gaue himselfe the name of a Lillie, in the Song of Songs. Ego flos campi, & Lilium conuallium. S. Bernard expounding this passage, in his 72. Sermon vpon the Canticles, speaketh to good purpose, saying, God hath euermore had especiall care particularly of the Monarchy of the Lillie, to loue, protect and defend it.

In the second of the same Canticles, verse 16. the holy Ghost saith. Dilectus meus mihi, & ego illi, qui pascitur inter Lilia, donec aspiret dies; & inclinentur vmbræ. Some haue appropriated this to the Noble Kings of France, whose reigne shall endure to the worlds end, because thus speaketh S. Bernard in his 71. Sermon. Si plenitudo boni totum in Christum est, Liliorum. The Kings of France are they that haue endowed, enriched and defended the Church in all plenitude, aboue all other Christian Princes: and this is the reason, why they are stiled Most-Christian.

Three reasons why Christ is compared to the Lillie, and no Floure else.

There are three reasons, why the Scripture compareth our Lord to the Lillie, rather then any other Floure; as the Gilliflowre, the Rose and such like. It is, because as our vnderstanding is guided, and led by the hand (as it were) to the knowledge of the Diuinitie by that of naturall things: So in like manner, by this Floure the Lillie, we are leuated to the contemplation of the diuine Essence. The Leafe the midst, more highly exalted then the other, doth represent the height of Gods greatnesse, because, as Plinie speaketh in his Naturall Historie. The Lillie among all herbes, mounteth higher by three cubites. Nullis florum excelsitas maior, interdum tricubitum: taken so our Lord, as it is said in the Apocalips, Is the onely King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, who hath all power in Heauen and on Earth. He sitteth on the right hand of God, in exalted Maiestie, aboue all Principalities, saith the Apostle.

By the Lillie, the humility of Christ is designed: Quod languido semper colle, & non sufficiente, capitis oneri, saith the same Plinie.

And by the good smell or sauour of the Lillie, are noated the effects of his Godhead, he hauing the power (alone of himselfe) to ouerthrow and conquer death, and to expell the darke shades of sinne, to illuminate vs with the Sunne of Grace and righteousnesse. Lilium est lactei floris herba (so Isidore telleth vs) cuius candor, & ardor admirabiles sunt. There is not any thing more soueraigne for burnings, and to consolidate the skarres of old vlcers, then Onyons and the Lillie roote well boyled, and applied with the Oyle of Roses, saith Dioscorides, Auicenne, and other Doctors in Physicke. Also, that it hath wonderfull effects, for incision of the Nerues; to asswage the swelling of the spleene; to ripen Impostumes; to resolue tumours; and to heale the biting of venemous beasts, for they shunne the very smell of the Lillie. This was diligently obserued by the Rabbines, vpon the tenth Chapter of Iudiths Historie, where it is said: That to goe fight against venemous Beasts, which would haue deuoured the Iewes of Bethulia (that is to say, Holophernes and the Assyrians, who had besieged it) She adorned her head with sweet smelling Lillies. Assumsit ornamenta Liliorum plena, ornamenta in modum Liliorum facta: So speakes the Chaldean Paraphrase, and the common of Saint Hierome; Assumpsit que dextra sua, & Lilia, & in aures, & annulos, & omnibus ornamentis suis ornauit se.

Soueraigne vertues of the Lillie.

Iosephus de Acosta, in his Naturall Historie of the Indiaes, reporteth; that the new world hath her common plaines and gounds, flourishing with millions of faire shrubbes, and diuers Floures of most exquisite beautie, smelling excellently. But aboue them all appeareth The Lillie Floure, hauing such a sweete and pleasing sauour, as it rauisheth (with admiration) all such as come neere it. And that the Vice-Roy Dom Francisco de Toledo, sent some of those Lillies (as a rare and exquisite present) to the King of Spaine, Dom Philip the second, to shew, that this Floure had no equall in the world.

The Lillies of India.

The bottome of this rare Floure, is Yellow, as our view of it testifieth. And S. Isidore saith. Lilium est lactei floris herba cuius dum candor, & odor in foliis est; Aurei tamen species intus effulget. And as the Sunne out-shineth all the Starres: euen so doth Gold all other mettals, hauing in it an infinite number of vertues, and medicinable properties.

Water is the best Element,
And Gold, like the Fire resplendent,
Shineth aboue all other Cheuisance.

The Golden Lillies or Floures de Luces of France.

Saith Pindarus very learnedly. And that is a reason, why in the Armes and Banners of France, the Floures de Luces are of Gold: to enquire and acknowledge, the Excellencie and Precedencie of the Monarchs of the Lillie, aboue all the Kings and Princes of Christendome.

The Armes of our Sauiour compared with them of France.

And for the same reason, the Field of the same Armes, is rather Azure, which is the true colour of Heauen, when it is calme and cleare; then Guelles, Sable or Symple. For like as our Redeemer, who is the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, hath for Armes in the sacred Scripture, and in the Apocalips, the Heauens shining with Azure, and the true Blew Celeste, thickly stored with Starres, twinkling and respledishing like Gold, nailed or fixed in Cloudes of Diamonds: Euen so the most Christian Kings of France, for the glory of Iesus Christ, Portent l'Escud Azur à trois Fleurs de Lys d'Or. Scuto Francorum Regum color similis sereno Cœlo conuenienter datus est, quia sicut Cœlum situatum est in loco eminentiori, atque inter omnia corporalia altius eleuatum est: Sic Rex Christianissimus inter omnia Reges, & Principes Christiane Religionis, dignitate potentia, Nobilitate, & diuitijs est sublimior, atque mirabilior.

Like as (saith the Diuine Vinaldus, an Italian Doctour, in his Royall worke) Heauen is seated in the highest place of the world, exalted aboue all corporall things; Euen so the most Christian King, is the most sublime, the most excellent, & admirable, of all Kings and Princes in nobility and riches. And this is the cause why he beareth l'Escu d'Azur trois Fleurs de Lys d'Or. According as the Saphir is spred with points of Gold: euen so is the Stone, which beareth name thereof for excellencie. Saphyrus aureis collucet punctis, as Plinie hath obserued.

The comparation of the Saphyre Stone.

Moreouer, this celestiall colour, which is of the Saphyre (and which is called the holy Stone) like vnto Heauen, when it is calme and cleare; agreeth better with the Armes and Escutcheon of the most Christian Kings, then any other. Because, like as the Saphyre is more medicinable, and full of vertuous properties naturally, then all other precious Stones whatsoeuer (and in the holy Scripture, it is the Symbole of eternall Glory, like vnto the Seate of God. Quasi opus lapidis Saphirini, & quasi Cælum cum serenum est: as it is in *Exod.*24.10. and in *Ezek.*10.1.) Euen so the most Christian Kings, are full of excellencie and glory, aboue all Kings and Princes of Christendome. For they haue succeeded one another, persisting in the Catholique Faith, euer since the great King Clouis, euen to this instant, by a eternitie, race and long continuance, of more then twelue hundred yeeres inclely, not hauing any Kingdome in Christendome, that can equall and compare with the long lasting of the Monarchie of the sacred Lillie of France. So hath the excellencie of the Lillie, exceeded and surpassed the glory and magnificence of the great King Salomon.

The long continuance of the Kingdome of France.

Thronus Regis Lily sicut Sol in conspectu Dei, & sicut Luna perfecta in æternum Dominatione eius. The Throane of the sacred King of the Lillie, is wholly luminous and shining in excellencie and glory; like to the Sunne, and the Moone when she is in her full among the Stars, and that Monarchie shall eternally continue and endure.

Wilde Beasts flun the smell of the Lillie.

Eagles, Lyons, Leopards, Serpents, and other Beasts, naturally fierce, doe fle and shunne the sauour of the Lillie. Concidet Dominus inimicos eius, & fugientes eum in fugam conuertet. By extraordinary meanes, hee will serue himselfe with an Infant King, and a yong Shepheard Dauid, to deliuer the most noble Kingdome of Christendome, from the gripes and menaces of Gyants; who had vndoubted hope, to become maisters thereof, and to haue it vnder their controule.

An allusion to the future growth and prosperice of the Lillie

This goodly odoriferous Lillie of France, shall neuer wither, and his stemme shall grow greene to infinite ages. Folium eius non defluet. Erit tanquam lignum quod plantatur super aquas, quod ad humorem mittit radices suas: non timebit cum venerit æstus. Erit folium eius viride; on tempore siccitatis non erit sollicitum, nec aliquando desinet producere fructus: Prophesies of the Royall Psalmist Dauid, and of Ieremie.

The application of Prophecies to the Lillie of France.

Germinauit Lilium (before God in future times, and instantly, because his promises are altogether infallible) radices eius eruperunt vt Libani, quasi Oliua Gloria eius, & odor eius vt Libani, saith the Prophet Osea 5.7. All the Prophecies before alleadged may adapt, and morally appropriate themselues, yea, litterally, and more purposely to the sacred Monarches of the Lillie, then to any other Prince of Christendome: because in them cannot be demonstrated, any such subsistance and continuance of their State, as can compare or equall it selfe with that of the French. Because alliance or linking in kinred with the Lillie, is honor, ornament, renowne, and a very rarest splendour, that Princes here on earth can wish for, wherewith to diaper their Armes.

The Authors absolute determination, to answer the cauils of wrong opposers.

Whatsoeuer we haue said hitherto in this second Booke, by discourse (at aduenture) perhaps lasting with too long a breath; hath bin expressly set downe, and with an aduised purpose, to answere those Doctours, who to tarnish the lustre and glory of the Kingdome of the Lillie, by a fantasticke and imaginarie Precedencie: would preferre the Kings Catholique, and Spaine, before the most Christian, and Kingdome of France, and paragon Madrill with Paris. Like as the Neate-Heard (Virgill: by a depraued kinde of sence) beleeued Mantua to be as great as Rome. Or there is so much difference betweene Paris, and the very greatest Cities of Spaine; as b twee e day and night. I may safely speake it, as hauing seene Spaine in ers times. Part is an abridgement of the World, and of it may be said, as somewhile it was of Rome.

Verum hæc inter alios tantum caput extulit Vrbes Quantum lenta solent inter Viburna Cupressi.
Sic Canibus Catulos similes, sic Matribus Hædos
Noram, sic paruis compouere magna solebam.

The Gaules did heretofore people the greater part of Spaine, the markes whereof remaine yet to this day, in the ancient names of Portugall, Gallæcia and Celtiberia; as we haue already said at the beginning of this Booke.

The Gothes, Ostrogothes of Italie, and the Vuisigothes of Spaine, are obserued by Historians, to be more then two hundred yeares after the French; of whom Pharamond was not the first King, as (thorow extreame and grosse ignorance) it is set downe in writing by Augustino Cranato. With whom hee appointeth Athanaricus, to be the first King of Spaine, and that there hee tooke place, before Pharamond was King. Hee would haue sung naturally in another noate, if he had read the Historie of Spaine, composed by Dom Roderigo Ximenes, Archbishop of Toledo. and the Chronicler Idaccus, who conuince the errours of the new Spanish Historians.

The first appearing of the Scandinauian Ostrogothes.

Hee would then haue learnd, that the Ostrogothe people of Scandinauia, appeared not till the yeare of Grace three hundred fourescore and three, in which yeare, they elected for their chiefe Commander, Vinitharius. And the Vuisigothes, their Fritigernus, and after him Athanaricus, who reigned but one yeare; for this man dyed at Constantinople, in the Court of the Emperour Theodosius. Hee had for his Successour Alaricus, first of the name, and the first that had title of King of the Vuisigothes, which was in the yeare three hundred fourescore and eighteene.

Succession of the first Vuisigoths Kings.

Hee would haue learnd, that the said Alaricus dyed in Italie, the yeare foure hundred and thirteene; and that he had for Successour Athaulphus, slaine in the yeare foure hundred and fifteene, at Vienna in Daulphine, next whom succeeded Sigericus, who reigned but one yeare, being massacred by his owne people, as his predecessour was. After the said Sigericus succeeded Vallia, to whom the Emperour Honorius gaue Aquitaine, one of the Prouinces of the Gaules; which extended it selfe from the River of Loire, so farre as to the Pyrenian Mountaines.

Hee would haue learnd also of Paulus Orosius, a Spaniard, that this donation was performed the yeare of Grace, foure hundred and eighteene; and that this Prouince giuen by the Emperour, was then vsurped by the Alains, Vandales, & Sueues, driuen thither by the Iren h, who made them to dislodge, without sound of Trumpet, and to flit from the Gaules called Belgicke and Celticke. And that the Vuisigothes, as one naile driueth another, chased the Vandales and their associates, out of the said Aquitaine, from whence they scudded ouer the mountaines, and possessed themselues of Spaine, but very long time after. And that the Vuisigothes, vnder conduct of their King Vallia, conquered Aquitaine, Anno foure hundred and nineteene. And that the same King beganne not his courses in Spaine, but in the yeare of Grace foure hundred twentie foure (according to the Chronicle of Idaccus) where hee made a great progresse in the yeare foure hundred thirtie two.

King Vallia conquered Aquitaine.

The bloudy Battaile of Orleance lost by Attila.

He had for succour Theodoricke (not he of the Ostrogothes of Italie, who bare the same name) who conquered a great part. This man dyed in the furious and bloody battaile lost for Attila, on the plaines and fields of Sologne, and his Son Thorismond had his succession and hauing reigned but three yeares, he had for his successor Theodoricke, second of the name, his brother. After whom succeeded Eoricus, Father of Alaricus the second, put to death by Clouis King of France, in a foughten Battaile, who had the honour and profit thereof, by the conquest of Aquitaine and Tolose the seate Royall of the said Vuisigoths Kings.

So that Amalaricus was constrained to shift for himselfe in Spaine, despoyled of that which his Predecessours had held in France, and there hee whom established stablished his abiding. Thus we may iudge of the learning and expertnesse of Doctor Cranato, in the Historie of Spaine, which hee will haue to be the first King in painting, Ataiaricus (he would haue said Athanaricus) who neuer saw Italie or Spaine.

To deriue more aduantage in fauour of Spaine, by the Armes of Leon: wee haue shewne, that in this point of Nobilitie, the Precedencie it due to the sacred Lillie of France, which excelled the glory and magnificence of great King Salomon, and consequently, that of all Kings and Princes on earth.

Cranato draweth one point of his pretended Precedencie, because Ptolomie preferreth Spaine before France. But if his argument may take place, the Precedencie appertaineth to the Isle of Albion, that is Great Brittaine, which the same Ptolomie setteth downe, and placeth before Spaine.

Ptolomies deuision of Europe.

That excellent Ægyptian Geographer, who liued vnder the Empire of Adrian and Traian, hath deuided Europe into sixe tables. The first whereof is that of Albion, seconded by that of Spaine, followed by that of Gaule, of Alemaigne, of Rhetia that is the Leagued Grisons) of Vindelicia, that is the Countrey of the Switzers, of Sardignia, Sicilie, Sarmatia, Dacia, Misia and Greece.

The order of the new Geographers.

At this day, the moderne and new Geographers begin the discourse, and their tables of Geographie, not onely with England, Scotland and Ireland; but also with Groenland, the last Isle discouered vnder the North. Shall it therefore be well argued, to deriue some Precedencie from that desert and ill peopled Island, against that of Great Bretaigne?

Cranato for a Romaine, hath shewne, that he was most ignorant in the Romaine Historie: not knowing, that England and Scotland were subiected to and with the Gaules, vnder the Romaine Emperours. If he had read the Notice of the West Empire, he would then haue learned; that the Empire of the West was deuided into three Gouernements, which were called the Prætories: All that of then Gaules, of Italie, and of the Citie of Rome.

Deuision of the West Empire.

Gouernement of the Gaules Prætorie.

That vnder the Gouernment of the Illustrious Præfect of the Gauls Prætorie, were comprehended nine and twentie Prouinces: namely, seauenteene in the Gaules; seuen in Spaine; and fiue in Great Bretaigne.

Britanniarum Prouinciæ Quinque.

The fiue Prouinces of Great Bretaigne. { Maxima Cæſarienſis, Valentia, Britannia prima, Britannia ſecunda, & Flauia Cæſarienſis.

You behold here, how the Prouinces and Dioceſes of Spaine, England and Scotland, were comprehended vnder the departement of the Gaules, and not the Gaules ſubiected to that of Spaine.

But we will ſay, and that truely, that Spaine ſhall neuer walke Peere-like, for aboundance of people, fertillitie of all good things; excellencie of ground; temperature and wholeſomeneſſe of the Ayre; length and largeneſſe of her whole extendure (comprehending thereinto the Kingdome of Nauarre, vngraciouſly vſurped, and worſe detained from the iuſt Lords thereof) with France. For Spaine being ſeperated from Affrica, but onely by a narrow ſtraite, of ſome three miles in largeneſſe; is (for her burning heates) barren in moſt parts of the Kingdome; that is as much to ſay, as Prouinces badly peopled. and almoſt vn-habited. Fell'd Fields without Corne, without culture, without Trees, Springs or any Riues. And the foule diſeaſe of the Kings Euill, wherewith moſt part of the Inhabitans are infected, and made lotheſome: ſcrueth for a ſufficient proofe, what difference there is betweene Sunne-burnt Spaine, and the ſweete Ayre of France. Whether they may come yeerely, to make proofe, that the excellencie and vertue of the Lilies Monarche, excelleth and ſurpaſſeth that of Salomon; ſo conſequently the King of Spaine, and all other Kings and Princes on the earth.

The temperate ayre of France

Wee haue the meanes to paſſe by, that which encreaſeth and commeth from Spaine: becauſe the ſterrilitie of the Soyle, cauſeth continuall carriage thither from France, of Corne, Wine, Cloth and other things, moſt neceſſary for the life of man.

The Kings of Spaine want no qualifying and ſtiling themſelues, to be Kings of Leon, of Arragon, of Nauarre, of Valencia, of Granada, of Toledo, of Murcia, of Cordoua, of Portugall, and of the Algaraes, with a long thred of other the like titles, which are all but Prouinces, and hath cauſed ſuch as haue not ſeene the Country, to thinke, that Spaine is a number of times farre greater, then is the Kingdome of France.

——— Sed non ego credulus illis.

Experience hath ſuffered me to ſee the contrary, and verifie both plainely and palpably, that it can no way be compared with France; except through extreame ignorance. And whoſoeuer ſhall meaſure the fertile Prouinces of the Monarche of the Lillie; as Prouence, Languedocke, Guienne, Poictu, Bretaigne, Normandie, Champaigne, Bourgongne, Lyonnois, and Daulphine (without making any mention of the Prouinces ſeated in the midſt of them which we haue named, and which would make as many Kingdomes, if our Kings gouerned themſelues, according to the manner of Spaine) will finde without all doubt, that France in latitude and longitude, excelleth very much that of Spaine.

It is admirable France, from all antiquity, that (for her greatneſſe) ſerued as a ſpacious field, and a moſt noble ſubiect to the Spaniſh Poet Lucane; to ſhew: That Ceſar became Maſter of the Romane Empire, by the meanes of her wealthy Prouinces; whereas he hath not ſpoken the like of Spaine. He admireth earneſtly her extendure, and preferreth her (by good right) before all Kingdoms of the ſpacious World.

How Ceſar became Lord of the Romane Empire.

——— Sparſas per Gallica rura Cohortes
Euocat, & Romam motis petit vndique ſignis.
Deſeruere cauo tentoria fixa Lemano.

He beginneth with Suetia, watered by the Lake of Geneua, and of Lozana, and runneth from thence to the mountaines of Vaulga, which make ſeparation of the lands of Germany and France.

Caſtraque quæ Vogeſi curuam ſuper ardua rupem
Pugnaces pictis cohibebant Lingones armis.

The great extendure of the Mountaines.

Theſe mountaines extend themſelues very far into Germany, by Luxembourg, and ſo farre as Strasbourg; and from thence take and deriue their ſourſes, the Riuers of Meuſe, and of Saoha, ſeparating them of Mentz, Toull and Verdune, with the Bourgongnons & Langrois, whom Lucane tearmeth Pugnaces. And ſaith, that they delighted to weare enameled Armes, varied with diuerſity of colours. And Martiall ſaith, that the Common people of the Langres were cloathed with a garment of ſmoaky colour, called a Minime, ſuch as the Bardes vſed to weare among the Druides.

Sic interpoſitus vitio contaminat vnctio
Vrbica Lingonicus Tyrianthina Bardocucullus.

And Lucane maketh a Leape, ſaying:

Hi vadâ liquerunt Iſaræ, qui gurgite vaſto
Per tam multa ſuo, famæ maioris in amnem
Lapſus, ad æquoreas nomen non pertulit vndas.

He ſpake concerning the people of Sauoy, which is watered with the Riuer of Iſera, that taketh her ſourſe neere to Mont-Cenis, and (running rowling thorow Sauoy) taketh largeneſſe to Mont-Melian, thwarting Granoble, and Romans in Daulphine, & ſome few miles from thence, ſinketh it ſelfe in the Riuer of Rhoſne, or Rhone, ariſing out of the Alpes) which he calleth Amnem famæ maioris. Plinie in his naturall hiſtory, noteth the originall and ſpring of the Riuer Rhoſne, whereunto it ſwalloweth and looſeth it ſelfe, and Iſara and Saona thus. Galliarum fertiliſſimus Rhodanus Fluuius ex Alpibus ſe rapiens per lacum Lemanum, ſegnemque deferens Arim, nec minus ſe ipſo torrentem Iſaram, becauſe Iſara hath her courſe as impetuous as Rhoſne.

And thence againe the Poet hath another leap into Rouergne, whereof Rhodes the Biſhops See; Ciuitas Ruthenorum.

Soluuntur flauis longa ſtatione Rutheni.

And with theſe Rouergas, he windeth on the ſame bottome, them of Narbonois (Narbonenſis Gallia, the Country of Narbone in France) and Carcaſſois, watered and bathed with the Riuer of Auda; a Riuer big enough, but troubled and heauie in her courſe, which cannot carrie any great Bottomes.

Mitis Atax Latias gaudet non ferre Carinas.

It paſſeth betweene the Towne & the City of Carcaſſona, and paſſing the Rocks of the Carcaſſes and Minerues; paſſeth on all along, croſſing the Martiall and Metropolitane City of Narbonna, to Serignano and Beziers, a very pleaſing and delightfull Citie, whereof aroſe the Prouerbe.

Si Deus in terris

Plinie

Pliny calleth it Blitteræ, and some few miles frnm thence, Auda loseth it selfe in the Mediterranean Sea: Of this therefore is it that Trebellius make[s] mention,

Hunc fore Aquitanas posset qui fundere gentes,
Quem tremeret forti milite Vibius Atax.

And Pliny in the place formerly alleadged, saith; Fluuius Atax è Pyrenæo ruens, sem permeans lacum, &c.

From Auba he commeth to the Riuer of Gar.

Finis, & Hesperiæ promoto milite Varus.*

* A Riuer dividing Narbon from Liguria.

He saith that it maketh separation of the Gaules from Italie, & in this maner speaketh Plinie: Narbonensis Prouincia appellatur pars Galliarum, quæ interno mari adluitur, Braccata ante dicta, Annæ Varo ab Italia discreta. But hee must take it to be thus, during such time as the Prouince was wonne by the Romanes, and reduced into the forme of a Prouince, for otherwise, at all times it made part with the Kingdome of France. There is in the lower Languedocke, a Riuer which beareth name in the same manner, and rowling from the Seuenes, passeth betweene Nismes (Nemausus in Latine) the Episcopall City and Auignion, to Romoulins. It is very obseruable for the bridge of Gar, one of the Wonders of the world, an admirable worke and worthy the greatnesse of the Romanes; as well as the Arenes of Nismes, a mile and a halfe from which, is the said bridge of Gar.

Thence the Poet passeth to the ends of the Prouince,

Quæque sub Herculeo sacratus numine portus ——— Et tuta prohibet statione Monæci.

To the Port of Hercules, at this present called Ville-Franche: Of this Port, and of Monego, or Monacho, writeth Plinie: Portus Herculis, Monæci, Ligustica Ora.

From the side of Prouence, and of Gennes, hee commeth to cut ouer the Riuer of Rhine, and in the Episcopall City of Spire, Ciuitas Nemetum, and the Inhabitants called Nemetes.

——— Tunc rura Nemetis
Qui tenet, & ripas Atiri qua littore curuo
Molliter admissum claudit Tarbellicus æquor,

And from Spire, he flieth away to the last end of the Gaules in the Ocean Sea, to the Countie of Begorre, and the lower Nauarre. Of this Countie, Tarbes is the Episcopall City, the inhabitants whereof are called Tarbelli by Cæsar. The Riuer of Aduus, called by Lucane Atirus, and by Scaliger Ador, rowleth from the Pyrenean Mountaines, and making two branches the one is called Adoua, and the other Midoua; it commeth to loose it selfe in the Ocean, neere to Bayonne. Sidonius Appollinaris in his Epistle Ad Trigetium, calleth it Atturricus Fluuius: And the Bordelois Poet Ausonius, baptizeth it with the name of Aturrus.

People of Gaul couper neere the Pyrene Mountaines.

Infamunque ruens per saxa rotantia latè
In mare purpureum, domine tamen ante Mosellæ Numine adorato, Tarbellius ibit Aturrus.

Afterward, the Poet recouereth them of Xaintonge, & of Berry (or Bourdesan for there are the Bituriges Cubi, which be the Berruyers of Bourges, and those of Bourdelois, called Bituriges Vbisci, or pronouncing according to the ancient Gallish retained in Gascongnie, Biuisci, changing V. into B by the conuersion.

Signa mouet gaudetque amoto Santonus hoste, Et Biturix.

And from thence he commeth into Champaigne, vpon the Riuer of Aysne.

——— Longisque leues Axones in armis.

Axona (whereof Ausonius maketh mention in his Mosella, ——— Axona præceps.)

And taketh her course from Bassigny, or (according to others) from the mountaines of Vauga, the people wherof are commended by Lucane, for their seruice with the Pike or Partizane, whereby he meaneth long Armes. Long Armes then in vse.

Optimus excusso Leucus, Remusque lacerto.

He giueth them the honour of being stout and strong; for acting, casting, and getting loose Darts, Iauelins, and Arrowes, making them to be good and skilfull Archers.

Then he setteth downe the Sequanois, which are they of Bourgongne, and other neighbouring people.

Optima gens flexis in gyrum Sequana frænis.

For the Riuer of Seine, writhing it self like a Serpent, receiueth her Spring aboue S. Seine, drawing towards Chanceaux, within fiue miles and a halfe of Dijon, descending to S. Mard, Aize the Duchie to Chastillon, Mussy the Bishopricke, Bar, Troyes and Nogent, where it beareth bottomes of charge, to come to Paris. From whence it rowleth to Poissy, Meulant, Mante, Vernon, Gaillon, Ponte de l'Arche, Rouen, Chaudebec, Honfleur, Harflew, Haure de Grace, and drowneth it selfe in the Ocean Sea. The course of the riuer Seine. New Hauen.

From Champaigne and Bourgongne, it passeth into Picardy, and to the Countrey of Flanders; to the Inhabitants whereof hee giueth commendations, for well-gouerning and mannaging Waggons and Chariots, and for being very expert Waggonners. Good wagon driuers.

Et facilis rector rostrati Belga Couini.

From Belgicke Gaule, he returneth backe into Aquitaine, and the Countrey of Auuergne: the People whereof, boasting themselues to be Romane, hee mocketh for their vaine ostentation. The men of Auuergne reaming themselues Romanes.

Aruernique ausi Latios se fingere Fratres
Sanguine ab Iliaco Populi.

From Auuergne hee leapeth into Tournaisis, the people whereof vanquished a Legion and fiue Companies, left in Garrison by Cæsar in the Countrey of Liege, as he writeth in his Bello Gallico. And thus Lucan obserueth it.

——— nimiumque rebellis
Neruius & cæsi pollutus sanguine Cottæ.

Vpon one thred he fileth them of Treuers, sometime the Capitall City of the Gaules, them of Wormes and of Holland.

Tu quoque latatus conuerti prælia Treuir,
Et qui te laxis imitantur Sarmata braccis Vangiones, Batauique truces, habited after the Scythian and Poland manner.

And from thence hee commeth to the Garden of France; Poictou, Touraine, Aniou, and round-neighbouring people, dwelling on the Riuers of Loire, and them of Guien and Maine. The garden of France.

Pictones immunes subiungunt sua rura; ne vltra
Instabiles Turones circumsita castra coercent.
Inripis Manduana tuis marcere perosus
Andus, iam placida Ligeris recreatur ab vnda, Inclyta Cæsareis Genabos dissoluitur alis.

The Pictes or Poicteuins, of whom the Capitall City is called Augustoritum Pictonum, seated on the Riuer of Clan, which descendeth into that of Vienna, were so named, because they made markes in their faces with a hot yron, as Claudian informeth vs.

Ferroque notatas
Perlegit examine Picta moriente figuras.

And in his second Panegyricke,

Ferro picta genas, cuius & vestigia verrit
Carulus

As for that which Lucan calleth Genabum inclytam, such as take it for Orleans, are sottishly deceiued; because it is Gien vpon Loire, part of which City retaineth yet the name of Genaba, euen to this day. Cæsar saith, that in his time it was the Magazine or Storehouse of the Chartrains, whereof it seemeth that Tibullus tooke note, extending the said Chartrains to the Riuer of Loire.

Carnuti & flaui cærula lympha Liger.

Cæsar consumed this poore Citie into cinders, for the reasons which himselfe reporteth in his Bello Gallico. Now the Riuer of Loire, which Plinie calleth Flumen clarum Ligerim, taketh her fourse neere to the Towne of Puy en Velay, tearmed in Latine Anicium, encreased with other Springs, and Snowes melting from the Mountaines of Auuergne. After it hath rowled foure and twentie miles from the Spring, to Rouana, it beareth boates of Burden, and passing by Desise, Neuers, la Charité, Sancerre, Cosne, Gien, Gergeau, Orleans, Boigency, Bloys, Amboyse, Tours, Saumur, the bridges (called corruptly by Cæsar) Sea, Ancenis and Nantes; it commeth to disgorge it selfe into the Ocean Sea, at S. Lazaro.

From thence the Poet scuddeth to the Pyrenean Mountaines, where the Inhabitants of them are noted to be of the Gauliſh Nation; and extendeth himself farre into high Spaine, called Celtiberia, so farre as the Riuer of Ebro, or rather Iberus, (A Riuer in Spaine rising neere Iuliobrica in Cantabria.) So that in those times then, all that rounded the Cinga, was inhabited with naturall Gaules.

Gurgite ——— Qua Cinga pererrat.

And the same Lucan hath described it elsewhere.

Cinga rapax, vetitus fluctus, & littora cursis
Occani populisse suo: nam gurgite mixto,
Qui præstat terris ausert tibi nomen Iberis.

This Riuer hath not changed her name, but descendeth from the Mountaines of Catalogna, and after shee hath laued the Townes of Balbastra, Moncon, Lenda, Fraga, with some other little villages and Bourgades of Nauarre and Arragon, she commeth with the Segro (Sicoris called by Lucane) to discharge her burden in the Riuer of Iberus, which causeth her to lose her name.

——— Qua Cinga pererrat Gurgite:

From thence he skippeth to the Riuer of Rhosne,

Qua Rhodanus raptam velocibus undis
In mare fert Araxim.

Rhosne or Rhodanus, receiueth her fourse from Mont de la Fourche, in high Valais, passing by the Lake of Lozana, and Geneua the Knightly, and doeth descend to Lyon the Merchant; where beyond it, she meeteth the sleepy * Saona, and falleth with it into the Sea of Prouence. Rhosne maketh two branches, separating the Viuarez and Languedock, from Prouence and Daulphine. Beside which Principalitie, (the title to the eldest Sonnes of the Monarches of France) it watereth the Cities of ancient Vienna, the olde Chancery belonging to the Emperours of the West; Thin, Valencia, Lorioll, Mont-Limar, Auignion, Nonna, Tarascon, Arles la Blanche, and S. Gilles, where one of her hornes droppeth into the Sea. Thother watereth all along from Viuarez, the Townes of Tournon, Cursoll, Viuiers, Pont S. Esprit; and from thence coasting Auignion and Beauquaire, shee throweth her selfe into the Sea at Aigues mortes at Langudock. Ysera at Saona loose themselues in Rhosne, as the Durance doth, whereof Ausonius speaketh, calling it Durance, which after it hath washed part of the Cities and Towns of Daulphine, Prouence, and the Countie of Venissa, to witte, Guilera, Ambrun, Tallart, Cisteron, Cauaillon, and Poincte d Orgon, it looseth it selfe in Rhosne, which they of the Countrey call Rose.

* Or Saaona in Latine by the Scottish, which extendeth not hath.

Luouse discipliereth, and afterward taketh the people of Languedock, for inhabitants on the Mountaines of Ceuenes, which eythet begin, or finish them of the Pirenean. Ioyning to the Martiall City of Narbona, they goe (like a Scarse) to gaine them of the Alpes; hauing trauersed the higher Languedocke, the County of Geuaudan, the Puy in Velay, S. Floure, part of Viuarez and Auuergne, so farre to the Riuer of Rhosne. Lucane calleth all the people generally Seuenois, by the name of those Mountaines.

Concerning the people of Languedocke, & their dwelling.

Qua montibus arduâ summis
Gens habitat cana pendentis rupe Gebennas.

G. being set downe for C. Strabo, Potolomy, and other Geographers, comprehendeth them vader the name of Cebennus mons, Cæsar; Mela, and the Naturalist Plinie, Gens Cebenna in the singular, and the Inhabitants Cebenni Populi. Ausonius the Bourdelos, describing the City of Narbonna, saith:

The error and mistake of some Geographers of Cebenus Mons.

Interiusque premunt Aquitanica rura Cebennæ.

And in that of Tolosa.

Ninguida Pyrenes, & pinea Cebennarum
Inter Aquitanas gentes.

From thence Lucan maketh a leap to the City of Treuers, seated on the Riuers of Mosella, and of Seila; and thence he flitteth to the people of the Alpes, and beyond the side of Genoway and Millaine, which at all times made part of Longbeard Gaule.

Et nunc tonse Ligur quondam per colla decora,
Crinibus effusis toti prælatæ Comatæ.

How the Gaules extendure is finisht by Lucan.

Lucan, to very good purpose, finisheth the Gaules extendure, by the Riuer of Rhine; because their naturall extent was from this great flood, so far as to the Pyrenean Mountaines on the one side, and from one Sea to another, as we haue elsewhere said.

Et vos Crinigeros bellis arcêre Caycos
Oppositi, petitis Romam, Rhenique feroces
Deseritis ripas, & appertum gentibus Orbem.

The Precedencie of one Prouince to another.

Now, concerning that which giueth precedency of one Prouence to another, it is the fertility of the Soyle, for abounding in fruites, Woods, and Gardenings; which is wrought by the meanes of Riuers watering it. Spaine (for the most part) is wanting and defectiue in such an aduantage, few great Riuers to water it. For take away Iberus, Guadiana, Tagus and Guadalquibir; and there are none but small Brookes. Spaine is halfe desert; of a yellowish earth; burnt with the Sunne, euen as her neighbour Affrica is. And you see the Spaniards to be of small stature, demie-Moores, duskie and swarthy like the Affricans; with whom they haue consonance enough in manners and fashion of behauiour. Whereas the French are of a rich shape, actiue, and of gracefull presence; white fleshed, & open visaged: which sheweth the goodly temperature of the ayre in France, not ouer-hot, like that of Spaine, nor yet too cold, as it is in England.

Tibullus tooke pleasure in making France famous by her Riuers.

Testis Arar, Rhodonusque celer, magnusque Garumna,
Carnuti, & flaui cærula, lympha Liger.

But more particularly the Senator Ausonius.

Non tibi se Liger anteferet, non Axona præceps,
Matrona non Gallis, Belgisque interfita fines,
Santonico refluus non ipse Carantonius æstu,
Concedit gelido Durani de monte volutas
Amnis, & Auriferum postponet Gallia Tarnem.

The one maketh mention but of Saona, Loire and Garonna, as also of Rhosne; and the other of Loire, Aisna, Marne, Charanta, Dordogna and Tarn. The Riuer Charanta

Charauta is named by Ptolomy Cauentelus, which running from Poictu, adorneth hath watered the Townes of Engoulesme, Congnac, Xaintes, Tallebourg and Bourbiss; commeth to loose it selfe in the Ocean Sea, Father of all these Riuers as we learne by Homer.

That which Ausonius saith, in deriuing her Spring from the Mountaine Duran, is in our ancient Annales, and in the life of great Charlemaigne, called Dordogne, Derdania, whereof Sidonius Apollinaris maketh mention:

Exis ceruatis, Durani nuscose, saburra.

She bathes and trauerseth Perigord, and the Townes of Fumell, Bergerac, S. Foy, Libourne, Frontacke, built by Charlemaigne, and called (according to the opinion of some) Fines Saracenorum, at this day a Duchie and Peeredome, belonging to the Illustrious House of S. Paul of Orleans, neere vnto which place, the Riuer of Dordogne looseth it selfe, in that of Garonna beneath Bourdeaux.

As for the River of Tarn, which hee depicteth as Pactolus, and whereof Ausonius speaketh, that it hath for a Raye among the Tolosians, and them of Perigord, Tarn anne discrets, a Tolosiens, Petrocoris: the receiueth her Originall from the Cheuenes, from whence she rowleth to Lauregais, watereth the Townes of Lescure, Villemar, Alby (where it was said that the Mother of Cicero was borne), Gaillac, Rabasteins, and other places, discharging her selfe into that of Garonna, aboue the Towne of Agen.

The Mother of M. T. Cicero borne at Alby.

And so descending Garonna, (or Garumma, parting Celtica from Aquitania) a River so much renowned; I haue seene it from the Spring, to her declining, which is in the Vally of Aran, Vallis aranica, in the Diocesse of Comenges, and bottome of the Pyrenees, passing to Montrean de Riuiere, to Bacerauera, and to Pont de S. Iust, Beneath S. Bertrand the Episcopall Seate of Comenges, Ciuitas Conuenarum, and her diuision, Conuenis conuentum Conuene, drawne from S. Hierome, a light in the Church; to Valentine, S. Gaudens, Estaucarbon, S. Martory, Caseres beneath Pui Laurens, Tenasse, Muret, Partet, Tolosa, Grenada, Le Porte S. Mary, Aiguillon, Le Mas and Peeredome of France, in the famous house of Maiesme of Lorraine: Tonins, Marmande, La Reole, S. Macary, Langon, Cadillack, Bourdeaux, Blaye, Talmond and Arun, where Garonna looseth her selfe in the Ocean Sea, and yet re-flowes aboue it so farre as to the said Langon. Heereupon she is called Vasconia, Aquitanica & Aquerca, and in Claudian.

A Riuer of Celtica, Rises in the Pyrenees, and looseth her selfe in the Ocean Sea.

——— Retrò pernicior vnda Garumnæ
Oceano plenos quatenus impelitur æstus.

It would require a discourse, able to breake the longest breath, to obserue a million of Riuers that water and besprinkle France, and which make it to abound in all things that can be wished for, fit and necessary for the Nature of Man; without her constraint of begging any thing of strange Countries, especially of Spaine, which cannot be two yeeres (at the most) without the helpe of France, a good nurse, mother to the rest of Europe.

The fertilitie of France.

Among all the Nations of the world, that of the ancient Gaules was the best polished, and most ciuilized: because they were taught, ruled, and gouerned by the wise Druides, Masters of all Sciences and Vertue. For, in the first place, they had a setled knowledge of one only God, Creator of Heauen and Earth; and vnder stood perfectly his Worship and Seruice, that is to say, in what forme hee should be adored, in Spirit, and outwardly also.

The Gaules were the most ciuilized.

And to obserue (in a briefe Summary) the whole Masse of their knowledge and learning, they made profession of instructing the Gaulish Nobility, in the Morals & Politiques, all parts of the Mathematicks, the Immortality of the soule, and the knowledge of one onely God. But they opened the dore to all these, first by knowledge of themselues; the point most needfull and important, and preciseste to know any matter of goodnesse.

Their first Classe or forme in Schoole, was hung with Mirrours, in whose Glasses

Classes their Schollers learned their first Alphabet. Such as were endued with corporall beautie, were admonished to make themselues much fairer by the goods of the Soule: because those of the body were but flitters, subiect to changes, the wheele of age, and the least sickenesse.

Forma bonum fragile est, quantumque accedit ad Annos Finis minor.

Deformed and mis-shapen men, were taught to couer the defects of Nature, with all manner of vertuous actions, which made all such truly noble, as embraced them.

For impertection of body.

For the knowledge of God, they had for Maxime, Non colere Idola, and in all the Gaules (of very great extendure) there was no Image to be seene: But of the Sacred Virgin, that should bring forth, and giue sucke to the fruite of life, the onely Sauiour of the World. And yet this Image was but on the Generall Altar, for all the Gaulish Provinces: prepared on the Mountaine of Chartres, and in the faireste middest of the sacred Forrest, as it is reported by Epiphanius.

For the knowledge of God.

Cohibere parietibus Deos, & in vllam oris speciem assimulare, ex magnitudine Cœlestium non arbitrantur: so saith Tacitus in his Germania. Because God being a pure Spirit, diffused throughout the whole Vniuerse; hee cannot be restrained, nor shut vp within walls, or represented by humane figure. Deus est Sphera cuius centrum est ubique, Superficies vero nulla. God is a circle, whose point and Center is the earth, without Center, and without circumference. This is the doctrine of S. Paul, Excelsus non in manufactis Templis habitat, sicut per Prophetam dicit? Cœlum mihi sedes est, Terra autem scabellum pedem meorum: Quam domum ædificabis mihi? aut quis locus requietionis meæ est? dicit Dominus: Nonne manus mea fecit hæc omnia. The most high dwelleth not in Temples made with hands, as saith the Prophet. Heauen is my Throne, and earth is my foot-stoole: What House will ye build me? saith the Lord: or what is the place of my rest? hath not my hand made all these things? And preaching to the Athenians, when he conuerted to the faith of Iesus Christ, the great S. Denys Areopagita, and his Wife Damaris. Deus qui fecit mundum, & omnia quæ in eo sunt, Hic Cœli, & Terræ cum sit Dominus, non in manufactis Templis habitat, nec manibus humanis colitur. God that made the world, and all things therein, seeing that he is God of Heauen and earth, dwelleth not in Temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with mens hands.

Acts 7. 48. 49. 50.

Acts 17. 24 25. 34.

Before the building of Salomons Temple, God was not adored in enclosed Temples; but In Excelsis, & in Lucis: as we reade in Genesis, that the Patriarch Abraham, contracting alliance, and making a Couenant with the King of Palestine Abimelech; planted a Wood in Beer-sheba, and there called on the name of the Lord. Plantauit nemus in Beer-sheba, & inuocabit ibi nomen Domini Dei æterni. The same is to be read in infinite passages of the Scriptures, which serueth to shew, that before the building of the Temple at Ierusalem; Forrests & tufted Woods were Temples, and places destined for prayer by the people of Israell, and their Sacrifices to the liuing God. And that those Woods and places of deuotion, were ordinarily In excelsis, on the tops of Mountaines, shaded with Forrests and Woods. Gloria in excelsis Deo; as the Angells sung in the night time of his blessed birth.

Gen. 21. 32. 33.

Places for Prayer, before the temple at Ierusalem was made.

Euen so the Wise Druides, diuinely inspired, ordered their Temples in the veriest faireste places of thickest Woods, couered and shadowed vnder the couert and leading of high tufted Oakes; without enclosing their Temples with Walls and couertures, as the materiall are, built by mens hands. Lucos ad Nemora consecrant, deorumque nominibus appellant Secretum illud quod sola reuerentia vident, so saith the learned Tacitus. The Gaules and Germanes (saith he) had for their Temples some goodlie separate place, in the middest of a thicke Forrest, which they dedicated and consecrated vnto God.

Where the Druides prepared their temples.

There were not any Idolls, but the secret and most shadie place of the Temple was by them reuerenced, euen as the Mansion or dwelling of the Diuinity, which they durst not looke on with their eyes, but in great feare and reuerence. As if they would haue said. This Celticke people and Nation, doe dedicate and consecrate their Forrests and Woods to God, and serue him there as in Temples, the thickest

The Celtes dedication of their Woods and Forrests.

thickeſt tufts whereof is contemplated with their eyes, with all condigne humilitie and reuerence; not hauing ſo much boldneſſe or preſumption, to approach neere the Sanctuary of the Diuinitie: that is to ſay, from the moſt ſecret and deepeſt place of this ſacred Temple, to draw neerer then by ſight onely.

The Druides had knowledge of ſacred Letters. Gen. 13. 18. Exod. 3. 2.

And we need make no doubt, but that thoſe diuine Druides had (without all queſtion to the contrary) notice and knowledge of thoſe ſacred myſteries, obſerued in holy bookes; as God made himſelfe ſeene and knowne to the Patriarche Abraham, vnder the Oake of Mambre; and to the Law-maker Moyſes, in the thickeſt of a Buſh, burning on the Mountaine of Horeb, which Buſh Moſes approached vnto, in all feare, honor, and reuerence, after he had put off his ſhooes.

The ſecret place of the Druides Temple, how they called it, and reuerenced it.

And ſo thoſe Druides called the moſt ſecret place of their Temples, by the name of the liuing God: Domini Dei viuentis nomine dicabant Secretum illud quod ſola reuerentia videbatur. Honouring the place as moſt ſacred and holy, where they preſented their prayers to God, which they beleeued to make them moſt happy by his Diuine preſence. And the reuerence which they bare to thoſe Temples, was ſo great, as they dared not to approach neere them, but in all humilitie. Euen ſo the Sueues, the moſt potent people of Alemaigne (iſſued and deſcended from them of Sens, ſometimes renowned among all the Gaules) on the firſt day of their yere, that is to ſay, the firſt day of the Moone of September, they aſſembled together in their principall Temple, according to the cuſtome of their Noble Grandfathers, which was in a thicke Forreſt, where they held their Generall Eſtates, for an hundred Bourgades and Cominalties vnder their obedience. Tacitus ſaith: Vetuſtiſſimas, nobiliſſimoſque Sueuorum Senones memorant. Fides antiquitatis religione firmatur. Stato tempore in Syluam,

A ſuperſticious ceremony for ſuch as entred the temple.

Whoſoeuer deſired to enter into this Sacred Temple, were he the Prince or the greateſt Lord; was to haue his hands and feet faſt bound with cords, ſo that if peradeuenture he fell or tumbled to the ground, it was not permitted him to riſe again, or ſo much as to lift vp his head; but onely to rowle along on the earh. This ſuperſtition pointed and tended to this end; to make it knowne, that God alone (the onely Gouernour of all things) had choſen there his ſanctuary.

The ſame Antiquary Tacitus obſerueth in other places, that the Celtes had not any Idolls or Images in their Temples. Nulla Simulacra, nullum peregrinæ ſuperſtitionis veſtigium ibi videre licebat.

The Gaules met in hallowed Forreſts, before the Romanes came into Gaule.

The paſſage of Tacitus, concerning the Aſſembly of the Seuenois, or people of Alemaigne, giueth vs to note; that before the arriuall of the Romanes in Gaule, the publique aſſemblies of the ancient Gaules, were alwaies made in thoſe Sacred Forreſts: Becauſe they verily beleeued, that there was the acceptable dwelling of the Diuinitie: to whoſe preſcience or fore-knowledge, they referred the beginning and concluſion of their ſaid Aſſembly.

This is it which the ſame Tacitus obſerueth in his Hiſtories of aſſemblies, called Ciuilis, the Hollanders to treat and feaſt, and (by degrees) to hold a Councell, what they had to doe for redeeming themſelues from the Romaines ſlauery. Vocauit Batauos Sacrum in nemus ſpecie epularum. And Lucius Florus affirmeth: Vercingentorix feſtis diebus, & Comitialibus, quum frequentiſſimos in Lucis haberet, ferunt dictis ad ius priſtinum libertatis erexit. All which theſe Authors ſay, is to remark the faſhion of the ancient Druides, Presidents of the Generall States, that euery yeere they aſſembled on the firſt day of the Moone in September, in the Sacred Forreſt of the City of Charters, the Nauill or midſt of the Gaules, according as Cæſar ſpeaketh in his Bello Gallico. Druidæ certo Anni tempore in finibus Carnutum, qui regio totius Galliæ media habetur, conſidunt In Luce Conſecrato.

Thereof William the Breton maketh mention in his Philippides, ſpeaking of Mont-Fort l'Amaury, of S. Arnoul and S. Legier in Tuelina, where King Philip Auguſtus merited to ſee our Lord in humaine forme, betweene the Prieſts hands at the eluation of the holy Hoſte.

Returne we to our Gauliſh Temples.

Numa Pompilius, the very wiſeſt King of the Romanes, Scholler to Pythagoras, who had beene Scholler to the wiſe Druides (as wee learne by Clemens Alexandrinus) inſtituted for Temples to the Romanes, Woods and Forreſts, without any Idolls. And therefore the Latine Poet well obſeruing this Antiquity, purpoſelie determined to figure the ſame by the Venerable Temple of King Latinus.

Horrendum ſyluis, & religione parentum.

Concerning great Forreſts, and high topping trees.

And Seneca ſaith, Si tibi occurrat vetuſtis arboribus, & ſolitam altitudinem egreſſis, quens Lucus, & conſpectum Cæli denſitate ramorum alienorum alios protegentium ſubmouens; illa proceritas Syluæ, & ſecretum loci, & admiratio vmbræ in aperto tam denſæ attentæ continuæ, Fidem tibi numinis facit. If thwarting a great way as thou paſſeſt along, is offered or preſented to thine eyes ſome goodly Forreſt, or ſome faire Boſcage, ſhadowed with aged Oakes, hauing their heads exalted aboue all the woods; it be an vndoubted perſwaſion to thee, that this exceeding height, and admirable ſhade, made by thoſe goodlie tall trees, and the ſecrecie of a place ſo venerable, doe plainely ſhew, that there did remaine ſome Diuinitie, which ought to be adored.

And Plinie (next to this wiſe and Chriſtian Philoſopher, the familiar friend of S. Paul the Apoſtle) ſpake to good purpoſe: That olde Oakes, with their heads crowned in a round forme; were to our Auncients as their ſacred Temples, and onely places for their deuotion. Hæc fuere Numinum Templa, priſcoque ritu etiam nunc ſimplicia rura Deo præcellentem Arborem dicant. And in his Panegyricke to the Emperour Traian. Atque inter hæc piâ mente Adire Lucas, & occurſare Numinibus. And therefore the Poet in his Transformations, in the perſon of Erebonius the Atheiſt, maketh appearance of the paine or puniſhment, for all ſuch as profaned them.

Ille etiam Cereale Nemus violaſſe ſecuri
Dicitur, & Lucos ferro temeraſſe vetuſtos.

And Apuleius would elegantly darken the renowne of his Accuſer Æmilianus, by imposed on him, that in all his Inheritances hee had neither Temple, nor Lucus, dedicated and conſecrated to the Gods, wherein to make their offerings and prayers.

Quam, vt audio percenſentibus ijs qui iſtum nouêre, nulli Deo ad hoc æui ſupplicauit, nullum Templum frequentauit. Si fanum aliquod prætereat, nefas habet adorandi gratiâ limina libras admouere. Iſte verò nec Dys rurationis qui eum paſcunt, ac veſtiunt, ſegetibus, aut vitis, aut gregis primitias impartit. Nullum in villa eius Delubrum, nullum Lucus conſecratus. Et quid ego de Luco, & Delubro loquor? Negant eſſe ſe, qui fuere, vnum ſaltem in finibus eius aut Lapidem vnctum, aut Ramum coronatum.

All this before recited, was drawne from the practiſe and doctrine of the Ancient Druides, whom the Philoſopher Tyrius Maximus preſuppoſed (badly informed as he was) to haue for their principall Deity, the higheſt exalted Oake in their ſa cred Forreſts, ἄγαλμα Διὸς κλιτύχου ὑψηλὰ δρῦς.

Heereupon it was eſpecially, that the ancient Philoſophers would repreſent the God of Nature (as ſpeaketh the Gaules Apoſtle, S. Denys Areopagita, ſeeing that ge-enemies; and to hang vp or affixe them to ſacred and ſanctified places: becauſe he is pleaſed, and delighteth in the title, to be called The God of Battells and Armes, as the ſole Author of Victories, which he giueth to whom hee pleaſeth. So the Patri-

In like manner, the Anceſtors of the Gaules, hauing vanquiſhed Cæſar at old Clermont of Auuergne (Gergouia) where he ranne his fortune for life: hung vp a Trophee, in the great Temple Vaſſo, his ſword, which they had wreſted from his hand. And afterward, Cæſar hauing viſited the Metropolitane Temple of Auuergne (about which, on the height of Mountaines, were prepared Temples for the principall Gods and Goddeſſes) he found there his Sword, which neuertheleſſe he did not take away, as Plutarch noteth.

The Romaines, by the Gaules example, exalted as Trophees, the Armes of Generals and Captaines of Armies, belonging to conquered Nations. Virgil, ſpeaking of that which his Aeneas prepared, ſaith.

there was kept (as in ſafeguard) the Diſmes or Tenths of Gold and Siluer, wh from conquered people, ſo ſaith Diodorus Siculus in his Antiquities. It is a marueile, ſaith he, that in the Temple of the Gaules, you might behold great heapes of gold & ſiluer, not any daring to touch them; although that Nation was deepely in loue with yet were they ſo deuout and religious.

Strabo in his Geography, remarketh the ancient cuſtome of the Gaules, to yerely, & on certaine daies, their offerings to the Temples of moſt deuotion a e Gaules, ſpeaking of that at Toloſa. At Toloſa there was a Temple, moſt famous ſanctitie of the place, whereto all the neighbouring people ſent yeerely their Offerings of ld and ſiluer, and a very great number of all kindes of gifts; yet not any one of the Gaules ring to touch them. This Temple, vpon report of the Toloſans, was dedicated to e Sacred Virgin, adored at Chartres; and at the ſame place is yet at this preſent be ſeene, the Monaſtery and Church De la d'Aurade, that is, Our Golden Lady, on the border of Garonna.

The ſame Geographer, ſpeaking of the Toloſans, calleth them Tectoſages, and ith, that they made a voyage into Greece, with their Captaine Brennus; who hang heard the Idoll of Apollo ſpeake, which was at Delphos ſo highly renowned, all the poore Idolaters of thoſe times, and deteſting ſuch impiety; he reſolued ith his followers, to ſpoyle and deface that Idoll, by the Organe whereof, Sa-an the common ſeducer, deliuered ſo many of his lying Oracles. This Prince of euils wrought wonders, to conſerue his Rocke-hold, the dungeon of his tyranall Empire, by dreadfull Lightnings and Thunders; as is written by Pauſanias, ſme the Hiſtorian, with other Greeke and Latine Authors.

Yet ſo neuertheleſſe it came to paſſe, that notwithſtanding all theſe Bug-beare rightments, Brennus & his Gaules, who had no other feare, but leſt heauen ſhould l on their heads, forbare not to ſteale or pilfer the inredible treaſures, which had long time beene kept in that Plutonicall Manſion.

Which doth make publiquely knowne, that if the Gaules had beene Idolaters, co:ding as Cæſar ſuppoſed, and ſuch as haue followed him, building vpon his port, contrary to truth) they would not haue beene ſcrupulous in robbing the elphian Temple, which ſerued them as preſent ſupply, conſidering that they were nowned aboue all the Nations of the World, for ſingular piety and deuotion.
ns admodum dedita Religionibus, ſaith the ſame Cæſar in his Commentaries of the ules.

Cæſar wronged the Gauls in teaming them Idolaters

Part of thoſe Tectoſages dwelt in theſe quarters, where afterward they founded City of Ancyra, on the confines of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia: but the reſt urned home to Toloſa, the place of their birth and breeding, called by Geogra-ers, Toloſa Tectoſagum. Where being arriued, they preſented and offered in the mple De la d'Aurada, the ſpoyles gotten from the Deuill of Delphos, as matter quered by iuſt Title. Adding thereunto, the Tenths of that which they had got-in ſo long a voyage, and the inſcription thereon according to the ancient cu-me. Theſe Treaſures were kept there whole and intire, vntill ſuch time as the mane Conſull Quintus Cæpio, hungring after ſo rich a Booty (which by eſtiman commonly ſpoken of, amounted to more then 15. thouſand Talents, taking h Talent of ſiluer at ſixe hundred Crownes of our money) laded himſelfe and llowers with ſo much as they could carry. Which Sacriledge made him after-rd moſt miſerable, and the very Tennis-ball of Fortune. For, as Strabo ſaith, af-he had run through a thouſand dangers, and baniſhed from his Country, he died iſhoneſt and vnfortunate death, like a ſacrilegious theefe as he was; as his chil-n likewiſe did, after they had ſpent all their meanes in diſſolutions and wicked ces. The ſame diſaſterous fortune fell on all the Souldiers of Cæpio, who with ir prophane and impure hands, had made their ſhares of thoſe ſpoyles. Which de way to a Prouerbe vſed among the Romanes: He had Gold at Toloſa: Aurum et Toloſanum, as much as to ſay, He carried miſchiefe away with it; and fit for any e, that maketh ſuch a fatal ending, as Aulus Gellius obſerueth in his Attick Nights.
e Toloſans, to preſerue the reſt of the Romane pillage, melted into maſſie In-ts of gold and ſiluer, which they threw into the Lake and Mariſh ground, made Garonna round about their Temple. The Romanes within a while after (hauing quiſhed the Gaules ſold) this Mariſh ground at Port-ſale, which the buyers cau-to be digged, made themſelues extraordinarily rich; for there they found infie Ingots of gold and ſiluer, the quantity being vn-ualuable.

Theſe ſpoyles and treaſures, thus left as in depoſt & ſafety, and kept in the Gaules mples, ſerued as a modell and example to the Romanes, for doing the like, as Plu- ch obſerueth in infinite places, and namely in his Aulularia. Vide ſides etiam atq;

There were alſo kept their Standards and Banners, which the Captaines went to receiue from the hands of the Druides, when there was any noyſe of Warre. For the Druides only had power to take them into the Cloſture of the Generall States: and likewiſe to deliuer them to him or them, whom they had determined and nomed for conducting the Armie. Signa detracta Lucis in prælium Ferunt, ſaith Tacitus. And in thoſe Standards and Flagges were painted the Arms of the Gaules, the Lyon and the Ship, which Tacitus hauing ſeene in their ancient Temples, imagined that they worſhipped (as Idolaters and Pagans) the great Mother of the Gods Cybele, otherwiſe tearmed the Idoll of the Syrians, the ſame error of Cæſar.

It is well knowne that the deſcendants of Cham, Founder of the Aſſyrians Monarchy, were the firſt inuenters of Idolatry, as well in the perſon of Belus, father to Ninus, as in repreſentation of the Starres and Planets, euen as in humane figure, which they reuerenced for gods, forgetting the Creator, to honor Creatures: making the ſeuen Planets of Mettalls, which Nature (a moſt fruitfull Mother) engendreth and produceth in her hard entrailes, after continuall trauell of many ages of yeeres. Attributing Gold to the Sunne, Siluer to the Moone, Iron to Mars, Lead to Saturne, Tinne to Iupiter, Copper to Venus, and Quicke-ſiluer to Mercurie. Geneſ. 2. 1.

God did ſeuerely forbid the adoration and worſhip of theſe Idoles. And therefore the wiſe King of Edom, the Patriarch Iob, iuſtified himſelfe before the heauenly Maieſty, who enthroneth and vnſceptreth Kings & Princes on earth, according to his owne good pleaſure: becauſe he being (on all ſides) encloſed with Idolatrous Nations, yet he notwithſtanding, neuer bowed his knee to Baall, or ſoyled his ſoule with ſuch abhomination. Si vidi Solem cum fulgeret, & Lunam inſedentem clare, & lætatum eſt in abſcondito cor meum, & oſculatus ſum manum meam ore meo, quæ eſt iniquitas maxima, & negatio contra Deum altiſſimum. Thoſe Infidels, ſeeing the Sunne beames ſhining on their heads, and the Moone cleering the nights darkeneſſe, lifting vp their eyes to heauen, kiſſed their hands in ſigne of adoration, reuerence and honor. And the like they did, in paſſing before their Temples and Idolls. Apuleius, in the place before alleadged ſaith: Si fanum aliquod prætereant, nefas habet, adorandi gratia, manum labris admouere. It was Idolatry to repreſent Iupiter, and other Deities adored by Pagans, vnder the Image of a Ramme, a Bull, or other brutiſh Beaſts and Creatures, as the Ægyptians did, Greekes and Romanes: becauſe, Numinis nulla eſt ratio, neque figura.

The Idolatry of the Syrians extended to other Nations of the Eaſt, but principally it was planted among the Ægyptians, who be-mealed the Greeks therewith. And they, hauing (in verity) liuely and ingenious ſpirits, yet alwaies children in true wiſedome; as daily they were reproched, excelled in Demonomanie, all them that had gone before them, the Deuill ſeducing both the one and the other, by an infinite number of impoſtures, falſe miracles, and lying Oracles, euermore carrying a double intent. For the Aſſyrians, hauing no Idolatry but in the hoaſt of Heauen, the Greekes (hardy and bold lyers) ranked in the rolle of their gods, Princes and Tyrants of their firſt knowledge, addicted to all vices & diſorders, as Herodotus re-rs, and the Oratour. Si vero ſcrutari veteri, & ex eis quæ Scriptores Græciæ prodiderunt eruere coner, illi ipſi Maiorum Gentium Dij qui habentur, hinc à nobis profecti, in Cælum repercientur. Quærere quorum demonſtrentur ſepulchra in Græcia, &c. Of mortall men, and whoſe graues & Tombes were daily to be ſeene; they made their Gods.

Numa Pompilius, enſtructed by the Phyloſopher Pythagoras, had learned of our Druides the very beſt of his Phyloſophie, as is written by Clemens Alexandrinus: prohibited the Romaines, to repreſent the Image of God, by any humaine figure and repreſentation, or any creature whatſoeuer, which was obſerued for an hundred threeſcore and ten yeares continuance. Numa Romanorum Rex (theſe are the very words of Clemens Alexandrinus, in his firſt Booke of diuerſities) prohibuit Romanis, ne Homini, aut Animali ſimilem Dei facerent imaginem. Cum itaque Centum, & ſeptuaginta primis annis Templa ædificarent, nullam imaginem, nec affictam, nec deſtam fecere. Occulte enim iudicarat Numa quod id quod eſt optimum, non alia ratione, quam ſola mente vlli licet attingere. And in his time, the Temples of the Romaines were in the middeſt of Forreſts and Wods (as we haue already ſaid) without any wals or couerture whatſoeuer; which continued ſo an hundred and ſeauenty years, and vntill the vnfortunate Reigne of Seruius Tullius, who hauing heard the winde of the proud Temple of Diana at Epheſus, built at the common charge of the Grecian people; aſſembled the Romans, and he cauſed one to be built in the Citie of Rome, in ſuch faſhion: as hee was the firſt that planted Idolatrie, formerly vnknowne in the Latines Land, which from that time forward, became plundged (euen as with vailed head) to the diuels ſeruice, who cauſed himſelfe to be adored vnder diuers figures, and by ſundry names of Gods; As the Orator (before alleadged) obſerued for principall Gods of the Gentiles; Maiorum gentium Deos, compriſed in theſe two Verſes.

The firſt man that planted Idolatry in Rome.

Iuno, Veſta, Minerua, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars,

Becauſe, that ouer and beſide the deifying of the ſeauen Planets, they added to them the foure Elements; and afterward Bacchus, with other names of Diuels beſide, as Euſebius noateth.

The Romaines then thus enſtructed in Idolatrie by their King Seruius, who ſuffred iuſt puniſhment by a ſpeedy death (and by the hands of one of his own begetting) no ſooner ſet he footing in the Gaules: but he eſtabliſhed thorow all the Cities and Prouinces of them, the worſhippe and adoration of their falſe Gods. As it is affirmed by Saint Auguſtine; Euſebius in his fore-alleadged paſſage; and Paulus Oroſius.

And as the Citie of Authune in Bourgongne, was the firſt of the Gaules, that ſought for alliance with the ſaid Romans: euen ſo was it the firſt likewiſe, infected with their Demonomanie, to the end that they might appeare acceptable and pleaſing to theſe new-commers. The Inhabitants of this Citie, refer her foundation to the Patriarch Gomer, who made it one of the capitall Cities in his Kingdome. But howſoeuer, Cæſar, & the Noble Romaine Hiſtorian, make honorable mention of this ancient Citie. For Tacitus, in his Annales informeth vs, that vnder the Empire of Tiberius Cæſar; it was called Auguſtodunum, in memory of the Emperor Auguſtus (vnder whom it had bin built) and that then it had in it a moſt famous Vniuerſitie, whereunto the yong Noble men of the Gaules were ſent to ſtudie. Apud Æduos maior moles exorta, quanta Gnut as opulentior. Auguſtodunum caput gentis, armatis Cohortibus Sacrouir occupauerat nobiliſſimam Galliarum ſubolam, liberalibus ſtudijs ibi operatam, vt eo pignore Parentes, propinquique eorum adiungeret.

A famous Vniuerſitie at Auguſtodunum

In this Citie was prouided the Colledge of the Druides, the moſt famous of the Gaules: in all parts whereof, thoſe diuine perſonages taught the worſhip of the true God. And yet (to this preſent) is to be ſeene, the prints and markes of this Colledge of the Druides of Authune, at Mont-Iou, otherwiſe called Mont-Dru, that is to ſay, the Colledge of the Druides, and afterward named the Mount of Iupiter, diſtant a quarter of a mile from Authune, taking foure thouſand paces for a mile, after the manner of the Romaines account. Vpon this Mountaine (which is Westward from the Citie) was raised a Temple to Iupiter; Cybele, Mother of the Pagans Gods, and to Mercurie.

On the North side, in the Suburbs of the Citie, neere to the Riuer of Arou, was another Temple dedicated to Proserpina, and her husband Pluto. And there was the dwelling of the Bardes, who lodged neere enough to the Druides, to receiue their commands: for, by knowledge of the Starres, they foretold of things to come. And therefore the Romaines named them Genethliacus, directers of Natiuities: and of them the memorie remaineth to this day, at the Port of Authune, which is called Genethoye.

Genethliacus, a foreteller of mens fortunes by their Nativities.

In the faire middle of this Citie, was the Temple of Mars, whom the Gaules (infected with Idolatrie) tooke to be their principall God: as best correspondant to their naturall disposition, being Martiall and Warlike.

On the East side of this small Hill, called Philosia, as one would say, a place destined for Loue, was the Chappell of Cupid, and of his Mother Venus, and round about it were Stoues and Hot-houses, where the daughters of delight and dalliance, won gaine for maintenance of their wretched liues, by the sinnes of their bodies. Close ioyning thereunto was the Concoubarre, that is to say, a thicket or thornie Copice, on the highest part whereof, was exalted the figure of a Cuckoe, made of luorie; before which yearely) at the Springs beginning, those scant-honest Wenches, sacrificed to their God Priapus, the first Cuckoe that they could catch.

Like God, like Sacrifice.

In the highest part of the Citie, was the Capitall on the one side, and on the other the Temple of Apollo, ioyning to the Fraixine Streete, which we hold so called of Ash-trees, sometimes there growing. At the West side of the Citie was the Dog-quarter, where the Idole Annubis, with his Dogs-head stood fixed: And in that quarter, Cut-purses and Theeues were punished with death.

The Dog-like God Anubis in the Dog-quarter.

Beside these forenamed Temples, the Authunois had another, belonging to what Idole I know not, but named Koch: which they tooke for the Tutelarie God of their Citie, in imitation of the Romaines, who had their God named Romanessius. If this Koch were the Roth, or Rothot, which they of Rouen said, had bin the principall Idole of their Citie, and of whom it retaineth the name to this day: it may then be said, that such names were taken & deriued from the seede and off-spring of the Romaines Romanessius, as (in complement and flattery) honouring and reuerencing them, whereto the inhabitants of Authune addicted themselues too much. For vnder the Reigne and Empire of Vespasian, it was called Ædua Flauia, or Flauia Æduorum.

By example whereof, other Townes and Cities of Bourgongne, gaue themselues to the honoring of Idols, erecting and building Temples and Chappels to them. One to Iupiter, instead of Ioigny, called (by reason thereof) Iouiniacum to these times. Another at Flauigny, and at Semur en l Auxon, at Auxerre, in Latine Autricum. One to Diana, and her Nimphs of the Woods, whereto from all parts of the Gaules, the very greatest Maisters in Hunting, sent their Offerings of Gold and Siluer, and afterward (as times drew on) in faire Linnen cloathes, they sent the spoiles of Harts, and heads of the greatest Boares they slew in hunting. This Citie of Auxerre had diuers names, the most auncient whereof was Autricum (and not Antricum, ab Autris, as some say.) Concilium Autrici, in the Itinerarium of the Cosmographer Æthicus, made in the time of the Emperour Theodosius the elder, first of the name, in the yeare of Grace foure hundred. This Itinerarium was (to small purpose) imprinted vnder the name of Antoninus Pius Augustus, as Hermolaus Barbarus dreamed in his Annotations vpon Plinie. Floardus, in his Historie of Rheims, on the name Durocortorum Remorum, citeth for Author Æthicus in Cosmographia. Gesnerus in his Bibliotheca, saith, that he liued in the time of S. Ambrose, and Symmachus; and that this Citie of Auxerre was called Antisidiorum, now at this present Altissiodorum.

One Citie euill examples draws on many more.

A Iournall of trauailes from Country to Country.

In the small Citie of Dyon, at this instant the chiefest of Bourgongne, in regard of the Parlement, and which was called but a Castell, by S. Gregory Victor, Archbishop of Tours, in his Historie of France, where he setteth downe the description, according as now it standeth, and watered with the Riuer of Ouische, which he called ch Oscarum, and accompanieth it with another, which is not named by him, and thereof he maketh the entrance at one Gate of the Citie, and issuing forth at another. This is the torrent of Suson in winter, and yet without water in Summer; rier. This is the torrent of Suson in winter, and yet without water in Summer; ring from a Spring in the dangerous Vale of Suson, foure miles from Dyon, and one om S. Seine. In this Citie of Dyon was a Temple, dedicated to all the Pagan gods. The Romaines made such Temples for all the Gods, which they called Pantheons, ormed round, and open aboue: as that which is now at Rome, dedicated to the Mother of God, called S. Maria la Rotunda, the like is yet to be seene at Dyon, euen ich an auncient Pantheon, behinde the Church of S. Benigne.

A Temple called Pantheon, dedicated to all the Pagan Gods.

The entrance (at this present being the Quire of the moderne Church) as made in he forme of an Hemicicle, with strong Collomnes, and numbers of degrees, with wo Towers on both sides; the whole builded of Stones with wals and couertures, he rest is altogether round, open, and without couerture likewise in the roundnesse, uen from the toppe to the bottome, to receiue light, raine, and other iniuries of he Ayre. There are three stories or stages one aboue another, the two vppermost eing garnished with Ballisters of Stone. At the foote of this Pantheon are three Chappels erected one aboue the other: that highest, is dedicated to the most holy Trinitie; that in the middest, to the blessed Virgin; and that lowest of all, to the Martyre S. Benigne, the tutelarie Patron of Dyon, and where he was buried, after he had finished his course of life. Hee was the Disciple or Scholler of S. Polycarpus, the Scholler to S. Iohn the Euangelist, who sent him to the Gaules, there to proclaime the Law of Iesus Christ: and being arriued in Gaule, he was there martyred by the Gouernour thereof, named Terentius, Lieutenant to the Emperour Marcus Aurelius the Philosopher, Founder of Dyon (and not Aurelianus, as we read in S. Gregory of Tours) the first day of Nouember, in the yeare of Grace one hundred, sixtie and fiue.

At Talan, halfe a mile beneath Dyon, on the beginning of the Mountaines, was a Mannor house of the Druides, and another of the Bardes at Fountaines, a quarter of a mile from thence. where (since then) hath bin builded the Church of S. Ambrosian, and the Castell of Fountaines, famous by the birth of the Father of Religion S. Bernard, of Noble extraction. Et qui portoit de Sable à la Bande Eschiquettee d'Or & de Guenilles de deux filets.

At the said Talan was a Temple, dedicated to the sacred Virgin, that should bring forth a childe: but afterward prophaned by the Romaines, and (by them) dedicated to their Gods Apollo and Mercurie; yet rechanged after againe, and consecrated by the Christians, in honor of the Mother of God, and graced with Miracles. The ouer-plus of those Antique Temples, may be read in them, that haue written the Annales of Bourg-Ogne.

The Romains prophaners of temples

But seeing we are now come to the Mannor and Colledge of the Druides and Bardes; we will touch one word more of them, as we passe along, and then returne to the Demonomanie of the Romaines.

There remaine some noates in good Authors of ancient Philosophers, who report their ordenary dwellings to be in Woods, and not in Cities, Townes or Villages, peopled with inhabitants. As in the Forrest of Iury, vulgarly called the Forrest of Dreux, where the remainder of the Castle is to be seene, belonging to the Prince of the Druides, and where he made his continuall abiding. And round about it (in the same Forrest) were Cottages and small houses of other Druides, that were neere in Office about their Prince: who yeerely the seauenth day of September (the beginning of the yeare, Sacred by the Druides) assembled the generall States of all the Gaules Prouinces, at the foote of the Mountaine of Chartres.

The Office and charge of the Druides in the Gaulish Prouinces.

These Druides were dispersed and scattered, throughout all the said Prouinces, whereof they had the charge as well of the Sacrifices and Priesthoods, as also of Pollicie Criminall and Ciuile, and institution of the Gaulish youth. They knew also the affaires of State, as well in matters of peace, as for warre: so that they were Priests and Iudges together, iudging without any further appeale; so saith Cæsar and Strabo likewise, speaking thus. Iustissimi omnium opinione sunt Druidæ, ideo & priua- ta,

& publica iudicia eorum fidei mandantur, adeo vt rem etiam Bellicam antea indictam & Martem collaturi, illis iubentibus desistunt: Capitis quoque iudicia horum sententia permittuntur.

The Druides did not set downe any thing in writings.

And because those wise Druides did not set downe any thing in writing, but their learning and doctrine was giuen from hand to hand, by Cabala and tradition, we must make our recourse to the pens of strangers, as namely to the Romans, and after them to the Greekes.

Cæsar was the first of the Latines, who in his Commentaries hath said somewhat, and vpon his relation, and Iulius Celsus, Secretary of his Cabinet: the Greeks, Strabo, Possidonius, Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, Atheneus, Pausanias, Lucian and others haue likewise said something.

The deuotion of the Gaules.

Cæsar in his Commentaries obserueth in the first place, that the Gaules (in generall) were very full of deuotion, and that in their sicknesses of minde and body; they made their recourse to deuotion, to vowes and Sacrifices, and, for discharging themselues in those cases, they made their repaire to the Druides. But because he hath added thereto somewhat of their humaine Oblations, wholly dyed red with Blood: that (by his comforts) is annexed to his narrations, to make the conquest of the Gaules the more admirable. According to a common saying of the Oratour, that ordenarily such as come from farre: Sæpe aliquid de suo, cum mentiant latius. And as they say at Paris: Hee may easily lye, that commeth from farre off.

The two Estates among the Gaules, Clergie and Nobilitie.

Hee enstructeth vs moreouer, that throughout the Gaules, there was but two Estates (speaking as now we doe at this present) that of the Cleargie, which had the power of Iustice annexed thereunto, which at this day is reduced to the third Estate (by ignorance in the Noble men.) And the other of Nobilitie. For hee speaketh nothing of the third Estate, which is tearmed Plebeian. Plebs pene seruorum habetur loco, quæ per se nihil audet, & nulli adhibetur consilio. They were not called to the Generall Estates, nor to publique charges. De his duobus generibus alterum est Druidum; alterum Equitum.

The Offices and charges belonging to the Druides in their gouernement.

The Druides (saith he) had the charge and superintendencie of the Sacrifices, publique and perticuler, and of preaching what ought to be beleeued in Religion. The direction of the Vniuersities and Colledges, whereto the yong Nobilitie were sent to studie. In causes Ciuill and Criminall, as well in State matters, that is to say, for that which respected and concerned as well generally, as perticularly; of Successions, Deuisions, and generally for the Iudgement of paines and punishments, for chastising of bad behauiors, and regarding the honors and gouernments of such, as for their faithfull seruice, deserued recompences.

Excommunication vsed by the Druides, and the powers thereof.

If the Generall Estates in some Prouince, or the Perticuler, obeyed not (saith Cæsar) that which the Druides had determined by their sentence and iudgement: they thundered against them, and deprined them of the Sacrifices. After this excommunication, such refractarie people were auoided and hated as execrable, forsaken of God, and of men: who fled from their frequencie and conuersation, without saluting, receiuing them into their houses, speaking or conferring with them; as fearing, least they should be pollured and blemished by touching them. They might complaine, but there was no Iustice for them.

Tacitus addeth to this power of the Druides, that they presided in the Generall Estates; that the Nobilitie dared not to speake, without their permission: yea, they had such height of prerogatiue and authority, as, beside interdiction and suspension from the Sacrifices; they sent such to death as had deserued it, and whom they had condemned with such sentence. Silentium per Sacerdotes quibus tum, & coercendi eius est, imperatur. Caterum neque animaduertere, neque vincire, neque verberare quidem nisi Sacerdotibus permissum, non quasi in pœnam, nec Ducis iussu, sed quasi Deo imperante. And the same Tacitus, speaking of the force and power of their Excommunication, informeth vs, that such men of the Nobilities body, as in warre had suffered their Shields to be lost, or taken from them; were interdicted from publique assemblies, yea, and from the Sacrifices also. Scutum dereliquisse præcipuum flagitium, nec aut Sacris adesse, aut consilium inire ignominioso fas est.

The

The Metropolitane Prince of the Druides and the manner of his election.

These Druides were presided and commanded by their Metropolitane, knowne the name of Prince of the Druides, who had that supreme place during life. By decease, they proceeded to election of another in his Office, by plurality of the yces loudly pronounced, and not by Scrutinie: but in this election, none were downe in the Bill, but onely the most excellent in learning, and integrity of life. mortuo, si quis ex reliquis excellit dignitate, succedit; at si plures sint pares, suffragio uidum (the Kings, Princes and Nobles had no voyce at all in those Elections) aditur. The Princes and Nobilitie (by their Armes) fauoured those Elections, if y came to them.

The Druides free from all taxations.

All the Druides were exempted from contributions and charges, both in times of ace and warre, whereto they could not be constrained to march. So that in rerd of their great priuiledges; the Noble men sent their Sonnes to their Colledges, t they might attaine to the dignitie (by Studie) to become of the Druides Soctie.

The time of Studie limited to their Schollers.

The Rules and Precepts of the Druides Doctrine, were reduced and couched in rses, which they taught to their Schollers, and by hart: and the time of Studie, such as would excell other in learning, was twenty yeares. For in those things ich concerned the Sciences, they had not any Bookes by writing; but all must apprehended and engrauen in the Booke of Memorie. For Contracts and or publique Acts, they were written in the Gauliſh-mother tongue, which Cæ, and others that haue followed him (against all reason) called the Greeke ngue.

The Gaulish tongue called Greeke by Cæsar & others.

And therefore, in this case, I entreate the Reader not to dislike of this digressi- to vnderstand and know, whether the Gaulish tongue was the same, which s knowne to the Sages of Ægypt, Greece and Italie, by reason of the Druides. d that it was not without subiect, that the excellent Poet Du Bartas, speaking of auncient Gaulish tongue said.

Before the Latine name, and the Romulides,
Were by Euander sharpned in such sort:
The Learned-Holy speech of Bardes and Druides,
In Greece, in Italie, and Memphis held report.

We will shew what this Gaulish tongue was, which we haue maintained to be the ne; that (by wrong information) was said to be Greeke.

Concerning certaine names

Some haue thought, that it was perticularly to the Gaulish Nation, neither Greeke Latine, building vpon some passages of Suetonius, in the name of Galba, which affirmeth to be Gaulish, & to signifie a man grosse and fat, plumpe or well liking, ing full the belly of his doubtlet: as now a dayes we vse to say; Hee hath a good belly. Or that of Beco (in the life of Vitellius) which in the Tolosane-Gaulish tongue, nifieth the Bill or Beake of a Capon. Or of Caracalla, a name which in the same ngue signifieth a Garment for a Horseman-Souldior, vulgarly called a Cassocke, aque or Mandillion, according to the common kinde of speaking at Paris, where s pronounced instead of R. As contrariwise the Romaines doe, in imitation of Parisians, pronouncing Fusius Camillus: Si quis Asam Struxesit, instead of Fu- Camillus, and De Aram Struxerit, and a thousand such like. And so of Caligula, tocking or Hose, proper for a Gaulish Horseman, made in forme of halfe-Buss, and of curried-leather, the soales whereof were set thicke with nayles, for the nger-lasting: these Buskins rose vp to the calfe of the legge. The like of Alauda, Gaulish word, the meaning whereof is a Larke, the firname of that Gaulish Le- on, so much renowned for valour and readinesse. These are the most pregnant d pressiue passages to serue their turne, which (neuertheless) are not sufficient to ld on, for inferring and concluding from thence, that the Gaulish tongue was ther Greeke nor Latine, but perticuler by it selfe. Whereto wee may answere, t it is a Romaine which speaketh it, and as well the Greekes as the Romaines ue confused and altered proper names, and appellatiues of the auncient Gauls, acding to their owne fancies, as we haue already said before in other places.

Pronouncing one Letter for another.

The Larke legion of the Gaules very famous.

The Romans and Greekes altered names of the Gaules as themselues pleased.

The

to make themselues vniuersall in all their Sciences, Customes & Ceremonies; which soone after they carried into Italie, Greece and Ægypt. For euery one knoweth, that Plato was the most famous Phylosopher, which euer had beene in Greece.

Learning brought into Italie by Pythagoras.

Concerning Italie, Science was brought thither by the Phylosopher Pythagoras, a natiue of Thuscane, who, according to the Druides manner; caused Colledges to be erected, or rather Conuents and Monesteries well gouerned. He called his Conuent ἐμπεδοκλεῖον, as we say a Church. So speaketh (well to purpose) Clemens Alexandrinus; according to whose testimonie, the Priests and Iudges of Ægypt had deriued the very choisest of their Ceremonies, as well for Religion, as Iustice. So that in the same authoritie of the Prince of the Druides, who had the dignitie of the high Priest-hood, and the intendance or Soueraigne Gouernement of Iustice: the Aegyptians had of their Bodies and Colledges, a Prince, Chiefe of Iustice, whom they called (according to Diodorus Siculus, and Aelianus) Principem Iudicij. So likewise were they Priests and Iudges together, ened in the same manner as the Druides were.

Pythagoras was Schoolemaister to Numa Pompilius, second King of the Romaines, so saith Clemens Alexandrinus. Numa Pompilius Romanorum Rex erat Pythagoreus. Hee taught him the Ceremonies of Sacrifices, and of Religion, as also how to gouerne the Romaines by good and holy Lawes, drawne from the Gaulish customes, and obserued by the wise Druides. In like manner the Greekes had for their Law-maker Draco, and after him Solon, Founder of the Areopagites at Athens: hauing learned of the Gaules which passed into Greece, at the time before noated, Tarquinius Priscus being then King, the fift of the Romaines. For, before that passage, the Greekes were but meere children, so speaketh diuine Plato, In Critia, being stupified in such grosse ignorance; as they knew not Phylosophie, Astrologie, Geometrie, and other parts of the Mathematicks. The Ægyptians knew not any more, and whatsoeuer is found written of them before that named time; they are nothing else but Fables and tales, made vpon pleasure, without any certainty, or appearance of probabilitie.

The grosse ignorance of the Greekes, and likewise of the Ægyptians.

Aesculapius and Pimander, the true Fables of Diuinitie of the Druides.

Mercurius Trismegistus, instructed in the Schoole of the Druides; had there his eyes vnsealed, and by communication with his Aesculapius and Pimander, which are the true Fables of the Theologie of our diuine Druides, and which hee wrote in the Greeke tongue, proper and naturall to the Gaules; he taught a solide and perfect Doctrine. All the Sages and Phylosophers, Solon, Thales, Chilo, Periander, Cleobulus, Bias, Pittacus, Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Numenius, and Diuine Plato, all men renowned for Phylosophie: had learned from the Druides, the keye and secret of the Soules Immortalitie; of Diuinitie, Astrologie, Phylosophie Morall and Naturall, and other good Sciences, accounting their labour pleasing and acceptable, comming into the Gaules Countrey, to sucke from the sweetest bottome, the excellent learning of our Phylosophers, whereof they had begun to taste, by commerce and frequentation with the Gaules dwelling in Greece, and the firme-land of Asia. For all those men forenamed, had no noate or fame, but since the passage of the Gaules thither, and about the yeare of the World three thousand fiue hundred sixtie, and almost to sixe hundred yeares.

The Druides were instructer well neere to the whole world.

At what time Mercurius Trismegistus liued.

As for Mercurius Trismegistus, hee liued vnder Ptolomie Lagus Soter, ninth King of Ægypt, after Alexander the Great, the yeare of the World three thousand eight hundred thirtie seauen, some three hundred yeares before the Incarnation of the Eternall Word. So then if it were so, that the Marsellians should bring into France, the knowledge of Sciences, and of the Greeke (which quite contrary they drew from the Gaulish Drudes:) the reason is alleadged, because Ptolomie in his Geographie, speaking of Achaia (vnder which he comprehendeth most part of the Iles of Greece) saith in eloquent tearmes, that it was peopled by the Gaulish people, who (with their victorious Armes) carried thither their Religion, Police and Language, and so Graecos à Gallis Litteras habuisse. The Elanians, that is to say, the Greekes, learned of the Gaules, the knowledge of the Greeke tongue and good Sciences; as it is concluded by Clemens Alexandrinus; and Xenophon in his Equiuocations, saith. That Cadmus brought into Greece, Letters and Characters of writings, altogether like to them of the Galates, that is to say, Of the Gaules. Wherefore Du Bartus hath said to good purpose, that the Language of the Druides, that is to say the Gaulish, improperly tearmed and called Greeke; was knowne to strange Nations, to wit, in Ægypt, Greece, and Italie, long time before that Cadmus and Euander had deliuered the knowledge and vndeestanding of Letters.

Before the Latines name, and the Romulides
Were by Euander sparpned in such sort:
The Learned-Holy-Speech of Bardes and Druides
In Greece, in Italie, and Memphis held report.

And to shew yet more clearely, that the Greeke tongue was the same of the Gaules, behold here two passages of Cæsar, which can receiue no reproach. The first is in his Commentaries of the Gaulish warre, thus set downe. In Castris Heluetiorum tabulae repertae sunt Graecis Litteris confectae, & ad Cæsarem perlatae. That the Rowles of the Horsemen of the Switzers, People inhabiting a Countrey of the Gaules, were (after their defeate) brought to Iulius Cæsar, written in Greeke Letters.

The other is in his sixt Booke, where he writeth, that the Druides, did set downe nothing of their Science and Learning, by writing: howbeit, in their affaires, they serued their turne with the Greeke tongue, as well in their Acts Publique, as Perticuler. Neque fas esse existimant ea Litteris mandare, cum in reliquis fere rebus, publicis, privatisque rationibus Graecis Litteris vtantur.

Lucian, a Greeke Author, who liued vnder the Empire of Traiane, Contemporane with Plutarch, describing our Gaulish Hercules, saith; That the Gaules spake elegantly the Greeke Language, as being theirs naturally.

S. Hierome, that glorious Light of the Church, and incomparable for knowledge and learning, had long time made his aboade in the Citie of Treuers, it being then the chiefest of the Gaules; and there hee ranne the course of his Studies, wrote the Paraphrase and interpretation of the Psalmes of David, and transcribed with his owne hand, the long labour of Saint Hillaries Synodes, as himselfe witnesseth in his sixt Epistle Ad Florentium. This worthie man, who liued the yeare foure hundred of our Saluation, in the Commentarie which hee wrote on the Epistle of Saint Paul, sent written to the Galatians, who in his time were them of the Hellespont, Æolia, Phocæa, Ionia, with other people of Greece and Asia (he had trauailed thorow all those Countries there, passing from Rome to the Holy-Land, where he confined himselfe all the rest of his dayes, and died at Bethleem) spake the same Language, as they then did at Treuers.

Treuers the Capitall Citie of the Gaules in those times.

S. Hierome died in the Holy-Land at Bethleem.

These considerations caused a resolution in the learned Gulielmus Budeus, the honor of our France, in his Booke De Asse, and in his Pandects on the first Law De Ser. Corr. at ff. Quod ait Prætor; Lazarus Baif, and other skilfull persons, to say: That that Language, which thel Greekes and Romaines haue called the Greeke, was the Naturall and Maternall of the Gaules. From whom shee went to the Alemaignes, our Germaine Bretheren; to the Italians and Greekes; who of vs learned Eloquence, the Mathematickes and Philosophie. This is it which heretofore moued many learned men, to report the conformitie of the most part of French vocables, to them that are called Greeke.

The resolution of diuers men concerning the Gaulish language.

The Alemaignes or Germaines, are not sundered from the Gaules, but by the Riuer of Rhine, which from all Antiquitie) hath made the bounds and limits of France and Germanie. And beyond the Rhine is Franconia, that is Orientall France, so much renowned by Claudian, Ausonius, S. Hierome, and the Bishoppe of Auuergne Sidonius Apollinarus. And it is not to be wondred at, if this neighbourhood occaoccasioned, that the Greeke tongue, or (to speake better) the Gauliſh, had her courſe throughout Alemaigne, the moſt part whereof was peopled with naturall Gaules, as we haue ſaid. Iulius Cæſar writeth, that Arioviſtus, King of Alemaigne, vnderſtood and ſpoke perfectly the Greeke tongue, without neede of any Truchemman or Interpreter: which is not to be admired, becauſe it was his mother tongue. And Cornelius Tacitus hath obſerued in his Germania, that the Epitaphes in that great Prouince, were written in Greeke letters. Monumenta, & Tumulos quoſdam Græcis Literis inſcriptos in confinio Germaniæ, Rhatiæque extare audio.

If thoſe Greeke Letters had not bin thoſe, which the Gauliſh people brought thither, from whence ſhould they elſe come? For the ſame Authour noateth at the beginning of his relations, that no man of any ſtrange Nation had euer entred into Alemaigne, before Iulius Cæſar. Quis præter periculum horridi & ignoti maris, Aſiâ aut Africâ, aut Italiâ relictâ, Germaniam peteret? And that which the ſame Hiſtorian ſuppoſed, concerning the voyage of a pretended Vlyſſes; are meere lyes and inuentions, hauing taken Vlyſſes for, and inſtead of Hercules, the memorie of whom was venerable, as well among the Germaines, as Gaules. So that he muſt make his recourſe to truth. Gallos atque Germanos nulli, aliarum Nationum connubys infectos fuiſſe. That the Gaules and Germaines had not any commerce and habitude, with ſtrange Nations. And this is the reaſon, which moued Ioannes Auentinus, the Annaliſt of Bauaria, to ſay: That the Alemaigne tongue was wholly like to the Greeke.

The memorie of Hercules venerable with the Gaules & Germaines.

And as concerning that of the Iſle of Albion, called at this preſent England, heretofore peopled by the Gaules, as we ſhall hereafter more at large relate; it was that language of the Druides. For we learne by that Father of learning Origen; Quo nemo melius, vbi bene dixit. That God, by his vnſearchable Prouidence permitted, that the Wiſe Druides ſhould paſſe from the Gauliſh Bretaigne, into great Albion, to the end; for gouerning the Inhabitants of the Iſle of England; to inſtruct them in their Language, and to giue them knowledge of one onely God, Creatour of the World.

For the Language of the auncient Spaniards, Ioſephus deduceth their firſt Originall from Tuball, Iubal or Ibal; but hee ſpeaketh nothing elſe, neither haue the Greekes and Romaines made any great account. There was no acknowledgement of them, but vnder the conqueſt of Spaine, made by the Carthagenians, whom the Romaines ſent packing by force of Armes. And that which is ſpoken by a falſe and ſuppoſed Berroſus, with his Sequell; is a fabulous diſcourſe, without any likelihood of truth whatſoeuer. And the Spanish Hiſtorians agree with one conſent, that their prime anceſtors liued groſely in ignorance, and all ruſticitie. They ſpeake not any thing of their Religion, neither had they any Druides, to guide them in the way to Saluation: which is attained vnto, by the knowledge, worſhippe and ſeruice of one onely God. So that Poets haue made Spaine to ſerue as a Theater, for bloody and pittileſſe Tygers; for Geryons with three heads, and an infinite number of Monſters, and Sonnes of the Earth, deſtroyed and trampled on by our Gauliſh Hercules. They ſpeake nothing of the Gauliſh Nations comming thither.

The principall thing, which they imprinted in the minde and memorie of their Schollers and Diſciples; was, The Immortalitie of the Soule, which ſerued as a ſharpe Spurre or Needle, to beare themſelues valiantly in hazards of Warre, and to deſpiſe death, by aſſured hope of eternall life. Hoc maxime ad virtutem excitari putabant, metu Mortis neglecto. This Cæſar obſerued.

The Druides chiefeſt leſſon, Immortality of the Soule.

This being perſwaded as an Article of their beliefe; they taught them the Mathematickes, and namely Aſtrologie, which diſcourſed on the nature and motion of the Planets; the Creation of the World; the greatneſſe of the Earth; and the nature of things. And from Phyſicke, their Schollers mounted to Metaphyſicke, that is to ſay; to the knowledge of things purely eſſentiall and ſupernaturall, which are God and the Angels.

Other leſſons deliuered by them to their Schollers.

After Cæſar, Strabo ſpeaketh thus. Among the Gaules, the Druides are honored aboue all other, and next to them goe the Bardes and Poets, (Vates, ſo ſay the Romaines, a name equiuocall and common, as well to them that make profeſſion of Poeſie, as to prepare Horoſcopes and Natiuities, and to foretell of future things, onely by inſpection of Phyſiognomie. And many Druides, and Druiades foretold to Romaine Captaines, that they ſhould attaine to the Empire, as wee reade in the Romaine Hiſtories.) I let paſſe in ſilence, that which Poſsidonius reporteth of the Gaules, and of their Iudges and Prieſts the Druides: becauſe Strabo argueth to be lying and falſehood, whatſoeuer is alleadged by that Authour. Whereto the Naturaliſt Plinie (a bold lyer) hath added out of his owne braine, a thouſand reports of old tales, done vpon pleaſure: as of Egges hatched by Serpents, the vſe whereof was neuer practiſed by the Druides; without diſpleaſure offred to the honeſt man of Chaſſeneux, in his Glory of the World, who hath ſet downe Egges for Armes of the Druides, inſtead of Oaken Leaues and Acornes.

The Druides were Iudges and Prieſts of the Gaules.

Diodorus Siculus in his Antiquities, ſpeaking of the Gaules and Germaines (whom he comprehendeth all vnder the name of Galatæ) calleth our Druides, Saronides, whom hee maketh Theologians and Phyloſophers, honoured by the Galates aboue all other, and that after them went the Bardes and Deuiners: who by other Authours, and namely Ammianus Marcellinus, are called Eubages, and the Druides, Drasidas and Druidæ. For they haue had diuers names; Saronides, by one of the deſcendents of Gomer, who inſtituted the firſt Colledge of the Druides, in the Prouince of Bretaigne Armorica, as wee ſhall report elſewhere. Semnothes of Samothes, a ſir-name giuen to the Patriarch Gomer, our Gauliſh Hercules, whom the Bourgongnons make Founder of their Citie Alexia, or by the reſt, of Flauigny: And the Piccards of their Mother-Citie Bratuſpantium, on the ruines whereof are remaining Breſtuell, Caſtelet and Camp-Reims, Beauuoir, &c.

Semnothes or rather Samotheans.

Diogenes Laertius, at the beginning of the Phyloſophers Liues, writeth, that Phyloſophie receiued her ſourſe and firſt originall, not out of Greece or Italie; but from Nations farre further off. Becauſe among the Babylonians of Aſſyria, the Chaldeans made their profeſſion; the Mages among the Perſians; and among the Celtes and Gaules, the Druides, otherwiſe called Samotheans, that is to ſay more plainely, Diuiners.

Euen ſo Suidas, vpon this word Δρυΐδαι, ſpeaketh thus. Druidæ qui & Semnothei Philoſophi Gallorum.

S. Clemens Alexandrinus maketh honorable mention of the Druides, and other Gauliſh Phyloſophers, ſaying. Philoſophie, moſt beneficiall and neceſſarie for Man, to guide and conduct to the path of Vertue, and the notice or knowledge of the Sciences: tooke her birth from the Druides, Gauliſh Phyloſophers. Whence the Greekes did deriue. Philoſophia res valde vtilis olim floruit apud Barbaros (it was a cuſtome with the Greekes, to baptize with the name of Barbarians, all ſtrange Nations, more ciuilized then themſelues, alwayes children) per gentes reſplendens; poſtea autem venit ad Græcos. Et autem præfuerunt Gallorum Druidæ, & Celtarum, ij qui Philoſophati phatis sunt. Non solius autem Philosophiæ, sed etiam omnium ferè artium fuerunt inuentores.

The whole scope of the Druides Studies.

Strabo writeth, that the Druides, beside the knowledge which they had in naturall things; practised also those Politicke and Morall. For they addicted all their Studies, to professe Vertue, and to auoide Vice, so that their Colledges were Seminaries and fruitfull Orchards, stored with men of knowledge, and of merit to gouerne an Estate. And so their Soules being pure and cleane from all soyle of sinne; it was not to be wondred at, that they became so capable of diuine secedes.

Ammianus Marcellinus, who had remained long time at Paris, and other places of the Gaules, with his Emperour Iulian the Apostata, vnder whom he serued as a Souldiour, and whose life he wrote; speaking of the Druides, with whom he had conferred very often, saith thus to their aduantage, concerning the Colledges of the Gaulish Priests. Inter hos Druidæ ingenijs celsiores, sodalitijs adstricti consortijs, quæstionibus occultarum rerum, altarumque erecti sunt, & despectantes humana pronunciarunt Animas Immortales. And this is no more then Cæsar said in his sixt Booke, formerly spoken of.

Great difference betwixt the Druides and Bardes or Diuiners.

The Druides, endowed with soules more sublime and exalted, then the Bardes and Diuiners, were assembled by Conuents and Colledges, lodging and dwelling together. They addicted themselues to the contemplation of secrets in Nature, and of Celestiall things; contemning humaine matters, as too lowe, and vnworthie of their meditation, which they mounted to a higher flight, to Heauen, and therefore they pronounced, that mens Soules were Immortall. Of them it was that Ouid spake.

Felices animæ quibus hæc cognoscere primis,
Inque domos superas scandere cura fuit.
Credibile est illos pariter vitijsque, ceiisque.
Altius humanis exeruisse caput.
Non Venus, aut Vinum sublimia pectora fregit.

And the Poet Lucane reporteth, that they onely were capable, of hauing perfect knowledge in all things, and to Philosophize, euen from the Phoenixe and Cedars of Libanus, to the Ante & Hisope. De Syderibus atque eorum motu, de Mundi ac Terrarum magnitudine, de rerum natura, de Deorum immortalium, vi, ac potestate disputant, & iuuentuti tradunt.

Strabo addeth hereto, that they assured themselues, that as the face of the Earth was purged by the vniuersall Deluge: euen so the same World, shall (one day) by a generall burning. And that the beliefe of this consuming, being the Doctrine of the Druides, was passed to the Greekes and Romaines.

Esse quoque in fatis reminiscitur affore tempus
Quo Mare, quo Tellus, correptaque regia Cœli
Ardeat, & Mundi moles operosa laboret.

Diodorus Siculus writeth, that the Gaules made such an account of the Druides for their great knowledge and good life; that they beleeued them to be descended from Heauen, and to participate with the Diuinitie. Druidas esse diuinæ naturæ consciosque, & tanquam Dijs propinquiores; horum intercessione bona à Dijs censent petenda. And that the more men had from the Druides, the more blessings they receiued from heauen, in far greater affluence and plantation of all goodnesse. And that their holy Prayers being carried vp to heauen, they heaped all benedictions and most happy life vpon Gaulish People, such was the opinion of Strabo. So that the Gaules, grounding certaine beliefe, on the sanctitie of the Druides, their Iudges and Sacrificers, it was no wonder, if they grew wealthy, & heaped vp treasures in the Colledges, which they had through all the parts of Gaule. For they had the charge and direction of youth, that was sent to them from all places, as to an assured Schoole of Pietie. The

The Orator Cicero maketh mention of Diuitiacus, one of the principall persons in the City of Anthune, because being a Druide; hee had perfect knowledge in things Supernaturall and Diuine, whereby he could presage and foretell matters to happen afterward. Diuitiacus ille Æduus, cum ex Druidis vnus esset, Naturæ rationem quam φυσιολογίαν Græci appellant, notam esse sibi profitebatur, & partim augurijs, partim coniectura, quæ essent futura dicebat. For they measured them by their Elle of Idolatry, of Auguries, and such follies: as another,

——— Interpres diuum qui numina Phœbi,
Qui tripodas, Clarij lauros, qui sydera sentis,
E volucrum linguas, & prapetis omnia penna.

And Tacitus to the same purpose, Sin permissum, Auspiciorum fides adhuc exigitur, & illud etiam hic notum, Aurium voces, volatusque inuestigare. But they gaue not themselues to such Sorceries, till after they were corrupted with the Demonomanie of the Romaines.

Now, for the Immortality of Soules, taught by the Druides to the Gaulish youth; it made them to contemne death, as Lucane obserueth.

——— Vobis auctoribus vmbræ
Non tacitas Erebi sedes, Ditisque profundi
Pallida regna petunt: Regit idem spiritus artus
Orbe alio longe, canitis si cognita, vitæ
Mors media est.

The Gaules beleeued the Resurrection.

So that the Gaules, filled with the faith of this Resurrection, had no feare at all of death; it being no more then a passage to immortality, and a life happy & tranquile in all eternity. And this was it that made them so couragious and valiant in War, holding it a note of great cowardise, to be sparing of the body, which was to rise againe.

——— Hos ille timorum
Maximus haud vrget Leti metus. Inde ruendi
In ferrum mens prona Viris, animæque capaces Mortis, & ignauum est reditura parcere Vitæ. Said the same Lucane.

The Gaules courage in going to Warre.

To this purpose is very obseruable, that which Ælianus, a Greeke Author reporteth, concerning the valiancie of the ancient Gaules, in his booke of Varieties. I vnderstand (saith he) that the Celtes (among all the Nations of the World) are the most prompt and ready, in exposing themselues to perills and hazards. They marche to the Warre Crowned with Garlands and Chaplets of Floures, as if they were going to a wedding. To conserue the memory of such as dye in Warre, they cause to bee composed by their Bardes, Hymnes and Songs, containing their praises. They make Trophees with the Armes of their conquered enemies, to leaue notes and enfignes of their valour to posteritie. They hold it for great shame and ignominie, to flie from dangers and dreadfull encounters; so that they will not shun houses which fall by age, no more then those that are consumed with fire, suffering themselues rather to be scorched and burned, then cowardly to flie away. Others, beholding the Sea angerly swelling, and mounting out of her bounds and limits; stand boldly to the bankes and shoares, as if they would force her backe againe into her bed, and ordinary Channell, by strength of their bodies. And others throw themselues couragiously into the midst of her sterne billowes, to grasp and restraine their fury; fighting against them with their drawne Swords, their Arrowes, Darts, and Iauelins. These are the very words of Ælianus.

The name of the Gaules dreadfull to the Romanes.

Polybius a Greeke Author hath left vs written, that the ancient Romanes, hauing seene the Gaules fight on the day of Plombine, and with inuincible courage; did so admire their Valiancie and generositie, that they reputed them to be the onely braue spirits of the habitable World. In like manner, this Nation was so dreadfull to the Romanes, after they heard Rome to be ransacked, and her Capitall; that at the least noyse of the Gaules arming themselues, the rumor (were it true, true, or but ſuppoſed) cauſed all the States of Rome, without exception of age or qualitie, immediately to enter Armes. The Prieſts and Sacrificers ſtood exempted by their habits, as much to ſay, from going to Warre: but if any one talked of the Gaules comming, then, they were no more priuiledged then the meaneſt of the people.

The Alemaignes or Germanes, brethren to the Gaules, and liuing vnder the ſame Lawes and Policie, held reſoluedly the Immortality of the Soule. Whereupon, Appianus Alexandrinus, ſpeaking of this Warre-like Nation, ſaith. The Germaine Nation is of wonderfull hardineſſe in Fights, holding great contempt of Death, by firme beliefe which they haue of the ſoules immortality, and the Reſurrection.

Tacitus alſo writeth, That they ſing when they march in Battale: Ituri in prælia canunt. For the Germanes had the ſame Religion as the Gaules, of the Druides and Bardes, contrary to that which Cæſar ſaith in the ſixt Booke of his Commentaries, ſpeaking vnaduiſedly, and without hauing beene there.

But Tacitus writeth otherwiſe, becauſe he had hanted & frequented them, as formerly we haue related ſomthing, concerning their Temples. They branched aloft & below on Trees, ſuch as ſled from, and forſook their rankes on the day of Battel: or elſe drowned them in ſome Marle or Lime-pits, throwing clay and earth on them, becauſe they ſhould no more be ſeene. And marching to the Warres, euen as the Gaules doe, they haue at the head of their Armie, Bardes, who ſing hymnes and ſongs, compoſed to honor the memory of hardie and v. liant Captaines, dying in the Warres: the Germanes and Gaules taking the Refret or burthen of the Song, ſing after the Bardes.

The Bardes ſing tongs marching in the Armie.

Tacitus in his Germania, ſaith: Sunt illis carmina, quorum relatu, (quem Barditum vocant) accendunt animos, futuræq; pugnæ fortunam ipſo cantu augurantur. The Gaules celebrate the memory of their Patriarche Gomer, whom they place chiefeſt in the number of their worthieſt. The Germanes in like manner, ſaith Tacitus, Fuiſſe apud eos Herculem memorant, primumque omnium virorum fortium. Of our Gauliſh Bardes the Poet Lucane writes.

Vos quoque qui fortes animas, belloque peremptas
Laudibus in longum Vates demittitis ævum, Plurima ſecuri fudiſtis carmina Bardi.

And the ſame Poet, ſpeaking of the excellency in knowledge of the Druides, wrote: That they onely were worthy and capable, to ſound and know the depth of the Diuine Eſſence.

Solis noſce Deos, & Cœli numina vobis
Aut Soles neſcire datum.

The Druides abiding in great Forreſts.

And that their dwelling was in the greateſt Forreſts.

Nemora alta remotis Incolytis lucis.

Onely he wanted, in deſcribing the Garments of the Bardes and Druides, and what faſhion they walked in the Cities of the Gaules. Yet hee inſtructeth vs, that the King, Numa Pompilius, had brought into the City of Rome, the Ceremonies of Temples without Idolls, and the Order of Prieſts and Sacrificers, deriued from the Gauliſh Druides. And according to their example, their high-Prieſt was daily cloathed with a Sotane or Caſſocke gowne of fine white Serge, guirded to him with a broad guilded Belte, and ouer that a Rochet of fine white Linnen cloth, with the Albo-Galerus. And that the other Prieſts (like vnto the Druides) had but onely the white Sotane, and white hood or Bonnet, differing neuertheleſſe from that worne by the Prince of the Druides; and on his head a Focquet of fine white ſilke, with Eare-lappes of the ſame, and ſomewhat reſembling the Manniples of our Biſhops Miters.

What maner of Habit the high Prieſt vſed to weare.

He

He had written, that in publique aſſemblies, and namely, of the Generall States of all the Gaules (which was kept at Chartres yeerely, the ſeuenth day of the firſt Moone in September) the Prince of the Druides, was carried by the chiefeſt of the Gauliſh Nobilitie, hee ſitting vpon a broad Shield (according as the Kings of the Gauliſh Prouinces did) exalted on their ſhoulders; and ſo they walked three times about the aſſembly, as we haue formerly ſaid.

The Prince of the Druides carried vpon mens ſhoulders.

That at all times, and ſo often as the ſame High Prieſt went in ſolemnity to the ſaid Aſſemblies, one carried before him (as a Scepter and note of Soueraigne power, belonging to the Prieſthood and Iudgement) A Hand of Iuſtice, fixed vpon a rod of Iuorie. And that in imitation of the Druides, this Hand of Iuſtice, and other notes of Soueraignty, were carried before the High Prieſt of the Ægyptians, as hath beene elſewhere already obſerued.

The Hand of Iuſtice carried before the high Prieſt.

Now, concerning the other Druides, they neuer went abroad in publique; but carried in a mouing Chariot, drawne by Oxen or Buffells, like to our Kings of the firſt Ligne. And the ſaid Chariot was couered with Basketting Wicker, wholly round, like to a Coach of the Antique faſhion; the fore-part and hind-part finiſhing like the Prow and Poope of a ſhip. The forme of this Coach is noted by Lucane, in the place before alleadged, and named Couinum.

How the other Druides vſed to bee ſeene in publicke abroad.

Et docilis rector Roſtrati Belga Couini.

And Tacitus telleth vs, that the Prieſts of the Romanes, called Flamines, and the Princeſſes and great Romane Ladies, had taken the practiſe, vſe, and faſhion of thoſe Coaches or Chariots of the Druides. Numa Pompilius (in like manner) granted the ſame Priuilege to the Veſtal Virgins. The Noble Hiſtorian Cornelius Tacitus in his Annales, ſaith: Suum quoque faſtigium Agrippina extollere altius, Carpento Capitolium ingredi, qui mos Sacerdotibus, & Sacris Druidibus communis, venerationem augebat fœminæ, quam Imperatore genitam, Sororem eius qui rerum potitus ſit, & Coniugem, & Matrem fuiſſe, monicum ad hunc diem exemplum eſt Which Tacitus admireth vpon iuſt reaſon, as a rare example, this Agrippina to be Daughter, Siſter, Wife and Mother of Emperors, which neuer was at any time ſeene in France, nor yet elſewhere.

Priuiledges of the veſtal Virgins to ride in Coaches.

Agrippina, daughter, ſiſter, wife, and mother of Emperors.

The Greekes in all their Hiſtories, haue obſerued but Lampedo of Sparta, who was Daughter, Wife, and Mother of a King, but not Siſter, Sonne, Brother, Vnkle, and Father to Kings of France, (without hauing beene King) was ſeene in the perſon of Monſieur Charles of France, Count of Valois, ſonne to Philip the Hardie, brother to Philip le Bell, Vnkle to Lewes Hutin, Philip le Long, and Charles le Bell, and Father to Philip de Valois, Kings of France.

And to very good purpoſe is this Text of Tacitus remarkeable, that the vſe of Coaches was not common then, as now at this preſent, when all is out of reaſon and order, and they ought to be permitted but to eſpeciall perſons. For then there was ſufferance but to high Prieſts, and Illuſtrious perſons, to enter into the Capitole, and the Imperiall Pallace Coached. From whence iſſued the cuſtome obſerued in the Courts of Kings and Princes, to enter (on horſe-backe, or in Caroſſe) the Court; which was neuer permitted in France, but onely to Princes and Princeſſes of the Blood Royall. An honour (ſince then) communicable to Princes Strangers, allied to the houſe of France; to the Conſtable, prime Officer of the Crowne, & to Cardinalls Legates in France. But now a-daies, all is confounded, without rule or any obſeruance (whatſoeuer) of the dignity Royall: euery one will carue with the Prince, and goe as his Peere.

Coaches not ſo common then as now in theſe daies.

The order for entring the Court of France.

That which the Romanes called Carpentum, the Gaules in their language tearmed Couinum: the olde Gloſſe Couinum, vehiculi genus cameratum, Galli ſua lingua Couinum appellabant. Thoſe Coaches were made after the modell of Gondolaes and boates for paſſage, whereof the Gaules made good ſeruice, for going to any place (neerer then otherwiſe) by water. And thoſe Gondolaes are called by Aulus Gellius, Galli, as particularly proper to the Gaules, and of their owne inuention, hauing the Prow and Poope diſcouered, to haue the Rowers or Watermen there placed, and the middle couered Arch-wiſe.

A Chariot vſed in Warre.

Of

Of this fashion were the Coaches of the Gaules, large and broad behinde, like the Poope of a Ship, and pointed before, like the spurre of a Prow, couered aboue in round wise, and in the middest onely. According to this modell, the Romanes made their Chariots for Warre, whereon their Knights fought stoutly; Cosinarius Eques, in the same Tacitus.

And as the Coaches and Chariots of the ancient Gaules, were built in forme of Stems and Gallies, Rostrata Cauna; so in like manner were their Hose and Shooes.

The hose and shooes of the ancient Gaules.

The Romanes vsed shooes the fashion whereof is seene in ancient Paintings and Medalls, leaning to the fashion of Espartignes, and shooes of cords, vsed in Spaine) which they called Soleas. Those of the Gaules were not couered with leather, but in the midst onely, the heele squared like halfe a Lozenge, and the toe pointed and raised, as in forme of a Spurre.

The Romane Ladies Pantofles.

The Romane Ladies doe yet weare their high Patines and Pantofles, couered and diapred, the point or toe rising in two hornes, and the heele in halfe a Lozenge. The Romanes gaue their name to their shooes, as well as to their Bonnets Galeri, so saith Varro. Pileus rotundus in modum Galeæ factus à Gallis inuentoribus dicitur Galerus, for it is Masculine, and Neuter. So their hose and shooes were called Galligæ, or this instant tearmed Galoches.

Cicero reprehendeth Marcus Antonius, because he disdained to habit himselfe Romane like, but went cloathed after the Gaulish manner, Cum Gallicis, & lacerna cucurristi. Aulus Gellius saith: Omnia ferme id genus quibus plantarum calces tantum infimæ tegantur, cætera prope nuda, & teretibus habenis vincta sunt, soleas dixerunt, non minus quam Græci Crepidulas. Gallicas autem verbum esse opinor nouum, non diu ante at tem Marci Ciceronis vsurpari cœptum.

Vpon the same subiect we may say, that the ancient Greekes, in steed of Goblets, Cups and Glasses; serued themselues with Cornets and Rams-hornes to drinke in, as is obserued by Athenæus and the learned Xenophon. But the Gaules had their Cups and Boules to drinke in, not made round and high; but long and Ouall-wise, in forme of a Shippe or Galley. Wherefore the Romanes called those Vessells Galeolæ, which we now at this day tearme Gondolues. Nonius Marcellus, Sinum & Galeola Vasa genus fuit. Varro. in his ancient liues of the Romane people, saith. Phœrat Pinum in Mosella positum, aut Galeola, aut Sinum. And from thence descended the ancient Verbe Gallique, that is to say; to drinke louially; to row in a good Galley like a Gaulois. The same Varro, cited by Nonius Marcellus, saith: Gallare est Bacchari Varro. Cum illo cantato, vtdeo Gallorum frequentiam in Templo, qui dum effert iam hora, Deam adhuc non potuerunt adis signo, & Deam Gallantes vario retinebant studio, &c. Now adayes, at the Tables of our Kings, Princes, and great Lords, the ancient custome is retained, to set at one end of them Shippes of Gold, or Siluer enammelled with Gold, and in them are placed Salts, Spoones, Forkes, Knines and Napkins, by example of the ancient Gaules, who euer made vse of such seruice, as a note and memorall of their ancient Originall.

The Order now adayes at great tables.

The Habit of the Druides.

Returning now to the Druides, they were clothed like to the Chanons Regulars, of S. Augustines Order at Paris, at S. Geneuiefue, S. Victor, S. Lazarus in the Suburbs of S. Denys.

Habit of the Bardes.

Poor Schollers

But concerning the Bardes, how they were distinguished from the Druides, by dwelling separated; so in like manner were they garmented. For the Bardes were cloathed poorely and simply, in a duskie or smoaky colour, euen of the same fashion and manner, as goe the Capettes of Montagu Colledge at Paris. For they haue a Cowle or Capouche close and strait, sowed to their Cassock, to couer them against the Ayres stormes and iniuries: and ouer that, their long Cloake or Houpe-land, without any coller, but tied with a Tach-hooke of wood. And because they of Xaintonge delighted to goe cloathed in the Bardes fashion, Martiall and other Latine Poets called them Santones Bardocucullatos.

Gallia Santonico vestit Bardo cucullo
Cercopithecorum penula nuper erat.

Yet to this day, not onely in Xaintonge, but in all the rest of Guienne, Gascoigne and and Languedocke; most part of the men goe cloathed in the naturall colour of the Minimes, (a light sootie colour, with an eye of grey in it) hauing sleeues to their Cloakes, and a little Cowle or Capouche, to thrust the head in.

Come we now to the Romanes Demonomany, brought into Gaule.

Cæsar in his Commentaries, supposed the Gaules (in his time) to adore Mercurie as the very principall and greatest of their gods, and to haue many Idolls and Images of him. They made him the inuenter of Arts, the guide and conducter to Merchants, and other men in their Voyages; because hee had the whole power of giuing riches, and all affluence of good things.

Cæsar his opinion of the Gaules gods.

After Mercurie, they worshipped Apollo, Mars, Iupiter, and Minerua: For Apollo healed Diseases, Minerua instructed in Workes and Trades; Iupiter held the Empire of the heauens, and Mars presided in fights and battels.

Bloody Sacrifices offred by the Gaules.

And adding to this first supposition of Idolatry, murder and slaughter; hee feigneth, that to all those imaginary and fantasticke Deities, the Gaules offered in bloody Sacrifice, liuing men of all qualities, innocent and faultie, good and wicked indifferently, according as the humor tooke them. Such (saith he) as they found afflicted with some incurable disease, exposing themselues boldly to dangers and hazards of the Warre; offered liuing men, in stead of Beasts for Sacrifice, or else made vowes to offer them.

In these Sacrifices they made vse of the Druides Ministery; as neuer beleeuing that the Maiesty of the immortall Gods, could and would recompence the life of one man, with that of another. This was, because they held publiquely Schools of such bloudy Sacrifices. Hee adethd moreouer (lye vpon lye) that the Gaules had Huge Idolls with liuing men in them.

Idolls of immeasurable greatnesse, made and composed of Oziers and Wickers, which they filled with liuing men, and then set them on fire, to burne them aliue, being stuffed with flame and smoake, and so consumed to ashes.

Offenders in high treason burn'd among the Gaules.

But Cæsar returning to truth, and the ancient Custome obserued amongst the Gaules, of burning malefactors publiquely, and principally the Criminalls in high Treason (as they would haue done as much to the pretended King of the Switzers, Orgetorix, if he had not bestowed death on himselfe) he saith, that the execution of them which had beene condemned to death for crimes; was a most acceptable oblation to the immortall Gods. Is not this conforme to the doctrine of the Old Testament, that is an agreeable worke to God, to wipe the wicked out of the Booke of Life, and to take them from off the face of the earth?

Cæsar maketh his conquest of the Gaules wonderfull to the Romanes.

Cæsar, for his owne aduantage, and to make his conquest of the Gaules more admirable to the Romanes, hath described the Gaules, wholly comparable to the inhumane Lestrigons. But instead of arming them with constancy and magnanimity, which are ordinary companions with the Queene of Vertues, Iustice; hee supposed them all to be died red in the bloud of their Citizens, especially in speaking of their Generall Assembly. For he saith in his fift booke, that Indiciomarus, hauing made an Assembly or generall Muster in Armes (which was, after the Gaules manner, an infallible note of commotion and ouuerture of warre) ordained by publique Cry, that all youthes (aged fourteene or sixteene yeeres) stood bound to appeare armed to their vttermost. And hee that came last, was to be massacred before the assembly in the same place, after he had beene first tortured with all torments, and the most cruell punishments that could be deuised.

The Gaules came armed to generall assemblies.

Most certaine it is, that the ancient Gaules went alwaies armed to the Generall Assemblies. Tacitus saith in his Germania: Vt Turba placuit, considunt armati. Titus Liuius, speaking of such Assemblies in his Romane History, saith. In his noua terribilisque species visa est, quod armati (ita mos gentis) in consilium venerunt. A Gaule could neuer be taken without a sword by his side, his Lance or Iauelin in his hand. At feasts and banquets, as going about their very meanest affaires, Tacitus. Tum ad negotia, nec minus sæpe ad conuiuia procedunt armati. Their seruants following their Maisters, were it in the hall of banqueting, carried Shield, Lance, and other Armes of their Masters. Athenæus saith in his Dypnosophists: That going to their Temples, the place of all assurance, they went Armed. And the Panegyrist said, Maiores vestri hæc Templa ingrediebantur, nisi armati.

The Gaules went armed about all their affaires.

In

The Gaules born to be warriours.

In briefe, this Nation declared in all their actions; that they were generous, warre-like, inured and fashioned to manage Armes. In the generall Estates, they approued the sayings of their Prince, by the clattering of their Armes. Si Principis sententia placuit, frameas concutiunt: Honoratissimum assensus genus est, armis laudare; Striking the Steele of their Lances on their Shields, saith Tacitus in his Germania. And in his Annales, speaking of the Oration of Ciuilis, he saith. Vbi sono armorum, tripudysque (stabilis mos) approbata sunt dicta. They exalted their Princes and Generalls of Armies, vpon broad Shields, so soone as by the resultation of the generall Assembly, they were declared to be such. And the same Tacitus saith againe. Brinno Impositus Scuto (more Gentis) & sustinentium humeris vibratus Dux eligitur. At their reception, or (to speak better) their eleuation, the Gaulish Nobility take their Oath of fidelity to them, vpon their Armes: A custome kept by the ancient French as Cassiodorus hath obserued. Iudicamus Parentes nostros inter procinctuales gladios (more maiorum) Regalem constituisse dignitatem. And the Bishop of Poictiers, Fortunatus, who liued vnder the Kings of our first Ligne, in his Epithalamium of Chilperick and Golsinda of Spaine.

Vtque fidelis erit, gens armata per arma
Iurat, iure suo se quoque lege ligat.

But that the Gaulish Nation, so milde and so benigne, euen toward Strangers, should be so cruell against their owne bloud, in an age so tender as fifteene or sixteene yeeres; this must needs stand out of all beleefe. Resembling (to speake vprightly) the Tales of the Storke, whereof Plinie speaketh in his Naturall Historie, reciting their meeting. These Creatures (saith he) assembled together yeerely in the Moneth of August, and in a wilde field of Asia, called Pithon, to conceiue (from thence) the drinesse of other Countries beyond Thrace: and after they haue held among them some forme of Councell, the last Storke that came to the Rendevous, is torne in peeces by all the rest. Pythonos Comen vocant in Asia patentibus campis, vbi congregatæ, inter se murmurant. Eam denique, quæ nouissimæ aduenit, lacerant, atque ita abeunt.

Diodorus Siculus, and the Geographer Strabo, well-neere Contemporanes together, and who did (more diligently then Cæsar) obserue the Gaulish customes; toucheth not so much as one word of this cruelty. Indeed the latter of the two saith, that at publique Diets, he who first shall interrupt and trouble the Assembly, by importune discourse, hearing him that proposeth the Herald, or Vsher of the doore, menaceth him with his sword drawne, to aduise him to be silent: which if he reiterate to the third time, and perceiue his aduertisements vnprofitable; hee cutteth from his Cassocke or Mandillion, such a lappet, as the rest shall remaine vn-vseable to him, a note of ignominie, for hauing no better brideled his tongue, when he had most need.

A good note for barbarous babblers.

And yet notwithstanding, there are Authors, who haue credited the Gaules to be armed with all cruelty. For Lucane painteth their supposed gods, with humane blood, in stead of Cynoper & Vermillion, a colour wherewith the Romans would disfigure their Idolls on the daies of great feasts, as we vnderstand by Plinie. Lucane giueth to the Gaules, these imaginary Gods.

Et quibus immitis placatur sanguine diro
Tentates, horrensque feris altaribus Hesus
Et Taranis Scythicæ non mitior ara Dianæ.

AN Opinion followed by Lactantius Firmianus, in his Diuine Institutions: whereunto we may answere in the same manner, as Plutarch did in the life of Pelopidas. That such abhominable, cruell, and barbarous Sacrifices, were neuer acceptable to any of the gods, or to any Essence, better or more powerfull then ours. Considering that there are no Typhons or Gyants, who haue the domination of the world: But the onely All-mighty, who is the Father of Gods and Men. And to thinke that that there be gods or demy-gods, that can delight themselues with murder, and effusion of bloud of men, vndoubtedly is a meere folly. But if it were so, there is no other account to be made of them, but of such as haue not any power: For it is the signe of a base and wicked soule, when it shall imprint in it selfe such strange and vngracious appetites, and let them dwell there still.

Cæsar deceiu'd in the Gaules Originall.

But like as Cæsar (trusting to other mens reports) was grossely mistaken in that matter, which concerned the Religion of the ancient Gaules; euen so hath he dealt in the case of their Originall, writing thus: Galli omnes a Dite patre se prognatos reputant: All the Gaules deriue their Originall from Father Dis. The Romanes called Pluto god of Hell, the Rich Father, Ditem Patrem, Father of Wealth and riches, because the Mines created by the Sun and Moon, are drawn from the fruitful wombe of the earth.

Effodiuntur opes irritamenta malorum.

Cæsar, to vnderprop his opinion with some apparant reason, alleadgeth afterward; That the Gaules had learned such beleefe of the Druides. Idque a Druidibus proditum dicunt. Next he alleadgeth the custome vsed by the Gaules, of accounting by nights, and not by daies. Ob eam causam spatia omnis temporis, non numero dierum, sed noctium finiunt, & Dies natales, & Mensium, & Annorum initia sic obseruant, vt Noctem Dies subsequatur; The Night preceded the Day.

How the Druides counted their yeares & moneths.

According to the diuersitie of Climates, Moneths, Dayes, and Yeares haue had diuers beginnings. The wise Druides began their yeeres, and counted their Moneths by Nights, and not by dayes: in the same manner as the Iewes did, who had their yeares of two fashions; the vulgar or the Naturall for one, and the other was called Legall, or holy.

Of the Legall or sacred yere.

This last named, began at the Equinoctiall of the Spring time, in the Moneth of March, which they called Nisan, according as God had commaunded the great Law-giuer Moyses in Exodus 22.17. when the Israelites departed from the bondage of Ægypt, to prepare towards the Land of Chanaan, which was promised them. This Equinoctiall entred it selfe, the fourteenth day of the Moone of March, vpon which day the Iewes celebrated the Feast of Easter. But at this present the Equinoctiall of the Spring (when the dayes begin to exceed the nights in length) falleth not but about the twentieth of March, since the reformation of the Calender, made by Pope Gregory the 13. the yeere of Grace, 1581.

At what time the Æquinoctiall entred, by the Iewish account.

And like as the Hebrewes began their yeeres by the Moneth of March, and of September: so likewise were their Moneths Lunary, diuided into thirteene Moneths, and baptized by these names: Nisan, Iiar, Siuan, Tammuz, Ab, Elul, Tizri, Marchesuan, Kisleu, Tebet, Sheuet, Adar and Veadar. Marche, Aprill, May, Iune, Iuly August, September, October, Nouember, December; Ianuary and February, first and second.

The names of the Months according to the Hebrewes.

How many daies the Solarie yeere contained.

For, because the Solarie yere had three hundred sixty fiue daies and sixe houres, which redoubled foure times, maketh from foure to foure yeeres, a naturall day of foure and twenty houres, from whence ensueth the Bissextile; and, accounting by Moones, there are onely three hundred fifty and foure daies, by reason of allowing twenty eight daies for each Moone: the Hebrewes made from three to three yeeres, a thirteenth Moneth, which they Intercalled and made it of thirty daies.

A thirteenth moneth made by the Hebrewes.

The Intercalary Moneth was called Ve-Adar, the second Moneth of February, because it had place betweene Adar and Nisan, February and Marche. And as for the Moneths of Marche, May, Iuly, September, Nouember and Ianuary; they were of thirty dayes, and the other but nine and twenty. So by the meanes of this Intercalary Moneth, the Lunary or Moone yeere, equalled that of the Sunne: and the first day of the Moone of Marche, made the principall, and the beginning of the Sacred or holy yeere.

The Moone yeere equalled the Sun yeare.

The yeere Ciuill or Vulgar, began the first day of the Moone, properly termed the 6. Moone, because the Moones intermingled themselues one vpon another.

The beginning of the Vulgar yeere.

The seuerall names of December.

This Moneth, or rather Moone of December, was named by the Hebrewes Tebet; by the ancient Gaules Kimerinon, and by the Germanes, Haleg-Monacht, that is to say, The Holy Moneth, as wee learne by venerable Bede, in his booke of Times; where he saith: The Ancient Germanes named the Moone Monaon, and by Almanish aspiration, Monacht, Princesse of the Night, who began their yeare at the Solstice of Winter, in the moneth of December, which they called Sacred or Holy, because therein were performed their solemne Sacrifices, for a good beginning of the yeere. That the Moneth of Aprill was called (by them) Easter-Monacht, the Moneth of Reioycing: in remembrance that they came to their Lands in the said Moneth of Aprill.

The ancient Gaules celebrated ioyfully the moneth of March.

Which they had retained and kept from such time as they dwelt in the Gaules. For the ancient Gaules celebrated (with all reioysing) the Moneth or Moone of March, which they had baptized with the name of their Gaulish Hercules, the Patriarch Gomer, and which they called Ogmion, in memory and remembrance of this, that at departing from the Land of Sennaar, after floating long on the Ocean Sea; they were arriued (in a good port) on the Coasts of Armorica, in the Moneth of March.

December, the beginning of the Gaules yeere.

And as for the Moone or Moneth of December, beginning the vulgar yeere of the Gaules: this Moneth was called by the Romanes, Mensis brumalis, during which Moneth, the Sea would be troubled and tossed with vnruly billowes and tempests, which made it vn-nauigable; except at such time as the gentle Halcyons brought forth their young.

The Druides gather Misselloe, and send it to all their Colledges.

The Gaules called this Moneth of December, A Sacred Moneth, because in it the wise Druides gathered the Misseldine, or Missell-toe of the Oake in great Ceremonie, and deuided it (as a New-yeeres Gift) and beginning of the yeere, to the people. From whence ensued the ancient Prouerbe, which yet we retaine to this very day; With the Missell-toe, comes the New yeere, Ad viscum Annus nouus: For, after that the Prince of the Druides had gathered, blessed, and consecrated the Missell-toe; he imparted it to all the Colledges of the Druides: by command of whom, the Bardes went from City to City, and from one Towne to another, to proclaime the beginning of the yeere to the people. Because they were to come and receiue the Missel-toe, (which they called Panacreston) as a Catholicon and remedy for all euils. And vpon this subiect was alleadged this verse, which is generally reported to be Ouids.

Ad viscum Druidæ, Druidæ clamare solebant,

A notable custome yet obserued in Picardie.

This ancient custome is yet kept in diuers of the Prouinces of France, so that in the night of the euening for the yeere, the children go crying through all the streets, At Missell-toe Tide, comes the New-yeeres Bride, by a kinde of corrupted speaking, The New yeeres Missell-toe. In Picardie, where are kept more particularities of the Gaules ancient customes, then in any Prouince of France, the children after they haue cried, At Missell-toe tide comes the New-yeres Bride, they adde this ancient French word, Plantè, Plantè, that is to say, Plenty, Plenty, or a yeere abounding and fertile in all good things; words deriued from the Prayer of the ancient Druides, where they wished the People all affluence of good things.

The addition of Bourgongne.

In Bourgongne they adde, That God would send them a rich and plentifull yeere, with a long circumlocution and Bead-roule of words, which are trucked vp in one word by the Picard, Plewie.

The

The Missell-toe of the Oake, was called by the Greekes (who learned it of the Gaules) ἰξος, the vertues and singularities whereof are noted by Galen in his Medicamentorum simplicium; by Plinie, and by Dioscorides. This hearbe or simple is alwaies greene, especially in the very strongest of Winter, when his graines are ripe and yellow as gold, as Virgill enstructeth vs.

Quale solet syluis Brumali tempore Viscum
Fronde virere nouâ, quod non sua seminat arbos.

Three kindes of Missell-toe.

There are three kindes of Missell-toe, for it increaseth and groweth on Oakes; as the most hard and branchie Oake; the holme, or barren Skarlet Oake, and on the wilde Ballace and Turpentine trees, for it is seldome seene on any other Trees.

The strange growing of the Missel-toe

The Missell-toe neuer commeth by seede, nor planting, but groweth maruellously by the dung of Ring-doues, or Wood-coysts, and of Thrushes or Feldi-fares who are fed therewith; for it neuer sprowteth or buddeth, till it be first mortified in the bellyes of Birds: It neuer exceedeth a Cubit in length; is alwayes greene, and very branchie. The Male beareth Seedes or Graines, but the Female none: and the best is onely that, which is gathered on old hard Oakes, called strong Oakes, in Latine Robora.

The great account made of the Oake by the Druides.

Pliny in his Naturall Historie sayth, The Druides, who are the Priests and Sacrificers of the Gaules, esteeme nothing in the World more rare and singuler, nothing more Diuine and Holy, then the Missell-toe, and the Tree whereon it groweth: prouided neuer beleese, that it be an hard Oake. Therefore they made choyce of Oaken Forrests, and neuer offered any Sacrifice, but with the branches of his Tree. All things which grew on those Oakes, were reckoned by them as things sent from heauen; and they held it for an vndoubted beleefe, that this Tree was acceptable to the Diuinity, and especially elected to be honoured.

The Missell-toe (saith he) is very difficult to be found; but hauing discouered it, the Druides keepe it most religiously. For the Moone (of necessity) hath sixe daies (according to the Moone they establish the beginning of their Moneths and their yeares, making their Ages of fiftie yeares. The Moone then hauing sixe daies, and mounting to her force, they prepare to gather the Missell-toe of the Oake, which in their language they call Panchreston; Omnias sanans, An Antidote and Remedy against all harmes.

This was the liuely image of the Worlds Sauiour, extended vpon the Crosse, made and carpented of Oake, the true Missell-toe, whereby all our infirmities are healed; for he is the Author of Life, and the onely Physician for our aduersities. So Lactantius Firmianus maketh him deciphered and described, by the Sybilla πᾶσαν ἰάσιν σημαίνουσα. A Medicine for all euills, and the Christians saluation.

Bread and Wine in the Druides Sacrifice.

Plinie continueth on further yet, saying. At the foote of this aged Oake, was an Altar erected, whereon, in Sacrifice and solemne Festiuall, The Prince of the Druides offered and blessed Bread and Wine. And when the Sacrifice was ended, they brought (moreouer) two yong Buls, all white, which had neuer bin subiected to the yoake of labour: they were coupled together, and reserued for a Sacrifice and Oblation, after the gathering of the Missell-toe.

The Druides generall Procession.

But this Author hath let slip in silence, that before the gathering of the Missell-toe; the Prince of the Druides, assisted with his Colledge, the King, the Princes of the Gaules, and the People, went in generall Procession: according to the equipage and order, described as well by Diodorus Siculus, Ælianus, S. Clemens Alexandrinus, and Apuleius; as by the Ceremonies which the Ægyptians, Greekes, and Romaines had deriued and borrowed from the Druides, as well as their learning.

The order and manner of the Druides Procession.

First, the Eubages and Diuiners went formost, leading the Buls for Sacrifice. These were followed by the Bardes, singing the Canticles of reioycing and praise, with thankesgiuing to the diuine Essence. After them next marched the Schollers, imitated in the mysteries of the Druides, who followed in their due order. After them went an Herald, or King at Armes, all alone, cloathed in white (like vnto the Druides) his hat or bonnet likewise white, whereunto were two wings fastened, and a Caduceus in his hand. Those wings (according to Clemens Alexandrinus) shewed the diligence which his Office imposed on him. Alæ sunt ministeria, & operationes tiones sublimes dexterarum simul, & sinistrarum potestatum. For these Heralds were true Interpreters of their Princes secrets; who, vpon the fidelity of their Relations, resolued themselues for Peace or Warre. The Caduceus which the Herald carried in his right hand, was a branch of Verueine, writhed into the shape of two serpents, ioyned together by symmetry and proportion: not for the fables subiect inuented by the Greekes (as hardie lyers, as theeues of ceremonies, and other mens doctrine) as, to their reproach, the same Clemens Alexandrinus speaketh of them; because they attributed the inuention thereof, to their pretended Mercurie.

The Heralds Office belonging to the Druides.

The Caduceus was the inuention of our Sacred Druides, according to the testimonie of Plinie in his Naturall Historie, speaking there of the said Druides. Hic complexus Anguium, & efferatorum concordiæ causa videtur exteræ Gentes Caduceum in Pacis argumentis circumdatâ effigie Anguium fecerint. Neque enim cristatos esse in Caduceo mos est. And the King of Armes going before the Prince of the Druides, gaue thereby to vnderstand, that the authoritie of the said Prince depended on Peace and Warre; for the one and the other could not be resolued, but by his appointment, as we haue already said.

The three Sacrificing Druides in their Offices.

After the King of Armes came three auncient men, the most venerable of the Druides, all equally together. The first of them carried the Challice and Cruet of Wine; He next to him, Bread for the Sacrifice; And the third, the hand of Iustice, called The Cubite of Iustice, Cubitum Iustitiæ. These three Sacrificers were followed by the Prince of the Druides, who went alone, cloathed in a white Cassocke, and ouer it an Albe of fine Linnen, girded with a broad Girdle or Belt of Gold, and a white Bonnet on his head, with Tassels of white Silke, and the Fanons (hanging behinde) of the same. If the King were in the Prouince, he went along with the Druides Prince; followed by the Nobilitie, and all the People in traine.

The Prince of the Druides his habite.

How the Druides Prince gathere I the Mistl-toe.

The Prince of the Druides being thus cloathed, as we haue said, ascended vpon the Tree, and with a Sickle of Gold, tooke and cut the Misselt-toe: which the other Druides (cloathed likewise in white Linnen Albes) receiued in a faire white Napkin, or Table-cloath. Sacerdos candida veste cultus, arborem scandit, falce aurea demetit, candido excipitur sago; so saith Plinie, holding on still the thred of this Ceremonie. Which being done the Buls were Sacrificed, and the Prince of the Druides made The generall Benediction: entreating the Diuine bountie, that the gift which they receiued from his liberall hand, might be beneficiall and profitable to the Gaulish people. The Misselt-toe serued as an Alexypharmacum, and a soueraigne mischiefe-expeller, against all kindes of poysons: and being taken in drinke by women barren, and vnfruitfull creatures; it made them plentifull and fertile. Fœcunditatem eo poto dare cuicumque animali sterili arbitrantur. And this was the reason, why in saying: At Misselt-toe tyde, comes the new yeares Bride, the word of Plentie, Plentie was added. Which was (moreouer) obserued, in sending (from one to another) the leaues of the Misselt-toe of the Oake; as a good New-yeares gift on the first day of the yeare. And that was pleasantly obserued by one of our French moderne Poets.

In stead of Chaine, or Gold-Ring, I commend
To you this New-yeares morning (deerest Friend)
This tender Slip of the Oakes Misselt-toe:

Ist not a rich Gift, to be giuen so?
This forme of giuing was not bred by me,
The wise old Druides, famous for memorie,
This day made it their gift of good presage,
I wish this louing token like in comperage.
That as the Leaues make Glew, and fast combine:
Euen so your heart (as fast) may knit to mine.

The Poet made his allusion to the Misselt-toe, whereof the Glew or Lime is made, which for the catching of small Birds serueth very necessary: the manner whereof is noated by Virgill.

Tum laqueis captare Feras, & fallere Visco
Inuentum: & magnos: & magnos Canibus circumdare saltus.

In like manner the Romaines, the first day of their yeare, with their other gifts, which they sent from one to another (instead of the Oakes Misselt-toe) sent the leaues and branches of Verueine: a custome practised from the time of Tatius, King of the Sabines, as we learne by Symmachus: Ab exortu penè Vrbis Martiæ Strenarum vsus adoleuit auctoritate Tatij Regis, qui Verbenas fœlicis arboris, ex Luco Strenia Anni noui auspices primus accepit. And in his imitation, the Emperour Augustus receiued the new yeare of the Romaines, the first day of the yeare.

As concerning the branches of Verueine, which Symmachus (after the Romaine manner) called The happie Tree; the Romaines (in memorie of King Tatius) called them not Verueine, but Sabine, without which they offred not any Sacrifice. And yet at the first rising of their City, they sacrificed nothing else but Verueine onely, as it is obserued by Ouid.

The Verueine called Sabine.

Ara dabat fumos herbis contenta Sabinis:
In sacris nullum culter habebat opus.

Which Numa Pompilius, the Author of such vnbloody Sacrifices, had deriued from the doctrine of the Druides; whose King of Armes (as wee haue formerly said) carried his Caduceus of Verueine, which was in as great esteeme for the singuler vertue, and admirable properties thereof; as the Plant Baaras, so celebrated by the learned Iew Iosephus. And this was the reason, why the diuine Druides gathered it with the same Ceremonies, as they did the Oakes Misselt-toe. They are noated by Plinie (who scarsely comprehended the misteries, either of the one or other, hauing his eyes sealed vp with grosse ignorance, by being fleshed against the blood of Christians, during the persecutions of Domitian and Traian) in his Naturall Historie. Similis est huic herbæ Sabinæ Selago appellata. Legitur sine ferro, Dextra manu Sinistræ superpositâ, modo furcæ, Flamine candida veste vestito, purè lotisque pedibus, & Sacro, Pane, Vinoque, facto, priusquam legatur: Fertur in mappâ nouâ. Hanc contra omnem pernitiem habendam prodidere Druidæ Gallorum, & contra omnia oculorum vitia fumigationem eius prodesse.

To the Verueine is altogether like and conforme, that which wee call* Sauine. It is gathered without any Iron instrument, hauing the right hand interlaced and put vpon the left, in forme of a Saulter. The Priest being (before) cloathed in a fine white Albe, purifieth his soule, washeth his feete to be neate and cleane: offreth the Sacrifice of Bread and Wine, and after, maketh the Hearbes gathering, which is put into a faire white Table-cloath. The Druides great Sacrificers among the Gaules, strongly held: that it had power to chase away all mischances, all impostures, illusions and sorceries.

And not those of the Mexicanes, be-smeared with humaine blood, according to the opinion of Cæsar: vnder whose name, his Secretarie Iulius Celsus, hath, ſuppoſed a thouſand lyes and tales, in his Commentaries of the Gauliſh Warres. Which hath bin obſerued by Suetonius, in the life of that great Captaine. That Cæſar himſelfe, acknowledging his imperfections, had reſolued to new-cloath his Commentaries, and to correct the ſuppoſitions which hee had there inſerted: as well in regard of his owne fleeting memorie, as hauing (ouermuch) truſted to heare-ſay, and other mens reports. Parum diligenter, parumque integrâ veritate compoſitos fuiſſe hoſce Commentarios; quum pleraque, & quæ per alios erant geſta, temerè crediderit, & quæ per ſe, aut conſulto, vel etiam memoriâ lapſus, perperam ediderit.

The Druides being infected corrupted the people with Demonomany

It is then to be held for infallible and certaine, that the Romaines brought their Demonomanie into Gaule, wherewith the Druides once infected; corrupted the people: taking for pretended Deities, ſuch things as beſt anſwered to their Martiall and warlike nature, and thereby ſuſceptible of all kindes of Science, as well as mechanicall Arts. But it is to be noated, that thoſe ſuppoſed Gods were not in the Gauliſh Temples repreſented after the Romaine manner: but according to thoſe effects, which the Druides iudged conuenient for them.

Venus the goddeſſe of generation.

For, to begin with the Idole of Venus, the pretended Goddeſſe of Generation; the Greeke and Romaines preſented her vpon a triumphall Chariot, accoaſted with three graces, Venus and they ſtarke naked, and crowned with Mirtle; a ſhrub greene at all times, and the Symbole of Loue.

Populus Alcidæ gratiſſima, Vitis Iacchо:
Formoſæ Myrthus Veneri, ſua Laurea Phœbo;

The Latine Poet ſaid; That Hercules was crowned with Poplar; Bacchus with Vine leaues; and cluſters of Grapes; Apollo with Laurell; and immodeſt Venus with Mirtle. Pauſanias writeth, that the Greekes did crowne their Venus with a Chaplet of Roſes, and that the three Carites or Graces (her aſſociates by her) the one held a little Bone, the ſecond a branch of Mirtle, and the third a Roſe. Poets haue feigned, that (of their owne nature) Roſes were white, before the death of the Minion Adonis, torne by a Boare in hunting: but Venus at the blaſt of thoſe ſad tydings, vnprouided of hoſe or ſhooes, as then ſhe was; ran ſwiftly to helpe him, and in her running, her feete being rent with thornes and briers, it gaue to the Roſe a Vermillion tincture.

How the white Roſe became red.

The Gaules emblazoned farre otherwiſe Venus (whom they tooke as the marke or Symbole of Generation) and her Graces. For they preſented them in a Baſtile, fortreſſe, or grated donion, not naked, as the Greekes and Romaines: but antiquely cloathed in Robes of courſe cloath, after the Countrey faſhion, with face, hands, and feete veiled or couered, their heads crowned with Garlands, compoſed of all kindes of floures except the Roſe, which the wiſe Druides held for the Hieroglyphicke of immodeſt Loue.

How the Gauls preſented their Venus and her graces

The picture of a wife and good Woman.

The donion wherein they were ſhut vp, declared that the vertuous and well nurtured woman, ſhould keepe her feete within her houſe, thinking vpon her houſhold (without gadding daily here and there) as the Apoſtle wiſhed her to be Domus Custodem. For in figuring a wiſe Woman, they figured a Tortoiſe vnder her feete (a creature which neuer leaueth her houſe) and a Dogge ſtanding by her, the emblеme of faithfulnes. Moreouer, the grated or lattiſed donion, ſignified Matron-like modeſtie, which ſhe ought to keep carefully all her life time, according to the end & intent of marriage.

——Natis Venus Alma creandis
Seruiat, hos fineis tranſilyſſe nocet.

This chaſtitie was obſerued in our Gauliſh Women, Pauciſſima in tam numeroſa gente Adulteria, nec corrumpere, aut corrumpi ſæculum vocabatur. So ſaid the noble Hiſtorian Tacitus. It was not then, as now at this preſent in Women, giuen ouer to all whoredome and diſſolution: be it Man or Woman, no other anſwere is returned, but this; Such is the World, Scculum vocatur; youth muſt needes haue haue his paſſage. This falſe Coine had no currencie, in the time of the ancient Gaules, as we haue ſaid.

The face, hands and feete couered, repreſented modeſty, with honeſt ſweete-fac'd ſhame, which the married wife ought to be carefull of, in her ſpeech, touching and treading, meaſuring her paces by the Elle of modeſty and grauitie both together. Nothing was to be diſcouered, becauſe (as Plutarch ſaid, to very apt purpoſe) The Wife putting off the garment neereſt to her body, diſpoyleth her ſelfe of all ſhame and modeſtie. The Roabe of plaine and courſe cloath, figured the trauaile and care of houſekeeping, and that in her cloathing, ſhe ought to be decently modeſt: like to a woman of honour, and not as a bold faced Courtizane, daily fitting her ſelfe with new deuiſed paintings, to make her ſeeme beautifull outwardly, hauing a ſoule worme-eaten with all vices and ſinnes within, like vnto poliſhed Sepulchers. The Crowne of all kindes of floures, pleaſing to the ſinell, and goodly to looke on, expreſſed, that the principall paintings and guildings of an honorable woman, are the loue of her husband, good enſtruction of her children in feare and pietie; her care for houſekeeping, ſeldome ſpeaking, honor of her actions, and modeſty in her carriage. Theſe are ſuch Odours and perfumes, wherewith ſhee ſhould be ſweeted; yet there were no Roſes, that is to ſay, immodeſt allurements, to charme men withall, and attract them by the behauiour of Courtizanes: Becauſe the end of ſuch Syren Enchauntreſſes, is euermore deplorable, wofull and vnfortunate. Such women are deſcried like to falſe Coine, expoſed to the worlds coſenage and mockery, deſpiſed and contemned, as paſſant Roſes, becomming like Heps growing on the wilde Brier.

The difference betweene a good woman and a bad.

The reaſon why there were no Roſes in the Crown or Garland.

The Idole of Apollo (in the following Tract, we ſhall ſee that of pretended Mars) which repreſented the bright eye of the world, the Sunne; had a great head, thickly buſhed and tufted with haire, entoured with beames, the face beardleſſe, like vnto a youth, the mouth open, euen as if he would ſpeake. In his right hand he held a Lyre with ſeauen cords or ſtrings, and a Cornucopia or Horne of abundance in the left. A Creſcent or halfe Moone couered both his knees, his breſt thrickly parſemed with Starres, and his feete fixedly planted on a Bowe in Heauen, bending Boulewiſe. Thus the Gaules figured Apollo, with his effects and miſteries; as willing thereby to make knowne, that it was nothing elſe, but as appeareth by this morall deſcription.

The Idole of Apollo, figuring the Sunne, deſcribed.

The Sunne, the Moone and Starres fixed beneath his Circle, haue no other light or ſplendour, but that which they borrow from him. And the ſame Sunne, although it be the goodly eye of the world, and the flaming luminous Planet of Heauen, ſo preſented by the colour Celeſtiall and Azure, whereof this Idole was compoſed: yet notwithſtanding, he was (in part) tarniſhed or diſcoloured, his brightneſſe and luſter couered and obſcured, by the gloomy and obſcure body of the Moone, vpon this occaſion painted (face to face) with his head. That the ſame Sunne, by the attractiue power of his rayes or beames, diſſipated miſts, fogs and cloudes, motiues of Raine: figured by the Bowe in Heauen of diuers colours, and by that meanes, illuminating the whole round frame of the world. His Lyre or Harpe with ſeauen ſtrings, repreſented the hermonious motion of the ſeauen Heauens, knowne by the name of the ſeauen Planets. Iuſtly in the midſt of them was the Sunne planted, to impart his light to them, and by their courſe equally ordained, the ſeaſons of the yeare had their conuenient times and propitious, for yeelding to the hoſtes of this terreſtriall world, plentie and abundance of all good things, obſerued by the Horne of Abundance.

The moral application or meaning of the Idole of the Sunne.

The Raine-Bowe fixed in Heauen.

The Sun placed in the middeſt of the ſeauen Planets.

S. Gregory Victor, Archbiſhop of Toure, in his Hiſtory of France writeth, that Chrocus, King of the Alemaignes (which were the Sweues) went to forrage Gaule; and paſſing through Auuergne, he burned the Temple, which the Galates (in their materiall tongue) called by the name of Vaſſo, about the yeare of Grace two hundred and foureſcore; the ſixt of Pope Eutichianus his Pontificacie, and ſecond of the Empire of Probus. Chrocus Alamannorum Rex, commoto exercitu, vniuerſas Gallias peruagatur, ciuitaſque edes, quæ antiquitus fabricatæ fuerant à fundamentis ſubuertit. Veniens vero Auernos delubrum illud quod Gallica lingua Vaſſo Galatæ vocant, incendit, diruit, atque ſubuertit.

This

Two especial things to be obserued.

This passage of our most auncient French Historian, is worthy singuler obseruation, for two things. The one, for the liuely description of the principall Temple in Auuergne. And the other, to shew, how likely it was, that the Gaules (whom this Romaine Authour, issued of a famous house, descended from Senatours, and allied to the Romaine Emperours) called Galates, as did S. Hierome, that worthy cleare light of the Church, hauing for their mother tongue, that which vnfitly was called Greeke. To this passage may be added an other of the same Author, concerning foure Letters added to the French Alphabet, by King Childericke: as the Emperour Claudius made addition of three to the Romaine Alphabet, according to the testimonie of Tacitus. This is spoken, to cause them enquire, that are of a contrary opinion.

S. Gregory of Tours a Roman by birth

As concerning this Temple Vasso, which some haue thought to be that of Polignac in Auuergne: Gregory of Tours maketh the Topographie, in these words. Miro opere factum fuit, atque firmatum, cuius paries duxplex erat. Ab intus enim deminuto lapide, à foris vero quadris sculptis fabricatum fuit. Habuit enim paries ille crassitudinem pedes treginta, Intrinsecus vero marmore, ac musiuo variatum erat. Pauimentum quequedis, marmore stratum, desuper vero plumbo tectum. This Temple (saith S. Gregorie) was built of proud structure, for it was double walled. That within was of small stone, and that without was of great Quarrie, all squared, and this Wall had thirtie foote in thicknesse. The wall within was spotted or in-laied with Marble, and pieces painted with Mosaicall worke, diuersly colored with Floures and Animales: The Pauement was in like manner of Marble, and the roofe couered quite ouer with Lead.

A description of the Temple in Auuergne.

The Mountaine of Polignac.

Polignac (a Vicountie, and most auncient Noble house) is on a Mountaine of meane height, betweene S. Floure, Clermont in Auuergne, and Velay on the side of the great French high-way: on the top whereof was built a Temple in the honour of Apollo. This mountaine is round engirt with other hils, whereon likewise were erected Temples, dedicated to pretended Gods and Goddesses of the Romans: but much inferiour to that of Apollo, and of meaner expences.

A great Tower seated on Poignac.

Vpon this of Polignac, is a great Tower, square on the one side, and neere thereto (heretofore) was a very auncient Temple, inwardly pargetted with small stones, depicted and coloured in the Mosaicall manner: but so excellently cimented and Masonned, as it was impossible (in an whole dayes space) to get forth a handfull. At the place where the head of this Idole was fixed, there is now a Crosse fastened to the Wall: because the Villagers of Velay, ascending vp to this Castell of Polignac, should there fall prostrate on their knees, vttering there their Prayers and Orisons, euen as before the Images of Saints.

The Idoles stature by measure of the head.

The head of this Idole was fiue foote in height, and the circumference answerable to the same proportion: so that by iust measure and simmetrie of the head (which ought alwayes to make the eight part of a mans body) it is easie to iudge, that the Idole contained fortie foote in height. And yet notwithstanding, Plinie maketh mention of a Colossus, representing the Idole of Mercurie, which contained foure hundred foote in diameter. Vibio Autio prouinciæ Aruernorum præsidente, ætate nostra (Plinie the second, liued vnder Vespasian, his Sonnes, and Traian Emperours) omnem ampletudinem eius generis statuarum vicit Zenodorus, Mercurio facto in Ciuitate Galliæ Arnernis per Annos decem, pedum CCCC. immani pretio. That the excellent Caruer Zenodorus, made in the Citie of Auuergne, a Colossus of immeasurable greatnes, & that he was ten whole years in the caruing it, with incredible expences.

Ioyning to this Temple of Polignac, is another little Chappell, Vaulted in like manner as the Temple was, and painted Mosaically, to serue as the Vestrie. At the yssuing forth thereof, may be seene the steps and treadings, as also the foundation of auncient buildings, ordained as dwellings for the Priests, seruants and attendants on this Idole, whereby Sathan the seducer of men deliuered his lying Oracles. At this Temple it was, where the Emperour Tiberius Cæsar shewed his deuotion, and sent his Offerings, to be assured in the length of his life. And in memorie thereof, is yet to this day to be seene (on the left hand in the Temple) an Antique inscription, but bitten and worne with age, which conteineth these words following.

Tib.

Tib. Claud. Cæ. Aug. Ger. Pon. Max.
Trib. Pot. V. Imp. X I. PP. Coss. I I I I.

The inscription on the wal, in memory of the Emperour Tib. Claud. Ca.

Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus, Germanicus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribunitia potestatis quintum, Imperator vndecimum, Pater Patriæ, Consul quartum.

The Romans called their God Apollo, by the name of Belenus, and Belenus was deriued from Belus, King of the Assyrians, who was beleeued by Antiquity, to be the first inuenter of the Science Astrologicall, as Plinie reporteth in his Naturall History. Durat adhuc Beli Templum, Inuentor hic fuit Syderalis Scientiæ.

The Priests imployed in seruice for the Idols of Apollo, were called Phœbitians, by the name of Phœbus. Ausonius in his Professors and Doctors Regents of the Gaules, famous and renowned for learning in his time, speaking of a Sexton belonging to this pretended God, said:

Nec reticebo senem
Nomine Phœbicium
Qui Beleni Æditutes
Stirpe satus Druidum
Gentis Aremoricæ.

They had the name also of Cup-Bearers, Cup-Carriers, Tasters, Gobletters and Butlers to Apollo. Pateræ dicebantur apud Romanos Sacerdotes Apollinis, qui & Phœbicy. Ausonius, speaking of Attius, Sonne to Phœbicius, both of them famous Rhetoritians, issued from the auncient Druides of Bayeux in Normandie, said:

Tu Baio cassis stirpe Druidarum satus
Si fama non fallit fidem.
Beleni sacratum ducis à Templo genus,
Et inde vobis nomina.
Tibi Pateræ, sic Ministros nuncupant
Apollinaris mistici.

Titus Labienus, Lieutenant to Iulius Cæsar.

In the Towne-house at Clairmont in Auuergne, is a Coffin of Stone, hollow like a Trough, in forme of an Ouall, which had (in times past) serued for the buriall of the wife to Titus Labienus, one of the Lieutenants to Iulius Cæsar, in Conquest of the Gaules: And who afterward reuolted from him, and followed the part of Great Pompey. On one of this Coffins sides is an inscription, the most part thereof eaten away with yeares.

The Epitaph for the wife of Labienus.

Which sheweth that the Romaines, from their first Conquests, had erected in the honour of Apollo, some Temple neere to Clairmont in Auuergne: the People of which Prouince, to please the Conquerours, did (with the first) embrace their Denomanie, yea, euen tearmed them their Brethren, saith Lucan.

Aruernique ausi Latios se fingere fratres
Sanguine ab Iliaco populi.

How the Gauls figured the Idole Mercurie.

As for the Idole of Mercurie, the Gaules deciphered it according to their mistiall meaning, in like manner as the rest, without receiuing any Poeticall fictions of the Greekes or Romaines. They presented him cloathed with a Surcoate or loose Mandillion, made all of Feathers; great Wingges at his sides; his face Beardlesse, lesse, like to a Woman. In his right hand hee held a Bowe bent, as readie to shoote, and a great Purse, with many little Purses; and in the other hand a Trompet.

The morall interpretation concerning Mercurie.

The Mythologie or morall interpretation serued to make knowne, that Mercury was the God of Eloquence, and of Riches. His Feathered Coate, his Wings of Feathers; his young face, and his Trompet signified, that the memorie of learned and skilfull men, flye quite throughout the world, as being for euer consecrated to the Temple of Immortalitie, continuing euermore in strength and vigour, without growing old at any time.

Ἀγλαόκαρπον Μούσων σέβασμα ἀμαράντινος ἀεί.
Nunquam æternarum marcescunt Serta Sororum.

Onely the Chaplet of th' Immortall Sisters:
(As others doe) It neuer fades nor withers.

Concerning the admirable power of Eloquence.

The bended Bowe expressed the power of Eloquence, which hath effects of admirable vigour: for an Eloquent man hath so much strength, as he is able to manage and guide a whole People or Nation, at his owne deuotion, and to turne them on which side he will. Eloquentia est sagitta in manu Potentis. As for the great Purse, swolne bigge with other: it figured the wealthie substance and Riches, which is obtained by the trafficke of Merchandise; whereof they made Mercurie the Lord and President.

Per mare, per terras currit Mercator, Pauperiem fugiens.

Vigilancie was denoated by the Surcoate, and Wings of Feathers thereto most expedient. Such then was the Idole of Mercurie.

Paris infected with Idolatrie before the comming of Denys the Areopagita.

Beside which, they had likewise those of other Gods, and pretended Goddesses and Deities of the Greekes and Romaines, adored by the Gaules, and in whose honor, worshippe and seruice, Temples were erected thorow all the Prouinces and Countries of Gaule. And namely at Paris, and in the skirts round about, where the great S. Denys Areopagita being arriued, he found it wholly infected with Idolatrie. For, in the territorie of Vauuert was a Temple, consecrated to the Idole of Mercurie, which serued as an Orgaine and instrument for the Diuell, to render his doubtfull answeres, and his Oracles of mischiefe against the credulous Paritians.

From thence beyond the Riuer of Seine, was the Temple of Mars, where the Gaules and Romaines made their assemblies and meetings.

The Temple of the Goddesse Isis.

Repassing the said Riuer, and on the bankes thereof, ioyning to the territorie of Vauuert, was that of Lars (improperly by the vulgar called S. Andrew des Arts) where was exalted the Temple of the Goddesse Isis. The Niche or hollow seate where this Idole was pearched, is yet to be seene, on the North side of the Quire, in the Church of S. Germain des Prez lez Paris. In place of which Idole, in the life time of our Fathers, Messire Guillaume Bricouuet, Bishoppe of Meaux, and Abbot of the said Abbey, caused the Crosse to be there aduanced, which at this present, is to be seene.

The Village of Isis, called Issy by the vulgar, was the Farme appointed for the sustentation of the Priests, which serued this Idole Isis.

The Temple of the Goddesse Ceres.

In like manner, fiue miles from Paris, was the Temple of the Idole Ceres, whereof at this present the Village of S. Ceour, in Latine Sacrum Cereris, retaineth the name. The ignorant vulgar called it Cinq Souls, to small or little purpose. About this Village there is another, which the same Vulgar call Huict Souls, instead of Vict-Ceour, in Latine Victus Cereris: because it was ordeined or destenied, for the nourriture and maintenance of the Priests of Ceres, and their Familie.

Origen in his Homilie before remembred, telleth vs, that it was the most easie for for the Druides, and the Gaulish people (by their example) to abiure the Demonomanie of the Romaines; at the first preachings of S. Denys Areopagita, the Parisians first Bishop, and of other Bishops his Contemporanes, sent thorow all the Prouinces of Gaule. Because (saith he) they had assured notice and knowledge of the Sacred Mysterie, of the Incarnation, and descent of the Sonne of God on earth, for the Saluation of men.

And they liued Morally, keeping and instructing the Gaulish People in these Precepts.

The enstructions taught to the Gaules.

Non colere Idola, sed benedicere Deum. To flye Idolatrie, and to worshippe one onely God.

Cauere ab incestu propinquorum, & alio nefando concubitu. To keepe themselues from committing Incest, and vnlawfull coniunction.

Non fundere humanem Sanguinem. Not to commit any homicide.

Non rapere. Not to steale the goods of any other man.

Non tolere membrum Animali viuenti. Not to mutilate, or maime the member of any liuing creature, whereby to make it vnapt for labour.

Precepts of Nature binding all men generally to obserue them.

Other Maximes they had beside, and enstructions to keepe and preserue publique Societie, Precepts and Commandements, which were nominated and called; Præcepta Naturæ, for obseruance whereof all men stood obliged, of what Religion soeuer they were; especially Pagans and Gentiles. So saith Rabbi Salomon, vpon the second Chapter of the Prophet Hieromie, and the Sedar-Olam, fift Chapter.

They were called Præcepta Filiorum Noe: The Commandements of the Sonnes to the Patriarche Noah, in regard that Sem, Iaphet and Cham (hauing receiued them of their Father, with charge, to leaue them as memorials to their Sonnes and descendants) they were inuiolably kept and obserued by the Linages and Families of Sem and Iaphet. Whereas, on the contrary, wicked Cham contemning them, and addicting himselfe to all impietie: was the first Author of Idolatrie, and ingratitude to God; and of Idolatrie were deriued Incest, Sodomie, Theft, Robberie, Murders and Massacres.

The Druides receiued their Precepts from Gomer.

The Druides hauing receiued from their Founder and Patriarch Gomer those Precepts: caused them to be exactly kept and obserued by the Gaules and vpon the preuarication of them, were grounded Iustice and Pollicie both Ciuile and Criminall.

And this was it which made them more capable, then all other Nations on the earth, of gathering those diuine Seedes, reuealed by the great S. Denys; and which made them also so apt for receiuing his Doctrine, wherby the Gaules (in a moment) became Christians, firme and constant in the Faith of Iesus Christ, without the least feare of any torments.

The firme constancie of the Gaules in the Orthodoxe Religion.

And their firme constancie in this case, was the foundation, originall and well-spring of the Gallicane Churches libertie: the Bishops whereof shewed themselues as Bucklers of the Orthodoxe Religion, against all Heretiques. The Prouinces of Greece, Italie and Spaine hauing bin infected with Heresie: the Gaules onely remained constant (without wauering in the Catholique Faith) foure hundred yeares together. And vntill such time as the diuell (the enemie to man) caused to be sowne in this field of blessing, the Darnell of a most wicked and detestable Doctrine, by one Vigilantius Tauerner, a native of Calahorra in Spaine. As we learne by that learned Father of the Church S. Hierome, writing against Vigilantius: Gallia sola monstris caruit, cum Vigilantius (immo Dormitantius) Caupo Calaguritanus subito exorsus est, &c. Heretiques shoote vp in one night, like to Mushromes.

For the firme constancie in the Catholique Faith, the French Church hath alwaies had the preference & precedency (aboue all other of Christendome) with the holy See of Rome. And vpon this constancy are grounded the liberties thereof, which (to speake all in three words) consist in maintaining the Authority of the holy See Apostolique, & of the vniuersall Councels. Against which is no tolleration in France, of those things which Popes (made men) would innouate. In which case, the Steered Parlaments of France, and namely of Paris, are the Ephores, or rather the Areopagites of his power; ruled according to holy Councels, the abuses rooted out.

The great liberties of the Church of France against some Popes proceedings.

The liberties of the French or Gallicane Church, are so great, that it is no matter of meruaile, if Popes (preoccupated with passions) sending their fulminations against France: haue no longer bin acknowledged for such men, and that they haue stept out of their obedience, as well by prohibiting the transport of Gold and Siluer out of the Kingdome, as the prouision of Benefices, which (in this case) are remitted to Ordenaries.

The kingdome of France hath power to elect a Pope.

The Kingdome of France (by a most auncient priuiledge) hath power, the holy Seate of Rome being vacant, and the Cardinals not agreeing for the election of a Pope: to make choyce of one in France. Pope Gregory the ninth being dead, the Cardinals at Rome were long time proceeding in the election of another. The King S. Lewes, in the yeare one thousand two hundred forty three, sent his Ambassadours to Rome, to signifie and declare to the Cardinals, that they should speedily and without day, proceede to the election of a Pope: if not, thorow their default and negligence, the Prelates of France should elect one beyond the Mountaines, according to the auncient liberties of the Gallicane Church.

Per idem tempus miserunt Franci solemnes Nuncios ad Curiam Romanam significantes persuadendo præcisè, & efficaciter, vt ipsi Cardinales Papam ritè eligentes, vniuersali Ecclesiæ solatium pastorale maturius prouiderent, vel ipsi Franci propter negligentiam eorum, de sibi eligendo, & prouidendo summo Pontifice citra Montes cum obedire tenerentur, quantecyus contrectarent. Et hoc audaciter significabant, Consisi de antiquo Priuilegio suo, per Sanctum Clementem beato Dionysio concesso, & obtento, qui ab antiquo Priuilegio suo, per Sanctum Clementem beato Dionysio concesso, & obtento, qui ab eo sit Apostolatus erdem Dionysio super gentem Occidentalem. Vnde ipsi Cardinales, quasi quibusdam stimulis, hinc Domini Imperatoris, inde Francorum agitati, Romam conuenientes adierunt, vt Papam eligerent, in vnum ibidem congregati. As they did, electing to the holy Seate Pope Innocent the fourth, on S. Iohn Baptist day, the yeare aboue named, the Seate hauing bin vacant a yeare and nine Moneths.

Pope Innocent the fourth elected by the French Clergy

We may, and will say, for an infallible point of Honor & Precedency of France before Spaine; that France and her Kings, haue preceded Spaine, in beleeuing the Faith of Iesus Christ, Orthodoxall, and Catholique. And the oldest Christians of Spaine, had neuer become such; but by Bishops of France.

Pope Clement sent Dionysius Areopagita into Gaule by Parisis by Irenæus, and other helpers with him.

For the Breuiarie of the Church of Toledo in Spaine, speaketh conformely to that of Paris, and of S. Denys in France: That the Pope S Clement sent the great S. Denys Areopagita into Gaule, and namely to Paris, there to preach the Law of Iesus Christ. Hee gaue him also as coadiutor, these, S. Rusticus, Eleutherius, Eugenius and Regulus; who S. Denys sent as Bishop into Prouence, and he was the Apostle and first Bishop of Arles. To S. Eugenius he gaue the charge of passing into Spaine, which he did, trauailing to the middest thereof: making his stay at Toledo, where he conuerted a great number of Spaniards to Christianitie, so that hee was the first Bishop of Toledo. For which place, hauing prouided a Successour, and ordained Bishops in the principall Cities of Spaine; he returned into France, to conferre with his Maister, concerning the gouernment and ruling the Church of Spaine.

S. Denys and his companions entreated Martyrdome.

But being arriued at Paris; hee vnderstood, that the great S. Denys and his associates had suffered Martyrdome. And being filled with ioy, as hoping to follow them speedily in the same way; he laboured to consolate the Parisians, exhorting them to continue firme and constant in the Faith, resolute to liue and dye with them, following the footesteps of his worthy Doctor and Maister.

The Prouost of Paris, Fescennius Sisinnius beleeuing that S. Denys was risen againe: caused S. Eugenius to be taken, and being vnable to compell his sacrificing to the Romaines Idols; hee sent him in banishment to Dueill, betweene S. Denys and Gonnesse, where hee was Martyred, and cast into a Ponde at the same place, where he lay (for a time) vnknowne to the Christians; vntill S. Denys appeared to one of them, named Hercolde, to whom hee gaue charge, for taking vp the body body of his Brother and fellow Scholler, and cured him of a disease, which quite bereaued his sight, Hercold hauing found the holy Body, as fresh at the same houre as when it was stabd: tooke it thence, and carried it into a piece of his owne Land, where he gaue it buriall.

Hercold found the body of Eugenius and buried it.

He made it soone after very famous, in regard of infinite miracles, so that to honour the memory of him; the Inhabitants erected a Church, where his body was reuerenced long time, and the people came thither from all parts of France in Pilgrimages. The Normans and Danes robbing the Kingdome, vnder the declining of the second Ligne of the Kings: the body of S. Eugenius was carried from Ducill to S. Denys in France, a place strong and well guarded. When the Warres were appeased, the people of Dueill, willing to regaine their Tutelarie Saint and Patron: it was vtterly impossible for them, to beare it from the Church of S. Denys, where it was carefully kept; so that perforce and constrainedly, they returned without performing any thing.

The Normans and Danes ransacked France.

In the yeare of Grace 1148. the Archbishop of Toledo, called Dom Raymond, Primate of Spaine, came into France to the generall Councill, then held in the Citie of Rheimes in Champaigne, by Pope Eugenius the third. This Archbishop soiourning at Paris, went to see the Church of S. Denys in France, and visiting the Reliques there, being a great many in number: he espied in one of the Chappels this Epiaphe. Here lyeth Eugenius the Martyre, the first Bishop of Toledo. The memory of whom was abolished, and vtterly lost in Spaine, as well by the length of time, that the Affrican Moores had held Toledo, as ignorance of the place, where the said S. Eugenius had suffered and endured Martyrdome. Wherefore it was at S. Denys, that Dom Raymond learned his Legend, such as we haue summarily before related; and perticularly, that he was Martyrised with stabs of a Ponyard and Sword, by Priests of the Roman Demonomanie, a yeare after the death of the Apostle of the French, S. Denys, by command from the Prouost of Pairs Fescennius Sisinnius, vnder the reigne and Empire of Adrian.

A generall Councill at Rheimes in An. 1148.

The Councell at Rheimes being ended, Dom Raymond returned into Spaine, and aduertised the King of Castile Dom Alphonso, in the former narration; requesting his sending into France, to haue some Reliques of the said S. Eugenius. The Historians of Spaine doe confesse, that our King Lewes the yonger, made a voyage to S. Iames in Galitia, as well for deuotion (according to our Chronicles) as to visite the King of Castile Alphonso the seauenth, whose daughter, named Constance, he had espoused (after repudiation of his first wife Alianor of Aquitaine, at the Councell held for the same occasion at Baugency) Alphonso hauing entreated him, to giue him some Reliques of the S. Eugenius, the prime Apostle of Spaine: King Lewes at his returne, sent him the right Arme of the said Saint, richly enshrined. The Shrine was brought to Toledo, carried on the shoulders of the said Alphonso and his Sonnes; which happened in the yeare of Grace 1156. the twelfth day of February, and the said day is yearely celebrated at Toledo as Festiuall, for finding the said S. Eugenius.

King Lewes the yonger his voiage into Spain

In the yeare 1565. King Charles, ninth of the name, was entreated and moued by Ambassadours sent from the King of Spaine Dom Phillip the second, his Brother in Lawe; to giue him the body of the said S. Eugenius. This precious Relique, the most Noble present that one King could deuise to send to another; was deliuered to the Chanon of Toledo, Dom Pedro Mauriques, Sonne to the great Adelantado of Castile, expressely therefore sent into France, very honorably accompanied. The King Dom Phillip, went to receiue the holy body, and himselfe, attended by the Prince Dom Charles his Sonne, and the Arch-Dukes Rodolphus (afterward Emperour, second of the name) and Ernestus, Sonnes to the Emperour Maximillian the second, and his Nephewes; carried on their shoulders the Shrine of S. Eugenius from the Gate of the Citie, to the great Church of Toledo, into a Chappell vnder the high Altar, where it remaineth. Thus Princes and Christian Monarchs, honored and reuerenced the Bones of holy Martyrs & Confessors of Iesus Christ, which the Heretiques of our times haue consumed into cinders, in all places where those angry Tygers, haue planted their Ensignes of their Rebellion.

The body of S. Eugenius requested by the King of Spaine and sent vnto him.

The entertainment of the body in Spaine and where it was placed.

A Lampe of Siluer sent from Spaine into France.

The said King Phillip the second, in acknowledgement of so great a benefit, gaue as a present to the Apostle of France, the great S. Denys Areopagita, a Lampe of Siluer, which is to be seene in the vpper Quire at S. Denys in France, before the morning Altar, called of the Trinitie: vnder which, vpon a Piller of Brasse or Copper, is exalted the Shrine of another S. Denys, Bishop of Corinth.

The same Historians of Spaine report, conformably to that which is said by S. Gregory of Tours, in his Historie of France. That Herminigilde, Sonne to Leuuigilde, King of Spaine, had to wife the Sister of Sigibert, King of France, by whose perswasions, he detested Arianisme, professed by the Gothes, and conuerted him to the Catholique Faith. Whereat his Father grew so hatefull towards him, that hee vsed him with all cruelty, sending him farre off into exile, with his wife, and caused him also to be slaine, on the very night of Easter, in the yeare of Grace 589. And his wife Ingunda (although shee withdrew into Affrica) ceased not to Cathechise and instruct in the Orthodoxe Religion, the Brother of her Husband, named Reccarede, who hauing succeeded after King Leuuigilde his Father, in the Crowne of Spaine: caused a Councill to be assembled at Toledo, in the yeare of Grace 595. the fourth yeare of his Reigne, whereat were present 62. Bishops. Before whom, the said King Reccarede, Bada his wife, and his Vuisigothes abiured Arianisme, and made profession of the Catholique Faith, yet afterward, the Spanish Gothes perseuered therein. By the meanes of this conuersion, King Reccarede (being a Widdower) fought alliance & amity with Childebert, King of France, second of the name: taking in marriage Anthare, sister to the said King Childebert, and Ingunda, wife to Herminigilde, which happned in the yeare 598.

The deserued memory of the vertuous & famous religious Lady.

King Reccarede becommeth by marriage allied to France.

The Gothes being exterminated by the Moores, in the yeare 714. the Ammirant of Affrica, named Musa, Gouernour of Spaine, because he would not desert Toledo, Corduba and some other Cities; permitted some small number of old Spanish Christians, retired from the Moores furie, to inhabite there; namely at Toledo, where were fiuen Churches of the Saints, Maria, Eulalia, and Iusta; of the Saints, Marke, Luke, Sebastian and Torquatus. With them (to be supported) they receiued the Africane or Arabian Christians, passing out of Affrica into Spaine with Musa; by whose name, both the one and other, confused pell mell together) were called Musarabes, iudged and gouerned according to the Gothes Lawes, by one of their Religion. These Musarabes and old Spanish Christians, long time maintained the Diuine Seruice, according to the manner formerly obserued in Spaine, called the Isidorian Office, or of S. Leander; vntil they receiued that according to the vse of France, otherwise called the Romaine, and the Gregorian, in Anno one thousand threescore and sixteene.

Musa Ammirant of Affrica and Gouernour of Spaine.

Musarabes old Spanish Christians.

When there was held a Nationall Councill at Burgos, the Capitall Citie in the Kingdome of Castile, at the request of Alphonso, sixt of the name, King of Leon and Castile, for reformation of the Isidorian vsage, which smelt yet and tasted of the old leuen of Arrius his Heresies: Pope Gregory the seauenth, then sitting in the holy Seate, sent as Legate, and to preside in the said Councill, Richard, Abbot of S. Victor at Marseiles, who with inuincible courage, and without any distaste, abolished (quite throughout Castile and Leon) that auncient vsage, instead whereof, he planted there the French. This had formerly bin attempted many times, without bringing it to passe, and likewise in this Councill, it was opposed by some Bishops of Spaine, who would not receiue a new vsage, which they tearmed Officium Gallicanum: as it is reported by the Archbishop of Toledo, Dom Roderigo Ximenes, and the good and faithfull subiect Mariana, in his Historie of Spaine. But especially Ximenes, in his Spanish Historie, where he saith: That the French earnestly pursued in Spaine the abolition of the Musarabe Office, for the reception of their owne.

A Nationall Councill held at Burgos in the Kingdome of Castile.

Now, as the Spaniards were naturally opinionate and superstitious, and rather good Christians in apparance, then indeede and effect: so the Histories of Spaine doe report, that before receiuing in Spaine this Officium Gallicanum, as they called it; the Nobilitie and People openly bandied themselues, so that the most part of the Cleargie, contrary to this Decree in the Councill of Burgos, could not induce nor perswade them to receiue it: vntill after the proofe and examination, on, vsually made in Spaine and elsewhere, in matters of importance, to know whether the French Office should be preferred, before their Musarabe: they brought two Champions in Battaile, to decide this quarrell in Combate, and by force of Armes.

The Spanish Historians, to despight the French, haue purposely let slip vnder silence (malitiously and disdainfully) the name of the French Champion. And yet tell vs, that theirs was called Iohn Ruiz de Matienza, a Bourgade seated by the Riuer of Puiserga. Also, that the Champion fighting for the Gothish Office, ouercame him for France: and by that meanes, the preferrence and honor remained to his side.

The difference to be decided in single Combat by two Champions.

When the Combat was ended, they made their recourse to proofe by Fire. For in the Citie of Toledo, in those times newly conquered from the Moores, a great Fire was kindled, wherein the French and Gothish Offices were throwne together. The French leapt immediately out of the Fire, whole, intire, and without any harme. That also of the Gothes, hauing continued there a much longer time; was likewise taken forth without any burning. Notwithstanding all these essayes, in right defended and prohibited by the Church, against the opinion of the Spaniards: the Decree of the Councill preuailed, and the Legate Apostolicall, Richard of Marseilles, Dom Bernard, then Archbishop of Toledo, and the most part of the Bishops Suffragans, ordained. That in the ancient Churches, built by the Christians Musarabes, the auncient forme of Prayers should be maintained, after the Gothish manner. As yet to this day it is (in my time) certaine dayes in the yeare, in the Cathedrall Church of Toledo, in the Chappell of the Sacrament of the Altar: but in other Churches, the Office Romaine, or Gallicane, should be receiued in Castill and Leon.

A second triall made by fire, and what succeeded thereon.

The ordination for a finall conclusion

Sixteene yeares before, to wit, in Anno One thousand and sixtie, the said Gallicane Office had bin receiued in Arragon, and the neighbouring Prouinces of the ancient resort or iurisdiction of the Crowne of France (as we haue said) by the Nationall Councill held at the Citie of Iacca. Wherein Presided S. Austindus, Archbishop of Auch in Armagnac, with the Suffragans the Bishops, Sancio of Iacca, called of Arragon; Paternus of Sarragossa; Arnaudus of Roda; William of Orgell; Heraclius of Tarbes in Begorre; Stephen of Oleron in Bearn, and many other Prelates. In this Councill it was ordained, that the Gothish Office should be vtterly suppressed; and the Romaine or Gallicane introduced and obserued. Moreouer, if hereafter the Citie of of Huesca should be wonne from the Moores, that then possessed it; the Episcopall See of Arragon, being then at Iacca, should be there established, as it had bin before.

The Gallicane Office receiued in Arragon, & the neighbouring Prouinces

In this manner then, both the Monarches of the Lillie, and the Kingdome of France, had the principall aduantage aboue that of Spaine, for profession of the Catholique Faith, the true point of Nobilitie, a Precedencie obtained by our first King Clouis, when he embraced the Orthodoxe Religion, and not Arianisme, whereof the Kings of Spaine made profession. It is true Nobilitie, to be truely Christian: as the Bishoppe of Auuergne, Sidonius Apollinaris said, in the Epitaph for his Grandfather.

Hæc sed maxima dignitas probatur
Quod frontem Cruce, membra fonte purgans:
Primus de numero Patrum suorum
Sacris sacrilegis renuntiauit.
Hoc primum est decus, hæc superba Virtus,
Spe præcedere, quos honore iungas.

It is an Historicall meditation, greatly remarkeable from the Sacring of King Clouis, that then when he embraced the Faith of Iesus Christ: the Kings of Christendome were infected with Heresie, and he alone Orthodoxall. For the Emperour Anastasius, who reigned in the East, was infected with many Heresies, and for them Excommunicated by Pope Symmachus. The Kings of England were eithe Clouis the onely Catholique King in the World.

Pagans or Idolaters, and the reſt plundged in the errour of Pelagius. Theodoricke, King of the Oſtrogothes in Italie; them of Bourgongne; Alaricus, King of the Viſigothes in Aquitaine; The Kings of the Alanes, Vandales and Sweues, who then commanded the moſt part of Spaine and Affrica, all taking part with deteſtable Arrius. There was not then in all the world, an Orthodoxall and Catholique Prince; but onely Clouis: King of the French. And this was it which moued the moſt learned Cardinall Baronius (diſcourſing on his Sacring) to ſay. Contemplare, Lector, præſentis temporis Eccleſiæ Catholicæ ſtatum, quo (mirum dictu) nullus eſſet reperiri in toto terrarum orbe penitus Princeps. Chriſtianus Catholicus: nam & qui velamento Fidei Orthodoxæ diu latuit Anaſtaſius Imperator, iam apertiſsime cognitus hæreticus, Catholicæ fidei oppugnator, iuſte, meruit tandem à Romano Pontifice Excommunicatione percelli, &c.

A further relation collected out of Cardinal Baronius.

And in another place after he had admired the vnſearchable Counſels of the Diuine Wiſedome, who for the ſupport of his Church; illuminated Clouis to embrace earneſtly the Catholique Faith; he ſaith. Etenim hoc ipſo anno (quis credit?) quo tam denſa tenebræ operuerunt vbique Terram, & caligo Populos, in Gallijs plane diuinitus Nouæ Lucis Fulgidum Sidus apparuit, cum videlicet Clodoueus ille magnus Francorum Rex, illuſtratione ſacri Baptiſmatis filius lucis efficitur.

And from that time is it, that the Monarchs of the Lillie obtained the right of Precedency, aboue all other Kings and Princes on the earth. As God promiſed to Dauid (*Pſal.*89.28.29.30.) to giue him the right of Primogeniture, aboue all Kings of the earth, for the conſtancie of his true Religion, wherein the Sacred Kings of France haue bin ſucceſſours to Dauid. Ego Primogenitum ponam illum excelſum præ Regibus Terræ: & ponam in ſeculum ſeculi Semen eius, & Thronum eius, ſicut dies Cœli.

This is the auncient teſtimonie of S. Gregory the great Pope, in the Epiſtle which he wrote to the King of France Childebert, ſecond of the name, and yongeſt ſonne of Clouis. That the King of France is as excellent, aboue all other Kings of the earth, as Maieſtie Royall is aboue all other men. Quanto Regia dignitas cæteras antecellit, tanto cæterarum Gentium, Sentium, Regnorumque Regni perfectio veſtri culmen excellit. Eſſe Regem, quia ſunt & alij, non mirum eſt. Sed eſſe Catholicum, quod alij non merentur, hoc fortis eſt. Sicut enim magnæ lampadis ſplendor in tetræ noctis obſcuritate, luminis ſui claritate fulgeſcit: ita Fidei veſtræ claritas inter aliarum gentium perfidiam rutilat, atque coruſcat. Quidquid cæteri Reges ſe habere gloriantur, hoc habetis: ſed ipſi in hac re vehementius ſuperantur à vobis, quoniam principale bonum non habent, quod habetis.

Looke how much Royall Dignity ſurpaſſeth all them of the World; ſo much the more the Kingdome of France excelleth the height and greatneſſe of the Nations and Kingdomes of the earth. To be honored with the magnificent title of King, is no matter of noueltie, neither wanteth a ranke of Precedencie and Honor; becauſe it is but equall to many other Kings of Prouinces in the World. But to be a King that maketh profeſſion of the Catholique Faith, and who (in that reſpect) deſerueth to be tearmed Most-Chriſtian: therein is the Excellencie, and the infallible right of certaine Precedencie, which is not communicable to a Prince on the earth, how great ſoeuer he may pretend to be. Becauſe, like as the brightneſſe of a great burning Lampe, ſerueth as the Sunne at mid-day, during the feares of a cloudie darke night, drowned in all obſcuritie: in the ſame manner, the clearenеſſe of Faith in the Most-Chriſtian Kings of France, ſhineth in all bright ſplendour and glory, aboue all the Kings of Chriſtendome.

Wherein conſiſteth iuſtly both Excellencie and Precedencie.

At ſuch time as great King Clouis receiued the Faith of Ieſus Chriſt; Anaſtaſius, Theodoricke, Alarick, and the reſt, who tearmed themſelues Chriſtian Kings; were deuided from them that profeſſed true Religion indeede, by an infinitie of torments and punithments. On the contrary, Clouis, immediately after his Baptime; applied his minde, to bring the Church into her auncient luſter, and to warre vpon ſuch as tyrannized ouer her.

The great difference betweene Chriſtians of this time and the other ſorte.

A generall Councell at Orleans in France.

Firſt, he cauſed to be aſſembled a generall Councill of all the Prouinces in France, in the Citie of Orleans (as it is obſerued by Hincmarus of Rheims, and Sigibert after him) writing to the Fathers aſſembled at the ſaid place, this remarkeable Letter, the tenure whereof thus enſueth.

The

The Letter written by King Clouis, to the Generall Councell aſſembled at Orleans.

... Dominis ſanctis, & Apoſtolica Sede digniſsimis Epiſcopis, Clodoueus Rex.

ENunciante fama quid actum fuerit, vel præceptum omni Exercitui noſtro priuſquam in patriam Gothorum ingrederemur, Beatitudini veſtræ prætierire non potui. In primo quoque de miniſterio Eccleſiarum omnium præcipimus, ne ad ſubripiendum ea aliquis conuertatur, neque de Sanctimonialib. neque de Viduis quæ in Religione Domini deuotæ eſſe probantur: ſimili conditione de Clericis, vel filijs ſupradictorum tam Clericorum, quam Viduarum, qui cum illis in domo ipſorum conſiſtere videbantur. Idem, & de ſeruis Eccleſiarum, quos de Eccleſijs tractos per Epiſcoporum ſacramenta conſtiterit, præceptum eſt obſeruare, vt nullus ex ipſis aliquam violentiam, vel damnum patiatur. Quod ita ad intelligendum eſt, vt ex his ſupradictis ſi aliquis vim captiuitatis pertuliſſet ſiue in Eccleſia, ſiue extra Eccleſiam, omnino ſine aliqua dilatione præcipiamus eſſe reddendos. De cæteris quidem captiuis Laicis, qui extra pacem ſunt captiuati, & fuerint approbati Catholici, aut cui volueritis arbitrio veſtri, non eſt denegandum. Nam de his qui in pace noſtra tam Clerici, quam Laici ſubrepti fuerint, ſi veraciter agnoſcitis, veſtras Epiſtolas de annullo veſtro inſignatas ſic ad nos omnimodis dirigatis, & a parte noſtra præceptionem latam nouerit is eſſe firmandum: ſic tum Populus noſter petit, vt cuicumque Epiſtolas veſtras præſtare fueritis dignitati, cum ſacramento per Deum, & benedictione veſtra dicere non tardetis, rem iſtam quæ poſcitur, veram eſſe: quia multorum varietates, & falſitates inuentæ ſunt, vt comprehendantur, ſicut ſcriptum eſt: Perit Iuſtus cum impio. Orate pro me, Domine ſancti, & Apoſtolica Sede Papæ digniſsimi.

And in the ſecond place, hee reſolued to warre (with all his power) vpon the Vuiſigothes, ſworne enemies to the Catholiques; becauſe they were Arrians, and to purge and cleanſe France of ſuch an hereſie. For ſo ſaith S. Gregory of Tours in his Hiſtory of France. Clodoueus Rex ait ſuis; Valde moleſte fero, quod hi Ariani (ſpeaking of the Vuiſigothes, from whom the Spaniards deriue a part of their pretended Precedency for their Kings) partem teneant Galliarum. Eamus cum Dei adiutorio, & ſuperatis redigamus terram in ditionem noſtram. At the very opening of this Warre, he ſpeaketh as if he had the Victory already aſſured to him; and the God of battell bleſſed his enterpriſe, as we haue formerly ſaid.

His ſecond purpoſe to warre againſt the Vuiſigothes Arrians.

For this cauſe the Fathers aſſembled in the ſaid Councell of Orleans (wherein are named aboue all the reſt for ſanctitie of life, and numbred in the Catalogue of Saints, to this day famous in the Church: Gildardus Biſhop of Rouen; Lupus of Soiſſons (Sonne to S. Principus, Biſhop likewiſe of Soiſſons, and Nephew to S. Remigius of Rheims) S. Melanius of Rennes, Quintianus of Rhodes, Theodoſius of Auxerre, and Leontius of Toloſa:) doe teſtifie that it was the feruour and deuotion of this great King Clouis, for augmentation of the true Religion, and that therefore onely, he deſerued (by good right) aboue all Princes in the world, the title of Catholike, and the Sonne of the Catholique Church.

Especiall reuerend fathers aſſembled in the Councell, remembred for their vertues.

Domino ſuo Catholicæ Eccleſiæ Filio Clodoueo Glorioſiſsimo Regi.

OMnes Sacerdotes, quos ad Conſilium venire iuſsiſtis, quia tanta ad Catholicæ Religionis cultum glorioſæ fidei cura vos excitat, vt Sacerdotales mentis affectu, Sacerdotes de rebus neceſſarijs tractaturos in vnum colligi iuſſeritis; ſecundum veſtræ voluntatis conſultationem, & titulos quos dediſtis, ea quæ nobis viſa ſunt, definitione reſpondimus: ita vt ſi ea quæ nos ſtatuimus, etiam veſtro recta eſſe iudicio comprobantur, tanti conſenſu Regis ac Domini maioris, auctoritatem ſeruandam tantorum firmat ſententia Sacerdotum.

Such

K. Clouis, Son of the Catholicke Church.

Such was the reuerence and honour, which those Holy men bare vnto this great King Clouis, in giuing him the title of Son of the Catholique Church, that is to say, the Elogium or testimony of Catholique King. This Councel was held in the yere of Grace, fiue hundred and seuen. And the Title of Catholique was not giuen to the Kings of Spaine, in the person of Don Ferdinand of Arragon, till long time after the taking of Granada (happening in the yeare 1492. there are sixe score yeeres) to wit, in the yeere 1412. by Pope Iulius the second, a Capitall enemy to the French, in despight of the battell at Lauenna, lost by him and his partakers. Which gaue good occasion to the Italian Sabellicus, to write in sufficient intelligible tearmes: That the King of France Clouis, was the first of all the Kings on the Earth, that drew sword against Heretiques, to extirpate them. The same honourable title of Catholike King, and eldest sonne of the Church, was giuen to the said Clouis, by the Councells of Magunce, and of Aix in Germany.

Pope Iulius 2. a heauy enemie to the French.

And his example serued as a Lanthorne and guide, for doing the like to his Descendants and Nephewes. King Gonthran perceiuing that the Arrian Vuisigothes held and possessed the frontiers of the Gaules, Languedocke and Prouence; concluded to rouze them thence, as S. Gregory of Tours telleth vs in his French Historie: Igitur hex Gunthrammus in Hispania exercitum commoueri præcipit, dicens. Primus Septimaniam Prouinciam dittioni nostræ subdite, quæ Galys est propinqua. Indignum enim est, vt horrendorum Gothorum terminus vsque in Gallias sit extensus.

He cald the Vuisigothes execrable, because they were infected with the Heresie of Arrius, the most abhominable of all other that euer had beene; and in regard, that in all their actions they were cruell and bloudy, according to the Nature ingrafted in all Heretiques.

Concerning the donation of S. Peters patrimony.

Augustino Cramer, among all his cunning trickes, some-what cleanly sowed together with fine white sisters thred, could not iustifie, that the Patrimony of Saint Peter should come from the donation of the Spanish Kings. In despight of his teeth he must confesse and auouch, that the Exarcate of Rauenna, Romaignia, and all else contained in the Oath of Otho (formerly spoken of) came onely from the Kings of France, alwaies good benefactors to the Holy See. The same Cranato, knew not how to blanche the Emperour Charles the fift, (whom hee exalted vp to the third heauen) concerning the sacke of Rome, set downe in very few words.

The sacking and spoyle of Rome, by the Army of Charles the 5. Emperor.

Philebert de Chalon, Prince of Orenge, Lieutenant to the said Charles the fift, hauing besieged Rome, preuailed in his purpose on Sonday, the fift day of May, An. 1527. There, by true Catholique Spaniards, (of the grossest graine) ioyned with the Germanes, he caused to be exercised the very greatest cruelties, that the Turke and Affricane Moores (coniured enemies to the Christians) knew not how to doe the like; without respect or any distinction, eyther of Age, Sexe, or the most sacred things, no more then they that were the prophanest.

Pope Clement, the Cardinalls, Rancio de Cere, with other Romane Lords, saued themselues in the Castle of S. Angelo: whereunto they were no sooner entred, but prested also with a long siege, from which to be deliuered, the Holy father was enforced to giue an hundred and fiftie thousand Crownes in ready money, for redemption of the persons and goods being in the said Castle, which the Pope was to deliuer to the Spaniards, with all the munition for Warre therein, beside two hundred and fifty thousand Crownes, at time agreed vpon.

The Pope extreamely constrained by the Spaniards.

Ouer and aboue those, foure hundred thousand Crownes for ransome, the Pope was constrained (by composition) to discharge the said Charles the fift, and the Kings of Naples his Successours, of an annuall Cens or quit-rent of eight thousand Ounces of Gold and of all the arrerages which formerly were owing; and to content himselfe afterward with a white Haquency, at euery Lords change. This Order was dated in Anno 1528.

The King of France offers to reuenge the Pope's cause.

King Francis the first, as the most Christian King of France, and Eldest Sonne of the Church, to reuenge this iniury done to the High Priest of the Catholique Church, and set him at libertie, leuied presently a potent Army, the Conduct whereof he gaue to the Lord of Lautrec, Messire Odet de Foix. It was composed of nine hundred men of Armes, and of fiue hundred light horse, and of sixe thousand Lance-Knights;

Knights; whereof was Colonell, the Count de Vaudemont; sixe thousand Gascoins, conducted by Don Pedro de Nauarre; ten thousand Switzers, commanded by Mondragon, a Gascoin Captaine; and foure thousand French, by the Lord De Burie, with good number of Artillery.

This Army being ready to marche on, King Francis sent Guyenne King of Armes, to defie the said Emperour Charles the fift, hee then soiourning at the City of Burgos in Castile. The Letter of defiance vnder hand and seale, was dated at Paris, the eleuenth day of Nouember, in the yeare 527. signed by Guyenne King of Armes, importing as followeth.

A Letter of defiance sent to Charles the 5. in part declared.

FRancis, by the Grace of God, the Most-Christian King of France, of Naples and of Sicily; Duke of Millaine, and Lord of Geneway, defied and declared warre against him both by Sea and Land: Because by his command (entitling himselfe Catholique King) the City of Rome was taken, forced and spoyled, the Pope and his Cardinalls detained Prisoners, as yet still they were; Churches pilled, Women and Maidens violenced, and that great City, the chiefest of the World, reduced into an estate so wretched and miserable, as she neuer had bin so vsed by the Gothes, Hunnes, and other sworne enemies to the Church, &c.

The Emperors cold excuses in this case.

Charles the fifth laboured to excuse these violences, but it was apparant, that he onely had part of the booty, of the Sacke and Pillage of the City of Rome, and the Popes ransome; beside the acquitting and discharge of the Kingdome of Naples, amounting well-neere to a Million of Gold. The same Emperor Charles the fifth, and his sonne Dom Philip the second, then being in England, caused Rome to be besieged, making strong warre vpon Pope Paul, fourth of that name. To whom in the yeare 1556. King Henry, second of that name, sent succor, conducted by the Duke of Guise; which Armie consisted of fifteene thousand Foote, fiue hundred men of Armes, and eight hundred Light-horse; which constrained the Dukes of Parma and Florence, Lieutenants to the said Emperour and Philip, to discampe from before Rome, and to leaue the Pope and Romanes quiet.

Henry King of France sent succour to the Pope Paulus Quartus.

Popes at all times haue found no sicli refuge as in France.

At all times, Popes being offended by forraigne Princes, and namely Emperors, neuer found any more assured retreat, then to France, neither any such ready succour in the very strongest of their afflictions: the Monarchs of the Lillie haue alwaies beene the men; others neuer had any part or portion, in the honour of so holy an enterprise.

The offer of King Lewis to Pope Innocent the fourth.

Pope Innocent the fourth, being persecuted by the Emperour Fredericke the second of that name, vsurper of the Kingdome of Sicilie, came into France, as into a place of certaine safety. He assembled a Councell at Lyons, in the yeere of Grace 1245. whether the King S. Lewis went to see him, and offered him and the Holy Seate, for succour against the said Emperour Fredericke and other enemies, his Person and Kingdome, which (at all times) had beene the Refuge and Sanctuary for afflicted Popes, so saith the Historian of England, Mathew Paris.

In the yeare 1244. towards the feast of S. Michael, the King S. Lewis, Queene Blanch his Mother, the Kings Brethren, Counts of Artois and Poictiers, the Duke of Bourgongne, and sixe Counts of France, went to the Generall Chapter at the Cisteaux, (an Order of white Friers in France) there to vtter their Prayers, and to see so many Abbots there assembled together; who marched in Order and Procession before the Most-Christian King.

The Pope hearing of the Kings comming to the Cisteaux, sent to entreat the Abbots of the saide Order, to obtaine of his Maiesty permission to come and shield himselfe in France. Vt secundum antiquam, & consuetam Franciæ consuetudinem, & libertatem, patrem suum, & pastorem summum ac præcipium Ecclesiæ rectorem, videlicet Romanum Pontificem, contra insultus Imperatoris potenter tueri, atque defendere dignaretur. Et si necessitatis articulus expostularet, sinum pandens ingenuæ pietatis, cum in Regno suo benigne receptaret. Sicut quondam bonæ memoriæ Alexandro Papæ (tertio) exulanti, & a facie Frederici Imperatoris persequentis, fugienti: consolationem & refugium nouerat præstitisse.

Philip Augustus did as much to Pope Innocent the third, against the Emperors, Philip, Philip Augustus succoured Pope Innocent the third.

lip and Otho, as we haue already declared in the precedent Chapter.

Pope Adrian succoured by Charlemaigne.

Charlemaigne went diuers times into Italy, to the assistance of Pope Adrian, against Didier, King of the Lombards, afflicting the Pope and the holy Seate; hee exterminated his reigne in Italie, and confined him prisoner in the Castle (famous by his name yet this day) Mons-Desidery, Mount-Didier in Picardy.

Pope Stephen assisted by K. Pepin le Bref, & restored to his seate.

King Pepin le bref, Father to Charlemaigne, receiued into his Protection & safeguard, Pope Stephen, in whose fauour he went two seuerall times into Italy against Astolphus, as then King of the Lombards; whom he sent packing from Pauia, constrained (after he had endured a long siege) to submit himselfe. Hee restored the said Pope Stephen to the Holy Seate, which he held by his liberalities, euen the Patrimonie, called of S. Peter, particularized before in the Oath of the Emperor Otho, fourth of that name, to Pope Innocent the third. And the same Pope Stephen, comming into France, King Pepin, his wife, his children, and all the Nobilitie, went to receiue him at the farthest Frontires of the Kingdome, and kept him company to Pauia.

At the first meeting of K. Pepin with the Pope, he forth-with alighted on foot, and all his company, and in that manner went three miles, or three thousand paces before him: and then going neerer to him, fell on his knees, kissing his feete in all humility, taking the Holy Fathers Palfrey by the bridle, and so conducted him to the place which was prounded for him.

Like Honour and Reuerence haue many Popes receiued, comming into France (which haue beene a very great number) where they haue beene welcommed, nourished, and defended against their enemies, by our Kings and the people of France, as the like cannot be said of any other Kingdome in Christendome. As hath been obserued by the learned S. Thomas Aquinas, in his booke De Regimine Principum, dedicated to Iames King of Cyprus, of the Illustrious House of Lusignan in Poictou. That in former times the Emperours of the East, and of Constantinople, were Protectors of the Holy Seate of Rome, to the time of the Sacred Kings of France, Pepin and Charlemaigne, of whom he implored helpe, to be redeemed from the slauery and seruitude of them of Lombardy. Aduocauit Romanus Pontifex ad sui defensionem contra Longobardos Reges Francorum. Primo quidem Pepinum Stephanus Papa, & successor Zachariæ contra Astulphum Regem Longobardorum. Deinde Adrianus, & Leo Carolum Magnum contra Desiderium ejusdem Regem. And for this cause (saith hee) the Kingdome of France is and alwaies hath beene, the assured Retreat for the afflicted Popes. Nothing can be said of the like in fauour of Spaine

Another way whereby to continue our Kingdome in Excellency.

The Precedency of France ought likewise to be iudged by Learning, Pietie, and extendure of the Kingdome, with the other, which is best knowne by the great number of Dioceses and of Vniuersities: an Argument which may Warre to some purpose.

The Vniuersities of Spaine are of least fame.

All the Spaines intirely (comprehending therein the Kingdomes of Nauarre and Portugall haue no more but sixe famous Vniuersities, as namely Academiæ Illerdenses, Conimbrensis, Oscensis, Toletana and Salamanticensis. Speaking properly in the Countrey Language: Lerida in Nauarre; Coimbre in Portugal; Huesca in Arragon: and the rest in the midst of Spaine, to witte, Alcala de Henarez; Toledo, and Salamanca.

The Vniuersities in France, Paris the first.

In France there are twelue; as namely Paris, sans Pair, without Peere, the City of the Lillie; not of the Kings of the Persians, but the ordinary abiding of the greatest Monarch in the World, The Most Christian King of France. Paris, the true residence, and the Parnassus of the Muses; the Magazine and Store-house of all kindes of Arts, Sciences, and Faculties; and principally renowned through all parts of Christendome, for that of Diuinity.

Foure Academies in the middest of France.

She is followed by the Vniuersities of Orleans, of Bourges, Poictiers, and of Angiers in the middest of France: of Bourdeaux in Guienne, of Tolosa, of Cahors, and of Mont Pelier (particularly famous for the faculty of Physicke, Chirurgerie, and Pharmacie in Languedocke; of Valentia in Daulphine; of Rheims in Champaigne, and of Caen in Normandie. As concerning the number of Dioceses; France hath euermore made her deuotion to shine and appeare, aboue all other Kingdomes in Christendome.

We learn in the histories of Spain, that their King Bamba, or Vamba, as they please to pronounce it, and of whom the Spaniards make fabulous tales (concerning his stature, which bloomed or blossomed so soone as it was fixed in the ground) was hee who made diuision of Bishoprickes & Dioceses therein, as now at this day; changing and disposing, quite contrary to that which they were ordered for, in the time of Constantine the Great; vnder whose Empire, the Metropolitane Sees of Spayne were these.

Hispalis, Emerita, Carthagena, Taracona, and Brathara: which in Spanish are Seuill, Merida, Carthagena is ruined, and the Metropolitane Seate transferred (say they) to Toledo, the primatiall Church of the Spaynes Taragon and Braga, famous by her Councell, called by ignorants in the Spanish tongue, Bracarense Concilium.

The Archbishopricks Suffraganes.

As for the Suffragans belonging to these Archbishopricks, Seuil had the Bishopricks of Italica, Seritium, Assidonia, Elepla, Malaca, Eliberis, Astigium, and that of Egabrum: hereafter we will obserue the Spanish Vocables.

Carthagena had for Suffragans, Toletum, Oretum, Setabis, Segobrica, Complutum, Caraca, Valentia, Murcia, Biatia, Castulo, Montogia, Basta, and Bigena, otherwise called Bigastra.

Them of Braga.

Braga, the fift and last Metropolitane Seate, had vnder it Dumio, Portu-Cale, Auria, Oueto, Asturica, Britonia, Iria, Allubria, Iffa, and the last, Tuda.

The diuision made by King Bamba.

King Bamba diuided these Dioceses wholly after another fashion; erecting for Metropolitanes, Toledo, which he made Primatiall of all Spaine, Seuille, Merida, Braga, and Taragone.

Belonging to Toledo.

Toledo, which was sometime the Capitall City of the Vuisigothes, Kings of Spaine, had for Suffragans these Bishopricks; Oretum, Biatia, Mentesa, Acci, Basti, Murcia, (otherwise called Vrci) Bagasta, (that City is ruined) Illici, Setabis, Dianium, Valeria, Segobrica, Arcabrica (by Ptolemie called Percabica, and these two last Cities are destroyed) Siguntum, Complutum, Vxama, Segobia, and Palença, called at this present Almagro, Baeca: Montison, Guadix, Baza, Almeria, Helche, Xatiua, Dénia, Valence, otherwise called Valere la Bruslee, in Spanish Valeria quemada, Alcala de Henarez, Monuiedro, Osma; Segobia and Palença haue kept their ancient appellation, and the Castulo of Constantine, is at this present Lez Naues de Tolosa.

Pope Adrian succoured by Charlemaigne.

Charlemaigne went diuers times into Italy, to the assistance of Pope Adrian, against Didier, King of the Lombards, afflicting the Pope and the holy Seate; hee exterminated his reigne in Italie, and confined him prisoner in the Castle (famous by his name yet this day) Mons-Desiderij, Mount-Didier in Picardy.

Pope Stephen assisted by K. Pepin le Bref, & restored to his seate.

Auch in Gaſcoign the Metropolitane, & her ſuffragans.

And this is worthy to be obſerued of France, that Arragon, and the Prouinces neighbouring to France, conquered by our King Charlemaigne; acknowledged for Metropolitane, the Archbiſhoprick of Auch in Gaſcoigne, of which were Suffragans the Biſhopricks of Barcelona, Girona, Orgell, Empuries, Vic D'Oſoue & Taraſſone. And the very greateſt part of Arragon, the Counts of Barcelona, Catalogna, Rouſſillon, and Cerdagna relied on the Crowne of France, and thereof they acknowledged the Soueraignty, ſince the Conqueſt of the ſaid Charlemaigne, and the names of the Kings of France were inſerted and noted, at the beginning of all publique Acts, which were expedited to the ſaid Prouinces, and which was obſerued vnto the yeare of Grace, 1182. when Alphonſo, ſecond of that name King of Arragon, Count of Barcelona, Catalogna, Rouſſillon and Cerdaigna, cauſed a Nationall Councell to be aſſembled at Taragona. In which Councell was prohibited for euer after, to acknowledge the Kings of France as Soueraignes in the ſaid Prouinces, and the Notaries, Regiſters and Scriueners, were no more to inſert in their Acts, the names of the Kings of France, and the date of their yeeres Reignes, as they had done before: but onely the yeere of the Incarnation of our Sauiour and Redeemer Ieſus Chriſt, which in France we call the yeere of Grace.

A Nationall Councell cal'd by Alphonſo K. Arragon againſt the ſoueraignty of France.

7. Metropolitans, and 60. Biſhopricks in Spaine.

There are then in all the Spaines, ſeuen Metropolitane Seates; as Toledo, Seuille, Merida, Burgos, Braga, Saragoſſa, and Taragona: and threeſcore Biſhopricks, or thereabout.

15. Metropolitans, & 110. Biſhopricks in France.

In France there be fifteene Metropolitane Seates, and an hundred and ten Biſhoprickes.

At the beginning of this Chapter, we obſerued the ſeuenteene Prouinces of the Gaules, according to the ancient Order and Ranke which they held, when they were obedient to the Romane Emperors. But the Order is not ſuch, in regard of the Metropolitane Seates, and Dioceſſes of France. Whereof S. Iſidore, Archbiſhop of Seuill in Spaine, (for we will ſerue our ſelues with Spaniſh Authors, which cannot be gaine-ſaid by them of their owne Nation) nameth the firſt Metropolitan Seat, to be that of Lyons.

Lyons the firſt Metropolitan Citie.

An ancient goodly City, laued and watered with the Riuers of Rhoſne, and of Saoſne, Rhone and Soan. The Archbiſhop thereof is Primate of the Gaules. This Primacie was heeretofore conteſted by the Archbiſhop of Sens, who euen to this day ſo entitleth himſelfe, and qualifieth Primate of the Gaules, and alſo of Germanie.

And

And yet notwithſtanding theſe interiected appellations of the Archbiſhop of Sens, it relied to the Primacy of Lyons, the Archbiſhop whereof preceded all the Metropolitanes in the Kingdome of France; conſequently thoſe of Spaine, and all the Kingdomes of Chriſtendome, what part ſoeuer they tooke or held in the Generall Councells. The Church is dedicated vnder the name of S. Iohn the Euangeliſt, remarkeable for the integrity there carefully kept for Diuine ſeruice, as it had beene from the Apoſtles time, and birth of the Church. For this cauſe it is ſaid of her, that Eccleſia Lugdunenſis non recipit nouitates.

The Order of the Metropolitane Sees of France, and how they are marſhalled ech after other.

It is then to be noted, that the Metropolitane Sees and Dioceſſes in the holy Kingdome of France, doe marche in this order. Lugdunenſis prima, Lugdunenſis ſecunda, Lugdunenſis tertia, Lugdunenſis quarta, Lugdunenſis quinta.

There is next after the firſt Gaule Belgica and ſecond, follow

The firſt, ſecond, and third Prouinces of Aquitaine: after which come the

First and ſecond Prouinces Narbonnoiſe, which S. Iſidore calleth the ſecond and third Prouinces Viennoiſes, and theſe are followed by the Fourth Prouince Viennoiſe, ſo ſaith S. Iſidore, and of the ſaid Prouinces, theſe are the Dioceſſes, Lyons the firſt Prouince of the Gaules.

The firſt Prouince of the Gaules, is that of Lyons, called in Latine Lugdunum, which hath for Suffragans foure Biſhopricks, on this ſide the Saone in Bourg-Ogne; to wit Autun, in Latine Aedua in the Commentaries of Cæſar, and Auguſtodunum by the Doctor of Doctors S. Hierome.

The City of Autun now deſert and ruined.

When as the See of Lyons is vacant, the Biſhop of Autun preſideth and gouerneth therein, whereof he maketh the fruits to be his: And the Archbiſhop of Lyons doth as much in the Biſhopricke of Autun, at ſuch time as it is without a Biſhop. This City of Autun, heeretofore one of the moſt renowned of the Gaules, in the time of Cæſar, and now deſert and ruined, is ſeated on the Riuer of Auron.

Kings of Orleans called Kings De Bourg-Ogne.

Next after marcheth Langres, called Lingonenſis Eccleſia, a Duchie and Peeredome of France, a City ſeated on the mountaine of Vauga, or Vouge, tearmed in Latine Voſegus, and Vogeſius by Lucane the Spaniſh Poet. A place famous for hunting, by our Kings of Orleans, called De Bourg-Ogne, of the firſt Line; as we haue ſaid in the Treatiſe, concerning the principall Officers of the Crowne of France.

After Langres is the Biſhoprieke of Maſcon, cited by Cæſar, and called Matiſco, and vulgarly, Ciuitas Matiſconenſis, ſeated on the Riuer of Saone. It is followed by that of Chalon, called by the Latine Geographers Cabilonum, and by Cæſar, Cabilinum; in like manner ſeated on the Riuer of Saone.

The 6. Biſhopricks of Normandie, marſhalled in their rank & order.

Lugdunenſis ſecunda, or the ſecond Prouince Lyonnois, is the ſame which wee call Normandie, the Metropolitane See or Seate whereof is Rouen, called in Latine Rothomagus, ſeated vpon the royall Riuer of Seine, and beautified with one of the Parlements of France. The Archbiſhop whereof entitleth and qualifieth himſelfe Primate of Normandie, hauing ſixe Suffragans vnder him, remarkeable by this ancient name Saeble. Theſe are the Biſhoprickes following; of Bayeux, called Baiocaſiu, Baiocenſis, Baiocæ, and the Inhabitant Baiocaſſes. Auranches is ſecond, in Latine Abrincenſis, Abrincantum, Abricatenſis, Arboricenſis, and Abrincæ. A Seate renowned by Robertus Cœnalis, Doctor in Diuinity, of the faculty of Paris, Biſhop of Auranches, whoſe Tombe and figure is to be ſeene raiſed in Copper, on the North ſide in the Quire of S. Pauls Church at Paris. After Auranches, is the Biſhopricke of Eureux, in Latine Ebroicum; the Inhabitants Ebroices in Cæſar, and their City Ciuitas Ebroicenſis. The next is Seez, in Latine Saienſis, and Sagium, the Inhabitants thereof are called by Cæſar, Populi Seſuuij. After Seez, followeth the Biſhoprick of Lizieux, in Latine Lexouium, the Inhabitants Lexouij Populi by Cæſar. And the laſt Coutances, in Latine Ciuitas Conſtantienſes, which is ſaid to be ſo named, not of the Emperour Conſtantine the Great, but of him that bare the ſame name, and who poſſeſſed himſelfe of Gaule, and of Great Britaine, as wee haue already ſaid. And although the Vulgar people of Normandie comprehend their Biſhopricks vnder the name of Saeble, as we haue ſaid) and aſſigne them their ranke according to that ano-minate name; Sees, Auranches, Coutance, Bayeux, Lizieux, Eureux: yet notwithſtanding from all times) the Biſhop of Bayeux is the prime Suffragan, and he of Auranches the ſecond.

Lugdunensis tertia, the third Lyonnois Prouince, comprehendeth the Archbishopricke of Tours, in Latine Turonus, and Vrbs Turonum, called Cæsaromagus in Ptolomy, a faire and famous City in the Garden of France, seated on the Riuer of Loire; greatly renowned, as well for hauing bin the assured retreat for the Parliament of Paris, during the troubles in France, excited by the factions of a bloudy and furious League: in memory whereof (euery yere) the Parlement of Paris feasteth the day of S. Gratian; as also for a Generall Councell, which was held there by Pope Alexander the third, who made his recourse into France, the nursing-mother of Popes, as we haue said. Alexander Papa tertius Concilium congregauit Turoni in Ecclesia sancti Mauritij duodecimo Kalendas Iunij. For the Metropolitane Church is dedicated to the Knight and Martyr S. Maurice, howsoeuer the Vulgar sort call the said Church S. Gatian.

France a Nursing-mother of Popes.

11. Suffragans belonging to Tours.

Shee hath 11. Bishopricks Suffragans; two in France, and the other nine in Bretaigne. The first is Mans, a City seated on the small Riuer of Sarte, in Latine Sarta, and the City Cenomannum & Coenomanensis Ciuitas. The second is Angiers, seated on the Riuer of Maine, in Latine Maduana; and the City of Angiers called Ciuitas Andegauensis, the Inhabitants Andes in Cæsar, and Lucane in his first booke.

Lugdunensis Quarta, or the fourth Lyonnois Prouince, containeth the Archbishopricke of Sens, Senonia and Senonensis Ciuitas, a Citie seated on the Riuer of Yonne, called in Latine Icauna. Yues Bishop of Chartres, in his tenth Epistle, called the Church of Sens his Mother, and there doth make mention of the olde quarrell of this Church, against that of Lyons, for the Precedencie and Primacie. Yet neuertheless, acknowledgeth that of Lyons for the Prime, and calleth it Primam Sedem, namely in the hundred twenty sixe Epistle. Hugoni primæ sedis Lugdunensis Ecclesiæ Episcopo, Sedis Apostolicæ Vicario. And in the 18. Epistle, written to to the Archbishop of Sens, Richerius, he counselleth him to labour his cause; because the Popes had ordained and giuen the Primacie to the Archbyshops of Lyons. Non est consilium meum (saith he) vt contra torrentem brachia dirigatis: immo Apostolicis sanctionibus interim acquiescatis absque preiudicio Priuilegiorum, vel authenticarum scripturarum, si quando rapperiri poterunt, quæ hanc subiectionem ab Ecclesia vestra removeant, & eiusdem Ecclesiæ libertatem defendant. And we learne, that the Primacie of Lyons might be founded vpon the Antiquity of the Citty. De veteri querela quam habet aduersus Senonensem, Ecclesia Lugdunensis Apostolicæ manu roborata, vel Scripta authentica, quæ Primatum Lugdunensis Ecclesiæ, quam aliquando ex catalogis Ciuitatum coniecimus exitisse, &c.

Vnder the said Archbishopricke of Sens, are seuen Bishoprickes, obserued of the vulgar by this Anonimate name, Campont: as namely Chartres, Auxerres, Meaux, Paris, Orleans, Neuers and Troy in Champaigne; and yet notwithstanding, they goe not in this Order. Chartres marcheth first of all, Ciuitas Carnotensis, and Carnatens, a Citie both high and low, seated on the small Riuer of Eure, in Latine called Autura, the Inhabitants named by Cæsar Carnutes, and by the Spaniard Lucan Carnuti Populi: vpon the Mount of this City it was, that the wise Druides had erected an Altar, dedicated and consecrated to the Virgin that should bring forth a Childe, Virgini Paritura. After Chartres is Auxerre, which holdeth the second place. It hath diuers appellations, the most ancient whereof is Autricum, and her Bishop, Episcopus Autricr, Altissidorum, and Ciuitas Altissidorensis, seated on the Riuer of Yonne. The third suffragan Bishopricke is that of Troy in Champaigne, a Citie seated on the royall Riuer of Seine, Ciuitas Tricassinorum, and the Inhabitants called by Ptolomie, Tricasses, and Tricassini. And in the Itinerarium of the Cosmographer Athicus Augustobona, but at this day commonly Trecæ, Trecarum. The Cathedrall Church is dedicated to S. Peter, Prince of the Apostles; after which is the Collegiate of S. Stephen, in the Quire whereof are three Tombes of Siluer, of Kings of Nauarre, Counts Palatine of Champaigne and Brie. Orleans is the fourth, whose denomination we haue formerly obserued. After Orleans is Paris, the acceptable abiding to the Monarchs of the Sacred Lillies of France, by good and iust cause named the Queene of Cities, and Capitall of the Kingdome of Kingdomes; famous by her first Bishop, the Great S. Denys Areopagita, Metropolitane Bishop of the Gaules, as we already obserued by the testimony of strange Authors. Cæsar called it in his language, Lutetiam Parisiorum. The sixt is the Bishopricke of Meaux, the Church whereof is dedicated to the first of Martyrs S. Stephen; Ciuitas Meldorum, seated on the Riuer of Marne, called in Latine Matrona, and Materna. And the last is that of Neuers, which receiued that name by her small Riuer, called Neuy, in Latine Neueris, which rowleth into Loire, in Latine Nigerna, and Ciuitas Niuernensis, which Cæsar saith, had beene a City depending vpon Autune, and the name Noniodunum Aeduorum. These are Bithoprickes Suffragans of the Church of Sens.

Lugdunensis Quinta, the fift and last Prouince Lyonnois, is Besançon, or Besanson, tearmed in Latine Vesontio, and by Historiographers Maxima Sequanorum. This Archbishopricke hath but one onely Suffragan in France, which is the Bishopricke of Bellay, called in Latine Episcopatus Bellicensis, of the Citie which beareth the same name, in the County of Bresse, happening by a Treaty of Exchange to the Sacred Crowne of France, in the reigne of King Henry the fourth of glorious memory, in Anno 1600.

The first Belgicke Gaule, hath for her Archbishop and Metropolitane, him of Treuers, sometime the capitall City of the Gaules, and which Ammianus Marcellinus calleth in his History, Clarum Domicilium Principum, The dwelling best liked of the Romane Emperors; and it is seated on the Riuer of Mosella. In the time of the Geographer Pomponius Mela, it bare the name of Augustam Vrbem, Of the Royall City, which he saith was the richest of the Gaules. S. Hierome bestowed his Study there, as we haue already said. The Bishop of Marseilles, Saluianus, and the Consull Ausonius the Bourdelois, speake wonders thereof. Yues, Bishop of Chartres giueth it the title of an Archbishopricke, Primæ Sedis Belgicorum.

The ſecond Belgicke Gaule containeth a part of Champaign, & Picardy wholly. Rheimes, called Durocortorum Remorum, by the Itinerarium of the Goſmographer Aethicus, and of Flardus in his hiſtory of the Church of Rhemes, was one of the Metropolitane Cities of the rich and abounding Gaules, as is obſerued by the Geographer Strabo (who liued vnder Auguſtus and Tiberius Emperours) and who nameth the City of Vienna in Daulphine, on the Riuer of Rhoſne, Metropolim Allobrogum: Durocortorum Metropolim Remorum: and Niſmes in Languedocke, Nemauſum Metropolim Arecomicorum. By the name of Μητροπολις were noted the capitall Ciuitates of the greateſt and moſt celebrate Prouinces, before the deſcent of the ſonne of God heere on earth. Chriſtians had retained this name of Metropolitane, and had Biſhops who had their ſeates in capitall Cities, where (before) Dukes and Romane Gouernours made their ordinary abiding, and who had other Prouinces alſo vnder their gouernments: becauſe the Dukes commanded in Counties, and the other in Vi-Counties and Vicaries or Vecegerencies, afterwards named Viguiers in the Nature of Preuoſts, as we haue ſaid in the booke of the principall Officers of the Crowne of France.

The Antiquitie of Metropolitane & Biſhops in chiefe and capitall Cities.

The Chriſtians of the Primitiue Church gaue (for honour) the name of Metropolitanes to Biſhops ordained by the Apoſtles, or their Diſciples; in principall Cities which bare name: with charge to haue an eye and command ouer Biſhops, appointed to Towns and Cities of the ſaid Prouince: and thoſe Biſhops were named Suffraganei, Suffraganes to the Metropolitane of ſuch or ſuch an holy Seate.

Thoſe Metropolitanes were called Firſt-Biſhops, and baptized with the name of Archbiſhop, about the yeere of Grace, fiue hundred foure-ſcore and ten, or very neere, as we ſhall further relate heereafter. And yet notwithſtanding, the ſaid Archbiſhops (for humilities ſake) tooke no other then the Title of Biſhops, as yet (to this preſent) doth the Pope, vniuerſall head of the Church; who tearmeth himſelfe Epiſcopus, Seruus ſeruorum Dei, and who, by a name of Precedency and Honor, was ſometime called Apoſtole, Apoſtolle, in our Romanciers, and by Biſhops Apoſtolicus. And the Readings of the Biſhop of Auuergne, Sidonius Apollinaris enſtructeth vs; that Biſhops, famous for Learning and Sanctity of life, were called by their Fellow brethren, Papæ, that is to ſay, Fathers of Father, Patres Patrum: and by another manner of ſpeeche, Apoſtolica ſede digniſſimi, worthy to gouerne the holy Seat of Rome, and S. Peters ſhippe.

When the name of Archbiſhop firſt began.

The Citie of Rheims (very famous from the time of Cæſar, becauſe it was then honored with this title of Metropolitane) ſeated on the Riuer of Vele, in Latine Vidula: is a Duchie, and the prime Peeredome of France, and the place where are Sacred and Crowned The moſt-Chriſtian Kings of France. And in the incloſure thereof, is the Abbey and Arch-Monaſterie of S. Rhemigius, Apoſtle of the French, as Pope Sylueſter, before named Gebert, calleth him in one of his Epiſtles: where is kept the holy Viole or Bottell, full of Baulme, brought from Heauen, at the Sacring and Baptiſme of Clouis, wherewith our Monarches are Sacred.

Senlis. The Archbiſhopricke of Rheimes hath eight Biſhops Suffragans; as namely, that of Soiſſons, a Citie called by the Geographer Aethicus, and other auncient Authors, Auguſta Great Priuiledges granted to the Abbey of S. Mard. Pope Gregory, firſt of that name, gaue great Priuiledges to this Abbey, in the Bull, where are named Flauius, Archbiſhop of Rheimes, and the Archbiſhop of Arles Etherius. The ſaid Pope (who ſate vnder the Reigne of Childebert, ſecond of the name, King of France) granted the ſaid Priuiledges, whereby he gaue this Elogium of Honour to the ſaid Abbey of S. Marde: That it was the Mirrour, and the Rule of them which made profeſſion of Monaſticall life. Erat regula Monachorum Francia, and Vic on Aine, the place of their obedience. In the Cathedrall Church of S. Gerualſe, is written this verſe in Capital Letters, for the rank of the ſaid Church.

AFter Soiſſons is the Biſhopricke of Chaalons, in Latine Catalaunum, and Eccleſia Catalaunenſis, ſeated on the Riuer of Marne, in Latin Matrona, and by ſome Hiſtorians, Materna, a Count Peeredome of France. The Church was dedicated in the name of the moſt bleſſed Trinity; of the Virgin Mary, S. Stephen the firſt Martyr, S. Iohn Baptiſt, S. Valerie, and S. Vincent Martyres, in the yeere of Grace 1147. the ſeuenth of the Calends of Nouember, by Pope Eugenius, ſecond of the name, refuged in France, and aſſiſted by ſixe Biſhops; to witte, Albericke of Hoſtia, Viuiers of Tuſculanum, Thibault of Paris, Bernard of Auxerre, Hugo of Neuers, and Bartholomew of Chaalons.

Amiens. Amiens, Ambianum, Ciuitas Ambianenſis, ſo named, in regard of ten Chanells of the Riuer of Somme which water this City; famous by her Cathedral Church, the very faireſt in the world, and for the head of the firſt Martyr, S. Iohn Baptiſt.

was diuided into three portions, each of them attributed to a new Bishopricke, as namely; one at Bologne, in former times an Abbey of great deuotion, dedicated to the Sacred Virgin; another at S. Omer, Sanctus Audomarus in Latine: and the third at Ypre. And these three new Bishopricks, with the three ancient of Arras, Cambray, and Tournay (the Cathedrall Churches whereof are dedicated vnto Gods Mother) were Suffragans to the Archbishopricke of Rhemes. Let vs now come to the seuerall Aquitaines.

Of the first Aquitaine, & all thereunto appertaining.

Aquitania Prima, comprehendeth Berry, Limosine, Auuergne, Caourcy, Rouergue and part of Lanouedocke. The Metropolitane City is Bourges in Berry, called Auarum Biturigum in Latine; by reason of the small Riuer, whereon this City is seated, called Auron, in Latine Varon, and her streame passing betweene the Port of Auron, and the Wall of the City, is termed Yeure. The Inhabitants beyond it are called Auaricenses, by a difference from those of Bourdeaux descending among them, and named Auarices Vrnefci; as we haue obserued in the History of Nauarre. The Cathedrall Church is dedicated to the Martyr S. Stephen, on the Frontespice whereof, these words are engrauen in Capitall Letters.

Patriarchalis Ecclesia
Sancti Stephani.

The Holy Chappell at Bourges.

At Bourges is to be seene the holy Chappell, built by Monsieur Iohn of France, Duke of Berry (brother vnto King Charles the fifth) who liued aboue foure score and two yeeres: and in the Quire thereof is to be seene his Tombe of Marble, and by him one of his two wiues, whose name I haue forgot. But I remember well the deuise of the good Duke, which is engrauen on his Tombe, whereby I learne, that (vpon pleasure) he called his wife by a merry nick-name Ourſigne, and her deuise was thus emblazoned. There was the figure of a Beare, and another of a Swanne, and between them these words, Le Temps Viendra, implying thus much, Ourſigne, The Time will come: perhaps vpon some hope which he had, which we are not able to diuine of. But well we know, that he bare the Beare for his deuise, a creature which produceth her like without any forme, like to a lump of flesh, as Moales or Monne-calues; but by the power of licking, she formeth and patterneth it. Wherefore Lambendo, by Licking, the Time will come. According to that which Plinie reporteth: Plutarch in his Tract of loue of Fathers towards their children; with Aelianus, in their naturall Histories of Creatures.

The deuise engrauen on the Duke's tombe.

Lewis de Bourdon a valiant Gentleman of Auuergne.

The Chronicle of Messire Iuuenall des Vrsines, vnder the yeare 1411. speaking of the Siedge of Dampes, being a demaine belonging to the said Duke of Berry, in which regard, there commanded a valiant Gentleman of Auuergne, named Lewes de Bourdon, to whom, (after surprizal of the Towne, and he retreated to the Castle, which could no longer hold out:) word was sent, that hee should come to speake with the King, Charles the fixt, and the Dukes of Guienne and Bourgongne, with safety: He came thither well apparelled, in a Robe of crimson Velvet, all imbroadered with Beares, and according to the Deuise of the Duke of Berry, and he likewise had giuen it him.

Like delight of Princes in deuises, and obseruation of Creatures, and Ladies names by them affected.

In those times then, the solace and delight of Princes was, to take pleasure in Deuises, and obserue them according to Creatures, and letters of Ladies names by them affected. The same Chronicle of the Vrsines, speaking of King Charles the 6, saith, that he loued the daughter of a Knight, named Cassinell, in fauour whom, he made his Standards & Banners, according to her liuery, and in letters of gold were wrought a K. a Swan, & an L. which denoted the name of his fauored Cassinelle. In these daies a mockery is made, of the vse of Ciphers or Deuises, as in the time of King Frances. Al. fauours of Susan, sister to Magdalen D'Estampes. Quidquid Principi placuit, lege Regia, Legis habet vigorem.

Bourges in Berry hath 10. Bishops Suffragans.

THe Archbishopricke hath ten Bishoprickes Suffragans, the first whereof is that of Clairmont in Auuergne, Sedes Aruernorum, Ciuitas Aruernensis, and by another Claromontensis, and for excellencie Aruernum, seated at a place, or about the auncient Gergouia. At the said Clairmont was held a generall Councill, wherein presided Pope Vrbane the second, and his Cardinals, being come for refuge into the Kingdome of France, according to their custome, in the yeare one thousand foure-score and fifteene. In this Councill was resolued the enterprise, for Conquest of the Holy-Land, by the French Princes.

Rhodes.

AFter Clairmont marcheth Rhodes, Ciuitas Ruthenorum, the Inhabitants Ruthens by Cæsar, now at this time Rouergats; great vaunters in their Buffaric language. This Citie is entoured with Mountaines, washed by the Riuer of Auion, in Latine Aueris. The Steeple of the Church is made of Bricke, in forme Octogone, flat aboue: a Tower which is held for the goodliest in the Countrey, and raised a Prouerbe, as we say in France. The Quire of Beauuais; the Body of Amiens; the Porch of Rheims; and Towers of Paris, all to make a Church perfect and compleate. So they of the Countrey say, Cloutherie de Rhoudes, Campane de Mende, Egleyse d'Alby. The Steeple of Rhodes, the Bell at Mende, and the Church of Alby; which followeth next after Rhodes.

Alby

THis white Citie of Alby, called Albia, ad Tarnum Sita, is on the Riuer of Tarn. Her Cathedrall is Dedicated to the Virgin S Cecilie, and holdeth but one onely Vault or Arch. But it is so richly depicted with Gold, euen from the top to the floore; as I haue neuer seene a fairer any where else. The Inhabitants are called by Romaine Geographers, Elay, and of the said Citie, the Mother to the Oratour Cicero, was a native.

Cahors in Quercy.

AFter Alby, followeth Cahors in Quercy, and by them of the Countrey Cahourcy, in Latine Cadurcum, seated on the Riuer of Oll, called in Latine Olda. Famous in regard of her Bridge, Rampared with three or foure Gates, strongly Porcullized, and being the great passage to Tolosa.

Limoges.

LImoges, the Inhabitants whereof are called by Cæsar Lemouices, renowned by her first Apostle S. Marcell, Contemporane with the great S. Denys Areopagita, as we haue said in the life of this first Bishop of the Parisians. It is seated on the Riuer of the Vigenna, according to the Limozine pronuntiation, where all the cadence is in A: in Latine Vigenna. This Church was held for the first Seate of the said first Aquitaine, and there was held a Prouinciall Councill, in the yeare one thousand fourtie two: vnder signed by Aimon, Archbishop of Bourges; Iourdain, Bishop of Limoges; Stephen, Bishop of Puy in Velay; Raucon of Auuergne; Ragamond of Mende; Aemilius of Alby; Deus-Dedit of Cahors; Isembert of Poictiers, Arnould of Perigueux; and Roull of Engoulesme. After Limoges, commeth in order the Bishopricke of MEnde, in Latine Mimatus, Ciuitas Gabalorum, seated on the Riuer of Oll (as well as Cahors) which is passed on a small Bridge of Stone, two Crosse-Bowe-shoote going from Seuenes (Cabennæ, vel Gebennæ) to S. Geniez on the banke of Oll. Wee haue said somewhat heretofore, in speaking of the Regalias, whereto we will adde, that the Cathedrall Church thereof, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, was pilled by a wicked wretch, and rebuilded by Bishop Adam de Heurte-Lou, after God had giuen vs peace, by the treatie of Veruins; decorated by his Successour and Nephew, Bishop Charles Rousseau. At the Porch of this Church, are two great Steeples of Stone, whereof that on the North-side, is of admirable structure, entoured with Galleries for the day-time. Here was the place of the great Bell, so farre ſamed, whereof I haue seene and measured the height and bredth, by the Clapper, as they call it (it is a Bataill in Armes) comming neere to that of S. Geneniefue at Paris. This Steeple is the very faireſt of Languedocke, whereto that of Rhodes is not to be compared.

Puy in Velay.

Puy in Velay, in Latine Auicium, ſo named by the Mountaine, at the foote where-of it is ſeated; but by the Inhabitants Lou Puech, and beyond it, Podium, her Cathedrall Church being dedicated to the Sacred Virgin, daily reſorted to for Miracles; the Spanyards call it La Segnora di Francia. This Church (among all other) hath this priuiledge, that at all times, and as often as our Lady day in March, chanceth to fall vpon Good Friday (which we at Paris call Holy-Friday:) there is a Iubilie of plenary Indulgence; whether people reſort from all the Coũtries of France and Spaine. The Chronicle of Iuuenall des Vrſins, vnder the yeare 1406. ſaith. In this Lent, our Lady Day was on the Holy-Friday. And it is ſaid, that when it falleth ſo on the Holy-Friday: there is then generall pardon for ſinne and puniſhment at Puy. And there was a World of People, wonderfull to behold: for there were aboue two hundred perſons crowded to death and ſmothered.

This is the great high way from Paris to Toloſa. And all th is happened in the yeare of Grace, One thouſand three hundred and eightcene.

Of the ſecond Aquitaine and her appendixes.

Aquitania ſecunda, properly called Guienne, hath for her Metropolitane Seate, the Cittie of Bourdeaux, Turgum Aquarum, in Latin Burdegala; & by the Geographers Portus Luna, becauſe ſhee is ſeated like to an halfe Moone, on that ſide where ſhe is b thed with the great Riuer of Garonna, bowed in an halfe Circle, yet wholly round, that way which leaneth to the Lands of Bourdeaux. And vpon this reaſon, this Citie beareth a Creſcent in her Armes, with the repreſentation of her Riuer, of her Towne-Houſe, the Leopard of Guienne, with the Chiefe of France. Her Inhabitants are called Auares Vibiſci, as we haue elſewhere ſaid. The Metropolitane Church is dedicated to the Apoſtle S. Andrewe; honored with a Parlement, and a moſt famous Vniuerſitie. She hath pretended the Primacie of Aquitaine, againſt her Mother, the Patriarchall Church of Bourges, maintained in her auncient priuiledge. Bourdeaux hath nine Biſhoprickes Suffragans, as namely;

The Armes of the Cittie.

Agen.

Agen, a goodly and pleaſant Cittie, ſeated on the Riuer of Garonna, called by Ceſar Nitiobrigum, the Inhabitants Nitiobriges: and now Aginnum, and Ciuitas Aginnenſis, renowned by her Patron S. Capraiz.

Angouleſme.

Angouleſme, in Latin Eccoliſma, and Engoliſma by S. Gregory of Tours, and Lupus, Abbot of Ferrieres; bencath which runneth the Riuer of Charente, in Latine Carentonus amnis; famous by the ſanctitie of her Abbot Sanctus Eparchius, in French S. Cibar, according to the teſtimonie of S. Gregory of Tours. The learned Cardinall Baronius, obſerueth the Feaſt of S. Gregory of Tours, in his Romaine Martyrologe, on the ſeauenteenth day of Nouember, in theſe words. Turoni Sancti Gregorij Epiſcopi. He departed out of this life in the yeare of Grace, fiue hundred foureſcore and foureteene, the fourth of the Pontificacie of Pope Gregory, firſt of the name, and the one and twentieth of the ſaid Gregory of Tours.

Saintes or Santes.

Saintes, Santones in Ceſar, and in the Itinerarium of Aethicus, Mediolanum Santonum. This Citie is deuided in two parts, by the ſame Riuer of Charente, and without it, in going from Poictiers to Bourdeaux, is to be ſeene the remnants of three Churches Churches of S. Eutropius, Patron of them, builded one vpon another, and laid in ruines, as markes of the irreligion of pretended Reformers, who of all the Images of Saints, haue not left one whole, or without breaking; but the repreſentation of the wicked Traitor Iudas Iſcariot, the firſt Sacramentarie Heretique that had bin during the Lawe of Grace. I haue ſeene the like Hiſtorie, at the Porch of the auncient Abbey of S. Gilles in Languedocke, where all the Apoſtles and their Maſter, are broken and maſſacred by the ſame pretended Reformers, and Iudas is left in his Pontificacie, by a ſecret article of their reformed Cabala.

Poictiers.

Poictiers, in Saint Hierome called Pictauium; by Ptolomie, Auguſtoritum Pictonum, a faire Citie, & famous Vniuerſitie (where I tooke my Licences in the Ciuile and Canon Lawes) ſeated on the Riuer of Clain. By the Inhabitants (whom Ceſar calleth Pictones and Lucane Pictones immunes,) named the Clan, and in Latine Glanus. Which hath for her Cathedrall Saint Peter, ter and for Tutelarie Patron, Saint Hilarie, the Hammer of the Arrian Heretiques.

Perigueux.

NExt followeth the Biſhopricke of Perigueux, in Latine Petracorium, called and named heretofore Veſuna Petracoriorium, by the Geographers: at this preſent Ciuitas Petracorcenſis, ſeated on the Riuer of Iſles, tearmed in Latine Ella.

In Aquitania ſecunda foure Biſhoprickes added by the Pope.

Pope Iohn the two and twentieth, added there foure Biſhoprickes Suffragans and more, to wit; Condom, Ciuitas Condomienſis, ſeated on the ſmall Riuer of Baize, in Latine Biliſa; famous by the Poet Du Bartas, becauſe it paſſeth by Nerac, three miles from whence, and ſixe miles from Auch, is the Citie of Condom. In the Cathedrall Church (dedicated to S. Peter) are the Tombes of Iohn and Blaize de Montluc, Brethe.en, the one Biſhop of Valencia in Daulphine, and the other, Marſhall of France, honored by his Commentaries.

Maillezais.

Maillezais in the Dioceſſe of Poictiers, Ciuitas Malleacenſis: the Chanons retaine ſtill to this day, the habite of S. Benet.

Luſon.

Lygon, or Luſon, likewiſe eclipſed from the Biſhopricke of Poictiers, Ciuitas Lucionenſis, and Lucronum in one word. And of theſe two new Biſhoprickes is deſcended the Prouerbe: Beati qui habitant Vrbes; exceptis Luſon & Maillezais.

Saſlat.

AND the laſt is Sarlat, betweene Cahors and Montauban, and in the Dioceſſe of Perigueux, Sarlatum, Ciuitas Sarlatenſis; famous by the Tombe and Body of S. Sacerdos, a Bourdelois by originall, and the thirteenth Biſhop of Limoges.

Of the third Aquitaine, and her dependances of nine Dioceſſes.

Aquitania tertia called Gaſcoigne, & by notice of the Roman Empire Nouem populana, commanding ouer nine Dioceſſes; hath for her Metropolitan the litle Citie of Auch Metropolitan of the Countie of Armagnack, & neighbouring Prouinces: but which ſurpaſſe in valure L'Arcobiſco de Toledo. It is ſeated on a Mountaine, where is the Cathedrall Church, dedicated to the ſacred Virgin, The Treaſure of Miracles. At the foote of this Citie of Auch (called in Latine Auſcenſis Auſcitana, and Auxitana Ciuitas) runneth the ſmall Riuer of Gers, in Latine Aegircius, which deſcendeth downe the Valley of Aura, and looſeth it ſelfe in Garonna. Fortunatus, Biſhop of Poictiers, deſcribeth theſe Meruailes.

Lubicat hic quoniam tenuato Aëgircius hauſtu,
Præfert druitias paupere fonte tuas.
Laus tibi ſorte minor fuerat generoſe Garonna.

Anciently the Metropolitaine Seate was in the ſmall Borough of Eaure, called by the Romaines Eluſaberis: by the Geographer Pomponius Mela, and by the Poet Claudian, Eluſa.

Muroſque

——Muroſque inuadit Eluſæ,

It is diſtant from Auch twelue great miles, and the ruines doe ſhew, that it had bin in much better condition, for I my ſelfe haue ſeene it: the auncient Church of Auch is S. Peter, beneath the Mountaine on the Riuer of Gers, without the Citie: on the backe whereof is the Abbey of S. Orens, in Latine Orentius, of the Order of Cluny, where I haue ſeene many auncient Sepulchers: it was founded by a Count of Armagnac, whom they called Bernard Luſt. The Seate of Auch is famous by an infinite number of worthy Biſhops, placed in the Catalogue of Saints, the chiefe of them, and their Reliques, are releuated by Leonard de Trappes, at this preſent Archbiſhop of Auch, a venerable Seate, which hath for Suffragans theſe following.

Aqs. Aqs, in Latine Ciuitas Aquenſis by the Romaines, and in the Itinerarium of the Greographer Aethicus, Aquæ Auguſtæ, in regard of the Bathes of hot water, which are of no great moment.

Letoure in Armagnac. THe ſecond is Letoure in Armagnac, as is the Citie of Auch, and both of them ſeated on the ſmall Riuolet of Gers, in Latine Aegircius, I haue ſeene on one of the Gates this inſcription. Lectora Ciuitas Regia, Ciuitas Lectorenſis.

Comminges. Comminges, which hath for Epiſcopall Seate S. Bertrand, of the name of the Biſhop: a little Citie, beneath which is the Village called Baccrauere, in Latine Vallis Capraria, where is a Monaſterie of Cordeliers, or Graie Friers. Neere to which is the Riuer of Garonna, which hath bin paſſed (in my time) vpon a Bridge of Wood, called S. Iuſt, as we haue ſaid. The ordenary dwelling of the Biſhop is fiue miles from the ſaid S. Bertrand of whom I haue ſeene the Coape, and an Vnicornes Horne, curiouſly polithed, and pierced quite thorow: that at S. Denys in France cannot be compared therewith) at the Caſtell of Alan, repaired (in my time) by Biſhop Vrban of Gelas, of the houſe of Lanſacke, in whoſe Librarie I haue ſeene very rare Manuſcrips Bookes; for that Prelate knew many things. S. Hierome enſtructeth vs, that Great Pompey hauing made the Spaynes peaceable, and laid the foundation of the Royall Citie of Nauarre Pampeiona, called it by his owne name, Pompeiopolis, in the yeare ſeauen hundred from Romes foundation, Iulius Syllanus, and Lucius Murena being then Conſuls. So paſſing and returning to the Gaules, hee made ſtay for his old Souldiours (S. Hierome writing againſt Vigilantius, qualifieth them to be Bardoultors, that is to ſay, men liuing badly, by the [a] Sacke or Corde: Ex Veſtionibus, Arbuſtis, & Cultoribus, that had no other honeſt meanes) on the Riuer of Garonna, in the Pyrenean Mountaines. And that there he cauſed to be builded a Citie of very great circuite, thwarted by the Riuer of Garonna, and that this inhabitation he called Conuenæ; afterward by corruption of Language, Comenges, as it is at this day, retaining the ſame deuiſe which S. Hierome gaue it Conuenis, Conueniunt, Conuenæ.

The Biſhops ordenary abiding.

A note concerning Pompey the Great in building Pompeiopolis.

[a] Such as liue by drowning men in Sacks, or ſtrangling them with Halters.

And of S. Bertrand, it is called Ciuitas Conuenarum; and the Prouince Comitatus Conuenarum: which hath eight [b] Caſtell-wicks, as namely Muret, Semmathan, Caceres, Aurignac, S. Iulian, Salzes, and Caſtillon; in all which Townes are to be ſeene the Armes of the auncient Counts of the Prouince, who bare De Guelles à Quatre Otelles d'Argent en Saultour. This Countie is of very great extendure, from the Frontiers of France and Spaine, ſo farre as to the Port of S. Subran of Toloſa, hauing many Vicounties vnder it, and three Biſhoprickes: as namely Comenges, from fiftie to ſixtie thouſand pounds, according to the moſt value of Corne: Couzerans, at twelue or fifteene thouſand pounds: and Lombez, from nine to tenne thouſand.

[b] Farr'ier or ordinary of a Lord's Caſtell.

The extendure of the Countie of S. Bertrand.

At what time, and how it was reunited to the Crowne of France.

It was reunited to the Crowne of France, in the yeare 1442. as it happened by the will and teſtament (and as I haue read in the Regiſters of the Chamber or Court of Accounts at Paris) of the Counteſſe of Comenges Margaret, Wife (vnworthily, and ill-entreated, theſe are the words of the donation) of Mathew de Foix, fourth Sonne of Archembauld de Grailly, Captall de Buch, and of Puy-Paulin, Vicount of Benauges, and of Caſtelbon; and of Iſabell, heire to the Countie of Foix, and Seigneurie of Bearn: This was thus done vnder the reigne of King Charles the ſeauenth.

Fabulous reports of Pompey the great his City of Comenges.

I let paſſe in ſilence the fabulous Tales, which they of the Countrie haue related to me, concerning the greatneſſe of their auncient Citie of Comenges, builded by the great Pompey, which (they ſay) extended from the Village of Barbazan, ſo farre as to Mont Rean (that is Mont-reall) on the Riuer, which are almoſt two leagues in length, and the like in breadth. And as for this Countie, it extendeth it ſelfe farre into Spaine, and ſo farre, as to the Vicountie of Paillars, and to many Ports, for paſſage into Spaine. Namely, to that of S. Beat; another of Bagneres de Luſon, ſo named by the excellent Bathes of hot Water, whether there is going twice yearely, in the Moneths of May, and of September. This Port is alſo named by Benaſque, for the prime Village of Spaine, whence men paſſe to Saragoſſa, trauailing by Nelle, Campo, Aguas, La Puebla de Caſtres, Barbaſtre, Peralta, Saragnica, Hoſtalric, Ville Maſar, Sarragoſſa. After that is next the Port of Beauce, ſo named of the laſt Village of Spaine, betweene Nauarre and Arragon, from whence men deſcend into France, to the goodly Valley of Aura, in Latine Vallis Aurata. And from Spaine they come to lodge at a pleaſant Bourough, named Arreon, whereof S. Exuperius, Biſhop of Toledo was a native. I haue ſeene the place of his houſe, and a little Chappell of deuotion aboue Arreon; whence they goe to Sarancoulin, Prieure, where the Marſhall of Monluc (as he writeth in his Commentaries) ment to make his retear, ſeeing the troubles of France, raiſed by the new Euangelians, to whom he was a great friend. This Prioric appertained to his Brother Iohn de Monluc: From Sarancoulin they come to Monlon, Caſtelnau-de Magnoac, and to Auch.

Hot Bathes of reknowned vertue, Yeerely, May and September.

The goodly Valley of Aurata in France.

Couzerans. AFter Comenges followeth the Biſhopricke of Couzerans, Conſoraunenſis Ciuitas, a Vicountie. The Lord of Iornaille writeth, that at the firſt Voyage beyond the Seas, which S. Lewes made, he tooke acquaintance with Arnaud, Vicount of Couzerans, who bare the ſir-name of Spaine (there are many of this ſir-name in Gaſcoigne, as the Lord of Monteſpan, and others) Et l'Eſcu d'Or à la Bordure de Gueulles, Armes which our King Charlemaigne had giuen to his Predeceſſours. I know not whether theſe Viſcounts (in my time, this Viſcountie was fallen to the Diſtaffe, or Female) are as yet of this ſir-name: for, concerning them of S. Girons, beneath Couzerans, they are ſirnamed of Narbona, the laſt hauing the name of Emeric de Narbona. Now, his name of Couzerans, is that of the Prouince, and not of the Cathedrall Citie, which by the name of one of her Biſhops, was called S. Lize, in Latine Sanctus Licerius, who is the Patron of the Citie, where is his Church. And as for the Cathedrall Church, which is aboue, encloſed with Walles, and ſeperated from the Citie by the great Corps de Garde: it is dedicated to S. Mary, where the Biſhopricke is in goodly ſight. Since my time, there was a Biſhop, borne in Piedmont, a Gray Frier, named Franciſcus Bonardus, a learned Prelate, and who Preached very often to his Flocke. He had for his ſucceſſour one called De Lingua, his Nephew, a Gray Frier likewiſe; but yet not equalling his Vncle in learning. This ſmall Citie bare for Armes, D'Azur à la Campane d'Argent Batailee de Sable. In the Suburbs is the Hoſtel de Dieu, founded by a Biſhop, whoſe Tombe is yet to be ſeene in the Chappell at the ſame place. Beyond that we paſſe the Riuer of Salat, in Latine Sala, vnder a Bridge of Stone; in the midſt whereof is a ſtrong Tower, where Sentinell is kept, and the ſaid Bridge is ſhut vp faſt in the night time. At the end whereof, againſt the Mountaine, is a little Chappell, called Noſtre Segnore del Cap del Pon, which is obſerued by all the Townes of Gaſcoigne, where there are any Bridges. Vnder the firſt Arch of that of S. Lize, as we come from Toloſa, to goe to S. Girons, or to Caſtillon; I haue often times read this inſcription, engrauen in old Letters, Sacrum. Mirmuae. Fatidicae. Which ſheweth, that this Bridge had bin builded, during the Denonomany of the ancient Romans; notwithſtanding the fabulous reports, which thoſe of the Country ſpread abroad from time to time.

Couzerans.

A great diſhonour to any Houſe of France to fall to the Female.

The Bridge of S. Lize.

Next

Aire, at the further end of Gascoigne.

NExt followeth the Bishopricke of Aire, a small Citie, at the other end of Gascoigne, called in Latine Adura, Ciuitas Aduxensis; seated on the Riuer of Adour, Atyrus, and Aturrus, as we haue said.

Bazas.

THen is Bazas, seated in the Launds betweene Castet-Ieloux, and Langon, for going to Bourdeaux; in Latine Ciuitas Vasatensis, and the Inhabitants Vazates. The ground is very meagre, barren and sandie; therefore Paulinus, writing to the Bourdelois Poet Ausonius, tearmeth his Soyle Vasates Arenosas.

Consul Arenosas non dedignare Vastatas.

The said Ausonius called this Citie of Basas, Cossionem, municipale genus Vasatum; and Sedonius Apollinaris nameth it, Ciuitatem Vasatum. Whereto he gaue this nickename or by-word; That it was not seated on greene turffie, fattie earth, but on dust; Ciuitas Vasatum non cespiti imposita sed pulueri.

Tarbes. The first Kings of Nauarre their defeat.

NExt is Tarbes, Tarbella in Vibius Sequester, and Tibullus

——— Tarbella Pyrene.

The Inhabitants Tarbelli Populi, otherwise Bigerriones; this is the Countie of Bigorre, held by one named Centon, Count of Bigorre, of whose Ligne are descended the first Kings of Nauarre, as we haue said in the Historie of the Kingdome, the most auncient of all them of Spaine. These Bigourdans are surnamed by Ausonius, Fourrez, Pellitos Begerras, and their houses Smoakie, because their Chimnies stand in the middest of them smouldred with fire of Pine-tree-Wood, whereof they make their Cottages and Candelles.

Nigrantesque casas, & tecta mapalia culmo,
Dignasque pellitus habitas deserta Bigerris.

Tarbes diuided into three Bourgages.

Tarbes is a Valley sufficiently acceptable, watered with the Adoue, Aturrus, and Atyrus, as we haue so many times said; and deuided in such sort, as into three long Villages or Hamlets: whereof one is the Citie, the Cathedrall Church whereof is dedicated to the Sacred Virgin.

A goodly great way paued with Stone three miles long.

From Tarbes in ascending three miles aboue, is a goodly great way paued (during all the three miles) with faire great Stones, for going to the Bathes, the very goodliest that I haue seene in all my Voyages. For those of Barbotan, the Batherie of Lucon, and of Eucausse (which in the Itinerarium of Aethicus are called Aquas Conuenarum) nor all those of Genaudan, Languedocke, Prouence, and other Prouinces of France, cannot equall these Bathes, for pleasantnesse of the place, and aboundance or plentie of all kinde of Game. And this was it which moued the Poet of Gascoigne to write in praise thereof, after hee had toucht others in his passage along.

Baigneres la beauté, l'honneur, le Paradis
De ces monts sourcilleux.
Ces monts enfarinez d'vne Neige eternelle
La flancquent d'vne part, la verdure immortelle
D'vne plaine qui passe en riante beauté,
Le Vallon Penean la ceint d'autre costé.
Elle n'a point maison qui ne semble estre neufue;
L'Ardoise luit par tout: chaque Rue a son Fleuue,
Qui clair comme Christal, par la Ville ondoyant
Va toute heure bu'on veut le Paué ballayant.
Et bien qu'entre son flot, aussi froid que la glace
Et le Bain chasse-mal on trouue peu d'espace,
Il retient sa nature, & ne veut tant soit peu
Meslanger, orgueilleux, son Froid auec son Feu.

Bathe

Bathe there bright Beauties: Honors Paradise
To those high Mountaines well may you entise.
Mountaines all whited with eternall Snowe
Flancke the one part; Immortall verdures flowe, Vpon a Plaine, that's lonely Beauties pride:
The penean Vale engirts the other side.
Not any House, but seemeth fairely new,
Slate shines on all. Each Streete hath (as his due)
Bright Christall currents; washing through the Towne,
And all the goodly Pauement streameth downe
Entring his waues, so cold as any Ice,
The harme expelling Bathe, as very nice
Of his owne nature: proudly doth aspire,
Not to commix his cold, with that of Fire.

The Bathes of Bigorre resorted to from all parts of Spain.

The like is seene of all the Bathes by him specified, whether the Spaniards themselues come from all the parts of Spaine; but especially to the Bathes of Bigorre. For there is one Channell or Current of hot Water, and Sulphure, wherein Egges may be boyled, and Foules plumed or pluckt. At the rest (yearely) are an infinite number of vnknowne diseases cured, vtterly forsaken of Physitions.

Ceste Prouince abonde en Bains non achetez,
Ou le Peuple Estranger accourt de tous costez,
Ou la Femme Brehaigne, ou le Paralytique,
L'Vlceré, le Goutteux, le Sourd, le Sciatique
Quittant du blond Soleil l'vne, & l'autre maison
Trouue sans desbourser sa prompte guarison.
Encausse en est tesmoin, & les Eaux salutaires
De Cauderetz, Barege, Aigues caudes, Baigneres.

The Soyle abounds in Bathes, surpassing Art,
Strange People thither flocke from euery part.
The Barren Woman, and the Palsied Man,
Th'Vlcerd, Goutie, Deafe, Sciaticke, can
Finde present cure, without disbursing pay
(When golden-tressed Sol forsakes the way
To both his Houses:) There is no delay.
Encausses Soueraigne waters witnesse plaine:
That all Diseases are quite cleerd of paine.

Aquas Terebellicas.

THe Itinerarium calleth these Baths of Bigorre, Aquas Terebellicas, from which he counteth the waies, which make for Bourdeaux and Tolosa, in descending from Spaine. Now although the name of this delectable place, be designed by the titles of the Bathes of Bigorre: yet notwithstanding, without the Church of S. Martin, in the Subburbs of the said Village, is a Stone of the Countries White Marble, whereon is an Inscription in olde Romane Letters, which declareth, that the Inhabitants of the place were called Vicani; and that where this Church now standeth, was sometime a Temple, dedicated to the God of Physitians, Mercurie, to whom the blinded Romans (during the time of Paganisme) attributed the vertue of the waters of these Bathes.

The people in former times were called Vicani.

Merc. Sac. Vicanorum.
Aquensium.

Euery one knoweth what is meant by the name Vicus, & inde Vicani: in Spaine and Gascoigne there are many Villages and Hamlets, baptised by the name of Vic D'Ozone, a Bishopricke formerly spoken of, in the Diocesses of Spayne. In Gascoigne, in that of Auch, Vic-Fezensac, Vic-Bigorre, and infinite other beside. Now, it is a question, to know certainely, whether this Citie of Tarbes, be that, or no, whereof S. Gregory of Tours speaketh, calling it Bigorram, when he maketh relation of Morganengeba, of the Queene of Austrasia Brunehault, who committed so many Murders in France, on the persons of tenne, as well Kings, as Princes of the Blood of France. And by iudgement of the Generall Estates of the Kingdome, she was drawne alive at the taile of an vntamed Mare, to Authune, where shee was buried. De Cuntalibus Burdegala, Lemouica, Cadureo, Benarno & Begorra, &c. To take them vpon the letter of the word Citie, ought to be vnderstood as of Townes and Cathedrall Cities.

Brunehault, the great Murdresse of France

Going from S. Sean the Promontorie of Gascoigne) to Tarbes, you shall see a great Borough, which the Inhabitants of the Countrey call Lourde. All these Boroughes, situated within the Pyrenean Mountaines, are wonderfully faire, and well built of Stone, hauing likewise all couered with Slate, whereof there is great aboundance.

This Borough of Lourde, is called Lapurdum, in the notice of the Westerne Empire, and where the Romaines alwaies kept a strong Garrison of old Souldiours, on dead payes, for guard of the Frontiers of Gaule and Spaine. I soiourned there one whole day with my Company, to obserue the Antiquities, among which there is a great Tower (worke manship of the Romaines) which serued as a donion to a Castell, the ruines whereof are yet to be seene. It is impossible (in a dayes space) with a Mattocke and a Chizell, to get forth so many Stones as will fill a Hat; it is so well wrought by Masons, and so extraordinarily Cimented. After Tarbes of Begorre, are the two Bishopricks of the Principalitie, heretofore the Vicounzie of Bearne, namely

In the notice of the West Empire Lapurdum.

Oleron. OLeron, seated on the Riuer of Gaure, in Latine Gauus, Gaber, and Gaberus, and the Citie Iluro in the Itinerarium; denoating the way which is from Sarageſſa of Aragon, so farre as vnto the Citie of Hortez, anciently called Bearne, the one being distant from the other, an hundred and twelue thousand paces, at foure thousand to a Leage. Aethicus.

Orthez or Oleron. FRom Saragossa to Orthez is twentie eight Leagues of Gascoigne & Spaine, where Land is at good rate. Of this Citie of Oleron, the auncient stile & forme of Iudging (practised in Bearne) was called The Court of Oleron, in Latine Forum Iluri.

Lescar. LEscar is the second Bishopricke of Bearne, in Latine Ciuitas Lascurienſis, the Mansus for the latter Kings of Nauar, Of the most Illustrous Siruam De Foix, and D'Albret. The last Bishopricke Suffragan belonging to the Archbishoprick of Auch, is Bayonne. BAyone, in Latine Baiorum Ciuitas, vulgarly called Baiona; by them of the Countrey Bonne. It is seated and laued with the Riuer Adoue (which looseth it selfe in the Ocean Sea) called by Lucan Tarbellica.

——Per saxa rotantia latè
In mare purpureum Tarbellicus ibit Aturrus.

Auch the first Prouince of Narbonoise. THe first Prouence Narbonoise (which hath two Archbishoprickes in her dexion) the first of them is Narbona, the Metropolitane of Languedocke, called Septimana, Septimania, in the time of Flauius Constantine the Tyrant, vsurper ouer Great Britaine and the Gaules, of whom we haue formerly described the death, after the surprizall of Arles. For this Warlike Citie, was the Metropolitaine of seauen Prouinces; as namely, of the first and second Narbonoise; of the Viennoise; of the first and second Aquitaine; of Gascoigne; and of the Maritime Alpes.

Metropolitane of 7 Prouinces.

Narbona was auncienly named Narbo-Martius, becausse Iulius Cæsar (the perpetuall Dictator) caused to dwell there a Colonie, drawne from the Martian Legion, which was otherwise called the tenth Legion, Legio Decumanorum. The Emperour Augustus, in honor of the Dictator (his adopted Father) appointed, that it should be called Narbonam Paternam Iuliam, as the same is obserued by Plinie, and her auncient inscription.

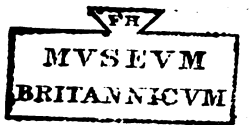
Narbona called Narbo Martius.



Col. Iul. Paterna. Narbo. Mart.

Serving to vnderstand these Verses of Martiall, which giue to this Citie the Sirname of Faire.

Quem pulcherrima iam redire Narbo,

Ad Leges iubet, annuosque fasces.

The Oratour giueth it the title of Bulwarke of Italie, and the Sentinell thereof; Speculo, & propugnaculum Italiæ. The learned Bishop of Auuergne, Sidonius Apollinaris, giueth therto these praises.

Salue Narbo potens salubritate
Vrbe, & rure simul bonus videri,
Muris, Ciuibus, Ambitu, Tabernis,
Portis, Porticibus, Foro, Theatro,
Delubris, Capitolijs, Monetis,
Thermis, Arcubus, Horreis, Macellis,
Pratis, Fontibus, Insulis, Salinis,
Stagnis, Flumine, Merce, Ponte, Ponto.

That which he saith in his first Verse, is good, in regard of them of the Country: but for Strangers, it is very vnhealthfull, by selfe hauing bin sicke so often as I Soiourned there, for the space of fifteene dayes, and more; for the Ayre is there very grosse, by being neere the Sea, about twelue thousand Paces, so that you may easily heare the noyse thereof, when it is troubled. It is seated in a bottome, and the Parapet of the Wals leuell with the ground, so that without, there can nothing be seene thereof, except the Steeples of S. Iustus, and of S. Paul, whereupon it is now tearmed Narbona, Latrina Mundi. It is a strong Citie for Warre, without Suburbs, not batter-able, being in a plaine euen Field, fortified with good Ramparts, strong Towers, and Case-mates, aptly disposed, to make double round both aboue and below, from an hundred to an hundred Corps de Guarde, and Magazines stored with Powder and Bals, as also a great number of Canons, which hath made it to be often attempted by the Spanyards, as well as Marseilles and Baione. It is a Keye for France, and therefore she beareth for Armes; De Gueulles à vne Croix Patriarchale d'Or, & vne Clef d'Argent.

Narbona, very vnhealthful to such as are Strangers.

The Sinke of the World.

The circuit of the Citie Wals, are full of antique inscriptions, and one quarter of them raised with hard Stones, cut like pointed Diamonds. The Citie is watered with the Riuer of Aude (whereof we haue already related somewhat) named by the Romaines Atax, and the Inhabitants called by Mela, Populi Atacini, & Atacinorum Colonia; and by the Gaules, Volcæ Arecomici. There are three Bridges on this Riuer of Aude, two at the ends, the Arches whereof are ioyning to the Walles of the Citie, and firmely fastened with Portcullises of Iron, which shut and open, for the entring in and issuing forth, of great Vessels of charge.

The Bridge in the middeſt, is couered with Marchants Houſes, very neere in length and wideneſſe (equally) to the ſmall Bridge at Paris. In the Citie is the Cathedrall Church, dedicated in honor of the Martyres S. Iuſtus and S. Paſtour, whoſe bodies are on the high Altar, incloſed in a Shrine of Wood, couered with a Pall of cloath of Gold.

There is but the Quire remaining in this Metropolitane Church, which is accompanied with two great ſquare Towers, and aloft vpon them (in a platforme) is the Beacon, Watch-Bell and Clocke, the Church and Chappels couered with Stone, according to the faſhion of Languedocke and Prouence, or (without going ſo farre) like the platforme of the Tuilleries Pallace at Paris. In the midſt of the Quire, is to be ſeene a rich Tombe, wherein are the bowels of Phillip the Hardie, third of the name, King of France, ſon to the King S. Lewes, who died at Perpignan, returning from the Warre againſt Don Peter, King of Arragon, as it is obſerued by William de Nangis, in the life of the ſaid King Phillip. Exequijs Regis expletis, & oſſibus per excoctionem a carne ſeiunctis, carnem quidem, & viſcera apud Narbonam in maiori Eccleſia ſepelientes, cum reduſſem Pariſios, Barones, & Prælati oſſa apud Sanctum Dionyſium cum honore præcipuo iuxta Patrem ſuum Ludouicum Regem ſanctiſſimum tumularunt. In one of the Chappels, on the South ſide of the Quire, I haue ſeene a great Table of the Reſurrection of Lazarus, held for excellent.

King Lewes the Hardy died at Perpignan

In the Citie is the Abbey Church of Chanons, and a Secular Abbot, dedicated in honor of S. Sergius Paulus, firſt Biſhop of the place, diſciple to S. Paul, by him conuerted to the faith of Ieſus Chriſt (as it is in the Acts of the Apoſtles) and by him deſtenned to be the Apoſtle of Narbona. Behinde this Church, and at the end of the Citie, where the Ramparts is, is the Fountaine S. Paul, the water whereof is very pleaſing to drinke, and admirable for Maide-ſeruants growing great (with ſome other Ingredients.) But ſuch it is, that from this water of S. Paul, is deriued a Prouerb adapted to ſuch as are forward and willing, Sergius Paulus firſt Biſhop of Narbona Acts 13. 12.

The Well or Fountaine of S. Paul.

The magnificence which the Biſhop of Auuergne obſerued in this Citie, is no more: becauſe it was ruined by the ſerious and cruell Attila. After whom, it fell (with Aquitaine) into the power of the Gothes, by the donation formerly noated. Of them it was called Gothia, and to this inſtant vulgarly Languedocke: but to ſpeake properly, Landſgot, that is to ſay, Land of Goths, Lands kenet, a man of the Countrie. This name of Land, ſignifieth Ground or Earth in Alemaigne, and the Northerne Nations.

Narbona ſurprized by the Gothes and called Gothia

Beziers. The Wolfes paſſage.

THe firſt Biſhopricke Suffragan of Narbona, is that of Beziers, eight Leagues from Narbona. In the midway betweene theſe two Cities, is a dangerous paſſage, named Le Pas du Loup. Beziers is a pleaſant Citie, where there is an excellent Ayre, as being exalted on the top of an high Mountaine, whence eaſily may be ſeene the Adriaticke Sea and the Peeles de Cendres, and other round neighbouring, with varied and ſpangled flourie Fields, wonderfully delectable to be ſeene. Whereupon the Inhabitants ſay (as praiſing and emblazoning the pride of their Citie:) That if God ſhould come to dwell, and conuerſe againe with the World in his humanitie, he would make choiſe of Beziers to be his abiding.

Si Deus in terris,
Vellet habitare Biterris.

The Armes of Beziers.

It beareth for Armes, Faiſſe d'Argent, & de Gueulles de ſix pieces, au Chef de France, as all good Cities elſe doe. It is tearmed plurally Biterræ, and in the Geographers Strabo, Ptolomie, Aethicus, Bliterræ, Ciuitas Biterrenſis. It hath for Patron S. Aphrodiſeus, her firſt Biſhop ordained by S. Paul of Narbona. At the foote of the Mountaine is the Riuer of Orde, called in Latine Obris. The ſecond Biſhopricke Suffragan, is Agde.

AGde, in Latine Agatopolis, Agata and Ciuitas Agathenſis, remarkeable by a Councill there held, in the time of the King of the Vuiſigothes Alaricus. This Citie is ſeated on the Adriaticke Sea, the Biſhop whereof beareth the Title, and Circle of a Count.

Carcaſſone,

Carcaſſona, a High & Low Towne.

CArcaſſone, in Latine Carcaſſona, deuided into an high and low Towne, by an interiect and diſtance one from the other, by the Riuer of Aude, as alſo great Gardening and husband-able grounds; ſo that they ſeeme as two ſeperated Towns, yet adorned with very good wals. The Citie is exalted on the height of a Mountaine, beautified with a Cathedrall Church, wherein is to be ſeene a rich Tombe of Copper, with a faire Graue Stone all of one piece, ſtanding before the high Altar, belonging to one of the Biſhops, named Martin de S. Andrew: whoſe Armes were and are D'Azur à vn Chaſteau ſommé de trois Tours d'Argent, le tout maſonné de Sable, à trois Eſtoiles d'Or in Chef. This Citie bare in Armes likewiſe, D'Azur ſemé de France, & au mitan le pourtraict du Portail de ladite Cité hercee, & maſonné de Sable.

The Armes of the Citie.

The lower Towne is formed foure ſquare, leuelled by the line, conſiſting of foure great Streetes, hauing foure Gates. The Towne houſe is planted iuſt in the midſt thereof, on a great goodly leuell; adorned with two Monaſteries, and two Pariſh-Churches; namely of S. Vincent, where (in my time) was kept the Commiſſaries Court, and the other of S. Mighell.

The low town

This lower Town beareth for Armes Seme de France au Tourteau de Gueulles bordé d'Or, à vn Agnus Dei d'Argent. During the troubles of the League, the Parlement of Toloſa was transferred into this lower Towne, and kept at the Carmelite Friers; On the Gate of the Chapter-houſe of the ſaid Monaſtery, hath bin ſeene (in my time) a long Stone, hauing this inſcription engrauen vpon it.

The Armes of the low towne

Anno Domini Milleſimo Quingenteſimo Nonageſimo, Henricus, IIII. Dei Gratia Francorum & Nauarræ Rex Senatum Toloſanum huc Tranſtulit, Henrico Mommorantio Procurante.

An Inſcription engraued on the Chapter-Houſe.

After that the Leaguers had ſurprized this Citie, the ſaid Parlement was transferred to Beziers.

Nifmes.

AFter Carcaſſona followeth the Biſhopricke of Niſmes, in Latine Nemauſis, ſometime called the Metropolitane Citie of the Auuergnacks, Nemauſus Metropolis Aruernorum; and by Mela and other Geographers, Nemauſus Arecomicorum. Strabo ſpeaketh wonders. Caput Arecomicorum eſt Nemauſus, longe inferior Narbona, ſi peregrinam, & negotiantium turbam ſpectes; ſin Rempublicam, multo præſtantior. Nam viginti quatuor habet pagos populariũm præſtantes viris, quibus & Latij ius, ita vt Nemauſi innenias Romanos qui Aedilitatis, & Quæſturæ honorem ſint conſequuti, eamque ob cauſam gens ea cum Præfectis Romæ miſsis nihil habet negotij. So that this Citie enioying the right of Burgeſhip by the Romaines, was ſometimes renowned aboue that which is called Aurigera, in the Countrie-language L'Ariege: And the other, by ſmall graines of Siluer, called Graines d'Argent, it receiued the name of Argentaria, and the Countrey L'Arget. I haue ſeene them both many times. The ſecond Suffragan is

The Citie famous in the Romans time.

Mirepoix, a Vicountie.

MIrepoix, in Latine Mirapincum, Ciuitas Mirapicenſis, a Vicountie, which depended heretofore on the Counts of Toloſa. But it was exempted by ſentence of Condemnation; pronounced at Paris againſt Count Raymond the fourth, and laſt of that name. This Citie is watered with the ſmall Riuer of Lers, in Latine Lertius, which deſcendeth from the Pyreneans, into the confines of France, and from Rouſſillon, it runneth and looſeth it ſelfe in the Garonna.

Montauban.

MOntauban, in Latine Mons-Albanus, and by the vulgar Montalba, ſeated on the Riuer of Tarn.

Lauaur in Lauragais.

LAuaur in Lauragais, a Countie; in Latine Vaurum, Lauracenſium Tectoſagum Oppidum, ſeated on the Riuer De La-Gout, in Latine Acutus Fluuius. This is the Countrey of Woade, for the beſt dying of Cloathes, which is carried and vented in Spaine, and throughout all the Countries of Europe. This hearbe is called Glaſtum; it hath leaues falling like new Coleworts, that haue not bin replanted: and it is gathered at diuers times, from the beginning, vntill the end of Summer. It is pounded, pounded, and made vpon lumps and clods, for the easier transporting it into strange Prouinces: And it is that which at Paris we call Gueſde. Du Bartas in his Weekes, giueth it the name of Herbe Lauragaiſe.

Admired Woade, that being toucht without,

Rieux. R*Ieux, Ciuitas Riuenſis*; and Riuence, Riouz by the vulgar, ſeated on the little Riuer of the Rize, in Latine Riza, which rouling downe the Mountaines of Foix: after it hath engirt the ſmall Citie of Rieux, runneth and diſchargeth it ſelfe in the Garonna, neere to the Terrace.

Lombez in Comenges. L*Ombez, Lomberia*, and Ciuitas Lomberienſis, in the Countie of Comenges, a quarter of a mile from Semmathan. Frances Petrarch, the Italian Poet, was a Chanon of this Cathedrall. The laſt Biſhopricke is that of

S. Papoull in Lauragais. SAint Papoul, in Latine Sanctus Papulus, a ſmall Citie of the Countie of Lauragais, a mile diſtant from Caſtel-nau-d'Arry.

Toloſa made an Archbiſhopricke by Pope Iohn 22. In auncient times, the Citie of Toloſa was Suffraganced by the Archbiſhop of Narbona. Pope Iohn the two and twentieth made Toloſa an Archbiſhopricke, and gaue it for Suffragans Apamiers (which Pope Boniface, eight of the name, had made) Biſhopricke in Anno 1296. without the conſent & agreement of Phillip le Bell, fourth of the name, King of France & Nauarre. Which gaue ſubiect of bad intelligence betweene them, & whereof the Pope repented himſelfe afterward: ſeruing as a mirrour and example to his Succeſſours, not to preiudice the Kings of France) and theſe ſixe other following. For of Abbeies, as they had bin before, he erected them to be Cathedral Churches, as appeareth in the fourth Booke of common Extrauagans of the ſaid Pope Iohn.

The ſecond Narbonois Prouince. Aix in Prouence. IN the ſecond Prouince Narbonoiſe, otherwiſe called the third Viennoiſe Prouince, is the Archbiſhopricke of Aix in Prouence, called in Latine Aqua Sextia, in the Itinerarium of Aethicus Aquæ Sextæ, in regard of Bathes, which now are no more in vſe. It is honored with a Parlement, and a Chamber or Court of Accounts. The Metropolitane Church is named by the vulgar, Saint Sauuary, that is S. Saluator, wherein I haue ſeene a very goodly Font, made Dome-wiſe, exalted vpon great Colomnes of Marble, at the South-ſide in the body of the Church. Behinde the high Altar is a painting of France, for the Sepulture of the great Prior of France, ſirnamed of Angouleſme, Gouernour and Lieutenant Generall in Prouence. Aix hath ſiue Suffragans, the firſt whereof is the Biſhopricke

Apt. OF Apt, called in Latine Apta Iulia; followed by that of Riez. R*Iez. Ciuitas Reienſis.*

Frejus. F*Reius, Forum Iulij*, ſeated at the foote of the Maritime Alpes, according to the teſtimony of the Geographers, Mela, Strabo, and the Authour of the Itinerarium Aethicus: deſcribing the paſſage from Italie into Prouence, by the Maritime Alpes, euen from the Citie of Rome, ſo farre as to Arles.

Siſteron. S*Iſteron*, in Latine Siſtaricum, and Ciuitas Siſtarienſis: This Citie is ſeated on the Riuer of Durance, called in Latine Druentia.

The firſt Viennois Prouince. THe firſt Prouince Viennois, is Vienna in Daulphine, tearmed by Cæſar and other learned Geographers, Vienna Allobrogum, ſeated on the great and famous Riuer Riuer of Rhoſne. This City, heeretofore the abiding for the Emperours of the Weſt, vpon the declining of the ſame Empire, and the Chancerie for the ancient Kings of Bourgongne; is diſtant from Lions onely ſiue leagues. The Archbiſhopricke of Vienna hath in number ſiue Suffragan Biſhoprickes, the firſt whereof is that of

Valencia. V*Alencia*, in Latine Ciuitas Valentinenſis; Valentia Segalaunorum: By Iuſtine the Hiſtoriographer, and by the Chronicle of Proſper, it is tearmed Nobiliſsima Galliæ Ciuitas: it is likewiſe ſeated vpon the Rhoſne. Next followeth

Die. The City of Fortune. D*Ie*, a Burrough anciently dedicated to the Goddeſſe Fortune; and therefore it was called Deæ Fortunæ Oppidum, during the Paganiſme of the Romanes, afterwards dedicated to the Virgin of Virgins.

Viuiers: The vineyards of Viuiers. V*Iuiers, Ciuitas Viuarienſis*, and Viuarium, and the Country Viuarez. A Citie ſeated on the Riuer of Rhoſne, and renowned in regard of her Vineyards; from whence Wine is conueyed through all the Seuenes and Auuergne, in Goates-skins, which they doe call Boucs. Sidonius Apollinaris, in his time commended a Biſhop of Viuiers, whom hee calleth Patientius, becauſe that the Viſigothes hauing rauaged and ruined the Gaules, and reduced the people to Famine; that good Biſhop ſuccoured them with his fruites and Corne. Poſt Gothicam depopulationem, poſt ſegetes incendio ab ſumptas, peculiari ſumptu inopiæ communi per deſolatas Gallias gratuita frumenta miſiſti: cum tabeſcentibus fame populis nimium contuliſſes, ſi commercio fuiſſet ſpecies iſta non munere. Vidimus anguſtas tuis frugibus vias, vidimus per Araxii, & Rhodani ripas, non vnum, quod vnus impleueras, horreum. Hee ſaid that this good Biſhop was another Patriarch Ioſeph, for nouriſhing hunger-ſtarued people. After Viuiers followeth

Granoble. G*Ranoble*, called Gratianopolis by S. Auſtine, and by Sidonius Apollinaris, in many of his Epiſtles. This City is ſeated on the Riuer of Yſere, in Latine Iſara; honoured with a Court of Parlement, for the reſort or Iuriſdiction of Daulphine, the Principality belonging to the eldeſt Son of France, as we ſhall ſpeake of elſwhere. The laſt Suffragan is,

S. Iohn de Maurienne. S*Aint Iohn de Maurienne*, in Latine Maurienna, a Bourgade at this preſent in the Eſtate of Sauoy; but heeretofore of the Prerogatiue, yea of the body of the Principality of Daulphine, as likewiſe the Biſhopricke of Geneua. G*Eneua*, which was Suffraganced by the Archbiſhopricke of Vienna, and the Principalitie of Daulphine, whereby the Countes of Sauoy had formerly vſurped this Citie: but the Inhabitants became Maſters thereof, to hold it as a ſeparate Eſtate, for contrarietie in Religion. The Biſhops ſeate had beene transferred to a place called Anicy in Sauoy: and yet notwithſtanding, the Bayliwickes of Gex, Bangey and Veromey (which almoſt toucheth the walls of Geneua, and of the ſaid Biſhopricke) are of the Crowne of France, and annexed vnto the Duchie of Bourgongne.

Anicy in Sauoye. This City of Geneua hath many and ſundry names, the moſt honourable whereof, is that of Knights, in Latine Ciuitas Æqueſtrium. As it very remarkeable by the Inſcription engrauen on the Gate of the Treillis, neere to the Court, which they call

No certainty of gaining this ſir name.

But to vnderſtand the aſſured and certaine time, when ſhe wonne this ſir-name, I could neuer yet attaine vnto; hauing beene at the place my ſelfe, and continued there three daies (with liberty of conſcience among the Catholiques) yet all to no purpoſe. They ſay, that the Emperor Aurelianus was the reſtorer thereof, and of him retained name.

Moreouer, that of the Emperor they had daily ſundry bookes, which they imprinted, to make them runne in apt diſguiſes. Now, although theſe pretences iſſued forth of one and the ſame ſhop; yet had they ſtill variety of names. One while of S. Germaſe, which is the leſſer Geneua, diuided from the greater by a large bridge of wood, vnder which runneth the Riuer of Rhoſne: of Aureliæ Allobrogum: and by another change, that of Auguſtæ Allobrogum.

They contemne that which was remarkeable from the time of Cæſar, & whereof himſelfe ſpeaketh the words. Extremum Oppidum Allobrogum, proximumque Helueticarum finibus, Geneua. Their deuiſe is retrograde, and their Armes well enough emblazoned. This City of Geneua is a dependant on the principality of Daulphine, let the Dukes of Sauoy ſay what they will.

An Order of Court concerning Geneua.

In the Court Regiſters of Parlement, there is an Order, dated the 13. day of Aprill, 1388. giuen between the Prince Daulphine, and Peter then Count of Geneua, whereby it was ſaid, that the Countie of Geneua appertained to the Daulphine, and that the ſaid Peter Counte of Geneua, ſhould doe homage, and take the Oath of Liedge fidelitie, as he did to King Charles the ſixth, at that time Daulphine of Viennois.

The 2. Viennois Prouince. Arles the Metropolitane.

The ſecond Prouince Viennois, is the Archbiſhopricke of Arles, a City ſeated on the Riuer of Rhoſne, and (as we haue formerly obſerued) honoured with the title of Metropolitane, for the holding of many generall Councells, and hauing an admirable Amphitheater.

In Latine it is named Arelas, and Arelate, ſometimes held and reputed for one of the dugs or ſucking-teates of the Gaules; whereupon ancient Geographers called it Galliæam Romam, and not Romam Gallulam, as the depraued paſſage of Anſonius ſpeaketh. Wherefore this Mother-Citie had diuers appellations; as namely Conſtantina, of Conſtantine the Great, Author of new Rome; or of Flauius Conſtantinus the Tyrant, who had eſtabliſhed his dwelling there, and where (after a long ſiege) he was taken, as we haue already ſaid, and this ſeemeth to ſauour of moſt truth. By the ancient Gaules it was called Θυμάρη, and by the Romans Mamillaria; as Auſonius maketh it the Teat, Breſt, and Nurſing-mother of Aquitaine Gaule.

Sundry names giuen to this Citie.

Difference of the olde Romane way.

We vnderſtand that they made it a farre greater length of ground, then at this preſent now they do, leauing the old way of the Romans, and taking the great road way French from Niſmes to Margalides, Le Pont de Lunel, famous for her white thatched ſhelter, Lunel the olde, Mont-Pelier, Veruna, Pezenas, Cerignano, Beziers and Narbona.

The Orator and Philoſopher Phauorinus borne in Arles.

In this City of Arles was borne the great Orator and Philoſopher Phauorinus, ſo much honoured by the Romanes, and renowned by Aulus Gellius; vpon whoſe ſo far famed Learning, he wrote his Atticke-Nights, as Plato did his Dialogues and immortall Tracts, on that of wiſe Socrates.

Heereby may the Spaniards learne to know, that they could neuer be Peered with the Gaules, famous in the Art Militarie, and all good Sciences, from one end of the world to the other, and in euery part thereof, as it is witneſſed by the Romaine Saluſt, in the end of the warre brought againſt Iugurth. Vſque ad noſtram memoriam Romani ſic habuêre, alia omnia virtute ſuæ prona eſſe, cum Gallis pro ſalute, non de gloria certari. In that againſt Catiline (compelled to confeſſe the truth) hee ſaith: Galles gloriâ belli, ante Romanos eſſe. Cranato, their owne ignorant Hiſtorian, in fauor of his Spaniards, malicioufly abuſeth the Gaules and French, againſt the Maximes of Warre. Cato giueth them theſe Titles of Honor in his Originalls. Plerag, Gallia duas res induſtrioſiſſime proſequitur, Rem Militarem, & Argute Loqui. They are ignorant in that which Iuuenall ſaith, concerning the Eloquence of the Gaules.

Gallia Cauſidicos docuit facunda Britannos.

They burie in ſilence their Studies and Colledges, more renowned then thoſe of Athens, againſt the notable teſtimony of that worthy Father of the Church, Saint Hierome, who baptizeth them with theſe names, Studia Galliarum florentiſſima. They make them vnapt for Armes, contrary to the Rules Military, which inſtruct; Let no man miſprize his enemy, but doubt him alwaies to be much ſtronger then he is not. And yet their owne Hiſtorians neuer ſpake of the Gaules and French, but with honour, eſteeme, and reputation to command the whole world.

Cranato, your Hiſtorian Vopiſcus, would haue taught you, if you had vnderſtood Latine, that Galligens hominum inquietiſſima eſt, & auida ſemper vel faciendi Principis, vel Imperij. Goe to Schoole Cranato, goe to Schoole, to learne the naturall diſpoſition of the Gaules and French. The Archbiſhopricke of Arles hath foure Suffragans, to wit:

Marſeilles.

A miſtake of ſome Hiſtoriographers.

Marſeilles, Ciuitas Maſilienſis, called Maſilia by the Greeke and Romane Geographers, who make there a Colonie of the Phocenſes, arriuing there out of Greece in their opinion, meerely ignorance. Whereas it was part of the ancient Gaules, which paſſed into Greece vnder the conduct of Captain Brennus: who (after his death) returned from Phocis into Gaule, and made their dwelling at Marſeilles, and in the land of Languedock, where they were borne, and named Volcæ Arecomici, & Tectoſages. For all of that Prouence and Languedocke, were knowne by the names of the ancient Gaules, long before any ſpeech of the Romanes.

Marſeilles a Key of France.

So ſpake the Bourdelois Poet Auſonius (to good purpoſe) in his Cities. Marſeilles is a Key of France, on the Mediterranean Sea, and one of the very goodlieſt Ports of Chriſtendome. After this Biſhopricke, next followeth in order that of Telo Martius a Romane Captaine.

Orenge. Orenge, or Orence, so named of her Cathedrall City, in Latine Aransio, Ciuitas Arausiensis, and by others Argenna, by the name of her Riuer D'Argent, tearmed in the Country Language Arceny. It was heretofore a Colony of the second Legion, and therefore it is called in the Geographer Pomponius Mela, Colonia Arausio. Secundanor. Coh. xxxiij. Without the gate of the said Citie, as men come from Lyons, is seene the remaines of a Triumphall Arche, which we may iudge by the eye to haue beene most magnificent, when it was whole and sound. And yet a Combat on horse-back may be discerned thereon, very admirably engrauen. They of the City say, that Marius the Romane was Author thereof, after hee had vanquished the Cimbres and Teuthones. Others doe beleeue, that it was made by Fabius Maximus, after he had ouercome (in a foughten battell) the Allobroges and Auuergnacs, as also their King Boduacus, called by the Romanes Bituitus, according to the testimony of Lucius Florus, one of their owne Historians.

A famous ruined triumphal Arche.

Allobroges deinde, & Aruerni cum aduersus eos similes Aeduorum querelæ, opem & auxilium nostrum flagitarent, Varus Victoriæ testis, Isaraque, & Vindelicus (this ouerthrow happened on the Riuers of Gar, the Lisere, the Sorgue, and the Rhosne) amnis, & impiger fluminum Rhodanus. Maximus Barbaris terror Elephanti fuere, immanitati gentium pares. Nil tam conspicuum in Triumpho, quam Rex ipse Bituitus distinctus in armis, argentoque carpento, qualis pugnauerat. Vtriusque Victoriæ quod quantumque gaudium fuerit, vel hinc æstimare potest, quod & Domitius Aenobarbus, & Fabius Maximus ipsis quibus dimicauerunt locis saxeas erexere turres, & desuper exornata armis hostilibus trophæa fixere.

The portraict of a conquer'd King, led by Rome in triumph.

There likewise is to be seene vpon this Arche, on the side towards Lyons, the picture of that King bound and manacled with chaines, his hands tied behinde him, according to the manner of a slaue, hauing vpon his breast this word written, Buduacus, with the Image of Rome, a Crowned woman, who with her right hand held the desolate King by the beard, to make him hold vp his head.

I should be ouer-long in relating all the particularities of this Arche, which I oftentimes beheld in nine or ten moneths time of my abiding in Auignion; and it is planted as in the middest of three Townes, of Orenge, Carpentras and Cauaillon, all three distant from Auignion by foure miles of the Countrey. So, Fabius Maximus was then the Author of this Triumphall Arche at Orenge, and not Marius; against the opinion of Sieur Iulian, in my time a Minister of the said place, one better acquainted with money, then skild in Antiquities.

Fabius Maximus Author of this triumphal Arche.

As concerning that which was prouided for Domitius Aenobarbus, the ruines and remaines thereof is to be seene at S. Remy, neere vnto Tarascon in Prouence. The Romanes made the Gaules a thousand times more easie to be vanquished, then indeed they were, onely to make themselues the more dreadfull to strange Nations, forming (many times) an Elephant of a Flye, and seruing their turne with a Foxes skinne, in stead of a Lyon. To make themselues great, they imployed all their purposes, like to the Spaniards; who notwithstanding all their Treaties and Alliances, neuer part from or forsake their praises. Practising the saying of the Confessor to the Emperor Charles the first: In all doubtfull matters, it is much better to hold fast then goe seeke. In obscuris melior est causa possidentis, quam petentis. As that Emperor perceiued on the persons of imprisoned Germaine Princes, on the Kingdomes of Naples and Nauarre, on the Duchie of Millaine, vsurped and vniustly with-held from the Crowne of France; and on other Cities of Italie, from their right and lawfull Lords.

The insulting of the Romans ouer the Gaules

A saying of the Confessor to the Emperor.

In this manner the Romanes triumphed in pictures, and this poore King of the Auuergnacs, Auuergnacs, Daulphinois and Prouencialls, and not by force of Armes, in regard they surprized him at an enter-view, notwithstanding the faith which Aenobardus had giuen, to let him come in all assurance. Neuertheless, this Roman Captaine brake his word brauely, by Equiuocation, and double meaning.

I will alleadge (for my warrant) Valerius Maximus, who freely discouereth the treason of the Romanes, in these tearmes. Iratus Betulto (hee should haue said Boduaco) Regi Aruernorum Cn. Domitius, quod tum suam, tum Allobrogum gentem, se etiam tum in Prouinciâ morante ad Qu. Fabij successoris sui dextram confugere hortatus esset, Per Colloquij simulationum accersitum, Hospitioque. Acceptum vinxit, ac Romam naui deportandum curauit. Senatus eius factum neque probare potuit, neque rescindere voluit, ne remissus in patriam Boduacus bellum renouaret; igitur eum Albæ custodiæ relegauit. Behold the instruction of Machiauells Prince.

An ancient theater & ruined temple.

In the same City of Orenge, are likewise the ruines and remaines of an ancient Theatre and Circle; as also the great walls standing of an antique Temple, which the said Sieur Iulian told me had bin dedicated to the goddesse Diana, & her Wood-Nimphes; and that the Theatre and Temple had beene built by Marius. Wherein the good man followed vulgar opinion, which (very often) is not the most assured and certaine.

We learne the contrary by Strabo, who giueth the honour to Fabius Maximus: obserue heere the testimony of that ancient Geographer. Quo loco Isara, & Rhodanus fluuij confluunt prope Cemmenum montem Qu. Fabius Maximus XXX. millium non integrorum exercitu instructus, Ducentâ Atilia Gallorum concidit, ibique Trophæum statuit ex albo lapide, ac duo Templa; Vnum Martis, alterum Herculis. So that there is the most appearance and likelihood, that this ancient Temple of Orenge, had beene dedicated to the Gaulish Hercules; to serue as a famous not of that memorable disrout and discomfiture of the Gaules in picture, rather then otherwise, of the Goddesse Diana.

Orenge a Principality included in the Countie of Prouence.

As concerning this Citie of Orenge, it is a Principality lockt vp within the Countie of Prouence. The King of Sicilie René, sold the Homage, Prerogatiue and Soueraignty, to Lewis de Chalon, Prince of Orenge. William (sonne to the said Lewis) also Prince of Orenge; sold them to King Lewis the eleuenth, who submitted the said Principalitie to that of Daulphine; which happened in the yeere 1475. So that although the Princes of Orenge doe enioy in the said Principalitie, all Soueraigne Rights by the concession of our Kings; yet neuertheless it is so, that if they intermeddle among Strangers Warres, the Kings of France make seizure of this Principalitie by Soueraigne hand. As in that of Charolois, appertaining to the house of Spaine, as we haue seene in our time, by the Treaty of Veruins, King Henry the Great (of glorious memory) raised his hand vpon the County of Charalois, wherof he remitted the enioying to the King of Spaine, Dom Philip the second. The same he did on the Principalitie of Orenge, which he remitted (by making a marriage of Madamoiselle de Conde, with the Prince of Orenge) to her Prince returned from Spaine, and sent thence the Gouernour Bacon, who held Authoritie there for the King.

The Kings of France hold soueraigne power in this Principality.

A comparison concerning the Countie of Charolois, and Principality of Orenge.

In the same second Prouince Viennois, is the Archbishopricke and Legation of Auignion, called in Latine Auenio, a Metropolitane Citie in the County of Venice; in Latine Comitatus Venuxinus, and Veniessinus, and Venesinus; and Auignion called Cauarum by the Geograper Pomponius Mela. This Citie and Countie is gouerned by a Vice-Legate, and the money thereof hath on the one side, the Picture of the Pope reigning, and his name for the Legend; and on the other side, the Armes & name of the Legate, or Vice-Legate, who is then Gouernour.

Auignion an Archbishopricke in the second Viennois Prouince.

The Bridge of Auignion ouer the swift and violent Rhosne, containeth ninteene Arches, sixteene whereof doe appertaine to the King, and the rest to the Pope. To whom also belongeth Auignion, and the Accountant of County, by meanes of the acquisition which Pope Clement the sixt made of Ione Queene of Naples & Sicily, and Countesse of Prouence; who ingaged them vnto the said Pope, for the summe of fortie thousand Crownes; with condition of perpetuall redemption by her, and her Successors, the Countes of Prouence: which engadgement happened in the yeare Auignion and the Accountate belongeth to the Pope.

The Riuer of Rhosne adiudged in Parlement to the King.

yeere 1360. Redemption was not made by the Countes of Prouence, Successors to the said Queene Ioane. King Lewes the eleuenth hauing caused the Riuer to be ruled in the Parlement of Tolosa, and adiudged to the King; was preuented by death, euen when the Offers and Moneyes were ready, for withdrawing the ancient parcells, dismembred by engaging the Countie of Prouence.

The Kings, Charles the eight, his sonne Lewes the twelfth, and Francis the first, hoping the assistance, or the neutralitie of Popes, for recouering the Kingdomes of Sicilie, and Lands of Italie; brought the Redemption to a quite surceasing, which hath so still remained (euen to this day) to the Popes, being Lords of the Lands engaged by the Counts of Prouence.

Three Suffragans belonging to Augnion.

Auignion within the enclosure of the Countie, hath three Bishoprickes Suffragans: namely, Carpentras.

Carpentras, in Latine Carpentoratte, and Ciuitas Carpentoratlensis. Aboue which is the Windie Mountaine (as the Countie men call it) and which I haue seene from the foote, to the Pond on the highest part thereof. They are of opinion, that from thence blow the cruell and rigorous windes, which whistle into Auignion, and maketh it healthfull: from whence grew their Prouerbe, Aucnio ventosa, sine vento venenosa. In a word, the Prouince is very subiect to windes, and especially Auignion, where they are daily resorters. If it proceedeth from the neere neighbouring of the Alpy Mountains, or the Leuant Sea; let the Prouincialls deside the quarrell.

Windie Auignion is venemous without winde.

Vaison.

Vaison, in Latine Vasionense Oppidum, by Sidonius Apollinaris, and by the ancient Geographer Mela, Oppidum Vocontiorum; a small City, seated neere to the Riuer of Durance, and watered with the Sorga, renowned by the same Mela, who calleth it Solgam. So doth Strabo likewise, who recounting the imaginary ouerthrow of the Auuergnacs King, before remembred, saith; that she runneth to lose her selfe in the Riuer of Rhosne, at the Towne of Vndale. Tertius est Sulgas fluuius, qui adVndalum Vrbem Rhodano infertur. Quo loco Cn. Domitius Anobarbus ingenti pugna per multa Barbarorum fudit instructa. This Riuer of Sorga (if I haue any good memory) taketh Originall from the fountaine of Vaucluse, in Latine, Fons Clausa Vallis, neere vnto which, is to be seene the remaines of the Castle of Cabrieres, where was borne Madona Laura, so celebrated by her Louer Petrarch, as well as the Spring of Vaucluse, (which I haue many times noted) at the issuing forth whereof, the water is so bigge, that it sunders it selfe into two armes, which make an Iland, furnished with a Towne, bearing name of the Isle, at the lower point whereof (ioyning together againe) it passeth on to Vaison, and from thence to Auignion. There it is diuided into many branches and channells, for best commodity of the Citie, which hath seuen Bridges passing ouer it; seauen Ports or gates; seuen Colledges of Chanons; seuen Monasteries of Men; as many of Nuns; seauen Hospitalles: And to close all with a Rime: To behold

Source or spring of the Riuer Sorgi.

Trois choses rares en Auignon
Beau Mur, belle Femme, & beau Pon.

3. Mir cles seldom seen in Auignon.

Three things in Anignion very rare:
A goodly Wall, a handsome Bridge, a Woman faire.

At entring into the Church of the Gray-Friers, on the right hand, in the first Chappell, named of the Holy Crosse; before the Altar is a long Tombe, in the middest whereof is engraued a Crosse, thwarted with two boughes or branches of Laurell, in forme of a Saultour, and on the top of it a Rose: this is the Tombe of Madam Laura, and the deuise which she had during her life. In my time, vpon a little Table in the same Chappell, was written the Sonnet, which King Francis the first composed, in honor and memory of this Lady of Cabrieres; and the Sonnet is imprinted in the Frontespice of Petrarches workes.

The Tomb of Madam Laura, Petrarch his Loue.

At departing from Auuignion, the Sorga hauing rowled some extendure of the Country,

Country, runneth and looseth it selfe in the Roze, as they call it in Auignion and Prouence.

The last Bishopricke Suffragan of Auignion, is that of Cauaillon.

Cauaillon, in Latine Cabellicum, a little Citie, but well piled together, and within halfe a quarter of a League thence, men passe the Riuer of Durance by boates, to the point of Orgon; which is the beginning of Prouence, and the great Roade-way of Marseilles, by Salon from Craux, Aquille, Francon, Aix, Ventabran, Marseilles, a goodly City, and beautifull Port of the Sea, so oftentimes attempted by the Spainards. Heere it is where men take shipping for passage to Genoway and Liuorne, into Sicilie, and to Malta: yea, it is the very shortest cut and passage for the Leuant Sea, to the Port of Alexandreta, Amman, Damas and Ierusalem.

The excellent Port for passage of Marseilles.

The fourth Prouence Viennois, containeth the Archbishopricke of Embrun, in Latine Eberodunum, the Metropolitane Seate of the Cottien and Maritime Alpes, which hath fixe Bishopricks Suffragans, as namely;

Of the fourth Viennois Prouince.

Digne.

Digne, in Latine Ciuitas Dinienſis, and by some Geographers, Dianium, & Dinia; which was sometimes a Metropolitane, as we may see in the first Councell of Orleans.

Grasse.

Grasse, within the Maritine Alpes, three Leagues from Antibe, called in Latine Antipolis; a City of the Emperor Antoninus, a Port of the Sea, and a retreat (oftentimes) for Rouers and Pirates, Grassa and Grassensis Ciuitas.

Vence.

Vence, in Latine Vencesina, Vencesium, and Vencienſis Ciuitas. Sancta Maria de Vence is her Cathedrall Church, as well as those of Grasse and of Freius.

Glandesue.

Glandesue, in Latine Glandena, and Glandenenſis Ciuitas, within the Maritime Alpes also. The Bishops Pallace, and the Cathedrall Church, are seated in a faire and pleasant Valley, named Entre-Vaux, Interualles in Latine, three thousand paces from Riez.

Senez.

Senez, in Latine Sanicienſium Oppidum, and Senetenſis Ciuitas, likewise seated in the Maritime Alpes. And, Nice.

Nice, Nicea, and Niciensis Ciuitas in Latine; a City and Port of the Sea, seated at the foote of the Maritime Alpes, and vnder the Homage, Authoritie, & Iurisdiction of the Countie of Prouence, engaged to the Counts of Sauoy (as we shall declare elsewhere) and as it is so maintained to this present. This place is beautified with a Castle, planted vpon the Mountaine, from whence may be discouered all the Adriaticke Sea. Beneath it is the City enriched with a goodly Hauen, where the Dukes of Sauoy haue their Gallies, serued by the Cheualiers of S. Maurice.

According to the former engadgement.

Such are the Metropolitane Seates and Dioceſſes of France, by the enumeration whereof, it is easie to iudge the greatnesse of the Kingdome, wherewith Spaine cannot be compared. The length of France is measured from the Towne and Port of Callice on the Ocean Sea, so farre as to that of Aigues-Mortes on the Mediterranean Sea, the extendure of two hundred and eight Leagues, more or lesse. The breadth or largenesse is from the Conquest in Bretaigne, vpon the Ocean Sea likewise, vnto Pont de Bonnorsin, the Frontier of France and Sauoy; being an hundred fourescore and twelue Leagues, more or lesse, at foure miles for a League: it is easie then to make the account. It cannot be found, that Spaine hath such bredth and length answerable to France; because Spaine in all her extendure, containeth no more then seuen Prouinces, whereof doe make part the Kingdomes of Nauarre, Portugall, and Arragon; as also the Counts of Catalogna, Rousillion and Cardignia, which appertaineth to the Most Christian Kings: and France containeth seuenteene, as we haue formerly obserued.

The measure of the longitude and latitude of Frãce.

Foure miles allowed to a league.

So that like as the Kingdome of France, being in a temperate climate (betweene the exceſſiue heates of Italie and Spaine, and the cruell coldneſſe of Germanie and England) is called by Mathew Paris, The ſweete Kingdome of France, and the chiefe of Chriſtendome; Dulce Regnum Franciæ. Euen ſo, for deuotion and pietie; knowledge in Learning and Sciences; expertneſſe in the Militarie Art; abundance and fertilitie of Soyle; mildeneſſe, politeneſſe and ciuilitie of the Inhabitants, it is not to be equalled by any. For they neuer liued in the barbariſme and ruſticitie of the auncient Spaniards, who by a kinde of cuſtomarie behauiour, would waſh and perfume themſelues with Vrine, long time kept in Sinkes and muddie places, wherewith both men and women cleanſe their teeth; an vnſeemely faſhion, yet common among the people of Spaine; like vnto thoſe Indians of Malabar, that bathe and waſh themſelues in filthie muddie waters: Therefore well may France be tearmed The Kingdome of Kingdomes.

Matthew Paris, the Engliſh Hiſtorian, further ſaith. Anno etiam eodem, verno tempore arridente, inſurrexerunt multi Magnates accincti ad prælium, vt bellum mouerent aduerſus Regnum Gallie. Indignabantur enim quod Regnum Regnorum ſedulet Gallia, conſilio muliebri regebatur. He ſpake of Queene Blanch, Mother to the King S. Lewes, regent in France: who was thwarted in his Regencie by Meſſieurs Hugh of France, Count of Boloigne, and Thibault, King of Nauarre, Count Palatine of Champaigne and Brie.

The Order of the Monarchall Hierarchie.

It is generally knowne, that in the Monarchall Hierarchie, the Emperour of the Romaines is the prime potentate. Yet ſo it is (notwithſtanding) that the Kings of France doe neuer acknowledge him for Superiour: but, as his equall in dignitie, walke foote by foote. As daily is to be ſeene at Rome, when Ambaſſadours come from the Emperour, and from the King of France, at ſuch time as he ſitteth in the Chappell: their preſent and encenſings are at one ſeaſon, and the ſame day they haue audience of the Pope. But others doe follow them of Spaine, and ſo the other Kings and Potentates of Chriſtendome.

Pope Gregory excommunicated the Emperor Fredericke 2

In the yeare 1239. Pope Gregory the ninth, hauing excommunicated the Emperour Fredericke the ſecond; he and his Cardinals, being aſſembled in the Conclaue: elected for Emperour Monſieur Robert of France, Count of Artois, brother to the King Saint Lewes. To which King the Pope wrote, and ſent his Nuntios, with command to reade his Letters before him, and all the Barons of France, and let them vnderſtand, that by vniuerſall conſent of the Cardinalles of the holy Church; the ſaid Monſieur Robert was elected Emperour of the Romaines. Heere you may reade the tenure of the Popes Bull.

The Popes Bull ſent to the King of France:

Gregorius Epiſcopus, Seruus Seruorum Dei. Nouerit dilectus Filius Eccleſiæ ſpiritualis Illuſtris Rex, & totum Francorum Baronagium, nos deliberatione, & tractatu diligenti omnium fratrum noſtrorum condemnaſſe, & a culmine Imperiali abiudicauiſſe Fredericum dictum Imperatorem, & Robertum Fratrem Regis Francorum loco ipſius elegiſſe ſubſtituendum, quem etiam omnibus nobis Eccleſia non tantum Romana, ſed vniuerſis, duxit non ſigniter adiuuandum, & efficaciter promouendum. Nullo igitur modo tantam ſponte oblatam dignitatem apertis brachijs ſuſcipere non pigritemur, ad quem opes, & operam, & opem abundanter effundemus conſequendam. Scelera enim prædicti Frederici multiplicia, ſicut tam nouit Mundus, eundem irreſtaurabiliter condemnarunt.

The King of France beſeeches the Pope to the contrarie.

S. Lewes, by the aduiſe and counſell of his Barons, vpon this nomination of the Emperor, returned this anſwere to the Pope. That by a ſpirit thirſting for reuenge, or elſe meerely in raſhneſſe, he had interdicted and fulmined againſt the Emperour Fredericke; not conuinced of ſuch crimes as the Pope had obiected againſt him. And therefore, to no purpoſe hee had depoſed him from the Empire, and left his Seigneuries as ſpoile and pillage, to the firſt that ſhould attempt to inuade them. But

But if the crimes whereof he accuſed the Emperor, were ſo execrable, as to deſerue depoſing from the Empire: the depoſition ought to bee done by a Generall Councell, and not onely by the Pope, his capitall enemie, being both a Iudge and Partie in the cauſe. For my owne part (quoth he) vntill then, I will acknowledge the ſaid Fredericke both for innocent, and an honeſt good neighbour; for I neuer knew any thing in him, that ſauoured of hereſie from the Catholique faith, or perfidious dealing towards men. The Emperors good ſeruice in the Holy Land.

Well know I that he hath fought valiantly for the Law of Ieſus Chriſt, as well on firme Land againſt Heretiques, as beyond the Seas againſt the Sarazens, dreadleſſe of all perills and hazards in Warre. Nor haue I found a zeale ſo feruent and deuout in the Pope, who is the man that ought to aduance the ſeruice of God, to loue, protect, & defend the ſaid Fredericke againſt his enemies: whereas quite contrary, he endeuoured with all his power, to ſupplant and depriue him of the Empire, during the time of his abſence, by cunning trickes, and very vnreaſonable waies. It is no part of my meaning, to hurle my ſelfe headlong into ſuch quagmires, by declaring War againſt Fredericke ſo potent; who hath, and can haue (at need) aſſiſtance of Kings and Princes, his neighbours and friends, and in a cauſe ſo iuſt as his is. It would be pleaſure and contentment vnto the Romanes, to ſee Riuers and Streames prodigally ſluced forth of our bloud, to ſatiate and glut their rage and fury, if by our owne meanes, and that of others, they could trample vnder their feet, the Kings and Potentates of the world, tranſported with an audacious and proud gale of winde: when ſo great an Emperor as is Fredericke, ſhall ſee himſelfe trode downe, without all hope or meanes of riſing againe.

An article of inueterate malice, & whereof Princes had need to be ſenſible.

Neuertheleſſe, not to ſeeme or appeare diſdaining, or miſ-priſing the Popes meſſage (though it be plainely euident, that it is done rather in hatred to the Emperour Fredericke, then any fauour which the Romane Church beareth to vs:) we will (for our part) ſend to the ſaid Emperour Fredericke our diſcreet and well aduiſed Ambaſſadors, to vnderſtand of him, what his credence is of the Catholique Faith; to the end, that we may be the more certaine & duly informed therein. For if nothing be found in him, that may ſubiect him to reprehenſion, why ſhould wee make warre vpon him? If we finde the contrary, we will marche in open field; not onely againſt him, but euen againſt the Pope himſelfe, if hee be offenſiue to God; yea, againſt any other perſon liuing, whom we will valiantly purſue, and proſecute euen to the death.

The return of the Popes Nuncios to Rome, and Ambaſſadors ſent to the Emperor Fredericke.

The Popes Nuncios returned with this magnanimous and generous anſwere, quite contrary to that which the Pope expected. And the King (on his owne behalfe) ſent his Ambaſſadors to the Emperor Fredericke, to acquaint him with the Popes goodly Letters. Which when the ſaid Emperour had read; all amazed at the calumnies thus impoſed on him, he made anſwer to the Ambaſſadors of France: That he was a Catholique and a Chriſtian, and conſtantly beleeued all the Articles of the Orthodoxall Faith. O God forbid (quoth he) that I ſhould euer forſake the beleefe of my moſt famous Grandfathers, to walke in the way of the wicked. I call God to be Iudge betweene the Pope (who hath ſo wickedly ſcandalized mee through all the world) and my ſelfe. Then lifting his hands towards heauen, & his eyes ſtreaming forth teares, his voyce being confounded with heart-breaking ſighes and grones, he cried out; O God, thou God of vengeance, reward the Pope according to his deſeruings. So turning to the Ambaſſadors, he ſaid; Moſt deare friends, and good neighbours, beleeue vndoubtedly, that whatſoeuer the vtter enemy to my bloud (faith, who would depriue mee of all honor; that I beleeue as a Chriſtian ought to beleeue. And if you be diſpoſed to make warre vpon me, credit conſtantly; that I will defend my ſelf valiantly againſt them that preſume to meddle with me. For my hope is firmly grounded on God (who is the protector and ſhield of the innocent) that he will deliuer me from my enemies. God knoweth, that the Pope (fauouring my rebellious ſubiects, the Millaine Heretiques) hath thus bandied himſelfe againſt me. But I am obliged to render infinite thankes both to your King, and to the Barons of France, that they would vnderſtand and take knowledge what manner of man I am, before they gaue credit to the Popes perſwaſions. The Fmperours words to the Ambaſſadors. The Pope moſt maliciouſly addicted to the Emperour. The Pope ioyned with the Emperours Enemies.

Hereupon the Ambaſſadours imparted to him, theſe words concerning their King, deseruing obseruation. God forbid (quoth they) that it should euer enter into the heart and minde of the French, to make warre against a Christian Prince, without cause, and manifest subiect. Ambition cannot moue vs a iot, to aspire or make any pretence to the Empire. Because we beleeue, that the King of France our Maister, that the Ligne called of the Royall Blood, and made to mount on the Kingly Throne of the Noble Flower de Luce, death seazing his life: his neereſt Heire to succeede him, is much more excellent then the Emperour, whatsoeuer he be, who commeth to that dignity but by a voluntarie election. It shall suffice then my Lord Count Robert, to be Brother to so great a King.

Ad hoc Legati. Nolit Deus vt vnquam ascendat in cor nostrum, vt aliquem Christianum sine manifesta causa impugnemus. Nec nos pulsat ambitio. Credimus enim Dominum nostrum Regem Galliæ, quem linea Regij sanguinis prouexit ad Sceptra Francorum regenda, excellentiorem esse aliquo Imperatore, quem sola electio prouehit voluntaria: sufficit Domino Comiti Roberto fratrem esse tanti Regis. These are the very words of the Monke of England, Mathew Paris.

Concerning the peaceful estate of France

On the peaceable estate of the Kingdome of France, dependeth the whole prosperity of the holy Seate, and of all Christendome.

The King of France visiteth Pope Innocent the fourth at Lyons.

In the yeare 1248. the King S. Lewes, setting on his voyage ouer the Seas, passed by Lyons, to visite Pope Innocent the fourth, who (by his permission) was retired thither for safety (as France hath bin at all times the Sanctuary, and the onely assured refuge for Popes, in the very strongest of their afflictions) against the Emperour Fredericke the second. In this parley or conference, the King most earnestly entreated the said Pope, to listen to some good agreement betweene his Holinesse and the said Emperour, the respect, reuerence and honour of the holy Seate reserued: to the end, that peace being granted to Christendome; passage to the Leuant Sea, and the Prouinces of Europe might thereby be kept open, free and safe for all Croisades, and for the affaires in the holy-Land. Because the wars of Popes against Emperours, serued but as a Bridge to the Sarrazins, to expell the Christians from their possessions in the holy-Land. And the King perceiuing, that the Pope lent but a deafe eare to his remonstrances: looking frowningly on him. I plainely perceiue (quoth he) that so soone as I shall be gone forth of my Kingdome: all disorder will step in, by Armes of strangers, through your peruerse and wilfull obstinacie. If the voyage to the holy-Land be impeached, all the blame will be imputed on you. As for my selfe: I will keepe France, as the apple of mine eye; because the whole prosperity of you, and of Christendome, dependeth on the State of France. Custodiam Franciam vt pupillam oculi, à statu ipsius, & tui, & totius Christianitatis dependet prosperitas. These are the words againe of the same Mathew Paris.

The words of king Lewes to the Pope.

The Greeke Authors, speaking of the Church of S. Sophia at Constantinople, say (in vaine ostentation:) That it is fastened to a Chaine of Gold, which descendeth downe from Heauen. We may truely say, that God, who ballanceth the whole world with his three fingers; Qui appendit tribus digitis molem Terræ: holdeth the Crowne of France fastened to a Chaine of Diamonds in Cœlum Empyrium, descending downe on earth. How many times hath it bin seene in great brandling, to be set vpon Strangers heads? And yet notwithstanding, when they supposed themselues neereſt catching it; God gaue so strict a closure to their fingers, that they were glad to leaue it behinde them. How many tempestuous stormes hath France (in her own Kingdome) endured, one while by the English on the one side, and then by Spaniards on the othe, through the factions and practises of two furious & bloody Leagues? As often hath God comforted her in the very fiercest of her afflictions, protecting, maintaining and preseruing her by wayes meerely miraculous, and out of all humaine apparance. A yong Damosell, of obscure birth, expelled the English out of France. An Angell of Heauen threw downe to the earth the Spanish Armies, and conducted by the Arme of a victorious King; returned to the great Church of Paris, where (the very same day) the Strangers were beaten thence, confused with shame and confusion.

The manifold afflictions of France by strangers.

We haue (in our dayes) seene a yong Salomon, aged but fifteene yeares, calme and make smooth in an instant the Kingdome of France, when it was in danger of totall ruine, by the small factions of two wretched Strangers; which moued the Monke of England Mathew Paris, to say in his History of England thus remarkably, That

That God particularly saueth, guardeth, maintaineth and comforteth the Kingdome of France, which he loueth especially & particularly, aboue all Kingdoms of the world. Dominus, Regnum Francorum, præ omnibus alijs speciali complectitur dilectione consolatur & tuetur.

The same Author, making a parallel or comparison of the Kings of France, with them of Germany (in those times, the elected Emperors had no other title, but Kings of Germany) saith excellently well. That the Kings of France were much more potent, then the said Emperours: Because the holy Kingdome of France hath alwaies beene in the especiall safeguard and protection of God. Hucusque auxiliatus est Dominus, qui semper opitulantibus Regni Sanctis, Francos sub alis refouet protectionis.

A Royall feast in France, and the guests present at it.

The same Historian, describing the stately Banquet and Feast, which was in the great Hall of the Temple at Paris, (it being without the City at that time) where were lodged the King and Queene of England, Henry the third of that name, and a great Traine: he saith, that at this feast sate three Kings, two Queenes, fiue and twenty Dukes, twelue Bishops among these Dukes, eighteene Countesses; three whereof were sisters to two Queenes of France, and of England, as namely those of Anion, Cornwall and Prouence, with the Countesse Beatrix, their Mother.

The words alledged by Mathew Paris in his history of England, Ann. 1254.

As concerning the sitting at the table of the said Kings, the same Historian saith, that for Honor) the King of France S. Lewis, was set in the middest, King Henry of England on his right hand, and on the left, Thibault King of Nauarre, Count Palatine of Brie and Champaigne: howbeit, the said holy King Lewes was pressed by Henry of England, to take his place in the midst. And the Author saith, that the most honorable place was granted to the said King Lewes: Because the King of France is the King of Kings. Consederunt igitur sic ordinati. Dominus Rex Francorum, qui terrestrium Rex Regnum est, tum propter eius Cœlestem inunctionem, cum proper sui potestatem & militiæ eminentiam in medio sedebat; & Dominus Rex Angliæ à dextris; & Dominus Rex Nauarriæ à sinistris. Et cum interitur Dominus Rex Francorum alter ordinare, et videlicet Dominus Rex Angliæ in medio, & in eminentiori loco sederet, ait Dominus Rex Angliæ. Non Domine in loco, decentis sedetius modo. sedliet in medio, & digni-

us. So at the entrance into Paris, of the Emperor Charles the fourth, & his Son Wenceslaus, King of Bohemia; the King of France, Charles the fift, rode betweene them, which is the place of Honour and Precedencie, hauing the Emperor on his right hand, and the King of Bohemia on his left: to shew, that the Kings of France are greater Emperors in their Kingdome, and acknowledge no Prince in the world to be greater, then they themselues are.

Queenes of France Queens of Queenes.

And like as the Kings of France are Kings of Kings, that is to say, they are the chiefest Kings of Christendome: by one and the same argument, the Queens Mothers and wiues of our Kings, are Queenes of Queenes, and Ladies of Ladies throughout Christendome. Matthew Paris speaking of the departure and death of Queene Blanch of Castile, Mother to S. Lewes, saith: Circa id quoque tempus, videlicet prima Dominica Aduentus Dominici, prima die Mensis, obijt Dominarum Secularium Domina Blanchia Francorum Regis Mater. The King of France, according to the testimony of the same Historian, is the example and mirrour of Iustice, to Princes Strangers: as the Sunne, whose luminous and splendant beams are darted directly, to cleare the most obscureſt darkenesse; For he is King of Kings.

The words of the Relation.

In like manner, he speaking of the voyage made into England (to be there crowned King) by Lewis the 8 of the name, sonne to King Philip Augustus, writeth: that not onely the English and French, but all Christendome generally, were entranced with feare, least some accident should happen to the Kings sonne of France, who was the Prince of Christendomes Princes, and in regard of the loue and honour, which he bare to the most Noble Kingdome of France.

The Relation of Denys de Corbeill, Iohn de Monstre-veuë, and William de Limets, Knights, Ambassadors from Monsieur Lewes of France, elected King of England, against K. Iohn without Land, to Pope Innocent the third at Rome, importeth; that the said King, eldest sonne to Philip Augustus, King of France, was the Arme of the Roman Church. Behold here the true words of the Relation, reported by the said Mathew Paris, Dominus Papa statim finito sermone, percusso pectore suo cum magno gemitu, effudit spiritu, & dixit. Heu mihi! quia in hac facto Ecclesia Dei non potest euadere confusio. Si enim Rex Angliæ vincitur, in ipsius confusione confundimur, quia vassalus noster noiter eſt, & tenemur eum defendere. (The vaſſaile might enioy to himſelfe his Fieffe or inheritance, vntill his demiſſion. But it is a queſtion, whether a Soueraign Prince can render himſelfe vaſſail & Tributary to another Prince, or no, without the conſent of his Vaſſails and Subiects.) Si Dominus Ludouicus vincitur, quod Deus auertat, in ipſius læſione læditur Romana Eccleſia, & ipſius læſionem propriam reputamus, ſecure enim ſemper habuimus & adhuc habemus, quod ipſe in omnibus neceſſitatibus debeat eſſe Brachium & ſolatium in oppreſſionibus, & refugium in perſecutionibus Eccleſiæ.

Pope Innocent the third might haue added heereto, that which the Neapolitane Doctor Vinaldus ſaith in his Royall worke. That it was the common beleefe of the Church (Learne, Learne Cranato) that by a particular gift of Grace, the diuine Clemency elected the ancient Kings of France, aboue all other Kings & Princes of the habitable earth; as the proper Combatants, Champions and Souldiers of the Catholique Church. Credimus, & firmiter tenemus Diuinam Clementiam dono particularis gratiæ elegiſſe veterantos Francorum Reges præ cunctis Principibus vniuerſi orbis, quaſi proprios pugiles Catholicæ Fidei. This Italian Doctor (Cranato) deriued this beliefe from the vniuerſal conſent of the Church, and the writings of the learned Rabanus Maurus, in the Treatiſe which he wrote of Antichriſt, inſerted in the ninth Tome of S. Auguſtines works (whom ſome affirme to be the Author of that treatiſe, but to none effect; in regard this Father of the Church, and the Mallet of hereticks in his time, departed from this life to heauen, in the yere of Grace 430. then being Conſuls, the Emperors Theodoſius for the 13. time, and Valentinian for the third.) The paſſage then is out of Magnentius Rabanus Maurus, a Natiue, and firſt Abbot of Fulda, & afterward Archbiſhop of Maguntia: he was Scholler to Venerable Beda, & died in the yeere of Grace, 856. Behold here what he ſaith in honor of France.

At what time S. Auguſtine died.

Dicit Apoſtolus Paulus ſecundo ad Theſſalonicenſes. Anti-Chriſtum non antea in Mundum eſſe venturum, niſi venerit prima diſceſſio, hoc eſt niſi diſceſſerint omnia Regna à Romano Imperio, quæ prius illi ſubdita erant. Hoc autem tempus nondum aduenit; quamuis credamus Romanum Imperium ex maxima parte deſtructum; Tamen quandiu Reges Francorum durauerint, qui Romanum Imperium integrum tenere debent, Imperij Romani dignitas non ex toto peribit; Quia ſtabit in Regibus ſuis (hee ſpeaketh not of Kings of Spaine, Cranato) but continueth on ſtill thus. Quidam vero Doctores noſtri dicunt, Quod venus ex Regibus Francorum Romanum Imperium, ex integro tenebit, qui in nouiſſimo tempore Maximus, & omnium Regnum vltimus erit. Hic poſtquam Regnum ſuum feliciter adminiſtrauerit, ad vltimum Hieroſolymam veniet, & in Olineti monte Sceptra ſuum Coronamque deponet, & hic erit finis. & conſummatio Imperij Romanorum, & Chriſtianorum; ſtatumque ſecundum prædictam ſententiam Apoſtoli Pauli, Anti-Chriſtum hæreant futurum.

The application of this Propheſie.

This ancient Propheſie is grounded, on the deuotion and piety of the moſt Chriſtian & moſt Sacred Monarchs of the Lilly; becauſe of all them which haue reigned in France, from the time of great Clouis, to K. Lewis the 13. of that name, now reigning, there is not found one King that hath wauered in Faith, or euer bowed his knee to Baall.

The faithfull Hiſtorian of the Spaniards Mariana, and all his fore-goers in the Hiſtory of Spaine, doe informe vs, that Mauregat, 7. King of Ouiedo and Leon, who began to reigne in An. 783. becauſe he would reigne; made himſelfe Tributary to the King of Moores in Spaine, named Abdiramus, yeelding a Tribute vnfitting for any Chriſtian Prince; namely, of fiftie Damoſels of noble extraction and lineage, and as many other meaner mens daughters, which he ſent yeerely vnto the Infidell Moores, to ſatisfie their infamous and beaſtly lubricity, by the loſſe of their Chriſtian ſoules. Whereas on the contrary, in all the three Lignes of our Kings with vs in France, we haue had ſome ſanctified and canonized.

A moſt diſhonourable tribute to be payed.

Kings of France ſanctified and Canonized.

Vnder the firſt Ligne, S. Gontran king of Orleans & of Bourguignonne France. The Romane Martyrologe of the moſt learned Cardinall Baronius (whom the Spaniards affect not, becauſe he ſpeaketh the truth, concerning the kingdomes of Naples and Sicily, wickedly vſurped from the Crowne of France) vnder the eight day of March, ſaith. Cabilone in Gallijs depoſitio Sancti Gunthramni Regis Francorum, qui ſpretis ritualibus actionibus ita ſe mancipauit, vt relictis Saculi pompis, theſauros ſuos Eccleſiæ & Pauperibus erogaret.

Vnder

Vnder the ſame firſt Ligne, Saint Dagobert, King of France, the 23. day of December, according to the Breuiaries of France.

Vnder the ſecond, Saint Charlemaigne, King of France, Ligne and firſt Emperor of the Weſt; and Author of S. Peters Patrimonie, the 28. day of Ianuary.

Vnder the third, Saint Louis, the 25. day of Auguſt.

So that on behalfe of the Kings of France, may be ſaid, as the ſubile Oratour in Ouid did.

Neque in his quiſquam damnæius, aut exul.

As much to ſay, that there was not a Mauregat among them all.

Aliances made with the Turke and Moores.

Cranato, you haue not ſpared to touch this ſtring; and yet notwithſtanding, you talke of foure formes of Alliance, which King Francis, firſt of the name, made with the great Seigneur of the Turkes. But you trip ſilently ouer them which Charles the fift, Emperour, made with the Sophie of Perſia, and the Moore-Kings of Fez and Marocco. Goe to Schoole Cranato, to learne this diſticke.

Tollere qui curas feſtucam ex fratris ocello,
Quæ tua perturbant lumina, tolle trabem:

Where intentions are different, the iſſues are diſcordāt.

Succeſſe of time hath verified that thoſe of Charles the fift, were in mallice, for reuenge, and fruitleſſe; whereas thoſe of King Frances the firſt, returned to the benefit of Chriſtendome. Who can tell, if God will ſerue himſelfe by extraordinary meanes, for reducing the Turkes to the knowledge of one onely God, and to make profeſſion of Catholique Religion? We ſee that this Alliance hath preſerued to this very day ſafely, the holy Sepulcher at Ieruſalem, and places of deuotion in the holy-Land, honored with the miſteries of our redemption: which elſe had long ſince bin ruined and defaced, by furie of the Iewes; but by reſpect in the Kings of France, who (by that Alliance) conſerued the poore Chriſtians in Turkie, and facilited the deliuerance of ſuch, as remained captiues among the Turkes. The libertie which the Engliſh, Italians and other Nations deriued from this confederation, to trafficke and merchandiſe on the Seas, and in the Lands belonging to the Turke, vnder the banner of France; may one day auaile, to aduance there the Chriſtian Standard of the Croſſe.

Other Nations made vſe of the French mens confederacie with the Turke.

Æghinardus, Secretarie of State to our King Charlemaigne, enſtructeth vs in the life of this great Prince. That he ſought, and obtained correſpondencie with Aaron, King of Perſia, who held all the Eaſt (India onely excepted) to maintaine and conſerue the holy Sepulcher of Ieruſalem: And thereof enſued the renowne and knowledge of the French in the Eaſt parts, and other ſtrange Nations; who baptized with the name of Franky, all the Chriſtian Nations, and the Spaniards alſo, in the Indiaes Eaſt and Weſt, and of China.

The care great Charlemaigne had of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians liuing among the Infidels.

The ſaid King Charlemaigne, ſought (in like manner) the Alliance (and conſerued it all his life time) of the Sarrazine Kings beyond the Seas; that he might haue the better meanes, for ſending his Almes, to the poore Chriſtians, which then dwelt in Syria, Ægypt, Affrica, Ieruſalem, Alexandria, and Carthage. Vbi Chriſtianos in paupertate viuere comperat (as Æghinardus telleth vs) penuriæ eorum compatiens, pecuniam mittere ſolebat. Behold here the fruite of theſe confederations, by the onely great Prince of Chriſtendome, with thoſe Infidels. Ab hoc maximè tranſmarinorum Regum amicitiam expetens, vt Chriſtianis ſub eorum Dominatu refrigerium aliquod, ac relcuatio proueniret. Becauſe poore Chriſtians, dwelling in their Marches, might be the more mildely gouerned and vſed. This Alliance then of the French with the Turke, is honeſt and profitable to all Chriſtendome: and ſo by conſequent, worthy of a moſt Chriſtian King, againſt which Cranato impertinently ſpeaketh. Returne we to our Precedencie.

The French, the right Arme and Champions of the Church.

If the Monarchs of the holy & ſacred Lillies of France, are the right Arme, and Champions of the Church, according to the teſtimony of ſtrange Authors formerly alleadged (In this principall cauſe, we ſerue not our turne with our owne, who beare their blame vpon their foreheads.) They are likewiſe the Founders & ſole Authours of the goods, which they poſſeſſe, or ought to poſſeſſe.

Petrum

Petrus Pomponatius, an Italian Phylosopher, saith, That the great benefits to the Romaine Church, giuen by the Kings of France: hath wonne them the title of excellence and honor of Most Christian Kings, aboue all Princes on the earth.

The imaginary precede ency of the Greekes.

The donation made to Pope Sylvester, by Constantine the Great, is falsely supposed by the Greekes (alwayes bold lyers) to arrogate it selfe to an imaginary Precedencie, and Honour of the Romaine Church; from which being sequestred and dismembred, they are become the Fable and contempt of the Turkes, the Iewes, yea, euen of their owne Nation, captiue and miserable, without hope of any reflorring. Also, the writings of Theodorus Balsamo, Patriarch of Antioch, and of Nomocanonde Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople, are meere impostures, fomented by the enemies of France. For Augustinus Eugubinus, and the Grammarian Laurentius Valla, who would gladly counterfeit Historians, with all their borrowed Greekes are learnedly contradicted by the iudicious Sigonius and Onuphrius, Italians. And the Annales of Germanie report vnder the yeare 756. that in the second voyage of Italie, made by the King of France Pepin, against Astolphus, King of the Lombardes; he made a donation to the holy Seate, of Lands and Prouinces by him conquered. Namely, The Exarcate of Rauenna, which contained thirteene Townes; Pompolis, Tesauris; the Seigneuries of Vrbin, Romaignia and Ferrara, of which Cities he sent the Keyes to the Confession of the chiefe of the Apostles S. Peter, by Eckardus, Abbot of S. Denys in France, Maister of his Chappell. Iterum Pepinus Italiam ingressus Hastulphum Papie inclusum obsidet, Rauennam, cum Pentapoli reddere compellit, & per Fobradum missum suum Sancto Petro Apostolo, & Stephano Papæ Vicario eius tradidit. Hee caused these to be surrendred at this second voyage, because at the first voyage of Italie, made before this, to wit, in the yeare of Grace 754. he had giuen to the Church the Lands before specified, by him conquered from the Kings of the Lombardes. That donation, made in the yeare aboue dated 754. was sometime engraued in a long Table of Marble, in the Citie of Rauenna. Pipinus. Pius. Franc. Rex Christianiss. Primus. Amplificandæ. Ecclesiæ sum. Apperuit. & Exarchatum. Rauennæ. cum. Amplissimis. .. .. ..

going against the Persians, hee being then aged, threescore and sixe yeares.

Seauen yeares before, hee had establisshed his ordenary abiding at Bizantium, which (by his name) was called Constantinople, and, for a title of honor, New Rome; enriched with the spoyles of the old, and of all the wealthiest Cities of the Romaine Empire, so saith the same S. Hierome. Ditatur Constantinopolis omnium pene vrbium nuditate.

Constantinople new Rome

Which passages may serue vs to approue, that this imaginary and pretended donation of Constantine, saw no light in the time of S. Hierome, who had bin as the soule and life of the Pope Saint Damasus. Eusebius his Predecessour, and the Chronicle, which he pursued during his life time, hath giuen vs to vnderstand some things.

The most-Christian Kings gaue originall to S. Peters Patrimonie.

It is then the most-Christan Kings, Qui Aurum habet Ecclesia, and vpon whose liberalitie, the Patrimonie of S. Peter receiued foundation and originall. At all times they haue bin the Conseruatours thereof, and of the Popes Authoritie. Semper pro Legibus, & Iuribus Ecclesiæ Dei, Summorumque Pontificum soli fideliter decertarunt. These are the words of the learned Doctor Vualdus.

The honorable offices of France to the Church and Popes, & their Precedencie thereby won.

These famous Offices, of the Monarchs of the holy and Sacred Lillies of France, rendred in all occurrences to the Church and Popes, with whom at all times they haue held such correspondencie, of reioycing in prosperitie, and comforting in their afflictions, which they layed vpon their owne shoulders, to disburden the Pope) won them the right of Precedency, aboue all Kings on the earth, and namely of Christendome. Beside these Epithites of honor; Eldest Sonnes of the Church; The most Christian Kings; Best Benefactours; and Protectours of the holy Seate.

In the Oration of Pope Iohn, eight of the name, a Romaine by Nation, made in the assembly of Bishops of Italie, in the Citie of Pauia, at the Coronation of our King and Emperour Charles, second of the name, tearmed the Baulde; hee was called Christianissimus Princeps: these are the words. Inter has tempestates Clarissimum Sydus in diebus nostris apparuit. Ecce nobis Karolum Christianissimum Principem superna prouidentia præscitum àse, præelectum ante Mundi constitutionem, & prædestinatum, &c.

Titles and additions of honor giuen to the Kings of France.

Anastasius, keeper of the Librarie to the holy Seate, in the liues of the Popes, Zacharie the first, Stephen, Adrian and Leo, neuer speaketh of our Kings, Pepin le Bref, Charlemaigne and Lewes the Debonnaire: but he addeth this Elogium of honor, Rex Francorum Christianissimus. And the like is read in the Decretall Epistles of the Popes, Stephen the second, Paul the first, Stephen the third, Adrian the first, and Iohn the eight: all which speaking of the Kings and People of France, say with one consent. That the Kings and People of France, doe shine and excell aboue all Nations in the World; as well for pietie towards the Church, as for Prowesse, Manhood and Valiancie.

A Bull for Legitimation Granted by Pope Innocent the third.

Pope Innocent the third, in the Bull of Legitimation for Monsieur Phillip of France, and of Madam Mary his Sister, Children (impeached from marriage by Iudgement of the Church) of Phillip Augustus, and of Agnes, daughter to the Duke of Morauia in Bohemia: The said Bull, giuen at the Castell of Agnano, dated the fourth of the Nones of Nouember, and the fourth yeare of his Pontificalitie, and of Grace one thousand two hundred and one, read, published and registred in the Court of Perlement, at the Candlemasse following; beareth these words worthy of obseruation, for the deuotion, and pietie of the Kings of France, on behalfe of the holy Seate, and of the said King Phillip Augustus.

The words contained in the Bul Inscribe

Nos igitur attendentes in eo deuotionis constantiam, & Fidei puritatem, quam à Progenitoribus suis Regibus erga Romanam Ecclesiam, quasi quodam hereditario iure, contraxit, vt tam honori Regiæ dignitatis quam vtilitati, & necessitati Regni Francorum prouide consulamus, præfatos puerum & puellam de speciali gratia, Legitimationis titulo, de communi Fratrum nostrorum consilio, decoramus.

And yet notwithstanding, the same Pope, in his Decretale directed to William, Vicount of Mont-Pelier, who vnder colour to relieue (in part) the Bishopricke of Magnelone: requested to haue a Bastard of his to be made Legitimate, had no other answere, but this. That he should shape his course to the King of France (the same Phillip Phillip Augustus) to whom he was a seruant. And what he had done in this Legitimation, was, because the said Phillip Augustus had entreated him to doe it: and not as arrogating or attributing to himselfe, any power or right of Legitimation, ouer the Lands of the Kingdome of France; whose Kings and Monarchs acknowledged in their temporalities, not any other Soueraigne, but God alone. In temporalibus neminem superiorem agnoscunt. In the Decretale, Per venerabilem, Qui Filij sint legitimi.

Pope Honorius the third, saith in his Decretale. That the King of France is the inexpugnable wall of Christendome; the Quiuer or Arrow-Case, from whence God taketh his Arrowes, and shooteth them abroad, to attract, subdue and reduce strange Nations, to the knowledge of his name.

Pope Boniface the ninth, and his Cardinals, said. That the King of France is the Soueraigne King of Christendome, by whom the Church ought to be illuminated, more then by any other King or Prince on the earth.

Now, like as we reade in Suidas the Greeke Author, that by the word Βασιλεὺς μέγας, the name of Great King, the sole Monarch of the Persians was designed, vnderstood and noated, and in speaking of other Kings, there was an addition, and firname of the People, ouer whom they commanded, as King of the Macedonians, or Lacedemonians, and so of others: So in like manner, The Kings of France are designed and acknowledged, by the name of King onely, and without addition, for Antonomasia. Other Kings of Christendome are perticularized by the names of their People, as Kings of Spaine, of England of Scotland, Hungaria, Bohemia, Polonia, Denmarke, Sueden, Norwaye, &c.

Titles and additions of other Kings.

This is the Doctrine of Doctors of Italie (not to alleadge any of ours, in our own cause). First of Bonifacius de Vitalinis, Auditour de la Rota in Rome, in his Preface on the Clementines, in these notable words. Dicendo simpliciter Episcopus, debet intelligi de Supremo, hoc est, Romano Pontifice, per excellentiam: Sicut decimus quod appellatione Regis simpliciter facta, Debet. intelligi. De. solo. Reges. Francie. per. Excellentiam.

Ioannes Ludouicus Vualdus in his worke Royall, is of the same opinion. Rex Francorum per Antonomasiam Christianissimus appellatur, & hic titulus ponitur vice proprij nominis, significans personam Regis Francorum; quæ quidem dignitas, Francorum Regibus data est, ob claríssima gesta, & admiranda prodigia, quæ pro Catholica fide semper egerunt.

The same Doctor in another passage. Rex Regum, Dominus Dominantium Iesus-Christus, per vniuersum Orbem statuit, & ordinauit Reges, & Principes in argumentum sue vnice Maiestatis. Elegit autem præ ceteris Regem Christianissimum quasi Nobilissimum Athletam Ecclesiæ suæ, cuius officium est auctoritatem Ecclesiæ Dei conseruare: Barbaras gentes, & Turcarum perfidiam expugnare: cultum diuinum, ac iura Christianæ Religionis magnificare: Tyrannos debellare: atque malenolos Principes infrænì subiicere.

He (saith this Author) who is pleased and delighted with taking this magnificent title of King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, Iesus Christ (in the Apocalypse) hath ordained and Apoc. 19. 16. established in all Prouinces of the World, Kings and Princes, to shew the effect of his Almightie Power. But principally he hath chosen the Most-Christian King, to whom he hath giuen the Precedencie of Honor, before all Kings and Princes on the earth: as being the vnconquerable Champion of his Church, whose care and ordenarie effect hath alwayes bin, to conserue and defend the authoritie thereof: Warring against Barbarous Nations, and Turks; to plant and aduance the seruice of God, and reduce to tearmes of dutie and obedience, all such as would harme the holy Seate.

Nenisanus, in his twelfth Councell, enclosed within those of Doctor Albertus Brunus, hath left written: That the Kingdome of France is the most excellent of all the Kingdomes in the World.

Corsetus, in the Booke which he wrote De Potestate Regia, saith. That the King of France is Emperour, and a more excellent Monarch and Soueraigne, then the Emperour of Germanie is.

Baldus, on the Law Exemplo, at the title De Probationibus the Code: on the Chapter, Per

Per Venerabilem (before obserued) Qui Filij sint Legitimi: In his Councell Petita Venia 218. And in his reading on the first Chapter, first Paragraphe, Lib. de Prohibita Feudi Alienatione per Fredericum, and first Booke of Fiefes, saith. That the King of France glorieth and shineth, aboue all the Kings in the world, as the morning Star doth in the midst of the Clouds. And that the Kings of France wore the Crowne of Glory, Honor, and Freedome, aboue all the Kings that are in Christendome.

Ioannes Andreas, and the Panormitane, write. That the King of France acknowledgeth on earth, no Prince greater then himselfe, be it either in fact, or Right.

This doctrine (word for word) is held by the Cardinall Zarabella, and Guillelmus de Monte-Lauduno, both Romaine Doctors, in their Readings on the Vnica Clementina, De Iureiurando. Goe to Schoole Cranato, to learne what the King of France is.

The Canonists, and the Glosse on the Pragmaticall Sanction, In Capite Nouit. de Iudic. In Capite Solitè, de Maiorit. The Glosse on the third Booke, De Off. Proc. ad Digest: And on the Chapter Per Venerabilem, qui Fil. sint Leg. doe hold and acknowledge with one consent. That the Most-Sacred Kings of France doe not acknowledge, either in Fact or Right, any one to be greater then themselues: That they are borne Emperours, and to them onely it belongeth, to weare the close Crowne, made firme according to the Imperiall manner.

Lucas de Penna, in his reading on the Lew Vnica, ad Tit. De Conductoribus, & Code.

Cursius the yonger, in his Treatise De Feudis, Part. and Quest. 2.

Andreas de Ysernia, on the Title De Vasallo decrepitæ ætatis, ad Feud. Cap. 1. And Decius Cap. Nouit, de Iudicijs, on the decretales, write all with one accord,

That the King of France is the most soueraigne Monarch in his Kingdome, and more then the Emperour is in his Empire. And

That he is the most Excellent and Noble, of all the Kings in the World. Thus you heare what the Doctors of Italie say: Come we now to Englishmen.

Venerable Beda writeth, that before the comming of Anti-Christ, to appeare in the world, a King must come forth of France, that shall reduce all Infidell Nations to the Catholique Faith, and range them vnder his obedience. This opinion is followed by Rabanus Maurus, as wee haue said, and by Volaterranus, on the word Ante-Christ. Wee haue formerly related an infinite number of passages of Mathew Paris, the English Monke, to the Honor and Precedencie of the Kings & Kingdome of France.

Let vs now make Spaniards (our contraries) to march along in Field with the rest, and draw from their owne mouthes the confession of Truth, in whose eyes can no dust be cast, according to the Great Tertullian. Cui nemo præscribere potest, non spatia temporum, non longinquitas regionum, nec dignitas personarum. Cranato, beare off this blow, and stand on your guard.

Oldradus, a Spanish Doctor, saith. That the King of France weareth the Crowne of Excellencie and Glory, aboue all Kings on the earth.

Petrus Bellugæ another Spanish Doctor, in his Mirour, ad Tit. 14. and Paragraphe Nunc videamus, Numero 29. writeth. That the King of France acknowledgeth in the world, neither in fact or right, any Prince greater then himselfe. Goe to the Schoole of your owne Spanish Doctors Augustine Cranato: but the glittering of Spanish Doublet hath blinded your sight.

The writings of Rabanus Maurus are filled with wonders, in behalfe and honor of the Kings and Kingdom of France. In the Treatise of Ante-Christ, he saith.

That the white Cloude, which couered all the rest, obserued in the Apocalips; designed and represented the Kingdome of France.

That he is the great finger, sustaining the foote of Iron, which is not to be bruised or broken: That the Fabricke of the world shall not perish by fire. In the Prophesie of Daniel, and as Lyranus expoundeth on the Apocalips. And Dan 10.9.

That the Scepter of the Kings of France, is the Rod, which must breake the Scepters and Crownes of Infidell Kings.

I

I let passe in silence an infinite number of goodly Tracts, delivered on this excellent subiect, by Iohn Froissard, Englebertus de Monstrelet, Iean le Maire, Oliuer de la Marche, and other Historians; because they are Flemings, and Subiects to the Crowne of France, in regard of the Counts of Flanders, Arbois, Henault, and other Seignuries in the Low-Countries, vnder Authoritie of the Parlements of Paris.

They that haue written, that the Sacred Kings of France, obtained this priuiledge from Popes, to stand exempted from sentences of Excommunication of the Bishops of France, and of Popes themselues: are ignorant in our Historie, erring both in fact and right.

For we in France doe hold, that the Pope hath not any Iurisdiction in Temporall occasions, ouer the Kings and Princes on the earth; neither hath hee power to Excommunicate them; to deliuer their Subiects from the Oath of Allegeance; to giue their Kingdomes as preyes and spoiles, to the first Intruder, and their persons to the Knife and Sword, according to the new Doctrine of the Iesuites, mischieuously practised on the Sacred persons of our two last Kings, of holy and glorious memory.

The constant opinion held in France concerning the power of Popes.

Kings and Princes on the earth, haue no other Iudge, but God onely. If they decline, slip or swerue from the way of vertue (as they haue power by their Authoritie:) In case of this disease; the proceeding must be by faire Remonstrances, milde, yet somewhat piercing, according to the occurrences, and not to step any further. Principes sæculi à nemine iudicantur. Good or bad, they haue no Iudge but God: and such was the beliefe of the Gallicane Church, twelue hundred ago.

None but God onely is the Iudge of Princes.

Pretextatus Bishop of Rouen, was accused before King Chilpericke, to haue had some practise and medling with his enemies. Chilpericke assembled the Bishops of France, in the Church and Monasterie of Saint Geneuiesue at Paris. Saint Gregory Bishop then of Tours, had charge to deliuer the speech for them all, for innocence of the Bishop of Rouen, hee composed this action of importance for the Church of France, in all honestie and modestie; and not in brauing tearmes, for reprouing the King, by attempting on the persons of Bishoppes: Because Kings on the earth haue no other Iudge, but God onely, and sinne not, but to God onely. Tibi soli peccaui Domine, & malum coram te feci, so said the great Arnobius, on the fiftie Psalme. Saule the first King of Israel, was reproued of God for his wicked life; and Dauid, a better man then he, chosen. Neuertheless, the Priest Samuel, did alwayes giue him the honor and reuerence which were due vnto him, to make example for the like in the children of Israel, although hee had denounced the tydings to him, of his priuation from the Kingdome. Scidit Dominus regnum Israel à te hodie, & tradidit illud proximo tuo meliori te. Saule returned him his answere. Peccaui, sed nunc honora me coram Senioribus Populi mei, & coram Israel, & reuertere mecum. I see well, that I haue sinned before God, who hath reproued me, yet neuertheless, start not from me, to withdraw thy selfe from my obedience: but follow me, and giue me the honor due vnto me, for good example to my People.

The Bishop of Rouen accused by King Chilperick.

1 Reg. 15. 28. 30.

S. Gregory of Tours spake to the said Chilpericke (although he was a cruell Prince, and addicted to all vices) in milde and gentle language, with all honour and reuerence beseeming his King, as is witnessed by his owne words. This Chilpericke demanded Iustice against his Bishoppe. O Episcope, Iustitiam cunctis iuri debes, & ecce ego Iustitiam à te non accipio. Saint Gregorie answered. Si quis ex nobis, O Rex, Iustitiæ tramitem transcendere valuerit, à te corrigi potest: Si verò tu excesseris, quis te corripiet? Loquimur enim tibi, sed si volueris, audis: si autem nolueris, quis te condemnabit, nisi is qui se pronunciauit esse Iustitiam? Sacred Maiestie, if any one of ys Bishops, doe swerue from the paths of Iustice; it belongeth to you to correct and punish him. But if by your absolute power, you doe exceede the bounds; What is he that shall reproue you? We may giue you admonitions, but if it be not your pleasure to take them in good part; you send a deafe eare to vs, and who shall condemne you for it, but onely he, who giueth to himselfe selfe the same title, and the name of Iustice? Hee affirmed, that the King had no other Iudge, but God onely, and not the Pope, as the enemies of France (otherwise boldly) imagine.

The answere refuted by the Bishop to the King.

Mathew Paris, vnder the yeare one thousand one hundred eightie eight, informeth vs, that warre being moued betweene King Phillip Augustus, and Henry, King of England, second of the name, the two Princes met together at a place neere to Ferté-Benehart, to finde some meanes, of ordaining and setling a good peace betweene them, to the end, that the voyage intended for the Holy-Land might be forwarded, but they could not agree. Which being perceiued by Iohn d'Aguano, a Cardinall sent by Pope Clement into France as Legate, who had drawne the English out of England thither: hee threatned King Phillip, to Excommunicate him, and to set an Interdiction vpon his Land. The King made him answere, that he did not feare any such fulmination, full of sinne and iniquitie. For (quoth hee) it appertaineth not to the Romaine Church, to Excommunicate Kings or Princes authorised on earth: And perticulerly, the King of France. Cui Rex Francorum respondit, se ipsius sententiam nulla tenus formidare cum nulla æquitate fulciretur. Addidit etiam, ad Ecclesiam Romanam minime pertinere in Regem aliquem, & maxime Francorum, per sententiam animaduertere.

The Kings royall answere to the ouer-bold Legate.

The same Monke further telleth vs, that Monsieur Lewes de France, eldest Sonne to the said King Phillip Augustus, was chosen King of England, in right of his wife Madame Blanch of Castile, daughter to Alphonso, eight of the name, King of Castile, & of Madame Eleanor of England, daughter (and onely then liuing) to the King of England Henry, second of the name, by generall consent of the Barons of England.

Galo, Legate to Pope Innocent the third, came to France, to hinder the passage of Monsieur Lewes de France into England. In regard (saith hee) the Kingdome of England is part of S. Peters Patrimonie: because King Iohn without Land (to be absolued of his enormous sinnes) had cowardly, and through lacke of courage, and not in any deuotion, rendred the Kingdome of England Tributarie to the Holy-Seate, in a thousand Markes of Siluer, payable yearely.

England a parcel of S. Peters Patrimonie.

For hinderance of this voyage, the said Galo came to meete with the Kings of France, Father and Sonne, at Lyons, fitting his turne with infinite perswasions and Prayers, which he perceiuing to faile: made his recourse, to the ordinarie threatnings vsed by Popes, namely, of Excommunication. Monsieur Lewes arising before the King his Father, holding his hat in his hand, said to him in all humble reuerence. My Lord, although I am your Liege man, in those demeanes which you haue bestowed on mee, concerning the parts on this side the Sea: yet notwithstanding, you haue no reason to take knowledge of any thing in the Kingdome of England. Neuertheless, I submit my selfe to the iudgement of my Peeres, whether you ought, or no, to hinder me in the pursuite of my right, which is that belonging to my wife, for defence whereof I will fight, euen to death.

Galo Legate from the Pope to King Phillip Augustus and his Sonne King Lewes.

But at departing out of the King his Fathers presence, hee told the Legate: That it consisted not in the power of the Pope, to Excommunicate him, or hinder him in the pursuite of his rights. Hee purposed to passe before him into England, there to haue him feasted and entertained by a Monke (who was a stoute Pirate on the Seas of England, named Eustace the Monke, Admirall of the Fleete belonging to Monsieur Lewes of France, for his passage into England.) of whom King Phillip Augustus had aduised the Legate to take heede. Legatus rogauit Regem Francorum, vt saluum sibi conductum præberet vsque ad Mare. Cui Rex respondit, per terram nostram prouidam conductum tibi lubenter præstabo: sed si forte incideris in manus Eustachij Monachi, vel aliorum hominum Ludouici, qui custodiunt semitas Maris; non mihi imputes, si quid tibi contingat, saith the same Mathew Paris.

King Lewes his words to the Legate.

The words of Mathew Paris

The Sacred Kings of France, are then no way Subiects to the Censures of Popes.

The Kings of France not subiect to the censures of Popes.

As wee haue at large related vnder Phillip le Bel, in the Historie of Nauarre, because their persons being Sacred with a Celestiall Balme, and so many Ceremonies, as are not any of the other Kings of Christendome: Cæremoniæ Regum facultatem excedit, neque enim Regum Francorum Persona exterioribus prorsus est Laica, sed Sacerdotalis: So effectually speaketh the Neapolitane Doctor Doctor Vualdus in his Royall Worke. And therefore the Sacred Kings of France, from the time of Clouis, receiued the Communion vnder both the kindes, which the Doctors tearme Communion Sacerdotale, as other Kings of Christendome doe not. Nithardus, Theganus, and the Authors writing the life of Lewes the Debonnaire, haue purposely obserued this King; that he communicated vnder both the kindes, of Bread and Wine, iuxta morem Francorum Regum.

And for Excellencie and Dignity of their Person, such as are imployed in their seruices, as are the Peeres, Councellers, and Officers of their Parlements, Councels, house and Crowne of France; neither can, or ought to be Excommunicated.

Attendants on the Kings person free from Excommunication.

And from the time of the first Ligne of our Kings, criminals and offenders, of what qualitie soeuer they were, being called neere about their person, and admitted and receiued to their Table: were (by that meanes) remitted in their temporall goods, charges and dignities.

Pardon granted to offenders.

Vnder the King of Paris Chilpericke, Prætextatus, Bishop of Rouen, by iudgement of fiftie, and of as many Bishops, was confined and banished into the Isle of Gerzey (opposite to the Towne of Coutance in Normandie, aunciently called Moritonium, and by Ammianus Marcellinus Campus Constantij; and this Isle of Gerzey sometimes Cæsarea, in the Itinerarium of the Cosmographer Aethicus.) After the death of Chilpericke, Prætextatus (whom they of Rouen called S. Prætextatus) went to Paris, to meete the King Saint Gonthran, who welcommed him honorably, admitted him to his Table, and, notwithstanding his enemies, sent him againe to Rouen, to gouerne his Bishopricke, as he had done before his exile. S. Gregory of Tours, in his Historie of France, saith. Sic a Rege susceptus, atque comitio eius adscitus, ad Vrbem suam regressus est.

The same S. Gregory, describing the entrance of Gonthran, King of France, into the Citie of Paris, where were met together most part of the Bishops of France: among them was Palladius, Bishop of Xaintes, Suffragan to Bertrand of Bourdeux. Both these men had bin conuicted of Felonnie, and to haue followed the action of Balomer, calling himselfe Gombauld, Sonne to a King of France, slaine at Bertrand de Comenges, in the Pyrenean Mountaines, as wee haue already elsewhere said. Behold what is said by S. Gregory of Tours. Tunc Berchramnus Burgalensis Episcopus, cum Palladio Sanctonico, valde Regi infensus erat pro susceptione Gondobaldi: sed & Palladius Episcopus ob hoc maxime Regis iram incurrerat, quod ei opus fallacias intulisset. Discussi enim ante paululum fuerant, à reliquis Episcopis, ac Optimatibus Regni (The Parlements of France were not in elder times composed, but of Bishoppes and Noblemen onely, they of the third Estate were neuer receiued into such charges; where, thorow ignorance in the Nobilitie, they are made capable of obtaining the estates and dignities of the Kingdome) Cur Gondobaldum suscepissent, cur Faustianum Aquis (of Dags in the Lands of Bourdeux) Episcopum ad preceptionem eius leuissimam ordinassent. These are the heads of their accusations.

The words of S. Gregory set downe in his Historie.

Now it fortuned, that the Sunday following this Entrance, King Gonthran went to heare Masse in the Cathedrall Church, and the Bishops Seruants at the Altar, receiued (with them) him of Xaintes, among the number of the Sub-Deacons. He then beginning to reade a Prophesie for the Epistle, the King demanded of the Prelates which assisted him, the name of the man that read the Epistle. So soone as it was told him, that it was Palladius: How (quoth the King) durst he be so bold, to present himselfe before me, and appeare among you, most Holy Fathers, being the man that was the author of troubling my Kingdome by a strange League? How haue you admitted and receiued him into your Communion? And he so audacious, as to pronounce out of his infidell and periured mouth, holy Prophesies, words of Truth? Qui mihi semper fidelis, & perfidus fuit, ille nunc sacrata verba prædicabit? Egrediar prorsus ab hoc cœtu, ne inimicum meum audiam prædicantem. (After reading the Epistles and Gospels, they were expounded to the people and Catecumenists, in the time of the primitiue Church, and very long after.) Et hæc dicens, egredi cœpit Ecclesiam.

King Gonthran goeth to the Cathedrall Church.

The words of the King to the Prelates.

The Prelates retained him, not by any threatning of Excommunication, or procuring to haue it done by the Pope; but by this reason. That all criminall and guiltie persons, whom the Sacred Kings of France honored with their table and reception, had generall abolition of all Crimes: and by the sole admission of them into their house and presence, they ought to be free, and absolued from all excommunication.

Vidimus enim eum (thus spake the Bishops of France to King Gonthran, in fauour of Bishop Palladius) conuiuio tuo adesse: ac de eius manu te benedictionem accipere: & cur eum nunc Rex aspernatur? Si enim sciissemus tibi exosum declinassemus vtique ad alium qui hæc agere debuisset. These words are indeede very remarkeable.

A Decree set downe in the Councill of Orleans.

At the Councill of Orleans, held by command of Clouis, first Christian King of the French, it was ordained by the Gallicane Church; that the Officers and seruants of that great Prince, and of the Kings of France his Successours, should not be subiect to sentences of Excommunication, and that such as had encurred the same deseruedly, should be receiued and admitted into the Communion of the faithfull, in regard of the reuerence and honor, which Vassales and Subiects (without any distinction) should render and beare to the Persons of the Sacred Kings of France at all times.

The Decree of this Councill at Orleans, is inserted in the seauenth Booke of our Capitularies. Vt hi qui à Sacerdotibus excommunicantur, à Fidelibus vsque ad reconciliationem, nisi quibus permissum fuerit, semper vitentur.

Ex Concil. Aurel. sub Clodoueo. i.

Placuit vt his qui à suis excommunicantur Sacerdotibus, nullus Fidelium communicet, nisi quibus permissum fuerit, nec priusquam canonice reconcilietur, ad eos accedat, & si quis id facere tentauerit, simili sententiæ subiaceat.

Si quos autem culpatores Regia potestas mensæ suæ participes effecerit, ab obsequium suum, aut in Gratiam benignitatis acceperit, hos Sacerdotum, & Populorum conuentus suscipere in Ecclesiastica Communione debebit: Vt quos Regia pietas recipit admittat Ecclesia Dei; & inter Regnum atque Sacerdotium vna semper maneat æquanimitas.

This is the testimonie of the learned Bishop of Chartres, Yues de Beauuais, in his 62. Epistle. De Geruasio quoque non debet vestra Fraternitas mirari, vel indignari, quod eum ad Communionem in Paschali Curia susceperi. Pro Regia enim Honorificentia huc fui fretus auctoritate Legis. Si quos culpatorum, &c.

The Lawes of the Capitulares, aduersable to the Commandements of the Church.

The same Bishop saith moreouer. Si Raptores, & sacrarum rerum violatores iuste à vobis à Communione separatos, sine satisfactione in Communionem recipitis offenditis legem, si in seperatione eorum ab Ecclesia, sicut dignum est, perseueratis, offenditis Regem. Because the Law of the Capitularies, conformably to the Commandements of the Church, doe ordaine, that Excommunicate persons should be depriued of Communion with the faithfull, to the end that they should procure their speedier absolution. But the same Law doth except such, as are imployed in the Princes seruice. Which was practised in France, vnder the Reigne of the mirrour of all pietie Saint Lewes, according to the testimonie of the Lord de Ioinuille. Whereunto the Prelates of France supplicated, that the Excommunicate; might be bound and constrained by secular Iudges, to get themselues absolued wholly, at least within a yeare. But answere was made freely to the Bishop of Auxerre (who spake for all the Prelates of France) that it might not be permitted, that Princes and Officers should be Excommunicated. Alleadging the example of the Count of Bretaigne, Excommunicated by the Bishop of the place; against whom the King tooke part, and maintained the Act of the Count his Subiect.

The Count of Bretaigne Excommunicated by his Bishop.

Sancta sunt corpora Regum Francorum, to very good purpose so spake Doctor Rualdus. And for the Sacred Kings of France onely (because the like is not done for the Kings of England, Spaine, and others of Christendome) the Popes and vniuersall Church haue ordained, that generall Prayers should be made for them, by all the rest of Christendome.

S. Thomas Aquinas, in the solution of the last Argument, writeth thus. That Prayer ought to be made particularly to God for the King of France. In

In the third Councill of Arles, the second Chapter; the second Councill of Chaalon, Chapter 66. In that of Rheimes, Chapter 4. And in that at Maguntia, Chap. 7. it is expressely enioyned, to pray to God for the Kings of France.

Some may alleadge, that all these Councils were French Councils.

Whereunto we make answere, that ouer and beside the said Councils: Popes haue particularly giuen and granted Pardons throughout all Christendome, to men in all places, to pray for the Kings of France.

Pardons granted by Popes.

Innocent the fourth, granted ten dayes of Indulgence, to euery one that prayed for them.

Innocent 4.

Clement the fift, granted an hundred.

Leo the tenth, granted a whole yeare. And Clement 5. Leo 10.

Clement the sixe gaue power to the Prelates, who should say Masse before them, to grant fortie dayes of Pardon to all such as gaue assistance to the Masse. We should neuer make an end, if we would here number the Titles of Honor and Precedencie, giuen to the Most-Christian Kings of France, by strange Authors, and Nations of the World. So that we will finish this Chapter, with the same Psalme which began it. Psal. 89. 8. Primogenitum posui Regem Francorum excelsum præ Regibus Terræ. Because the King of France is as Excellent aboue the other Kings, as Royall Maiesty is aboue other men. So saith S. Gregory the Great, writing to King Childebert of France.

Clement 6.

It remaineth yet (before we fully close vp this Chapter) to make knowne to Cranato, and them of his art, that the Precedencie of France, from Spaine hath bin adiudged by consent of the Kings of Spaine. And in this Spanish cause, we will serue our turne with none but Spanish Authours, whose testimonies are irreproachable. Afterward, wee will be tried by Strangers, with examples apparant to the eye, and practised in our time, both in the sight and knowledge of Spaniards themselues.

Precedency of France adiudged by Kings of Spaine.

Hieronimus Surita, in his Annales of Arragon, speaking of Ambassadors of Spain, deputed to goe to the Councill of Basile, saith

The sixteenth day of the moneth of September, 1434. were (on the part of the King of Castile Dom Iouan, second of the name) nominated for Ambassadours, Dom Alphonso Carillos, Prothonotarie Apostolicall; Aluarez d'Isorna, Bishop of Cuenca, Iean de Sylues, Alfier Maieur de Castille, and Alphonso Garcia de S. Maria, Deane of S. Iacques; To whom was giuen in charge, to request and demand of the Councill, to be receiued, and to haue the place of sitting, next to the Ambassadours of the Royall King of France. Goe to Schoole Cranato, and to the resolution of the Spanish Councill. The King of Castile and Leon required the sitting, next to the King of France: Because in the Councill of Constance, held in the yeare of Grace 1414. the Ambassadors to the King of Arragon, had preceded them of Castile.

At the said Councill of Constance, finished in the yeare 416. the sitting for the Kings of Christendome, was in this manner. On the right side, being the most honorable, was Maister John Gerson, Chanceller for the Vniuersitie of Paris, Ambassador for King Charles the sixt.

The order of sitting in the Councill of Constance.

Beneath him, Dom Raymond Folcho, Counte of Cardonna; Ambassador for the King of Arragon, Dom Alphonso, fift of the name.

On the left side were seated the Ambassadours for the King of England, Henry, fift of the name.

Those for the Kings of Ierusalem and Sicilie, Iames of Bourbon, and Iane his wife.

After whom was seated the Ambassadour for John (sir-named the Bad) Duke of Bourgongne, holding the Standard and Banner of Bourgongne: which the Bishop of Cuenca, Ambassador for Castile, snatched out of his hand, and cast it on the gound. So that next after the Ambassadors of Ierusalem, tooke seating those for the King of Castile, Dom Iouan the second: which were Dom Diego d'Annaya, Bishop of Cuenca, and Dom Martinez Hernando de Cordua; according as it is set downe in the Acts of the said Councill the 22. Session.

The Banner of Bourgongne cast to the ground.

Primo in primo loco sedebat egregius vir Ioannes de Gersono, Cancellarius Ecclesiæ Parisiensis, Ambasiator Francorum Regis.

Et post eum Dominus Raymondus Folchus, Comes Caudonæ, Ambasiator Arragonij Regis. Ad partem sinistram sedebant post Ambasiatores Regis Angliæ.

Oratores Iacobi & Ioannæ Regis & Reginæ Hierusalem, & Sciciliæ.

Quos sequebantur Dominus Didacus de Annaya Concensis Episcopus, & Dominus Martinus Ferdinandus de Corduba Ambasiatores Ioannis Regis Castellæ, & Legionis, loco Ambasiatoris Ioannis Ducis Burgundiæ.

The rank and order obserued in the Councell of Basile.

And as for the Councill of Basile, here you may behold the order and ranke, which the Ambassadours from Christian Princes there held; according to the testimonie of Pope Pius secundus, formerly named Æneas Syluius, Pregnotarie for the said Councill.

Ego nequaquam timebo Nationum ordinem seruare, &c.

1. Ex Natione Italica recepti sunt Episcopi Guillelmus Vercellensis, Georgius Augustensis, &c.

2. Ex Natione Gallica quæ & ipsa secunda est, Cuiusque in Ecclesiam Dei permaxima extant beneficia, nominati sunt ex Archi Pontificali dignitate Ioannes Tarantasiensis, &c.

3. Ex Natione Germanica, quæ omnium est amplissima, recepti sunt ex Episcopali præeminentia Fredericus Basilicnsis, &c.

4. Ex Natione Hispanica (quæ & ipsa vastissimos habet, ac pernobiles Campo, quam or Christianis Regibus, & uno infidelis regnata) hi sunt ad electionem magni Pastoris accersiti Pontifices octo. &c.

The beginning & ending of the Councill.

The Councill of Basile was begun in the yeare of Grace 1431. and ended in the yeare fortie. The verball Processe of Acts therein, reporteth, that the Archbishop of Arles, President of the Councill, tooke the opinion first of the Archbishop of Lubecke, chiefe of the Ambassadors from the Emperor Albert, second of the name.

In the second place, that of the Archbishop of Tours, chiefe of the Ambassadors from Kings Charles the seauenth.

And in the third place, that of the Bishop of Cuenca, chiefe of them from the King of Castile.

Ex Oratoribus Cæsaris Lubecensis Episcopus & Georgius Miles.

Ex Gallicis Archiepiscopus Turonensis, Trecensis Episcopus, & Collega alij.

Ex Castellanis Concensis Episcopus. &c. Who according to the memory of their construction, hath their sitting after them of France, as themselues had made their demand.

In the last Councill of Lateran, held at Rome, in the yeares 1513. 14. and 15. the same ranke was kept for the Precedencie of France, before Spaine, as is reported by the Acts thereof, and the confirmatiue Bull of the said Councill, in the time of Pope Leo, tenth of the name, giuen at Rome in the moneth of March 1516. and whereof these are the words.

The Bull of Pope Leo the tenth, dated at Rome, Anno 1516.

Charissimus in Christo filio noster Maximilianus in Imperatorem electus, Iulij Papæ secundi Prædecessoris nostri; nostro vero tempore clarissimæ memoriæ Ludouicus Francorum, & ceteri Reges & Principes Christiani, summo cum omnium gaudio Lateranensi Concilio in Spiritu sancto legitimè congregato, adhæserunt.

In this Councill, Messire Lewes Forbin, Sieur de Sabiers, Counceller in the Parlement of Prouence, Ambassadour for King Lewes the twelfth, preceeded Hieronimo Vecho, Ambassador for Ferdinand, representing the person of his daughter Dame Ioan, Queene of Castile and Leon, &c.

Nec minus continuis Principum Christianorum in Imperatorem electi, & Francisci Christianissimi Francorum, ac Caroli Catholici Hispaniarum, & ceterorum Regum illustrium. &c. Behold this precedencie adiudged in your Citie of Rome (Cranato) and yet you put it into compromise; either thorow grosse ignorance, or malice.

This Precedencie is witnessed by Italian Authors, first of all by Thomas Thomapegius, Bishoppe of Feltro, in la Marche Treuisana, Patriarch of Aquilea. But what will you say, Cranato, if by vniuersall consent of the Princes of Christendome, the King of France is the first of Christian Kings, before whom hee hath seating, yea, euen before the King of the Romaines? And at the Councill of Trent, where this Author was present, in the Session held the twentie nine day of January January, 1546. the Letters which were sent to the King of France, were read before those sent to the King of the Romanes?

Omnium consensu receptum est, Christianissimum Regem primum esse inter Reges: & primum ei deberi locum post Imperatorem. Et ideo si Romanorum Regi data sit solum Imperio successio, apertissimum est Regem Christianissimum prius nominandum, eiusque Oratores præferendos Oratoribus Regis Romanorum. Et ita in Concilio Tridentino, dum ille essem, die vicesima nona Ianuarij, Anno Millesimo Quingentesimo Quadragesimo Sexto, prius recitatæ fuerunt literæ sacri Concilij mittendæ Christianissimo Regi, quam aliæ ad Romanorum Regem.

The words alleadged concerning the Letters.

And from hence he concludeth, that if the King of the Romanes, who precedeth all other Kings of Christendome, be fore-gon by the King of France: to small purpose then would he of Spaine precede or goe before him of France. But so many times as he laboured to doe it, as often was he defeated in his pretences, as well at Rome, as in Poland and Venice.

The King of France precedeth the King of the Romãs.

At Venice, in Anno 1558. Francesco de Vargas, Ambassador in Venice for the King of Spaine, Dom Philip the 11. pretended, that he ought to precede Messire Frances de Noailles, Ambassador for King Henry the second. The Senate of Venice maintained the Ambassador from France in his Precedency, and excluded him of Spaine. The King whereof had no occasion at all to be discontented, or to complaine; in regard that their Kings his predecessors in the Generall Councell before named, had demanded their sedence, after the Kings of France.

A contention at Venice for Precedency.

This is affirmed by Menochius the Ciuill Lawyer, Counceller to the said King of Spaine Don Philip the second, in his Councell of Estate at Millaine. Serenissimum Dominum Venetorum aliquando declarauit obseruandam fuisse consuetudinem præeminentiæ sedendi, & ambulandi inter Regis Christianissimi, & Regis Catholici Legatos; Quo sanè prudentissimo iudicio factum est, vt Rex Hispaniæ conqueri non potuerit, cum id placuerit Dominio Serenissimo, quod olim Hispaniæ Regibus placuit.

Pedro Iustiniano, a Venetian Gentleman (descended of the ancient house of the Iustiniani, Lords and Princes of the Isle of Chio, vsurped by the Turke: (this famous house, which hath a Cardinall of the name, an honest Frenchman) beareth De Gueulles au Chasteau D'Or, au Chef de l'Empire d'Alemagne, c'est a dire d'Or a teste de l'Aigle esploye de Sable, writeth thus. Venetæ in vrbe controuersia inter Henrici Galliæ, & Philippi Hispaniæ Regum Oratores obort est. Vterque enim primum, & honoratiorem locum publicè apud Principem Senatumque sibi exhibere postulabat. Diu id Patres decernere recusarunt. Nihil que antiquâ priorique consuetudine, & quod omnium memoria semper obseruatum fuerat à Senatu immutatum est. Censuit tamen Senatus vt Gallus Orator Hispanum apud Principem publice præcederet. And,

Armes of the Iustiniani.

Natalis à Comitibus, saith: Franciscus Vargas Hispanus legatione apud Venetos tunc fungebatur, per quod tempus primum nata est controuersia de superiore loco inter Hispanum, Gallumque Reges.

The same Author further saith: Gusmanus Sylua Philippi Regis Orator, Venetios consesserat Ordinarius Orator futurus apud eum Senatum. Huius aduentu iniecta est opinio certa societatis belli constituendæ, quoniam multos iam annos, ob illam controuersiam de præcedentia cum Rege Gallorum, nullus Orator Hispanus fuerat ordinarius Venetijs.

In Poland, in Anno 1573. the most part of the Christian Princes sent their Ambassadors thither, for preceding in the election of a new King, after the death of Sigismond.

Contention for Precedencie in Poland, in An 1573.

King Charles the ninth sent thither as his Ambassadour, Messire Iean de Monluc, Bishop of Valence, to make election for King, his Brother Monsieur Alexander Hemrie of France, Duke of Aniou, as accordingly he was.

Philip the second, King of Spaine, had there for his Ambassador, Dom Pedro Fachardo, Marquesse of Velez, who demanded the Precedency for the King his Master, against him for France, as well in the Church, as in publique; and to this end he was heard the first after the Ambassadors from the Pope, the Emperour, and after him for France.

Precedency requested for the K. of Spain against France.

The States and Lords of Poland, being assembled at Varsouia, adiudged the Precedency to the K. of France. So that after the Ambassadour from Pope Gregory the

13. and from the Emperor Maximilian, the second were heard (for the Pope; the Cardinall Commendon, and for the Emperour Dom Guillame des Vrsins, Lord of Salzemberge) he from France was heard, and then he for Spaine, to whom orders (in ranke) was giuen to speake after him. But he, offended at this foyle, and in so notable an assembly; forsaking his Embassie, returned home from Poland with exceeping shame.

Contention for Precedencie at Rome, in An. 1564.

At Rome, which is the great Theater of the World, in Anno 1564. was Ambassador from King Charles the ninth, Mesire Henry Clutin, Lord of Oisell. At the same time was Ambassador from the King of Spaine Philip the second, Dom Louis de Zunyga de Requesens, great Commander of the Order of S. Iames of the sword in Castille, who laboured all he could possibly deuise with Pope Pius Quartus, to haue the Precedencie before him of France, or (at the least) to walke equall with him (for the Ambassador of France equalleth in Honours him from the Emperor,) and that at one and the same time, Incense might be giuen to him, and the Pax to kisse, as was done to the Ambassadors from France, and the Emperour. The Pope considered a long while, and ballanced this businesse in his braine; but in the end, he maintained the King in his Precedency, and in his Chappell vpon the day of Pentecost.

The Precedency granted by the Pope to the King of France.

The learned Onuphrius Panuinius, and the Spaniard Morales, in the life of the said Pope Pius Quartus. Non longe post controuersiam de honoratiori in publicis concessibus loco inter Oratores Galliæ, & Hispanum, diu ante Francisci Vargæ opera Venetijs excitatam, alata renouata est. Pontifex post multas longasque tergiuersationes Summum Gallo Locum assignauit, cum concordiæ forma multum consuluisset, nec vllam reperisset. Hispanus enim superiorem concessum Gallo negabat, & Gallus Hispanum æqualem recusabat: de eam rem Ludouicus Requesens magnus Castellæ Commendator Hispanus Orator irritatus, post publicam contestationem Regis sui nomine, Roma abijt.

Pedro Iustiniano saith againe. Pontifex circa ius Precedentiæ inter Gallorum, & Hispanorum Regum Oratores priorem locum Gallo, vti semper obseruatum fuerat attribuit. Ex quo Philippus Rex valde indignatus, Oratorem suum è Romana Curia statim reuocauit.

Cauallus, in his Annales of Cremona, vnder the yeere 1564. saith. Orta controuersia inter Legatos Hispaniæ, & Galliæ Regum Romæ penes Summum Pontificem, cum alter alterum præcedere vellet in Pompis, & alijs, quibus contingeret ibi adesse. Summus Pontifex declarauit debere præcedere Legatum Regis Galliæ, sub fundamento, vt creditur, quod prædecessores Regis Galliæ statum Romanæ Ecclesiæ ac Religionis Christianæ valde auxerint (goe to schoole to this man of Cremona, Cranato) & pro conseruando & ampliando multa Bella obierint, & præclara facinora egerint aduersus Infideles & alios qui ipsum opprimere voluerint. Et Galliæ Regnum sit antiquius Regno Hispaniæ: Et Galli prius Hispanis fidem Christi receperint: and thereto he might well haue added this Clause, Et à Gallis Hispani Christianæ Fidei notitiam acceperint.

These are (Cranato) those considerations which the Popes haue had, not to adiudge; but to conserue the Monarchs of the Lillies, in the Precedency which they had (from all times) ouer all the Kings and Princes of Christendome.

Precedency kept for the kings of France at Rome.

A Precedency kept for the Sacred Kings of France euen at Rome, in the eye of all Nations of the World; and in an Act the most solemne that had beene seene performed in fauour, pursuit, and at the charge of the King of Spaine, Dom Philip the second.

In the yeere 1588. Pope Sixtus Quintus then sitting at Rome (where the King of Spaine Dom Philip the second, had then the whole power; and where was the Fort and Dongeon of the bloody League, for rendring the French (as a prey) for the enemies pillage) Spaine caused a Religious Grey Frier, called in Latine Didacus, and in Spanish Diego D'Alcala, to be Canonized, for the gift of Myracles which God had wrought by his prayers, and daily did, both during his life-time, and after his death. Namely, for the health of the Infant of Spaine Dom Charles, according as it is more at large set downe and contained, in the Acts of his Canonization.

The Canonizing of Diego D'Alcala, a holy Grey Frier.

Dom Henry de Guſman, Count d'Oliuares, Ambassador of Spaine, with Cardinalls and and others of the Spanish Nation, pursuing this act, wholly Spanish; performed what possibly they could, in an action so fauourable for them, now or neuer, to haue Precedency, and Prime place of Honour, before the Ambassador of France, Messire Iean de Vinme, Marquesse of Pisany, whom the Spaniards (in a brauery) wished to bee a Spectator of this Act, as to draw him a Iudge for Precedency, before France.

The Marquesse, who well enough knew these Spanish practises, and what they did at Rome against King Henry, third of that name of blessed memory, and his Master; stood stiffely to preserue the Precedency and Honor, atchieued by the Sacred Kings of France, with expence of their bloud, for the state and maintenance of the Romane Church; and not to giue way to him for Spaine, by any of his supplications, which were, to giue no assistance in this Act and Solemnitie, altogether Spanish, or at this time, to yeeld or grant him any place.

The stout resolution of the Ambassador for France.

To compound this difference of so great importance, the Pope Sixtus Quintus, made a Congregation of foure Cardinalls, by whom this act was balotted, for diuers ouertures and waies of amity. Francis, Cardinall de Ioyeuse (who died a while after, Deane of the Cardinals) propounded one, which was. That the Ambassador for the King should absent himself, from the solemnity of Canonizing the Frier Diego D'Alcala de Henarez; on condition, that at the first Assembly that should be made in Rome, the Ambassador of Spaine should (as hee ought) take his place beneath him for the King of France. This offer, more then reasonable, was refused by the Spaniards, and they iudged vncapable of this French courtesie by the Cardinalls of this congregation. So that that the Count Oliuarez forsooke and left the place, free and wholly to the Marquesse de Pisany S. Gouast, who was present at all this Ceremony, according to the testimony of

The Pope taketh order to compound the difference.

The 4. Cardinalls gaue voyce for France.

Cicarella, in the life of Pope Sixtus Quintus, Anno Dom. 1588. Occasione Canonizationis Didaci ab Alcala, orta est inter Legatum Regis Hispaniarum, & Legatum Regis Galliæ magna contentio dicente Hispano in hoc actu Canonizationis sancti Didaci Hispani sibi deberi primum locum, cum is potissimum ad Regnum Hispaniæ pertineret: præterea sibi principales quasdam operationes in hoc actu incumbere.

Respondit Legatus Francie, peractis ijs quæ faciendæ Hispano erant, aut Sacello exiret, aut locum inferiorem occuparet.

Hispanus iterum, vt saltem Francus ille hac vice, Idque ex Gratia (of grace and French courtesie) primum locum concederet petijt.

Cui Francus, se quidem hunc locum illi concessurum, hac lege, ne quid derogaret iuri præcedendi, quod Galli habebant, & quod absq; præiudicio, primo quod habiturus esset Pontifex Sacello, Legatus Hispanicus (qui se inferiorem Francico semper ostendens, huc nunquam accedere solet) præsens adesset, locumque inferiorem suo occuparet.

Respondet Hispanus, se nullo modo id facturum: hoc enim facto fateretur se illi cedere.

Dum sic inter se contendunt, subrepit paulatim ira, incaluit sanguis, adeò vt ad arma propemodum, & ad maximum tumultum ventum fuisset, nisi aliorum auctoritas interposita esset.

Tandem negotium hoc modo compositum est. Legatus Hispanicus ad Sacellum non veniret, sed Cardinalis Deca eius munere fungeretur, eaque faceret, quæ feciſſet Legatus. Gallicus vero Legatus consuetum locum retineret. His peractis, Canonisatio cum summa quiete, & modestia peracta est.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of such Ceremonies and Orders as haue beene, and yet are still kept and obserued, at the Sacring and Crowning of the Kings Most-Christian.

A comparison of the Parisian Kings of Fráce with other Kings.

AS there haue beene none but the Parisian Kings of France, which beare Armes of Azure with three Floures de Luces of Gold; and others, onely Colours and Mettalls, varied and diuersified as formerly we haue said: so in the same manner, there haue beene none but the said Parisian Kings of France, that were Sacred and Crowned at Rheimes with Celestiall Balme, kept in the Holy Viole or Bottell. The Kings of Bourgongne France, were ordinarily Sacred and Crowned at Sancta Crux of Orleans; those of Austrasia at Mentz; & those of Soissons at another place, with holy Oyles Sacred by Bishops; and not with that of the Holy Bottle.

Consideration of the 3 Lignes changes.

Now it is to bee noted in our passing ouer the Kings, represented on the great Frontespice of the Church at Paris, which are XXVIII, in number: there is a knowledge necessarily required, concerning the changes of the three Lignes, and of them that were Sacred and Crowned at Rhemes or elsewhere.

Clouis the first Christian King.

Clouis the first Christian King, is in the number of those XXVIII. Kings. His picture is to be seene without the Church on the North side, which answereth to the Cloyster, betweene S. Iean le Rond, and the North gate of the Church; where also are obseruable the pictures of King Philip le Bel, and of Madam Iane of Nauarre, his Wife, vnder whose Reigne the Portall was finished.

Childebert first of the name.

The first King on the Frontespice is Childebert, first of the name, King of Paris, Restorer and Endower of the said great Church; as wee learne by the Bishop of Poictiers, Fortunatus.

Si Salomoniaci memoretur machina templi
Arte licet par sit, pulchrior ista fide.

And more lower.

Hæc pius egregio Rex Childebertus amore
Dona sua Populo non moritura dedit.

21. Kings of the Ligne of Clouis, and all Kings of Paris

All the thirteene which follow, are of the Ligne of Clouis, as namely; Clothaire the first, Charibert, Chilpericke; Clothaire the second; Dagobert, first of the name, Restorer and Endower of S. Denys in France; Clouis, second of the name; Clothaire the third, Childericke the second; Theodoricke or Thierry; Clouis the third; Childebert the third, called the Iust; Dagobert the second, and Clothaire the fourth, all Kings of Paris, and Sacred in the City of Rheimes. The other Parisian Kings are not there represented; because they were but Maskes and shadowes of Kings, deiected, exalted and suppressed, when it so pleased the Maires of the Pallace, who (vnder them) gouerned France by absolute power.

Of such as were Kings of France, and Emperours.

On this Frontespice, such as beside Scepters, hold Apples or Balles in their hands, are they that were Kings of all France intirely, vnder the first Ligne; and likewise others, that haue beene Emperours, or renowned for valiancie: Like as those Kings that were negligent, idle, and cowards, are presented with their Armes hanging downewards.

The second Line of Kings, beginning with Pepin le Bref.

The second Ligne began at King Pepin le Bref, tearmed the Dwarfe for his little Stature, yet armed with inuincible courage, and that is the reason why he is figured mounted on a Lyon. He, his Wife and Sonnes were Sacred at S. Denis in France, by Pope Stephen, who came to implore his ayd and assistance against the Lombards Kings.

The said Pepin is followed by sixe Kings of France of his Ligne, as namely Charlemaigne, Charlemaigne, first Emperor of the West, Sacred in the Church of Noyon; Lewis the Debonnaire, King and Emperor, Sacred in the Church of Rhemes, by Pope Stephen; Charles the Bald, King and Emperour, Sacred at Orleans by the Traytor Ganelon Archbishop of Sens; followed by Lewis the Stammerer, second of the name, King and Emperour; Charles the Simple; and Lewis of beyond the Seas. The other are not presented there, for the reasons formerly alleaged, in speaking of the last Kings of the first Ligne.

The third line beginning with Hugh Capet.

The two and twentieth King was Hugh Capet, Author of the third Ligne, reigning happily at this present; exalted to the Royaltie for his vertues, by vniuersall consent of the generall States of the Kingdome, assembled at Noyon; but hee was sacred at Rhemes, and his Sonne and Successor, Robert the Deuout; in the Citie of Orleans.

After Robert followed immediately, and by Order, these Kings; Henry, first of the name; Philip, first of the name; Lewis le Gros, sixt of the name; Lewis the seuenth, tearmed the yonger (to distinguish him from his father) sirnamed the Pittifull; and the eight and twentieth, King Philip, second of the name, called Gods-gift, the Conqueror Augustus, that is to say, Emperour: vnder whose reigne, and the Pontificacie of Bishop Maurice, the goodly Church was finished, as now at this day it is to be seene.

Lewis le Gros Sacred in the City of Orleans.

Now, in regard that Lewis le Gros, sixt of the name, immediately after the death of his Father, Philip the first, had beene Sacred in the City of Orleans, by Daimbert, Archbishop of Sens, assisted by his Suffragans, to witet, Yues Bishop of Chartres, Iohn of Orleans, Giles of Paris, Manasses of Meaux, Hugh of Neuers, and Ymbert or Harold of Auxerre: The Church and Archbishop of Rheimes complained of the Deed against the Archbishop of Sens, and his Suffragans, as of a manifest attempt on their ancient Priuiledge and possession, held time out of minde, euer since great Clouis, for Consecrating the Kings of France: whereupon, the Archbishop of Sens was sued in the Court of Parlement.

Yues, the learned Bishop of Chartres, made answer to this complaint, as appeareth by his Epistle, beginning Nouerint Sancta Romana Ecclesia, speaking in the name of his Comprouincialls, that this Act had not, neither was done by any enterprise in the Church of Rhemes: but onely to auoyd perills and dangers ensuing by long delay, after the decease of King Philip the first; in which respect it was thought expedient to Sacre Lewis le Gros in the City of Orleans. Erant enim quidam Regni perturbatores, qui ad hæc omni studio vigilabant, vt aut Regnum ad aliam personam transferretur, aut non mediocriter minueretur.

The time of Interregnums very dangerous.

Moreouer, he alleadged for example, the Sacring of the Kings, descendants of Clouis, who were Sacred in Principall Cities of their Kingdome and Partage, as already we haue said. Isti quippe Regis nullam à Remensi Archiepiscopo Benedictionem, vel coronam acceperunt, sed à Sacerdotibus Prouinciarum quæ regebant sublimati sunt, & sacrati. And afterward, examples of the Kings of the second Line, and third, Sacred elsewhere, and not at Rheimes. Ex quibus exemplis manifestum erat, quòd Francorum Reges non omnes in Remensi Ecclesiâ, vel à Remensibus Archiepiscopis fuerant consecrati, sed multi in multis aliis locis, & a multis aliis personis consecrati fuerant.

Kings Sacred in diuers cities of their kingdomes, & not all of them at Rheimes.

In the last place, that it was impossible, to haue Sacred King Lewis le Gros in the City of Rheimes, for reasons vtterly vnanswerable.

Reasons not way to be answered.

First, that the City of Rheimes was excommunicated, in regard of partialities and factions moued & raised therein, about the election of two Archbishops, chosen both at one time; to wit, Geruase and Raoull, or Rhadolph, by the partakers of whom, Miserabilis, & mirabilis erat Remensis Ecclesiæ status; Geruase renting all peace in peeces, by labouring to hinder the election Canonicall of Rodolph. Possibilis non erat, quia consecratio Regis Remis ab Archiepiscopo Ecclesia nondum inthronisato, sine summa perturbatione, & sanguinis effusione celebrari non poterat.

1. Reason.

The second was taken from the place and time.

2. Reason.

Of the Place. De Loco non conueniebat, quia Ciuitas sub anathemate posita erat.

Of the time. Because there was not any meanes for maintaining the State; by deferring and tardying the Sacring and Coronation. Tempori oppartuna non erat; quia quia si consecratio Regis differretur, Regni Status, & Ecclesiæ Pax grauiter perclitaretur, and this reason of State was most pregnant.

Now, notwithstanding the defences of Duo Carnotensis, by interuention of the Peeres of France, who likewise complained, that they were not called to the Sacring and Coronation of Lewis le Gros: the number of Peeres were ruled by King Lewis the yonger, to the number of twelue, by Decree of the generall Parliament, held in the great hall of the Bishops Pallace at Paris, at the Feast of Pentecost, Anno 1179. And by the same Order, the Prerogatiue of Sacring our Kings, which was in compromise, betweene the Archbishop of Sens, and his Suffragane Bishops, defendants against the Church and Archbishop of Rheimes, maintainers of the complaint; was adiudged to William de Champaigne, tearmed with the white hands, Cardinall by the title of S. Sabine, Archbishop of Rheimes, where the Sacring of our Kings was concluded on for euer after. And since the Sacring of King Philip Augustus, truely Augustus and Conquerour, performed at Rheimes on All Saints day, in the said yeere 1179. all our Kings his Successors, haue beene there Sacred.

An Order determin'd by the Court of Parliament.

Philip Augustus the Conqueror.

The late King Henry the Great (of glorious memory) excepted, who, by rebellion of the City of Rheimes (a thousand times more accursed at that instant time, then it was in the daies of Lewes le Gros, for fauouring an Vsurper against his lawfull Archbishop) had his Sacring & Coronation performed in the Church of Chartres.

Our Most Christian Kings are Sacred and annointed with holy Balme, in seuen parts and places of their body.

Of Sacring & Annointing the Most-Christian Kings.

First, on the crowne of the head.
Secondly, on the brest.
Thirdly, between both their shoulders.
Fourthly, on the right shoulder.
Sixtly, in the bending of the right arme.
And lastly, so on the left arme.

Queenes of France are ordinarily Sacred and Crowned at S. Denys in France, with other oyle then that of the Holy Bottle: and on two places onely, Sacring and Crowning of Queenes.

On the Head, and
On the Breast, but not elsewhere.

It is very likely, that Clouis, hauing bestowed such great benefits on S. Remigius, the said Bishop (no doubt) gaue part of them in the Inuestiture of Noblemen, to hold them in Fiefe of the said Abbey. And like as thorow all the Bishoprickes of France, there are foure Noble Fiefes, erected in the Title of Baronies, for which the Lords owe seruice to the Bishops: so in the same manner, this rich and ancient Arch-Monastery, honoured with keeping the Holy Bottle, hath (at all times) had the foure Barons and Knights of the said Holy Bottle.

Some Light hereof may be discerned, in many passages of the Ecclesiasticall History of Rheimes, written by Floardus: which yet may much more clearely be seene by the Acts and Sacring and Crowning of our Most-Christian King, and Noble Augustus Lewis, thirteenth of that name, now happily reigning, performed in the Church of Rheimes, on Sonday the 17. day of October, and in the yeere 1610. whereof I purpose to speake somewhat.

A briefe discourse of the Coronation of King Lewis the 13. now reigning.

The Royall Ornaments being newly made, answerable to the age and stature of the King (he being then but nine yeeres olde) were prepared and brought vnto the City of Rheimes: and his Maiesty, accompanied with the Queene Regent his mother, made his entrance into the City of Rheimes, the 14. day of October, in the said yeare of 1610.

The preparations for the Sacring were prouided in the great Church of our Lady (the same which we haue described for King Henry the Great, in the first booke of the History of Nauarre, vnder the yeere 1594. in the Moneth of February) his Maiesty on Saturday the 16. day, went to the Euening prayers: after which, he receiued the Sacrament of Confirmation, by the hand of Francois, Cardinall de Joyeuse, presented to his Maiesty by Q. Margaret, and Monsieur the Prince of Conde. Which

Which being done, the King offred to the Church of our Lady, his gift or present. Which was a head of S. Lewes, carried by two Angels, all made of Siluer, doubly guilded, weighing threescore and foure Markes. At the bottome whereof was enchased a bone of one of his armes, couered with Rockie Christall.

The Kings Offering to the Church of our Lady.

The Bases of the Shrine was supported by Cherubins, made forward Ouall-wise, and halfe circkled, whereon was the Image of the King, adorned in his Royall habits kneeling, his hands closed, and vp-heaued, and before him (on a Pillow) lay two Scepters, and two Crownes. About the Bases were to be read these words.

Ludouicus Decimus tertius Filius Henrici Magni Galliarum, & Nauarræ Regis Christianissimi, Parentis Imperio, eiusdem virtutibus succedens, hoc Toreuma ossis Diui Ludouici Regis eius initij prosapiæ Monimentum Posteritati dedit Mense Octobri, Anno Domini Millesimo Sexcentesimo Decimo, in aduentu Regni, sede dicante, Deo dedicauit.

At the said Sacring, performed on Sunday the seauenteenth of October, the said Lord Cardinall de Joyeuse, represented the Archbishop and Duke of Rheimes, Deane of the Peeres; the other Ecclesiasticall Peeres were all there personally present, to wit; Geoffrey de Billy, Bishop and Duke of Laon; Charles Des-Cars, Bishop and Duke of Langres; René Potier, Bishop and Count of Beauuais; Cosimo Clausso, Bishop and Count of Chalons; and Charles de Balsac, Bishop and Count of Noyon.

The Ecclesiasticall Peeres present at the Sacring.

The ancient Lay Peeres, Dukes of Bourgongne, Normandie & Guienne, and Counts of Tolosa, Flanders & Champaigne, were represented; the Dukes with my Lords, Princes of the Blood, De Conde, de Conte and de Soissons: And the Counts, by the Dukes of Neuers, d'Elboeuf, and d'Espernon. My Lord the Constable was presented by the Marshall De la Chastre; my Lord the Chancellor was there in person. The Marshall de Lauardin presented the Great Maister, the Duke d'Eguillon, Great Chamberlaine; and the Marquesse de Versoy Roger de Belle-Garde, Maister of the Horse, and the prime Gentleman of the Chamber was there in person. The foure Barons, for fetching the Holy-Bottle, were the Marquesse de Sable, Beauuais-Nangis the Sonne, the Viscount de Rabat, and the fourth was the Baron de Biron.

Chesne Pouilleux, a Village in Rhetelois, appertaining to the Abbey of S. Rhemigius, at all times yeelded ten or twelue of the Inhabitants, for attending on the said Holy-Bottle, carried by the great Priour of the said Abbey. Instead of twelue, all the Rusticks of the said Village, haue taken libertie of themselues, to be present at the Sacring of our Kings, and comming to Rheimes, (so many of them as are able to beare Armes) they march thither, with beating the Drumme, and Ensigne displaied, wearing their best garments, and euery one an Oaken Leafe in his Hat. For three dayes space they are there feasted at Rheimes, and haue (more-ouer) as a booty, the white Hacquency which the King giueth, for bearing the said Holy-Bottle. These saucie companions would make it to be credited, that these priuiledges are granted them, because in the time of Charles the seauenth, they wonne gaine the Holy-Bottle; which the Bourgongnons had carried away from S. Rhemigius: which is altogether fabulous, and no truth in it.

Attendants on the Holy-Bottle.

The Bishops of Laon and of Beauuais being sent to fetch the King, demanded for him at his Chamber doore, saying: Lewes the thirteenth, Sonne of Henry the Great, which is remarkeable, for remembrance of the dead, and may serue as a Spurre to the Sonne, for imitation of his Fathers valour. At Masse, the Cardinall de Joyeuse being the Officiant, was assisted by the Bishops of Aes and of Valence. The Bishop of Rieux sung the Epistle, and the Bishop of Boulongne the Gospell. The Cardinall de Gondy brought the kisse to the King, first the Pax, and afterward the Agnus Dei. The Offerings were carried on Cushion-cloathes of tawnie Damaske, frinced with Gold. The Lord of Montigny carried the Wine; De Ragny the Bread of Siluer; Beauuais-Nangis that of Gold; De Rambouillet the Purse, wherein were thirteene Pieces of Gold, each of them valuing thirteene Crownes. The King received the Communion vnder both the kindes, with deuotion and humilitie, admired in such yong yeares.

The Bishops that are sent for the King.

The manner of carrying the Offering.

Guests, and order of the ſitting at the Royall Feaſt, with other obſeruations.

At the royall Feaſt, next to the Table of the King, and the Peeres Eccleſiaſticks and Layicks; was that of the Officers of the Crowne, whereat were ſeated my Lord the Nuntio; the Ambaſſadours of Venice and Florence, my Lord the Chancelier, and thoſe which carried the honors of the Offerings, with Lords and Knights of noate. Roquemont Viole, Maiſter of the houſhold, tooke the Table-Napkin, and preſented it to the Marſhall de Lauardin, from whoſe hand his Maieſtie receiued it. Roquemont, as the moſt auncient Maiſter of the Houſhold, had the honor that day, to Vſher and goe before the Dinner ſeruice. The Duke of Rouannois carried the firſt Diſh, ſeruing as Great Pantler of France: the Lord of Crequy waited as Cup-bearer and Taſter; and the Lord of Rhodes, Great Maiſter of the Ceremonies, and Caruer.

The King receiued the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt, and in what manner.

On Monday, being S. Lukes day, the 18. of October, the King receiued the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt, by the hand of the Cardinall de Ioyeuſe. He was conducted to the Altar by my Lords the Princes of Conty, and of Soiſſons, preceded by the Officers of the Order; tooke the Oath of Great Maiſter, and ſigned it; Chaſteau-Neuf, Chancellor of the ſaid Order, holding the Euangelicall Booke. Which being done, De Rhodes, Great Maiſter of the Ceremonies, and Prouoſt of two Orders for the King; cloathed his Maieſtie with the Great Mantle or Cloake of the Order, and Cardinall de Ioyeuſe put about his necke the Coller of the Order, In the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the Holy-Ghoſt, making the ſigne of the Croſſe. Which ſerueth to ſhew, that Kings are not borne Knights, and that receiuing the Order of Knighthood, is an act ſolemne, hauing perticuler Ceremonies thereto as perticularly belonging.

Kings are not Knights by their birth, but by creation.

Other Ceremonies belonging to the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt.

After the Great Mantle of the Order was thus put vpon the King, the Cardinall tooke from the hand of Viſcount de Viſieux, Great Treaſurer of the Order, the Blew Riband, and a paire of Beades, which his Maieſtie receiued. This done, and the Act of Ceremonie Regiſtred downe by Aubeſpine Verderone, Pregnotare of the Order, and Preſident of the Chamber of Accounts at Paris, the King remaining ſtill by the high Altar: the Dukes of Eſpernon, and de Monbaſon, preceded by the Lord of Rhodes, the Herald and Vſher of the Order; conducted my Lord the Prince of Conde, chiefe Prince of the Blood, before his Maieſtie, of whom he onely receiued the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt: to declare, that no perſon in the world can walke as Peere, with Princes of the Noble Floures de Luce.

On the morrow, the King and the Queene his Mother, went walking to the Caſtell of Baron du Tour, who preſented them with a Collation, and thence their Maieſties returned to Rheimes; from whence they departed on Wedneſday the 27. to performe their Prayers at S. Marcoull, a Priorie, where the King touched the diſeaſed with the Kings-Euill, which were a great number; Father Cotton receiuing them ſtill from the King, who returned to Paris on Saturday, being the thirtieth of October, the Eeuen of All-Saints, and on the morrow went to heare Maſſe in the Church of Paris.

The King cured the diſeaſed of the Euill.

Thirteen pieces of Gold the Kings Offering.

The thirteene Pieces of Gold, preſented by the King at the Offering, and thoſe of Gold and Siluer, which were throwne to the People by the Heralds, crying Largeſſe, after the wonted manner; had on the one ſide, the Image of the King Crowned, and for the Legend, Ludouicus XIII. Dei Gratia Francorum & Nauarre Rex Chriſtianiſſimus. And on the other ſide a Cloude, from whence iſſued a hand with long fingers, A Fuzelles, holding a Bottle, vnder which was the repreſentation of a Cittie, as that of Rheimes, with a date of time, to wit, the XVII. of October 1610. and for the Legend, Francis data munera Cœli: the deuiſe true, but the repreſentation falſe, and which (in it ſelfe) argueth the Author guiltie of groſe ignorance.

Of bringing the Holy Bottle to S. Rhemigius.

At the Sacring of our firſt Chriſtian King, the great Clouis, it was not an Angell in humaine forme, which brought (from Heauen) the Holy-Bottle to S. Rhemigius the Biſhop of Rheimes. Floardus, whoſe teſtimonie is without reproofe, authorized for more then eight hundred yeares; ſupplieth the defect, which ſome bad reformers haue enuiouſly impoſed on Saint Gregory of Tours, our auncient Annaliſt; whotelleth vs in his Hiſtorie of the Church of Rheimes: That on Saturday in Easter weeke, in the yeare of our Saluation fiue hundred, on which day Clouis was regenerated by the Sacrament of Baptiſme, and by the ſame Saint Rhemigius, with three thouſand French. Clericus Chriſma ferens à Populo interceptus, ad Fontem pertingere penitus eſt impeditus. Sanctificato denique Fonte, nutu diuino Chriſma deſuit. Sanctus autem Pontifex Rhemigius, oculis ad Cœlum porrectis tacite traditur orâſſe cum lachrymis. Et ecce ſubito Columba ceu Nix oduolat candida roſtro deferens Ampullam, Cœleſtis doni Chriſmate repletam, cuius odoris mirabili reſperſi Nectare, inæſtimabili qui aderant, ſuper omnia quibus ante à delectati fuerant replentur ſuauitate. Acceptus itaque ſanctus Præſul Ampulla, poſtquam Chriſmate frontem conſperſit, ſpecies mox Columbæ diſparuit.

Confimation of the paſſage recorded by Floardus.

The great Seale of the Arch-Monaſterie of S. Rhemigius of Rheimes, confirmeth this paſſage of Floardus, the Biſhop is thereon figured, cloathed in his pontificall habits, aſſiſted by his Cleargie, preceded with a Croſſe, and two Candleſtickes carried by two Children Quireſters: Clouis on his knees before the Font of Baptiſme, attending for the Sacred Vnction, a Pigeon, white as Snowe, appearing on high, bringing in her beake the Holy-Bottle, which S. Rhemigius receiueth with his right hand.

The Inſtitution of this Order of Knighthood & manner of wearing the ſame.

The marke or ſtampe of this Seale, is preſented in the midſt of a Croſſe, which is carried by the foure Barons and Knights of the Order, of the ſaid Holy-Bottle of S. Rhemigius of Rheimes, inſtituted (as they ſtay) by the ſame King Clouis. About the necke is worne a Riband of Blacke Silke, whereto is faſtened beneath a Croſſe of Gold, cut and cornered, enamelled with white, charged with a Doue, holding in her bill the Holy-Bottle, receiued by a hand. And ſo ought the pieces of Gold and Siluer, at the Sacring of our Kings to be ſtamped; and on the other ſide the Image of S. Rhemigius of Rheimes. Behold here the figure of the Croſſe, which they weare about their necks.

The Mantles or Cloakes belonging to the Order.

On their Mantles or Cloakes, they weare a Croſſe angled and ſquared, made of white Sattin, or Cloth of Siluer; in the midſt, a round, containing the Seale aboue figured, the round Cantonned with foure Floures de Luces of Gold, the whole conſiſting of imbroderie. And becauſe this memory hath not bin noated by any other, before vs: I hold it conuenient, that the iuſtifiable acts of this Order, their Hommage to the Church of S. Rhemigius, and the Ceremonie at the Sacring of our Monarches, were not amiſſe to be inſerted in this place, according to their Originals, taken from the Records and Roules of S. Rhemigius of Rheimes, whereof here followeth the Tenour in the Countrey tearmes.

The receiuing of Faith and Hommage.

In witnesse whereof, we haue signed these presents, and caused them also to be signed by the Ordenarie Register to the Bailiwicke, of S. Rhemigius; & thereto put the Seale of the Holy-Bottle, belonging to the Bailiwicke, with ours, which was done at Rheimes the eight day of the month of October, 1610.

Acts of Notaries for the Sacring of King Lewes the thirteenth.

IN the presence of vs Peter Auger, and Thomas Roger, Notaries for our Lord the King, hereditarilie abiding at Rheimes, for the Bailiwicke of Vermandois, subsigned. This day, being Sunday, the eighteenth of October, one thousand fiue hundred and ten, being in the Church and Arch-Monasterie of my Lord S. Rhemigius of Rheimes, about the ninth houre in the morning, appeared in the same Abbey the high and mighty Lords, Messire Phillip de Laual, Marquesse de Sablay; Nicholas de Brichanteau, Lord of Beauuais-Nangy; Henry Gaston de Foix, Viscount de Rabat; and Armand de Biron, Baron de Chef-Boutonne, being at Rheimes: who said and declared to the venerable and Religious man Dom Iohn the Spaniard, Priest, Doctor in the facultie of Sacred Diuinitie, great Prior of the said Arch-Monasterie of S. Rhemigius; and great Vicare both Spirituall and Temporall to the Illustrious Prince, my Lord Lewes of Lorraine, Archbishop, Duke of Rheimes, and chiefe Peere of France, Abbot of the Abbey and Arch-Monasterie of Saint Rhemigius; as also to Dom Iohn Rauineau, Sub-Prior, Iohn le Clerke, third Prior, Claude the Bishop, fourth Prior, Chanters and Treasurers, Nic. Vaurouart, and Ondar Bourgeois, Ouerseers of the Sicke, all the Religious Priests of the said Arch-Monasterie, and other Religious persons of the said Abbey. That they were sent on the behalfe of the King our Lord, Lewes the thirteenth of that name, to cause the bringing by the said great Prior of the said Arch-Monasterie, and the Religious persons, in all reuerend and honorable manner, the Holy-Bottle from the place at Saint Rhemigius, to the Church of our Lady, for holy seruice at the Sacring and Coronation of our said Lord the King, which is to be celebrated the 17. day of October, and in the foresaid Church of our Lady. The forenamed Lords offering and promising (on their faiths) to doe their vtmost duetie for securitie of the said Holy-Bottle, remaining as Hostages in the Church of S. Rhemigius, vntill the Ceremony be performed, and the Holy-Bottle brought backe to the said Arch-Monasterie of S. Rhemigius, according as in the like cases hath bin accustomed.

Whereunto by the Lord Graund Prior, and Graund Vicare to the said Lord Abbot, with other of the Religious persons, answere was made: that they readily prepared, to obey the Kings good pleasure. Which being done, the said Lords deputed by the King, were transported before the Arch-Monasterie of S. Rhemigius, with the Lord Grand Prior and religious persons, where they made Oath on the holy Euangelists, which was taken by the wife and honorable man, Maister Rene Bourgeois, Bailiffe to the Archbishop of Rheimes, and of the said Abbey at this present, promising to render and bring backe the Holy-Bottle, to the said Arch-Monasterie of S. Rhemigius, according to their former offers. Neuertheless, entreating and requiring the said Lords, Grand Viscard Prior, and Religious persons, that it might be permitted them, to carrie from the Arch-Monasterie of S. Rhemigius, the Holy-Bottle, to the said Church of Rheimes, by good conduct and assistance: with promise, the Sacring being done and accomplished, to bring it safely againe, to this abiding place of S. Rhemigius, which was granted to them by the said Grand Vicar, Prior and religious persons, vpon those solemne promises, and thereupon was deliuered to them the said Holy-Bottle on the high Altar, whereat were present a great number of people, and the said Lord Grand Prior, cloathed with a Coape of beaten Gold, taking the Holy-Bottle from off the said Altar: carried it vnder a Pall or Canopie of cloath of Siluer, fringed very richly round about. Which was supported by Messire Thomas de Cauchon de Neuflize, Knight, Lord and Castillion of the said place, Baron of the Baronnies of Terrier and Chamlats, remaining there: Raoul de la Fontaine Esquire, Lord and Baron of Belestre, Neufuizy, Vaurineourt, and Arsilement, dwelling at the said Neufuizy: Iacques de Haudresson, Esquire, Lord and Baron of Lonurecy, all three Barons and Knights of the Holy-Bottle, belonging to my Lord Saint Rhemigius, Oathe being taken by them. And in place of the fourth Baron and Knight, was Maister Rene Bourgeois, Bailiffe of the Arch-Bishopricke of Rhemes, and of the said Abbey: the Lord Grand Prior mounted on a white Haqueney, couered with a Foote cloath of Cloth of Siluer, and the other religious persons of the Abbey, with great deuotion, and in solemne Procession, hauing a Crosse carried before them, went singing all the way to the said Church of Rheimes, the Anthemes and Prayers meete for so holy a Misterie. After whom rode the Lords Hostages on horsebacke, hauing likewise before them riding foure men, that carried foure Banners or Ensignes of white Taffata, whereon were figured the Armes of his Maiestie, and those of the said Lords Deputies, with mightie crowdes of people, all the way to the Church of Rheimes. In the bodie whereof was my Lord the most reuerend and worthie Cardinall de Ioyeuse, accompanied and assisted with manie Prelates, and other men of the Church, and a great number of the chiefest Lords.

To the Lord Cardinall de Ioyeuse, the fore-named Lord Prior of S. Rhemigius, offered, presented and deliuered the Holy-Bottle, for accomplishing and performing the acte of Sacring, speaking these words. Most Noble and most reuerend Lord, behold here the Holy-Bottle, containing the Celestiall licquor, wherewith are annointed and Sacred, the Most-Christian Kings of France: which I present and deliuer into your hands, to consecrate King Lewes the thirteenth, our Soueraigne Lord; with full charge, to haue the same restored and rendered into my hands, the Sacring being perfected and accomplished. Whereto the Lord Cardinall thus answered, clapping his hand vpon his breast. So I make you faithfull promise to doe. Immediately, the said Lord de Ioyeuse, tooke and carried the Holy-Bottle into the Quier of our Ladies Church, accompanied with the Lord Grand Prior, as also the Lords Hostages, Barons and Knights.

When the Sacring was finished, and Masse being solemnely Sung three whole houres; the Lord Graund Priour departed, in the foresaid manner attended and accompanied, bearing the Holy-Bottle vpon his brest, hanging at a Riband about his necke, and so returned vnder the same Canopie, to the Church and Abbey of Saint Rhemigius, where the Bottle was set againe in the wonted place. Which being done, and the Lords Hostages hauing ended their Prayers; they left their Enfignes of Armes in the Abbey, for a perpetuall memorie of the said Sacring, and were quitted and discharged of their former Oathes and promises made to the Grand Priour and Religious persons. As in like manner the Lords Barons and Knights, deliuered their Pall or Canopie of Cloth of Siluer, into the hands of the great Vicare and Religious persons, to serue as an ornament in the said Church. In remembrance whereof, and of all the Ceremonies then performed, the Lords Hostages, Barons, Knights, Lord Graund Priour and religious persons, haue requested of vs an Act, which was respectiuely granted to them, to serue as a memoriall to future times. Done at Rheimes, the day and yeare before mentioned, and deliuered to the Lord Graund Priour, religious persons, Barons, Knights, and the Lord Bourgeois, Bailiffe, Signed according to the Originals, in the presence of these following.

Signed,

Roger and Auger, Notaries Royall.

Acts of the Bayliffe, and discharge of the great or chiefe Vicare of the Holy-Bottle, and Pallium of Cloath of Siluer.

TO all, such as shall see or reade these present Letters, Rene the Burgesse, Licentiate in the rights, Bailiffe in the Bailiwicke of Rheimes, and of the Abbey and Arch-Monasterie of S. Rhemigius in Rheimes, sendeth greeting. Wee giue to vnderstand, that this instant Monday, being the eighteenth day of the Moneth of October, at eight of the clocke in the morning, did appeare in our Hostell in person, Messire Thomas de Cauchon & de Neuflize, Knight, Lord and Castellaine of the said Neuflize, and of the Baronnies de Terrier and Chalants, there dwelling; Antoine de la Fountaine, Esquire, Lord and Baron de Bellestre Neufuizy, & de Varnecourt, there dwelling; and Iacques de Haudressom, Esquire likewise, Lord & Baron de Sonastre & de Lonuresi, there dwelling; all Barons and Knights of the Sacred & Holy-Bottle. Which Lords de Cauchon, de la Fountaine, & de Haudressom, by the said remembred names in the presence of Maister Lewes de Lauall, Licentiate in the Laws, Exchecquer Attorny for the said Abbey, as also for the Bailiwick of Rheimes, declared, shewed & made appeare to vs, that in regard of the Baronnies of Terrier, Bellestre and Sonastre, which they held in full Fiefe, Faith and Hommage, vnder my Lord Abbot of Saint Rhemigius of Rheimes; they were, are, and did performe these Offices following.

A right belonging to them from all Antiquitie, each one of them to beare and carrie a Staffe (appertaining to the fore-said Order) of the Canopie or Pallium, vnder which is carried, from the Church of Saint Rhemigius, to that of Nostre Dame of the said Rheimes, on the day of holy Sacring and Crowning our Kings of France; the said Holy-Bottle, so farre as to the high Altar of the Church de Nostre Dame de Rheimes, which Bottle was miraculously sent from Heauen, and containeth the holy Oyle and Sacred Vnction, wherewith was annointed King Clouis, the first most-Christian King of the French, and successiuely to doe the like, to the most-Christian Kings of France in all times following.

At the end of which high Altar, they ought to stand as Assistants, vntill such time as the Sacring be finished, and high Masse said or celebrated in the Church of Nostre Dame de Rheimes; without being out of sight thereof, according as they stand obliged to doe: to haue the same with them at their returning, but in presence of the Lord Abbot of Saint Rhemigius, or he that hath the honor to beare it. They seruing as aides and assistants for conducting the same in safetie, to the body of S. Rhemigius, where it is, and hath bin (from immemoriall Antiquitie) kept and preserued in the same manner, as they haue vsed to accompanie it with all solemnitie, to the said Church of Nostre Dame du Rheimes.

Now know ye, that yesterday, being Sunday, the seauenteenth day of the Moneth of October, in the fore-said yeare, one thousand six hundred and tenne, the day of Sacring; in our presence, and of the said Lauall, Exchecquer Attorney; euery one of the said Barons, Knights of the Holy-Bottle, seruiceably came and performed their duetie, for carriage thereof the said day, at eight of the Clocke in the morning, in the Church of Saint Rhemigius: the said Barons and Knights being cloathed in habits of white Sattin, with Mantles or Cloakes of blacke Taffata, and on the left side of their Cloakes were embrodered the Crosse, belonging to the Knighthood and Order of the Holy-Bottle, framed of pure Gold and Siluer.

This was done in the presence of Dom Iohn the Spaniard, Priest and Doctor in sacred Diuinitie, high Vicare to my Lord Abbot of Saint Rhemigius, as well in spirituall as temporall occasions, and Graund Priour beside of the said Abbey, together with the Religious Brotherhood of the Abbey, the said Knights being placed in rankes, each after other, presented themselues before the high Altar in the Church of Saint Rhemigius, prostrating one knee each of them to the ground, in signe of Faith and Homage, to kisse the said Holy-Bottle, which was presented to them by the Lord Graund Priour, as it hung about his necke. The Graund Priour, after he had allowed them kinde acceptation, and deliuered them the Oath, in such cases required of faithfull seruice, each laying his right hand on the Booke of the holy Euangelists, for true and faithfull bringing the same backe againe: the said Lord Graund Priour, to each of them kneeling in ranke, did put a Crosse of Gold, enamelled with white about their necks, hanging at a large Riband of blacke Silke, the Crosse resembling that embrodered on their Cloakes, according to the order kept and obserued from Antiquitie, which they ought to weare during their life time, or shall enioy their said Lands and Baronnies, and neuer to be without the said Crosse about their neckes.

These Gentlemen, being thus come at the houre appointed in the morning, into the said Church of Saint Rhemigius: the honorable Lords, Henry Gaston de Foix, Vicount de Rabat, Phillippes de Lauall, Marquesse de Sablay, Iacques de Brichanteau, Lord of Beauuais Nangy, and Armand de Biron, Baron of Chefboutonne, all foure Lords Hostages, whom it pleased his Maiestie to send, to procure the bringing of the Holy-Bottle for his Sacring; they came and presented themselues to the Lord Graund Priour and vs, declaring; that it had pleased his Maiestie, to send them as Hostages for the Holy-Bottle, according to the custome obserued from Antiquitie, each of them holding a Lance in his hand, whereon hung an Enfigne of white Taffata, armed with the Armes of our Most-Christian King of France, according to the Orders kept in the Church of Nostre Dame de Rheimes, as also in the Church of Saint Rhemigius.

Moreouer, their ſuite was to the Lord Graund Priour, that he would be pleaſed, to honor them with the ſight of the Ceremonies obſerued in the Sacring, binding themſelues duely before the Notaries, for the ſafe conduct, and returne thereof backe againe. Which being granted, the ſaid Lords Hoſtages before named, laying their hands on the Booke of the holy Euangeliſts, tooke their ſeuerall Oathes, in preſence of the Notaries Royall thereto called. Which being done, the Lord Graund Priour deſcended downe the ſteps from the high Altar of Saint Rhemigius, with the ſaid Holy-Bottle hanging about his necke, the Graund Priour being cloathed with a Coope of rich Cloth of Gold. At the nethermoſt of the ſaid ſteps, he was preſented by the Lords Hoſtages, with a State Conopie or Pallium of Cloath of Siluer, ſent by them from his Maieſtie to the Lord Abbot or Graund Vicare, vnder which he was to carrie the ſaid Holy-Bottle, from S. Rhemigius to the Church of Noſtre Dame, according to cuſtome. The Lord Graund Priour receiued it graciouſly, and preſented himſelfe to the three Knights of the Holy-Bottle, and to vs, by reaſon of the other Knights abſence, to acquit them of their honorable charges. Vnder which Canopie the Lord Graund Priour ſtept with the Holy-Bottle hanging about his necke, and attired as before is ſaid.

Before the Holy-Bottle went two of the ſaid Lords Hoſtages with their Launces in their hands, and the other two behinde it, till they came forth of the Church. At the great Portall whereof, was preſented by the foure Lords to the Graund Priour, a goodly white Hacqueney, harneſſed all with white, and couered with a Foote-cloath of Cloath of Siluer, fringed with Siluer Fringe round about, which his Maieſtie had ſent him to mount vpon, for his eaſier carriage of the Holy-Bottle, and as it was the auncient cuſtome. The Lord Priour receiued it very humanely, thanking his Maieſtie, for ſo well following and maintaining good and auncient cuſtomes.

The Hacqueney was led by foure Groomes belonging to his Maieſtie, who aſſiſted the Lord Graund Priour to mount thereon: two of them leading him by the Bridle, one on the right ſide, and the other on the left, the other two waited on the Stirrops, ſo guiding and conducting him in the decenteſt manner. Hereupon, the Knights and Hoſtages mounted on their Horſes, the Knights ſupporting the Canopie of State, and the Lords Hoſtages riding two before it, bearing their Banners, and the other after the Holy-Bottle in the ſame manner, their Eſquires alſo bearing Banners by them. All riding before the venerable Religious Brethren of the Abbey of Saint Rhemigius, attired in white Aulbes, with the Croſſe and Torch-light, ſinging Proceſſionally, and the two Chauntres cloathed in Coapes, each bearing a Staffe of Siluer.

All the Houſes in the Streetes were adorned with Hangings of rich Tapiſtries, and before the chiefeſt religious men, went the Captaine, Lieutenant and Enſigne, with diuers Inhabitants Du Cheſne le Populeux, ſubiects to the Lord Abbot, according as they were enioyned to doe, and had warning ſent them by the Lord Graund Priour: Armed after their faſhion, Drummes beating before them, and Enſignes diſplayed, thus marched they about the Canopie, ſome before, and ſome behinde it, attended by the Officers of the Eſcheuinage belonging to S. Rhemigius, Subiects and Vaſſailes to the Lord Abbot, and the ſaid Religious Order in Armes, who were ſent for, and enioyned to be there, for ſafer conduct of the Holy-Bottle, vntill it ſhould be brought back againe to S. Rhemigius, according to the auncient cuſtome.

The Lord Graund Priour, being accompanied as formerly hath bin related; arriued before the great Portall of the Church of Noſtre Dame de Rheimes, and entred into the Church, attended on onely by the Religious Brotherhood, the forenamed foure Lord Barons and Knights, and foure Lords Hoſtages, together with the two Notaries Royall already named, with ſome other Officers, Captaine and Enſigne of the Companie Du Cheſne. At enting into the ſaid Church of Noſtre Dame, there arriued the moſt illuſtrious and reuerend Lord Cardinall, in his Pontificall habits, accompanied with the Peeres of France, attired in ſuch garments, as they vſe to weare at ſuch great ſolemnities, and many Prelates beſide, for more ſeriouſ receiuing the Holy-Bottle; which was deliuered by the Lord Graund Priour, into the hands of of the ſaid Lord Cardinall de Ioyeuſe, Officient in the abſence of the Lord of Rheimes.

But yet notwithſtanding, before receipt thereof, promiſe was made by the Lord Cardinall, for ſafe deliuering the ſaid Holy-Bottle, to the hands of the Lord Graund Priour againe, when the Sacring ſhould be accompliſhed. And thereupon, the Lord Cardinall went vnderneth the Canopie with the Lord Priour, attended on by the Prelates and religious Brethren, going ſome before, others behinde, and round about the Canopie, ſo ſupported by the Lords Knights, and vs, as we haue ſaid; vnto the high Altar of Noſtre Dame, the ſaid Lords Hoſtages ſtill aſſiſting, and neuer parting from it, as was their eſpeciall charge and duetie, the Lord Graund Priour, keeping alſo on the right hand, which is the South-ſide on the high Altar in the Church of Noſtre Dame.

When the Sacring was compleated, which laſted about the ſpace of three houres; the Holy-Bottle was redeliuered into the hands of the Lord Graund Priour, in our preſence, by my Lord the Cardinall de Ioyeuſe, the ſaid Lords Knights and Hoſtages (with others) witneſſing the ſame. And at iſſuing forth of the Church of Noſtre Dame, the Lord Graund Priour mounted on his white Hacqueney againe, accompanied as already hath bin ſaid, as well by the foure Lords Hoſtages, as alſo the Barons Knights, and we the Officers, who came according to appointment, for conduct of the ſaid Holy-Bottle, and bringing it backe againe to the Church of Saint Rhemigius; the Streetes ſtill remaining beautified and adorned, and all the people praiſing God for his goodneſſe, that the Sacring was ſo happily performed and finiſhed.

Being come backe to the Church of Saint Rhemigius, the Holy-Bottle was there placed by the ſaid Saints body, as from all Antiquitie it hath bin accuſtomed, and the foure Lords Hoſtages, and Barons Knights of the Holy-Bottle, requiring of vs an Act of all before related: wee yeelded thereto, after that the foure Lords Hoſtages had deliuered into the hands of the Lord Graund Priour, their foure Liueries and Banners, to remaine in the Church of Saint Rhemigius, as a memoriall for perpetuitie of his Maieſtie, as formerly other Banners of our predeceſſours Kings haue in there preſerued, for an honorable remembrance of them, as alſo of the Lords Barons Knights of the holy-Bottle, who likewiſe left there their Staues and Pallium of Cloth of Siluer, deliuered to the hands of the Lord Graund Priour, and Vicaret of the Lord Abbot, to ſerue as Ornaments in the Church of Saint Rhemigius.

When the Exchequer Attorney had hereon conſidered, and granted, that each of the foure Lords Hoſtages, together with the other foure Lords Knights, ſhould haue an Act of this preſentation of their duetie and ſeruice, according as formerly is expreſſed: A rule was drawne, and afterward, their Patents fairely engroſſed, to remaine as a liuing teſtimonie of their worthy performance, as Law, reaſon and equitie iuſtly commanded.

In witneſſe whereof, wee haue hereunto affixed the Seale; belonging to the Holy-Bottle, together with that of the Bailiwicke of Saint Rhemigius: And cauſed it to be ſigned by Maiſter Iohn le Poyure, Ordenarie Regiſter of the Bailywicke, the day and yeare aboue mentioned.

The Order of the Gennet, eſtabliſhed by CHARLES MARTELL. Anno 726.

CHAP. I.

The Order of the Gennet.

L'Ordre de la Genette.

IN the time of the Merouingian Kings declining, the Succeſſours of King Clouis; the Maires of the Pallace, Stewards of the Kings Houſe, called ſince Seneſchals of France, prime Officers of the Crowne of France, poſſeſſed themſelues of the Gouernement thereof by abſolute power: as we haue already ſaid in the former Booke, and in the ſecond Diſcourſe or Treatiſe, concerning the Officers of the Crowne of France, where we haue obſerued, what the power was of thoſe Maires of the Pallace, and their diuers appellations, with the Genealogie of the Kings of the ſecond Ligne, ſirnamed The Carlouingians, of Charles Martell; wherefore it is needeleſſe to vſe any more repetition thereof.

Cruell Ebrouin, Maire of the Pallace, in the time of King Clothaire, third of the Name, ſayling with full winde, by ill-ordered fauour of the Kings, whom he gouerned; was the firſt that (abuſing their facilitie) proiected to change and alter the State, grounded on his owne power. Charles Martell, following the ſteps of his predeceſſors, predeceſſours, Maires of the Pallace (all periſhing in the purſuite of ſo perillous enterpriſe) by his valour and good carriage, wonne the Crowne of France to the of his Ligne.

In the yeare of Grace, ſeauen hundred and foureteene, the eleauenth day of N uember, the Moores of Affrica, hauing enfranchiſed the ſtraight of Gibell-Tar therwiſe called Gilbrartar: poſſeſſed themſelues of Spaine, by the death of Fodericke, the laſt King thereof (iſſued from the Vuiſigothes) ſlaine in a fought ba taile, on the plaine of Cherez de Medina Sidonia, a Bourgade called ſometime Sidonia, compoſed of two Villages; the one named Seritium Aſſidonia, and the ther Caſarianum, on the Riuer of Guadaletta, called by the auncient Gaules (whic inhabited this Prouince) in their Mother tongue, Lethos, which ſignifieth Ob uion.

Now theſe Moores, not contented with their domineering in Spaine; concein (in their opinion) a conqueſt of the Gaules, which they thought would be as e accompliſhed, as their winning of Spaine: but they had then no Count Iulian ſerue as their guide and conducter. Neuertheleſſe, it came ſo to paſſe, that in t yeare ſeauen hundred and twentie, theſe barbarous people, ſetting free the Pyr nian Mountaines, on the ſide towards Narbona the warlike: threw themſelues (li an impetuous torrent) into Languedocke, at that time called Gothia, and became Ma ſters thereof, vſurping Narbona Beziers, Agda, Niſmes, Auignion and Prouence, cuen fa farre as to the Mountaines of the Alpes.

Languedocke ouercome by the Moores.

This firſt paſſage hauing ſucceeded ſo well as they could wiſh; they concluded t goe into France the ſecond time, inuited thereto by a Duke, who wonne them to i vpon this occaſion.

Charles Martell, Duke of the French, and ſole Maire of the Pallace of France; deſired to re-vnite to the Crowne thereof, the Prouince of Aquitaine, held then by Eudes, Duke thereof, iſſued from the auncient Vuiſigothes, Brother in Law, and Coſine to Garcia Ximenes, Count of Begorre, and firſt King of Nauarre. And to a uert the Armes of Martell, and to expell the tempeſt of the French, ready to fall u on his head: he practiſed the ſuccour of Abdiramo, an Arabian Captaine, newly come forth of Affrica into Spaine, to the end, that he might enter on the Lands o France, being vnder the gouernment of Martell.

The intent of Charles Martell for Aquitaine.

Abdiramo, with an Armie of foure hundred thouſand Arabes, came thundring into Aquitaine, vpon the ſummons of Duke Eudes, and inſtead of well and milde vſing the Lands of the Duke; he rauaged the Prouince, pilled and put to ſpoile the Cities and Townes of Bourdelois, Xaintonge and Poictu, putting all to fire and ſword, as if he had bin in a land of Conqueſt, and of his deadly enemie. This made Duke Eudes to acknowledge the fault by himſelfe committed, ſo that falling into more familiar inteligence with Charles Martell; they agreed together, to giue a ſudden gird to the Sarazines, and to chaſtiſe them in ſuch ſort; that others (by their example) ſhould looſe all deſire of euermore comming into France.

The number of men in Charles Martell Armie.

The Armie of Martell conſiſted onely of thirtie thouſand men, but all of them being choice Souldiors, actiue and braue ſpirited warriours, by whoſe aſſiſtance he aſſured himſelfe, to haue the honor of a famous victorie. Grounding his hope on the God of Battailes, who giueth the aduantage of Armes to a ſmall number armed in defence of a good quarrell: and in whoſe ſight, men are not meaſured by number or multitude, or hugeneſſe of ſtature, but by valour and hardineſſe.

Abdiramo and his maine troupes, hauing (like a deluge) ouer-flowne all parts from the Pyrenean Mountaines, ſo farre as to the Cittie of Tours, where he lay encamped: beleeued verily, that this wealthie and well peopled Citie, would ſerue him but for a breakefaſt, as all the reſt before had done. There Martell gaue him Battaile, and the fight proued ſo ſucceſſefull (ſeconded by Duke Eudes, who valiantly followed in the Rere of the enemies Army) that God beſtowed the victory on him, famous by the death of Abdiramo, ſlain in the fielde, with three hundred foureſcore and fiue thouſand Arabes: on the French-mens ſide were ſlaine but fifteene hundred onely.

Abdiramo ſlain in the field, and the Armie foiled.

The

The Chroniclers of Spaine write, that Pope Gregory the third, had ſent to Duke Eudes hallowed Spunges, which being cut into ſmall morſels and pieces, and diſtributed among the Souldiours of the Chriſtian Armie on the day of Battaile; they warranted all ſuch as had them, from being wounded and ſlaine. But theſe are meere Fables, and tales of Spaniſh Romancers, wherewith their diſcourſes are vſually filled, as that of their King Bamba. For it was at the requeſt of Eudes, that this circumciſed people had paſt into France, to backe him againſt Charles Martell. It were a fortiſh thing, to referre the miracle of this victorie to inanimate matters, or to the creature; inſtead of rendring the praiſe and honour thereof to God, by whoſe mercie alone it came ſo to paſſe.

Our Annaliſts ſet downe this Battaile on the two and twentieth day of Iuly, in the yeare of Grace, Seauen hundred twentie ſixe, which memorable victorie obtained of God, by the interceſſions and prayers of Saint Martine of Tours, the ſecond Apoſtle of the Gaules: Charles, in ſigne of thankſgiuing, erected in the place of fight, an Oratorie, in honour and memorie of the holy Biſhop, called S. Martine of the Battle, and by corruption of ſpeech, The Oratorie of S. Martin le Bel, Oratorium ſancti Martini de Bello. And Charles of Auſtraſia, as a noate of his great valour, was ſir-named Martel, Tudes Saracenorum, The Hammer of the Sarazins.

Among the ſpoyles of the enemies Armie, there was found great ſtore of rich Furres of Gennets, and many of the creatures themſelues were there aliue, being preſented to Martell: who made ſuch eſtimation of them, for the beautie of their Skinnes, and pleaſing ſmell, ſomewhat neere to that of the Ciuit-Cat; that for excellencie, he gaue diuers of them, to the Lords and Princes of his Armie, who receiued them of him in very thankfull manner.

A deſcription of the Beaſt, cal'ed a Gennet.

The Gennet is a Beaſt, almoſt like to the Foine or Wood-Martine, in bigneſſe and forme like to the Cattes of Spaine: it hath a ſnout or muzzell long and ſlender, the necke and body ſleeke, ſupple, and it is as quicke and readie as a Catte. It is repreſented (according to nature) by Petrus Belonius, Phyſition, in his Obſeruations, where hee ſaith. That this Beaſt is gentle, and maketh it ſelfe as domeſticke as a Catte, hee hauing priuately ſeene of them at Conſtantinople, and other places in the Eaſt. Meſsire Iohn de Bourdigne reporteth in his Hiſtorie of Anion, that good King Rene of Sicilie, reſiding in his Countie of Prouence, the King of Tertugall (being his intimate friend) ſent him for a rare preſent, an Elephant, two Dromodaries, two Ciuet-Cattes, two Gennets, with Marmoſets and white Apes, beſide many other ſtrange Beaſts comming from the Indies.

Concerning two kindes of Gennets, the rare and the common.

There are two kindes of Gennets, the rare, and the common. The common is Graye, ſpeckled and ſpotted with blacke. The other, which is excellent and rare, hath a blacke Skinne, and ſhining like to Sattin, or blacke Mathorne veluet; and it is marked or freckled with flat red ſpottes, which doe giue to the reſt a wonderfull beautie. The Skinne of this Beaſt, being rubbed and chafed, yeeldeth a delicate ſweete ſauour, or ſmell, like vnto Muske. And therefore Princes and great Lords delighted (in elder times) to weare their Gownes, Surcoates or Sotanes Furred with Gennets Skinnes: Nor is it aboue threeſcore yeares ſince, that the vſuall wearing of them ceaſed. For, as the Ermine, and the Letice next thereto, are prized and eſteemed for their rare whiteneſſe; euen ſo was the Gennet for her ſhining blackneſſe, and being moſt ſpotted with red freckles.

But becauſe this ſecond kinde of Gennet was ſo exquiſite, and difficult to be found; the Martines Zubelines, which came from Ruſſia and Moſcouia, vnder-went the others place; and is now held for the verie richeſt Furre. So that time, Skinners and Furriers will looſe all knowledge of the Gennet, as they haue done alreadie of other rich Furres, which had their full courſe in the time of our good King Saint Lewes. At his returning from the Holy-Land, hee cloathed himselfe more simply then any man in his Kingdome, so saith the Lord of Ioinuille in his life. For he would no longer weare Minneuer, Gris, nor Estoilettes (they were Gennets) in his garments, neither did hee euer after vse Stirrops or Spurres that were Guilded. His daily wearing cloathes were of Lincsey-wolsey, and on Feast-dayes, of Chamlet, Lile-Grograine or Wosted, Black, Blew, or Warchet, and the Furre of Garinthes, or Legges of Hares. The auncientest Skinners in this Citie, know not the Estoilettes, nor the Garinthes: but thinke men speake Flemmith or base Brittish, when they talke of such Furres. The Gennet, as well as the Puthois, or Fullmart, is brought from the Indiaes, Affrica and Prouinces in the East, from whence come the richest Furres.

The passage of Charles Martell into Languedocke.

After the Battaile of Tours, Charles Martell went into Languedocke, to fight against the Moores, who vnder the conduct of Athinus, entred the third time into France, being sollicited so to doe by Hunauld (whom the vulgar called Huon of Bourdeaux, whose fabulous gests and voyages are written in his Romant) eldest Sonne to Eudes, Duke of Aquitaine, deceasing within a while after. Athinus, this Amirant of the Sarrazins, was long time besiedged in Arigrignion, from whence stealing secretly, he got into Narbona, and was vanquished at the foote of the Mountaine De la Courbiere, with his companion Amerrheo. Aghinard maketh mention of these two Battailes, famously wonne against the Affricanes. Carolus Tyrannos per totam Franciam dominatum sibi vendicantes oppressit, & Saracenos Galliam occupare tenantes, ducibus magnis praeditis, vno in Aquitania apud Pictauum Ciuitatem, altero iuxta Narbonem apud Byrram fluuium ita deuicit, vt in Hispaniam eos redire compelleret.

The first Order of Knighthood knowne in France.

NOw to preserue the memorie of this famous Battaile to posteritie, so happily wonne against Athanimo: hee instituted and deuised the first Order of Knighthood, which had bin seene in France, and which hee named Of the Gennet, in regard of the Beast before described. He composed this Order, to consist of sixteene Knights onely, hauing caused so many Collers of Gold to be made, with three Chaines interwouen or linched, all enamelled red Roses. At the end of which Coller hung a Gennet of Gold, enamelled Blacke and Red, as at the Collor of France, bordered with Gold, vpon a Terrasse or hanch of Floures, fairely enamelled. The

The first persons honored with this Order, next to him that declared himselfe the Chiefe thereof, and the Maires of the Pallace after him, of his Blood, Princes of Austrasia, were

1. Childebrand (Sonne of Martine) Colonell of the French Infanterie, Prince by Surname of Austrasia, Cousine-Germaine by Father and Mother, and Brother in Lawe.
2. Eudes, Duke of Aquitaine, and his two eldest Sonnes, who had followed him, and fought bravely,
3. Hunaud, And
4. Gasfier.
5. Carloman, Prince of Austrasia, and of Thuringe, eldest Sonne of Martell.
6. Pepin le Bref, his yonger Son, afterward chosen King of France.
7. Lutprand, Prince of Lombardie.
8. Odilon, Duke of Bauaria, And
9. Lanfrede, a great Prince in Alemaigne.

At what time this Order of Knighthood flourished in France.

The other afterward honored with the same Order, are not named. This Order went vnder full sayle in France, so long as the second Ligne of our Kings issued and descended of Pepin le Bref, and of Charles the Great his Sonne) held, and possessed the Crowne of France, worne onely by her Princes; vntill King Robert, who hauing instituted the new Order of the Starre, in honour of the Virgin Mary. The Starre of the Sea; that of the Gennet became vtterly abolished.

We haue said, that Martell appointed the first Order of Knighthood, which formerly was vnknowne in France; and which is to be vnderstood of a distinct Order, and acknowledged by a perticuler title. For, from all Antiquitie, Princes, Monarches and Common-weales, haue knowne and confessed the valour and magnanimitie of their Subiects and Citizens, by noates of worth and reward, as we haue formerly said.

The Bauldrick or Golden Girdle.

As our Kings of the first Ligne gaue the Bauldricke, that is to say, the Girdle of Gold (one of the markes or noates of Chiualrie) to their Vassailes and Subiects, chosen into Offices of most Fame vnder their obedience. Wee haue infinite examples in Saint Gregory of Tours, the most auncient of all our Annalists, and namely, where hee speaketh of one Leonardus, made Knight by Chilperick, husband to Fredegonde. Quae furore commota iussit eum in ipsa Ecclesia Parisiaca (in the Church of our Lady in Paris) spoliari, nudatumque vestimentis, & Baltheo quod ex munere Chilperici Regis habebat, discedere à sua iubet praesentia. The same Author saith in another place. In Lib. 10. Cap. 21. Macone Comite eunte, vt debitum Fisco seruitium (this was not the Annuall right of Offices, but the receipt of the Royall Monies, whereof the Counties were accountable) solite deferret inferre, Filij Vaddonis praesentiam expetunt Regis, & co coram offerunt Baltheum magnum ex Auro Lapidibusque pretiosis ornatum, Gladiumque mirabilem, cui Capulum ex Gemmis Hispanicis, Auroque dispositum erat. These passages doe shew vs, that this degree of honor and Knighthood, calleth it selfe properly, a Gift Royall, which cannot be giuen but by the King himselfe, and these Knights are distinguished from the Nobilitie, by perticuler habits of great estates.

Now, that these Bauldricks were not any common wearing Girdles, the same Author maketh it very plaine and apparant to vs. For the Nobilitie, that is to say, all the French in generall, vsed to weare the Golden Girdle, from whence ensued our ancient Prouerbe, vsed among vs.

Bonne, & commune Renommee,
Vaut mieux que Ceinture doree.

Good fame, and common Renowne,
Is more worth then a golden Girdle.

Whereas Knights wore such as were garnished with great Buckles, Studdes and Rings of pure Gold, being of great price and value: as is witnessed by the same S. Gregory of Tours.

We haue formerly obserued, that Collers giuen to Knights, were all composed of triple Chaines of Gold: such was the auncient custome, not to exceede the trine or ternarie number, full of misteries, noated by the Ægyptians.

Charles Martell caused those Chaines of Gold to be interwouen with Red Roses: And here you may behold a reason for it.

The pretended Gods of the Gaules and French.

The auncient Gaules and French, hauing embraced the Demonomanie of the Romaines, chose for their Gods of pretention; such as corresponded best with their nature, and according to their Martiall and Militarie inclination, answerable to the knowledge of Arts and Sciences. Wherefore among all other Deities they honored perticularly those of Mars and Mercurie: for the rest, it was but subsidiarily, and by way of superabundance. But they represented these pretended Deities, not after the Romane manner; but according to their Philosophie, much more exalted then that of the Romaines.

The Idole of Mars, the pretended God of Warre, was mounted on a strong Pedestall of Brasle (with a round Colomne) armed at all points, the Caske or Helmet on his head, flowing with Lambrequins, and leaues of Achantha, like an antique Plume, his broad Sword in Pall naked in his hand, with Ballances vnder it. In the other hand he held a Pennon or Banner, charged with a red Rose, as the deuise and Blazon. Close by him, and as it were vpon his left thigh, leaned his Shield, made according to the French fashion, broade aboue, and finishing in a point for the end: Blazonne d'un Lyon Rampant bien Arme, & Lampasse. Au deuant de la Cuirasse estoit de relief vn Ours en colore & furu. Such was the presentation of this pretended God Mars in his Temples, as well at Mont-martre, as elsewhere. As also in Germanie, on Le Mont d'Eresberg, that is to say, Mont de Mars, adored by the auncient French and Germaines, vnder the name of Erminsull, in this Temple (the most remarkeable of Germanie) at Merspourg, destroyed by our Emperour Charlemaigne, in the yeare of Grace, Seuen hundred seauentie two, according to the testimonie of our best and auncient Annalists. Carolus Saxoniam bello aggressus Eresburgum Castrum cepit, & Idolum Saxonum, quod vocabatur Erminsull, destruit.

The Temple of Mars on Mont-martre neere to Paris.

Now, as concerning the Temple on the top of Mont-martre neere Paris, built (as is beleeued) in the Reigne of Augustus, successour to Iulius Cæsar: it continued in full and firme condition, vntill it was thunder-smitten from Heauen, and left in such estate, as was to be seene in the yeare Nine hundred fortie foure, and as we learne by Floardus in his Chronicle. Tempestas nimia facta est in agro Parisiaco, & turbo vehementissimus quo parietes cuiusdam antiquissimæ domus, qui validissimo constructi cemento, in Monte qui dicitur Martyrum diu perstiterant immoti, fundatus sunt eversi.

Some are of opinion, that this Temple of Mars aboue Paris, was the same whereof mention is made by Vlpian the Lawyer, at the Title of such as should be instituted Heires, next to the Code Theodosian. Deos hæredes instituere non possumus, præter eos quos Senatusconsulta constitutionibus Principum instituere concessum est, sicut Iouem Tarpæum: Apollinem Didymæum: Sicuti Martem in Gallia; Minervam in Melitensem; Herculem Gaditanum; Dianam Ephesiam; Matrem Deorum Cybelen, quæ Smyrnæ colitur, & Cælestem Salinensem Carthaginis. So that it is not to be wondred at, if (during the Demonomanie of the Romaines) the Temples of these Idoles were full of riches, seeing they were capable to be instituted Heires.

The Ballances vnder the Sword of this Idoll Mars, represented the doubtfull accidents accidents and euents of warre; victorie oftentimes inclining to the weaker side, or to the part of least iustice, as in the times of Cæsar and Pompey.

——Quis iustior arma
Tulerit, scire nefas:

For in outward appearance, the side of greatest iustice was that of Pompey, who yet was vanquished.

Causa Victrix Dijs placuit, sed victa Catoni.

The meaning of the Red Rose in the Banner.

The Red Rose emblazoned in his Banner, signified, That like as that faire Flower, pleasing to the sight and smell, so seth his sweet sauour and beautifull red colour, from this day to the next morning: euen so it falleth out in the successes of warre, to day fauourable, to morrow vnfortunate; because such as march vnder the ensigne of Mars, are said to haue no morrow at all, for their life stands on the instant daies determination. It behoueth them therefore to be armed with exalted courages, like to the Lyon, the symbole of Valiancie, as the Beare is of crueltie, as declaring; that Warre is voide of mildnesse and pittie, carrying along with it murders and massacres, according as Homer excellently figureth it, in the Shield of his Prince Achilles.

The Lyon is the type of Valour, as the Beare is of crueltie.

Now for his Shield, charged with a Lyon Rampant, on a banke or hillocke of variable flowers: it represented the auncient Armes of the Gaules, as also their natural and martiall disposition, they hauing no other delight and contentment, but in Armes, search of aduentures, broiles, encounters and battailes; being alwaies Armed, at their meetings, in their Temples, yea, and at their feeding. So saith Tacitus in his Germania: and Cæsar in his Commentaries; Strabo, with other Geographers; and Athenæus, as already we haue else-where said.

Athenæus his Censure.

Charles Martell, hauing all his life time followed the exercise of Armes, and made his memorie acceptable to the French: died in the yeare of Grace, Seuen hundred fortie and one, so saith the Chronicle of Laureshem, vnder the said yeare. Eodem Carolus Maiordomus diem obijt, tres filios hæredes reliquens, Carolomannum, Pipinum, atque Grifonem. He liued, died, and was enterred as a King among the Kings of France at S. Denys, the Mausolus for the Monarches of the Noble Fleur de Luce, and this inscription is about his Picture, as the obseruation of his Power.

The death of Charles Martel.

Dux, Dominusque Ducum, Regum quoque;
Rex fore spernit.
Non vult regnare, sed Regibus imperat ipse.

So would he ordinarily speake among his followers, That it was a more glorious thing to command Kings, then to Reigne himselfe.

Errors committed by Charles Martel.

But his renowne (otherwise immortall) became soiled with a blemish, which could not be wipt off; namely, in laying his hand on the goods of the Church, which he gaue to his Soldiours that followed him in Armes. For he was the Authour of the impropriation of Tithes, on the goods of the Church, for discharging the actuall seruices of his troupes; so that these impropriated Tithes holding place, and in the case of Fifes; the possessors of them were restrained and made subiect to the Ban, and Arrierban, as we tearme it in France. That if they be bequeathed, giuen or left in Mort-maine, Et ad primæuam naturam redierint, to the Churches from whence they proceeded, by want of seruice, or in case of dutie to the King; they are not then only impropriations, but the detainers bound to the Tithes. This vsurpation brought into France by Charles Martell, and his following Kings of the second Ligne, was the cause that it reigned very little time, passing but as a flash of lightning, continuing only Two hundred thirtie seuen yeares: yet this vnhappinesse lasted afterward in France, the Princes and great Lords declaring no conſcience at all, in maintaining their houſes on the Churches reuennues, and with ſuch licence, as they were not aſhamed, to ſtile themſelues Abbots of Abbeyes, which they poſſeſſed.

A garment like a Petticoate with body & ſkirts.

So the Father of Hugh Capet, was ſirnamed Hugh the white, becauſe he pleaſed to goe attired in a white Gonnelle. Our Hiſtorians commonly tearmed him, Hugh the great Abbot, becauſe he poſſeſſed the Abbeyes of S. Denys in France, of S. Germaine des prez at Paris, and of S. Martine at Tours. So in our Annales, and thoſe of Flanders, we ſee that the Counts of Vermandois and of Flanders fought in ranged battailes, for the Abbeyes of S. Vuaſt, S. Berthin and S. Omer, titling themſelues by the names of Abbots. In like manner the good Abbot of Fleury, and hee of Ferriers Loup complained, that they had threeſcore Religious perſons to feede, and yet neuertheleſſe, they had no more then the halfe part of their Abbeyes reuennues, their great Abbots enioyed all the reſt. For, Abbots by profeſſion and habite, were called but the leſſer Abbots, and Princes and great Lords, were named great Abbots, who (of the Churches goods) maintained both their horſe and foote Souldiors; oftentimes for troubling the repoſe of France, and bandying themſelues againſt their Soueraigne Prince, in preſcribing Law to him. And thus by the meanes of ſo many rich Abbeyes, Hugh the great Abbot, prepared the way for his Sonne Capet, to make himſelfe King of France, vtterly exterminating the Ligne of the Carlouingians.

The condemnation of Charles Martell.

The manuſcript Chronicle of the Counts of Foix, ſpeaking of Dagobert, and of Martell, ſaith, We reade in Chronicles, that the ſaid Martell is condemned; becauſe he laid hands and impoſitions on the Tythes of Churches: as it was miraculouſly reuealed to a holy man.

Our Auncеſtours gaue the moſt part of their goods to the Church, to the end, that the poore might be nouriſhed, and ſuch as ſerued at the Altar. Churches rendered the ſame inheritances, to the poore kindred of the donors, as in Fee-Farme, and improuement. Theſe Farmes of inheritance, are called in our Capitularies Precariæ, Quod precario Laicis ab Eccleſiâ vtendæ fruendæ concederentur.

Charles Martell, Pepin le Bref, Charlemaigne, & Lewes the Debonnaire gaue theſe heritages in all proprietie to their Leudes, as they tearmed them; that is, to their Franc, men of Armes and Soldiours, to enioy for perpetuitie, and ſtill as Biſhopricks came to be voide, beſide the impropriated Tythes.

Charles the Baulde laboured to take away this abuſe, introduced for ruine of the Church, as is to be ſeene in the fift Booke of our Capitularies. Nemini Regum, aut cuiquam Hominum liceat Præcaria in proprium tradere, vel commutare, vel quocunque noſtro coniato (conge) vendere. And in the ninth Chapter hee ordained, that from fiue yeares to fiue yeares, deſcription ſhould be made to him, of the Lands appertaining to the Churches of France; becauſe they ſhould not come to be loſt in following time, and Noble-men ſhould not appropriate them perticularly to their owne vſurpation.

The vſurpation of the Churches goods, was brought out of Italie, long time before Charles Martell, for Pope Symmachus, firſt of the name, who held the Seate from the yeare fiue hundred, to the yeare fiue hundred and fifteene (vnder the reign of our great King Clouis) in the Councill which hee held at Rome, conſiſting of a hundred and two and twentie Biſhops, complained of this diſorder, and bemoaned the miſerie of his time, in theſe words. Communis dolor, & generalis eſt gemitus, quod intra Eccleſiam, noſtris, & retroactis temporibus, de inuaſione rerum Eccleſiaſticarum, & Sacerdotum vexatione cognouimus. For, vpon the declining of the Romaine Empire, as well in the Eaſt as Weſt, the Emperours, hauing their wealth greatly exhauſted, vpon neceſſitie poſſeſſed themſelues of the goods of Churches, which they gaue to their Captaines, to recompence their trauailes taken in Warre, hauing no other meanes, whereby to reſiſt againſt ſtrange Nations, who in enuie one to another hurried themſelues (like an impetuous and frightfull torrent) into all Prouinces of the Empire, there to canton themſelues as beſt they pleaſed, diſpluming (feather by feather) the poore Romaine Eagle.

Charles Martell imitating this example, poſſeſſed himſelfe of the Churches goods.

goods. The fragment of the Chronicle of Fleury, in the Tract De Maioribus Domus Franciæ, ſpeaking of the ſame Martell, ſaith. Carolus Tudes Maior Domus, & Princeps Auſtraſiorum, res Eccleſiarum propter aſſiduitatem bellorum Daicis tradidit. And Floardus, Arch-deacon of Rheimes, in his Chronicle of France, ſaith. Hic Carolus, cunctis, qui ante ſe fuerant, audacior Regibus, non ſolum ipſum Archiepiſcopatum Rhemenſem, ſed etiam alios Regni Epiſcopatus Laicis hominibus, & Comitibus dedit. But behold here his more ample Hiſtorie and diſcourſe, as it is recorded in the ſecond Booke of the Hiſtorie of Rheimes, and the twelfth Chapter, in this manner.

A briefe Diſcourſe concerning the Life and Actions of Charles Martell.

Rigobert Archbiſhoppe of Rheimes expelled by Martell.

Charles Martell, ſo ſoone as by force of Armes he was become Prince, and ſole Maire of the Pallace of France; ſpoiled and expulſed from his Archbiſhopricke of Rheimes, the bleſſed Rigobert, his Godfather. For it is auouched, that hee held Charles at the Font of Baptiſme, and he gaue the ſaid Archbiſhopricke to one named Milo, a ſimple Prieſt, that had followed him in the Warres. This Charles, borne out of lawfull marriage, of a woman of ſeruile condition, as we reade in the Annales of France; was the moſt audacious and boldeſt of all the Kings his predeceſſors. For he haue not onely thus the Archbiſhopricke of Rheimes; but likewiſe all the other Biſhoprickes of France, to Countes and Laye-men: ſo that the Biſhops were bereft of all meanes, for exerciſing the workes of Charitie, not hauing whereupon they might well liue.

Martell borne out of lawfull marriage.

But he was chaſtiſed by the iuſt iudgement of God, for the euill by him committed, and perpetrated againſt the holy man Rigobert, as alſo the Churches of Ieſus Chriſt, whoſe iuſt diſpleaſure fell vpon his head. For we learne by an Hiſtorie and true Relation, that S. Eucherius, ſometime Biſhop of Orleans, whoſe body is buried in the Monaſtery of S. Treudon; this holy Biſhop being (on a day) in feruent prayers, was rapt into an extaſie, and carried into the other world. Where, among other wonders which he ſaw there, God gaue ſuch permiſſion, that he beheld Charles Martell tormented in eternall flames.

A ſtrange viſion ſeene by S. Eucherius.

S. Eucherius mervailing at an accident ſo ſtrange, and demanding the ſubiect of the Angell his conducter; he receiued this anſwere. That this Prince was condemned for euer into Hell fire, beuauſe he had laid hand on the goods of the Church, which he had abandoned to his Souldiours, and imployed for the vſe of prophane perſons. S. Eucherius returning againe into this world, ſent (in writing) this viſion to S. Boniface, Archbiſhop of Maguntia, Legate then in France: and to Folrardus, Abbot of S. Denys the Areopagite, neere Paris, Arch-Chaplaine and Apocriſiarie, that is to ſay, great Almoner to King Pepin le Bref. And to aſſure them of his Relation, he ſent them to cauſe the Tombe or Sepulcher of Charles Martell to be opened, for he dyed at Vermene, neere to Yſſoire in Auuergne, and was brought for buriall to S. Denys in France. To which place Boniface and Folrardus being come, they procured the Tombe to be opened, and found it ſo blacke with ſmoake, as if fire had bin burnt in it, and a very dreadfull Serpent, but no bones at all.

At the end of the workes of the learned Biſhop Yues de Chartres, is a Chronicle added by an ignorant Author (for it ſauoureth nothing, neither commeth neere the learning and ſtile of Yuo Carnotenſis) who vnaduiſedly attributeth this admirable Hiſtorie to King Charles the Simple, where as it is onely meant of Martell. And yet his teſtimonie may ſerue vs to ſecond Floardus.

Karolus Ludouici Filius Rex Francorum Viceſimus quartus, regnauit Annis XXXVII. Huic Tutudis, quod Martellus dicitur, nomen eſt inditum, & quia in Regno ſuo vix, aut raro pacem habuit, ideo res Eccleſiarum ſuis militibus in ſtipendium contulit maximâ ex parte. Qui mortuus, in Eccleſia beati Dionyſij Martyris ſepultus à ſiniſtra parte Altaris maioris, viſus eſt noctu in ſpecie Draconis, effracto ſepulchro, per vitream Eccleſiæ, cum magno terrore exijſſe.

Atheiſts

Atheists and pretended Reformists of our Age, doe make a mockerie of this Historie, and say, that it is a meere Fable, inuented by the Monkes; who ordenarily place in the Catalogue of Saints, such as are beneficiall to them, and when any such matter happeneth; it must not be held or reputed for a miracle. Because it is the vniuersall Doctrine of Hippocrates, and the Schoole of Physitions; Anguum gigni ex medulla spinæ hominis. Of the marrow in the backe-bone of men, Serpents are engendred. So saith Plinie, following the opinion of Pythagoras, and reported by the amourous Poet Ouid.

Sunt qui cum clauso putrefacta est spina sepulchro, Mutari credunt humanas Anguc medullas.

And that likewise out of the Graue of Anchises, Father to Aeneas, issued a great Serpent, according as Virgill writeth.

Dixerat hæc: adito cum lubricus Anguis ab imis.
Septena ingens gyros, septena volumina traxit,
Amplexus placide tumulum lapsusque per aruas.

These are naturall reasons, which neuertheless hinder not the effects of miracles, and things monstrous; as is testified not onely by our auncient Annalists, but Strangers also, namely Rhegmon, and other writers of good noate. And in the reading of this Historie, Kings and Princes of the earth may learne, and feare the iust iudgements of God, who forbiddeth the throwing of precious Stones to Swine; that is to say, giuing Church Benefices to prophane persons. For, oftentimes we see them to be possessed by enemies to the Church, and of contrarie Religion; by Bawdes, Strampers and Panders, to the great scandale & dishonor of Princes, which so basely bestow them.

The ceasing of the Order of the Gennet.

Charles Martell hauing bin but Maire of the Pallace, and Duke of the French; had for Successour his Sonne Pepin le Bref, exalted King of France, as wee haue said: And this Order of the Gennet was in maine strength then, and during all the length of the second Ligne, without proceeding any further.

A new Order of Knighthood in fauour of the Frizons, called, The Order of the Crowne Royall.

L'Ordre de la Coronne Royale.

Charlemaigne, to honour them of Frizeland, who had carried themselues valiantly in his Armies two and thirtie yeares, during which time, hee made warre on the Sesnes (which were the auncient Saxons, against whom the warre had beginning, from the time of the descendants of Clouis, and namely, vnder Clothaire the second, Sonne of Chilpericke and Fredegonde) who had ouercome them in a ranged Battaile, not leauing any one aliue, longer then his Sword: made them Knights of a new Order of Knighthood, which he established in the fauour of them, called The Order of the Crowne Royall. Because the Knights of this Order, vsed to weare on their breasts a Crowne Royall, in embroderie of Gold. The Gouernour of the Country, whom they called Potestat, after the manner of Italie, had power to giue this Order of the Crowne, to such as (for a certaine time) had followed the Armies of France, and warfared for our Kings, as well in Italie, as in Germanie. And we vnderstand, that in those times when our Kings made Knights, they gaue them a blow or cuffe on the eare; as Bishops vse to doe, in conferring the Sacrament of Confirmation. Martinus Hanconius, in his Historie of Frisia reporteth the Pragmaticall Sanction of our King Charlemaigne, touching the Institution of this Order of Knights of the Crowne, in these words.

The Pragmaticall Sanction of this Order.

Iubemus super statutum vt si ex ipsis sufficientationem habuerint, vel militare voluerint, dicta Potestas eis Gladium circumcingat, & dato eisdem, sicut consuetudinis est, Mantelo Colapho, sic Milites faciat, eisdemque similiter iniungendo præcipiat, vt deinceps More Militum Sacri Francia Regni, vel imperij incedant armati, eò quod consideramus si præfati Frisones secundum staturam corporis & formam eis à Deo, & Natura datam sic militaueriut, cunctis in orbe terrarum militibus sua fortitudine, ingenio, & audaciâ (dummodo vt prædictum est sint armati) facile præcellent, & præualebunt. Qui Frisones signum suæ militiæ à dicta Potestate recipere debent, in quo Corona Imperialis insignum suæ libertatis nobis concessæ debeat esse depicta. Datum Romæ in Lateranensi Palatio, Anno Dominicæ Incarnationis Octogentissimo secundo.

The said Charlemaigne wondrously enlarged the Kingdome of France. For, as Eghinard saith in the life of this Prince; In foure and fortie yeares space (which he reigned) he added double thereto so much, as king Pepin his Father had left him, and that was Gaule, limited by the Riuers of Rhine and Loire; of the Ocean Sea on the one side, and that of Maiorica on the other; that part of Germanie, which is comprised between Saxonie and the Riuers of Rhine, Danubie and Salas, which make the deuision betweene the Turingeans and Sarabes, from the Orientall French, which is Franconia from Germanie, and the Kingdome of Bauaria, whereto Charlemaigne annexed Aquitaine and Gascoignie, withall the bounds and skirts off and from the Pyrenean mountaines, so farre as to the Riuer Iberus, which runneth thorow Spaine, taking sourse or originall in the Kingdome of Nauarre, and afterward watering Arragon, looseth it selfe at Tortosa in the Sea of Maiorica. He conquered likewise all Italie, from Thurin so farre as the lower Calabria; Saxonie the great Prouince of Germanie; the two Panoniaes, that is to say, Hungaria and Austria; Denmarke from beyond Danubie; Sclauonia and Dalmatia, the maritime Cities and Townes only excepted, which he left (in courtesie) to be possessed by the Emperours of Constantinople. From thence he proceeded to the conquering of barbarous Nations, which inhabited betweene the Riuers of Rhine, and of Vistula the Ocean Sea, and wide spreading Danubie: speaking very well the same Languages, but their humours and customes being contrarie, he made them his tributaries. The principall People of those strange Nations, were then nominated and called Veltabes, Soraues, Abotrites and Boemes, against whom he fought valiantly, to ranke them vnder his obedience: the rest (in farre greater number) voluntarily submitting themselues to be gouerned by the French Empire.

How greatly King Charlemaigne enlarged France.

Charles Martell, Pepin le Breue his sonne (of whom it is said, that Maior in exiguo regnabat corpore Virtus)

The three valiant Princes of the French.

And Charlemaigne, were valiant Princes: but their Successours more peaceable, then warriors. And the Crowne of France, (with diuers successes) was held by the descendants of Charles Martell, euen as before him, by the same accidents, it had beene gouerned by the Merouingians. For like as the Ligne of Merouæus failed in the person of Childericke the third, the last of nineteene Kings descended of Clouis, which Childericke was shorne a Monke in the Monasterie of S. Hemerian of Reganespourg, at this day called Ratisponna, in the Duchie of Bauaria, as is recorded by Auentine in his Annales:) So in the like manner, of Charles Martell failed the Ligne at the eleuenth King, in the person of Lewes the fift, tearmed, Doe nothing, or the Hartlesse loiterer. Being so named, because the Annalists of the time obserued all his Reigne, and comprehended it vnder these three words; Ludouicus nihil fecit. Likewise he reigned but one yeare, deceasing at Compeigne, (where he is buried in the Abbey of S. Cornille with King Lewes the Stammerer, Emperour) the 22. of June, in the yeare of Grace 988. And so the race of the Carlouingians continued but two hundred thirtie and seuen yeares; and that of the Merouingians reigned in France three hundred yeares continuance, to wit, from the yeare of Grace 450. when Merouæus assured his conquest on this side the Rhine in the Gaules; vntill the yeare 749. So that according to the Chronicle of Laureshеim, which I haue, Bouchard, Bishop of Wirtzbourg, and Folrard Priest, afterward great Almoner to Pepin le Briefe, were sent to Rome to Pope Zacharie, to haue his aduise. Because it had beene called into question, for proceeding to the new election of a King, Lewes the loiterer, or Doe nothing.

King, and they made choice of Pepin le Brief, Maire of the Pallace of France, who supported all the burden of the Warres, reiecting the descendants of Clouis, without vertue, voide of courage and sprightly valiancie. Zacharie gaue his opinion answerable to the deliberation of the States. Melius esse illum eligere Regem quem summa potestatis tota consisteret, quàm qui Regis nomen tantum, sed nullam virtute Regia potestatis haberet. Whereupon, the yeare following, the same generall Stares assembled at Soissons (called by Aethicus, Augusta Suessonum) and Pepin le Brief was there declared, elected, and crowned King of France.

The Popes answer to the message.

Lewes the fift last King of the second Ligne.

So by the cowardlinesse and negligence of Lewes the fift, last King of the second Ligne; by resolution of the Generall States of France, met together at Noyon, in the remarkable yeare, obserued in the last Chapter of the former Booke; Hugh Capet, a valiant and wise Prince, was elected first King of the third Ligne, which only hath continued (euen to this present day) more then both the two former.

Indeed Lewes the Debonnaire, sonne to Charlemaigne, was his Successour in the French Empire; but not in his good fortunes. He left three sonnes, namely, Lothaire, Lewes, and Charles, called the Baulde, of diuers natures, bandying and contending each against other, for enuie and desire of Reigning, without companion.

——Omnisque potestas impatiens consortis erit.

We finde the Salique Law to be in practise vnder the said Debonnaire. Because the said Emperour had by his first Wife Ermingarde three sonnes; to wit Lothaire, who was Emperour; Lewes King of Germanie, and Pepin King of Italie. This Pepin had espoused the daughter to the Count of Mastric, Thiebert, of whom he begat two sonnes, and two daughters, married to the Counts Reginard and Girard. The sonnes were Pepin, King of Aquitaine after his Father, and Charles: but these two Brethren (for their wicked gouernment) were shorne Monkes; the one, namely Pepin, at S. Mard of Soissons; and the other at Prum in Flanders. And by the ciuile death of these two Brethren Princes, the Kingdome of Aquitaine, (which then contained Guienne, Gascoigne, Biscaye, Arragon, Catalogna, and Cerdaigne) were by Charles the Baulde re-vnited to the Crowne of France; with exclusion of the two Sisters to the said Princes Pepin and Charles, as is obserued by Aimoinus the Monke.

The iffue of Pepin King of Italie.

The French Empire deuided into three portions.

The three sonnes that remained liuing, of Lewes the Debonnaire, to wit, Lothaire, Lewes, and Charles, surnamed the Baulde, after many furious and bloudie fights accorded themselues, in the Assembly made at the Citie of Verdun, in the yeare of Grace 843. And there they deuided the French Empire left by Charlemaigne into the extendure before noted, and into three portions, which yet were vnequall.

Lothaire, the eldest sonne, had for his part, with the Title of Emperour (which after his death came to Charles the Baulde) Rome, Italie, Prouence, and the Lands which marched on the parts of the Baulde; and of Lewes of Germanie, afterward, the said portion was called Lotaringia, and now Lorraine, affer the name of the said Lothaire.

Lewes had Orientall France, which comprehended the most part of Germanie, and finished at the great Riuer of Rhine.

Charles, King of France, tearmed the Baulde, had in his Lot and portion, Occidentall France sometimes called Neustria, and Westria: which extended from the Ocean Armorica, so farre as the Riuer of Meuse. This is that which is properly called France, without any other addition.

Diuision the decay and ruine of the French Empire.

This deuision was the totall ruine of the French Empire, and the depressing of her prime Greatnesse; to verifie the Oracle of Truth it selfe, that Omne Regnum in se diuisum desolabitur: Euery Kingdome deuided against it selfe, shall be desolated. And the deuision of the same Kingdome, by the sonnes of Clouis, might haue enstroled those three French Princes, in the misfortunes which fell vnto them, and to their Subiects, bandied and deuided one against another, by many bloudie ciuill warres. Hereof Hereof (by good and iust cause) complained Hincmarus, Archbishop of Rheimes, in the Epistle which he wrote to the Emperour and King of France, Lewes the Stammerer, second of the name, Sonne to the said Charles the Baulde. Mortuo Lothario post multas controuersias, facta est diuisio inter Patrem vestrum Ludouicum, & tale deuenerunt miseriæ, sicut vobis sunt nota; & hoc Anno talis prouenit lugenda infelicitas, quæ per vniuersum penè Mundum, & per futura tempora merito erit in opprobrium.

How dangerous the dismembering of a State is.

Giuing Councell by this Epistle of his, to take example by the mischiefes, happening through the meanes of this Deuision. For, to dismember a State into diuers Tetrarchies, vnder pretence of Natures Law, and aduancement of the Sonnes: is, as if we should from the body of man, cut off a legge or an arme, which maketh it altogether impotent and deformed. But the acknowledgement of these passed enormities, gaue foundation to the Law of the Kingdome, wisely and religiously ordained by Hugh Capet, Authour of our Kings of the third Ligne.

That in following times, the Title of King should not be giuen, but to the Eldest Sonne of the Kings of France, Who hath right and Soueraigne power ouer his other Brethren, and who ought to reuerence him as their Father and Lord, not hauing any assured portion or partage, but by his grace and fauour. If he giue them any Lands and Seigneuries, in title of younger Brethrens portions: the said younger Sonnes shall hold and redeliuer them to the Crowne of France; and they are not to be giuen them, but with charge of Homrnage, Iurisdiction, and Rights Royall, and as reuersions of the said Crowne, deceasing without heires mayles, begotten and borne in loyall Marriage.

The Order of the Starre: Instituted at Paris by King Robert, sirnamed, The Deuout. In the yeare 1022.

CHAP. II.

Of the Order of the Starre.

HEe haue seene in the precedent Treatise, the Crowne of France to change from the Ligne of the Merouingians, into the Ligne of the Carolouingians. In this whereof we are now to speake, we shall behold it fastened to a chaine of Diamonds in Cælum Empirium, and placed fixedly on the head of Hugh Capet, Father of Robert (the subiect of this discourse) to continue, euen to the Worlds end, as proper inheritance to them of his Bloud and Ligne.

The originall and descent of Capet questioned.

Most part of Moderne Historians, doe put to Compromise, the Originall and descent of the said Hugh Capet: because they would deriue him from that baddе branch Vitichinde, or Witikind the Sesne, that is to say, a Saxon by Nation, against whom our Emperour Charlemaigne made warre so long a time. And that of him descended Robert the Saxon, Graund-father to the said Capet; who by force and violence possessed himselfe of the Crowne of France, against Charles of Lorraine, Vncle to Lewes the fift, last King of Charlemaignes descendants, as they say.

Fables inuented only to disturbe the peace of France.

This his muddie and rustie opinion, worme-eaten with age, yet raised vp in our times, by infinite mercinarie pennes, to trouble the peace of France with their their mustie pretensions. In like manner, that a certaine Bourgongnon, named of S. Iulian, (by a new Paradox) would make it to be credited, that the same Capet conceiued birth of an other Hugh, the published bastard Sonne of Lothaire the second, whom Sigibert vnder the yeare 886. writeth to haue his eies pluckt out, and was then shorne Monke in the Abbey of Prum in Flanders, where he ended his daies, without leauing any issue. Hugo Filius Lotharij Regis ex Waldradi pellice, paternum Lotharingiæ regnum rebellando assequi sperans, ab Henrico excæcatur, & nouissime in Monachum Prumiæ attondetur. If Hugh Capet had beene borne of this Bastard to King Lothaire, and of Waldreda his Concubine: the said Capet neuer would (so soone as he saw himselfe established in the Kingdome of France) haue published the Decree against the Bastards of our Kings, obserued yet to this day, without any contradiction.

An exact Order set downe against the bastards of kings.

Capet hauing obserued the faults in the State, concerning Kings his Predecessors, that the aduancement of their Bastards had alwaies beene the cause of troubles in France, hauing equally taken part with the Legitimate; yea, and exalted to the Royall Throne, as Lewes and Carloman, Bastards of the Stammerer: he ordained,

That thence-forward, I uery Bastard should not only be reiected from the Crown; but likewise from auouching the Sir-name of France.

And to manifest the obseruation of this holy Ordinance, it is sixe hundred yeares and more since it was published; and it is not read, That any Bastard of France, or issued or descended from the Sonnes of France, hath been legitimated and allowed. But John Count of Dunois, Bastard Sonne of Monsieur Lewes of France, Duke of Orleans, who for his great and worthie seruices done to the Crowne, was by the Generall States of France (assembled by command of King Charles the seuenth, called the victorious) declared Legitimate, and he and his descent proclaimed Princes, and all their rancke assigned immediatly after the Princes of the Bloud.

Concerning the descent of the House of Lorraine.

The same Authour of S. Iulian (supported by the Arch-Deacon of Verdun, misled with the same Doctrine) hath continued the descent of the Illustrous house of Lorraine, from Father to Sonne of the said Charles of Lorraine. And yet notwithstanding, it is a matter most certaine, that Otho, only Sonne to the said Charles of Lorraine, died without Children. Which hath made a great Ligne, described at large by the Authour of the Genealogie of S. Arnoull of Mentz, who liued vnder the Reigne of the good King S. Lewes, as it is described by himselfe. But returne we to the Originall of Hugh Capet, according to truth.

The Fragment of Maires of the Pallace of France, deriued from the Abbey of Fleury; Paulus Diaconus, in his Treatise of the Bishops of Mentz; Theganus, Coadiutor to the Arch-Bishop of Treuers, and all the auncient Annalists of Germanie and France, by a common consent doe instruct vs: That the two famous Families of the Carlouingians, and of the Capets, are descended of Ansbert the Senatour, Lord of the Auncient House, and whose Predecessors, at such time as the Romaines gouerned the Gaules, had beene Senatours and Gouernours of Austrasia, afterward named Orientall France. They erre then, that make this Ansbert the Senatour to be Auberon, the Graund-sonne to Clodion, King of France: For this Ansbert was of the Gaules Nation, sirnamed (but very vnconueniently) the Romaine.

Anchises the Father of Æneas.

This Ansbert was issued from an House so Auncient, that to know the prime Originall thereof, and to gratifie the same: it is referred to the Troyan Anchises, the Father of Æneas, the pretended Founder of the Romaines. All these Fables let vs leaue them.

Clothaire the Great, King of all France.

The truth of this Genealogie speaketh, that this Ansbert, sirnamed the Senatour, was Maire of the Pallace of Austrasia, who had to wife Blitilda, daughter to the King of all France (as well Westrienne, as Neustrienne, and Bourgongne.) Clothaire the Great, second of the name, only Sonne to Chilperick and Fredegonde. It is the same Clothaire, represented on the Frontispiece of the Church at Paris, holding an Apple or Ball in his hand (according as the Romaine Emperours are figured) to shew, that he was the only King of all France.

Of

Of this Marriage of Ansbert and Blitilda, was borne Arnauld, Maire likewise of the Pallace of Austrasia, Father to S. Arnoull, Bishop of Mentz.

Arnulph restorer of the Abbey of S. Denis in France.

The said Saint Arnulph, before hee became a Bishop, was Gouernour to King Dagobert, first of the name (Restorer of the Abbey of Saint Denis in France) to whom he was Cousine Germaine, in regard of his Grand-mother Blitilda, and by him created Maire of the Pallace of Austrasia; in place of Sadragesilus, made Duke of Aquitaine. Saint Arnulph had to wife Doada, daughter to a Duke of Saxonie, after whose deceasse, hee tooke holy Orders, and so became Bishop of Mentz. The Fragment of Maires of the Pallace, saith; Fuerunt Maiores Domus ex quibus Generatio Regalis processit. Primus quidem Ansbertus Senator, qui ex Blithilde filia Clotharij, genuit Arnoldum patrem Sancti Arnulphi, tandem Metensis Episcopi, qui genuit Anchisem patrem Pipini.

Saint Arnulph had three Sonnes by Doada the Sesne, or Saxon, to wit, Anchises, Walachises, and Clodulphus; according as we learne by Paulus Diaconus, before alledged, in these words. Arnulphus ex nobilissimo, fortissimoque Francorum Æmmiatestortus, ita Dei Ecclesiæ præfuit, vt & Palatij moderator sub honore Maioris Domus existeret. Hic iuuentutis suæ tempore ex legitimi matrimonij copulâ tres filios procreauit; Anchisum, Walachisum, & Clodulphum.

Anchises, eldest Sonne to Saint Arnulph, had to wife Begga, sister to Saint Gertrude de Niuelle in Brabant, daughter to Pepin Heristell the Auncient, a great and powerfull Lord in Austrasia. Of which marriage was borne Pepin, Maire of the Pallace of Austrasia, called le Gros (for then and in those times, men had no other sir-names, but of their imperfections, or vertues, as well of the minde, as body) by reason of his fat and great corpulence.

The reason of sir-names in elder times.

Pepin the Auncient, had beside two daughters, a sonne named Grimoald, Maire of the Pallace to Sigibert, King of Austrasia, which he possessed by his Maire. And being himselfe without Children; he adopted (as his Sonne) Hildebert, Sonne to Maire Grimoald.

Hildebert son to Grimoald.

After this adoption (which was done in the West parts, by handling the beard and Haire of the adopted Sonne, and in the East, by putting on his shirt) Sigibert had a Sonne, named Dagobert, whom Grimoald and his Sonne Hildebert (after the death of the King his Father) excluded forth of his Country into Scotland, where he was shorne a Monke, so that no more speech was heard of him. And in his place, Hildebert was elected King of Austrasia, a Kingdome whereof he had no long enioying: because Archambauld (Erceballdus) Hildebert choosenking of Austrasia. ure and Count (that is to say, Gouernour of Paris, Founder of the Chapell of S. Christopher in the Citie) vnder King Clouis, second of the name, was against those pettie Kings and Tyrants, slew Hildebert in the field, and brought Grimoald prisoner to Paris, where he was executed for his fellonies. And so, the whole ample succession of Pepin Heristell, fell to his daughter Begga, wife to Ansegises. For this cause Paulus Æmilius calleth her the only daughter; as she was from the death of her Father, and of the profession of her holy Sister S. Gertrude.

Pepin le Gros, sonne to Ansegises and Begga, was Maire of the Pallace of Austrasia, after the death of Martine, his Cousine Germaine by the Fathers side. He espoused Plectrude, and of her begat two sonnes, Drogo, that is Dreux, the young; and Grimoald, whom he made Maire of the Pallace of Neustria that was Occidentall France, whereof, Paris was the Capitall Citie, and position of the eldest; as Orientall France, called Westria, was that of the youngest.

The two sons of Pepin le Gros, and their portions.

Moreouer, he had by Alpaida, his Concubine, sister to Dodon (who stiled himselfe Maire of the Pallace of Austrasia, and who caused Saint Lambert of Liege to suffer Martyrdome) Charles, sir-named Martell (subiect of the Discourse of the Order of the Gennet) who hauing exterminated the legitimate sonnes of his Father, and published (as King) Theodorick de Cheeles, incapable to hold the Crowne of France: was made Duke, Prince of the French, and their King in effect.

Charles Martell maried Bertha, sir-named with the Great or Polte foote, daughter to Martine, Maire of the Pallace of Austrasia, his Cousine, sister to Childebrand and Colonell of the French Infanterie, as we haue said in the precedent Chapter. In this marriage he had Pepin le Bref, called and sir-named the Dwarfe, or little man in regard of his small stature: And Carloman, who yielded himselfe to be a Monke at Mont Cassin in Italie, being frghited with the report of his Fathers damnation. The Auncient Annalist saith; Carolus Martellus genuit Pipinum Nanum, & Carlomannum post Monachum.

The birth of Pepin le Bref, sir named the Dwarfe or little man.

Pepin the Dwarfe, otherwise called the little man, married Bertrada, daughter to the Emperor of Constantinople Heraclius, by whom he had two sons & one daughter named Gisla, Abbesse of Argentueil, in Latin Gemes, about two leagues from Paris, of whom Aimoinard speaketh. He had by a Concubine other Children, among which were Gilan, Arch-bishop of Rouen, and Grifon, whose eies were caused to be pluckt out, by his Brethren Charles and Carloman; because he would not liue in peace, but raised still new troubles in France. Theganus, in the life of Lewes the Debonnaire, saith. Sanctus Arnulphus cùm esset in iuuentute Dux genuit Ansegisum Ducem; Ansegisus Dux genuit Pipinum Seniorem & Ducem (the word Senior in our Auncient Annalists, is not alwaies to be vnderstood the auncient or elder, but signifieth Lord also. In the Oathes of Hommage and fidelitie; Seniori meo Regi promitto, &c.) Pipinus Senior, & Dux genuit Karolum Seniorem, & Ducem: Karolus Senior & Dux genuit Pippinum quem Stephanus Pontifex consecrauit, & vnxit in Regem. Pippinus Rex genuit Karolum quem Leo Papa Romanus consecrauit & vnxit in Imperatorem. Ansegises was Father to Pepin le Gros, Father of Charles Martell, Father of Pepin le Bref (sacred the second time by Pope Stephen, at S. Denys in France) Father of Charles the Great, and of Carloman, who after the death of King Pepin their Father, were elected and Sacred Kings of France; to wit, Charles in the Church of Noyon, at the entrance whereof (on the North side) is to be seene an auncient Table, which representeth the said Sacring: and Carloman at Soissons. The Chronicle of Laureshеim, saith; Pippini Regis Filii Carolus, & Carolomanus consensu omnium Francorum Reges creati, & Carolus Noviomago Ciuitate, Carolomanus in Suessiona insignia Regni susceperunt. The raigne of Carloman became in short time to be quite extinct: But for

The marriage and issue of Pepin le Bref.

The true Genealogie or descent of Charles Martell.

Charlemaigne, he had a Sonne, Lewes the Debonnaire, first of the name, King and Emperour, Father of Lothaire, Emperour, King of Italie.

Lewes, King of Bauaria; And

Charles the Baulde, King of France, and Emperour, Father of Lewes the Stammerer, second of the name, King of France, and Emperour, who marrying in the concluding of his daies, had by Adeleida, that is Alix, sister to the King of England, a Sonne Posthumus, named Charles the Simple, third of the name, King of France, in whom ended the Greatnesse of the House of Charlemaigne. The said Stammerer had by Ansegarda, his Lady in amorous embracements (before they were married) two Bastards, Lewes and Carloman, who being come to age at the death of their Father; vsurped perforce the Crowne of France, and stiled themselues Kings.

Charles the Simple borne after his Fathers death.

Charles the Simple, so named in regard of his deiected spirit, had to wife Ogina, daughter to Elstan, King of England, and of her begot Lewes, sir-named of Beyond the Sea, because he was nursed in England. This Lewes the fourth, espoused the eldest daughter to the Emperour Otho the first (eldest sonne to Henry, the Fowler or Bird-catcher, Emperour, and Duke of Saxonie) named Herberga: by whom he had two Sonnes, Lothaire, King of France in number, and Charles who was Duke of Lorraine, making himselfe Tributarie to the Emperour, and a mortall enemie to the French.

Why he was called Charles the Simple.

Henry the Bird-catcher.

Lothaire left Lewes the last, fift of the name, but last King of France, of the descendants of Charlemaigne; whose Ligne failed in the said Lewes, blamed with the sir-name of Loyterer, or Doe nothing, who reigned but one yeare. Et hoc mortuo sine liberis translatum est Regnum ad Hugonem Capetum Filium Hadeuuidis, so saith our ancient Annalist. You behold here the descendants of Ansegises, eldest sonne to Arnulph of Mentz: Let vs now speake of the younger Sonne, of whom are descended the most Christian Kings of France, in the third Ligne, which reigneth happily at this present.

Clodulphus the third sonne (for the second was of the Church) of S. Arnulph of Mentz, had to wife Amalbertha, daughter to a Count of Brabant, and of her begat many Children. After whose decease (following the steps and example of his Father) he yielded himselfe to the Churches seruice, and was Bishop of Mentz.

His eldest sonne Martin was Duke, that is to say, Gouernour of Austrasia (as his Father formerly had beene) intimately affected for his vertues, by Sigibert, King of Austrasia, sonne to Dagobert the first. After whose death, and of his Maire Grimoald, and his sonne Hildebert, the people of Austrasia deuided the power of the Maire of the Pallace into two parts, in sted of one: electing Martin, sonne of Clodulphus, and Pepin le Gros, both Cousins Germane by the Fathers side. These two Maires were summoned by Ebrouin, Maire of the Pallace to Theoderick, King of Neustria vnder colour (and his Maire in effect) to obey him. Vpon their refusall, he met them in Armes, neere to Laon in Laonnois, where the two Cousins were vanquished, Pepin saued himselfe by flight; but Martin remaining Prisoner, was slaine (in cold bloud) by Ebrouin, who would needes be sole Maire in all France. As he did the like to Lendegisilus, Maire of the Pallace, and Count of Paris, after the death of Archembauld, Founder of S. Christophors Church in the Citie of Paris. Afterward, Ebrouin was slaine by Hermenfroy, a French Gentleman: as a iust punishment inflicted on him, for so many cruelties by him committed, on the Princes and great Lords of France, from time to time.

Martin, eldest sonne to Clodulphus, eldest sonne to Clodulphus Duke of Austrasia.

Martin, eldest sonne to Clodulphus, espoused Beatrix, daughter to the Count and Gouernour of Ardenne, who was named Ebo, and by her he had diuers Children, the eldest whereof was Childebrand, Duke of Austrasia, Cousine Germaine to Pepin le Gros, Father of Charles Martell, and Mary de Bertha, sister to the said Childebrand, which is the reason, why the Continuer of Saint Gregorie Victor of Tours, and Gaguin, doe call Childebrand, Father of Charles Martell. And this gaue subiect to Du Tillet, to mistake himselfe, and say, that the fore-named Childebrand was brother to Pepin le Gros; and to Nicholas Gilles in his Annals of France, to call him Vncle by the Mothers side to Charles Martell. If hee would be edited, he should say, that this Bertha, sister to Childebrand, was wife to Errors committed by some Historians concerning Charles Martell.

Pepin le Gros, which he can no way finde: becauſe he had none but Plectrude, and therefore he ſhould not reade him Maternall Vncle to the Children of Martell, to whom he was Brother in Law, and Couſine by the Fathers ſide. This Childebrand ſucceeded in the honours of his Father, as well as in his valiancie. For he is renowned by all our Hiſtorians, for his dexteritie in managing Armes, whereof he made good apparance in the battaile of Tours, againſt the Sarazine Abdirame, where that great Thunderbolt of warre Martell (as Paulus Æmilius ſaith) ordaining and diſpoſing his Armie; vndertooke himſelfe to conduct the horſe-Troupes, and gaue that of the French Infanterie to Childebrand his Couſine and Brother in Law, Colonell of the ſaid Infanterie. Alſo, he had the honour of that victorious day; and, for recompence of his vertue, was firſt honoured (after the Chiefe) with The Order of the Gennet. After the ſaid battaile, the ſame Childebrand was ſent againſt Athimus, the Sarrazine Ammirant, who had poſſeſſed himſelfe of Gothia and Prouence. He ſhut him vp in the Citie of Auignion, famous in thoſe daies, for the ſtrength of her Scituation; he made it French, and conſtrained Athimus to ſaue himſelfe by the Roze (ſo did they call the Riuer Rhoſne in Auignion and Prouence) and flie to Narbona.

Thierry Count and Gouernor of France.

Thierry was the only Sonne to Childebrand, nouriſhed from his youngeſt yeares, in the Court of his Couſine by Father and Mother, Charlemaigne, by whom he was made Count, and Gouernour of France.

The Voiage into Spaine of Charles the Great.

DVring the voiage of Charles the Great into Spaine, the Seſnes (according to their wonted manner) reuolted from their obedience ſworne to the Kings of France: being incited to doe ſo, by Witichind, a Daniſh Lord, dwelling in Saxonie. Charlemaigne at his returne, in the beginning of Summer, held his Parliament in France (which is to be vnderſtood of Orientall France, in the Annales of Germanie) hauing paſt the Rhine at Cologne, he came to the Spring of the Riuer of Leppe, where his Tents and Pauillions were erected. And there he held his Generall Parliament, in the yeare 782. which being ended, and the Ambaſſadours of Denmarke and Hungaria diſpatched; he repaſſed the Rhine, and returned into the Gaules, the Neuſtrian France.

A Parliament helde by Charles the Great in his Tents.

Vpon this his returne, the Seſne witichind, who the yeare before had ſheltred himſelfe in Denmarke, his naturall Countrey: came backe againe into Saxonie, once more to make the people reuolt againſt Charles: to whom (at the ſame time) newes were brought, that the Sclauonians and Sorabes, inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Saltz and the Elbe, were entred into Armes, to forrage the Marches and confines of Saxonie and Thuring, fiering euerie where.

Speedily he expedited thence Adalgiſus his Chamberlaine; Geilon, Count of his Stable; and Conrard, Count of his ſacred Pallace (ſo in auncient times were called the Court and Caſtle of our Kings, as well during the firſt as ſecond Ligne of our Kings, Why then ſhould not we vſe the ſame now?) Hincmarus, Arch-biſhop of Rheimes, in the Epiſtle which he wrote to the King and Emperour Lewes the Stammerer, for ordaining and ruling his Court, ſpeaking of the Pallace of our Kings vſeth theſe tearmes (Sacrum Palatium, Sacrum Regnum) whom he commanded to take with them the Orientall French, and the Seſnes vnder his obedience, to checke the forwardneſſe of the Sorabes.

The Sacred Pallace an ancient name in France.

When they were entred on the Confines of Saxonie; they found all the Seſnes in Armes, conducted by Witichind, and readie to run vpon thoſe parts of France, which were the gouernment of Thierry of Auſtraſia. Wherefore, they were conſtrained to leaue the Sorabes in peace, to deale with a much neerer enemie, and ſo marched with the Orientall French, to encounter the Seſnes where they were then encamped.

Thierry met them at the entrance of Saxonie.

At the entrance of Saxonie they met Thierry, who came with his forces before the Emperours Lieutenant, of whom Paulus Æmilius termeth him to be a neere kinſman, and to whom (in qualitie of a Prince of the Bloud) appertaine the command of the Armies. The Annaliſt of Laureſheim, vnder the yeare before dated, ſaith, Quibus (Legatis) in ipſâ Saxoniâ obuiauit Thedericus Comes, Propinquus Regis cum ijs copijs quas auditâ Saxonum defectione, raptim in Ripuriâ congregare potuit. Thierry gaue them councell to ſend firſt, and (with all diligence) to diſcouer by Spies, in what place the Saxons were, to the end they might the better aſſaile them; if commodiouſneſſe of the place, and his owne ſeating, would well permit it. The Councell being allowed for good, the chiefe leaders went in companie ſo farre as to the Mountaine of Sontall, on the North ſide whereof, the Seſnes had planted their Campe. Thierry hauing ordered his Campe, in the ſame place where he was arriued; Adalgiſus, Geilon, and Conrard (to engirt this Mountaine) paſſed by another way beyond the Riuer, where they incamped with their Squadrons. And there calling a Councell, they concluded among themſelues; to ſet vpon the enemie, without any knowledge giuen to Thierry (to whom the Conſtable Geilon bare deadly enuie, for the intendence and ſuperioritie of Commanding) as fearing, leaſt the glory and honour of victorie, which they accounted ſure in their owne poſſeſſion, ſhould be attributed to him.

The diſcretion of a prouident Commander.

Ambition and enuie hauing made theſe Chieftaines reſolute for battaile, they prepared themſelues for fight: marching (neuertheleſſe) in very bad order, as if they were to meddle with an enemie full of deſpairing feare, ready for retreate and flight; and not encamped on firme footing, or reſolued to ſell his skinne at a deare rate. On the ſpurre they galloped into the enemies Armie, and there prepared themſelues for pillage: whereas, on the contrarie, the enemie attending them with a ſetled determination; encloſed them on all ſides in ſuch ſort; that the moſt part of them periſhed by the edge of the ſword, very few remained, who got into the Campe of Thierry, which was on the other ſide of the Mountaine.

In this Battaile the loſſe was very great, in regard, that the chiefe Commanders loſt their liues, to wit, Adalgiſus and Geilon, foure Counts, and many great Lords, to the number of twentie. Vpon theſe ſad tidings, Charles himſelfe marched immediatly to the Field, with the Armie of Thierry; entred into Saxonie, called before him the principall Perſons of the Seſnes, and made enquirie for the chiefe Leaders of the Rebellion. All laid the fault on Witichind, who (after this ouerthrow) fled for ſafetie into Denmarke, according to his wonted manner. Charles, in reuenge of this diſhonour done him, diſcharged his anger on foure thouſand and fiue hundred Seſnes, attainted and conuinced of diſloyaltie, all which were beheaded in one day. Cum Witichindum tradere nequirent, eo quod re Perpetrata ad Normannos ſe contulerat, cæterorum, qui perſuaſioni ſuæ mo-tum gerentes, tantum facinus peregerunt vſque ad quatuor & quinquaginta millia traditi, & ſuper Alaram fluuium in loco qui Ferdi vocatur, iuſſu Regis omnis vnâ die decollati ſunt. After this reuenge ſo taken, Charles went and paſſed the Winter, as alſo the Feaſts of Chriſtmas and Eaſter at Thion-Ville, on the Frontiers of Luxembourg: giuing the gouernment of Saxonie to his Couſine Thierry, who (after that time) was Sir-named the Saxon. Yet with this condition, that foure yeares after, to wit, An. 786. (Witichind, and the moſt part of the Seſnes being ſubmitted to Charlemaigne, and embracing the Chriſtian faith) the ſaid Thierry ſhould take to wife Iutha, the only daughter to Witichind, ſir-named the Saxon: who thenceforward liued peaceably with his two ſonnes, of whom are deſcended the Dukes of Saxonie, which reigne to this day.

The Gouernment of Saxonie giuen to Thierry.

The deſcent of the Saxon Dukes.

Charlemaigne ſent the ſame Thierry (as his Lieutenant Generall) into Hungaria, to warre vpon the Hunnes, in the yeare 792. For, hauing deuided his Armie into two parts, Partem Exercitus Thederico Comiti, & Meginfredo Cubiculario (marke how the Annaliſt of Laureſheim maketh this Prince of the Bloud, to march before Meinfroy the Great Chamberlaine, and other Officers of the Crowne of France) committens, eos per Aquilionarem Danubij ripam iter agere iuſſit: Ipſe cum parte quam ſecum retinuit, Auſtralem eiuſdem fluminis ripam Pannoniam petiturus occupauit.

Ansbert the Senatour, his Predeceſſours and deſcendants, haning borne for Armes De Gueulles à trois Aigles d'Or, colour and mettail of the Romaine Emperor Pepin le Bref, whom the Genealogie of S. Arnulph of Metz calleth Pepinum Numinum, hauing bin exalted and Sacred King of the French, by vniuerſall conſent of the States of the Kingdome (that is to ſay, of the Church, and of the Nobilitie) tooke them of France, that is to ſay E'Eſcu d'Azur ſeme de Fleurs de Lys d'Or, colour and mettall of France, forſaking the three Eagles, which his Predeceſſours had carried.

The Armes of Prince Thierry permitted by Charlemaigne

And the ſame Charlemaigne permitted to Prince Thierry, by ſir-name of Auſtraſia, as his Predeceſſours were; to forſake the auncient Armes of the Familie, and to beare De Gueulles au Raiz pommette & florence d'Or, à la bordure de France: Armes which were retained from the time of Hugh Capet, who bare De France ſans nombre; ſo followed by the Kings his Succeſſors, euen to Charles the ſixt, Qui les vemt à Trois Fleurs de Lys.

Iſſue of the marriage of Thierry with Iuthæ.

In the marriage of Thierry, Count of Saxonie (that is to ſay, Gouernour) with Iuthæ were borne a Sonne and Daughter; to wit, Hermingarde, firſt wife to our King and Emperour Lewes the Debonnaire; and by this marriage was renewed the alliance betweene the deſcendants of the two Brothers Anſegiſes and Clodulphus. The Son was named Robert, called the Strong and Valiant, alſo ſir-named the Saxon, becauſe hee was borne in Saxonie. Our King and Emperour Charles, ſecond of the name, and nicknamed the Baulde (The People is the ordenarie Godfather of Princes, whom they baptize with a Sir-name of their perfections and vertues of minde or body; as the Wiſe; the Valiant or Hardie; the Great, &c. as contrariwiſe, with imperfections; the Simple; the Stammerer; the Lame or Crookt backt; the Leaprous; the Good or Bad; the Blacke; the White; the Wrie-neckt; the Lewde; the Wretch; the Sullen or Dogged, and ſuch like.) Sonne to Lewes the Debonnaire, and Iduith his ſecond wife; cauſed the ſaid Robert the Strong to come into France, to ſerue as a Bulwarke or defence againſt the Daniſh and Norman Rouers or Pirats, who iſſuing from Scandinauia, ſpoyled the coaſts of the Ocean Sea, all along Piccardie, Normandie, Bretaigne and Aquitaine.

This Nation (then being Pagans and Infidels) began to ſhew themſelues (immediately after the death of our Great Clouis) vpon the Marches and confines of Auſtraſia, conducted by a Leader, whom the Archbiſhop of Tours S. Gregory Victor, in his Hiſtorie of France, calleth Cochilarius: who hauing carried his buſineſſe but badly in this firſt proceeding, continued ſome while afterward in quiet, without ſeeking his fortune any where elſe.

The inhumain cruelty of Pirates & Rouers

Vnder the Reigne of Charles the Baulde, thoſe Normans, that is to ſay, People of the North, (acknowledged vnder the name of Danes) returned to roue on the coaſtes of France, with moſt barbarous cruelty. They preſumed principally on the Marches of Bretaigne, wonne the mouth of the Riuer of Loire, and vpon a Saturday, in the yeare of Grace, Eight hundred fiftie three, they ſurprized the Citie of Nantes, maſſacred inhumainely the Biſhop and Prieſts, ſacked the Citie: and in the ſame furie, put to fire and pillage, them of Angiers and Tours, returning loaden with moſt wealthie booties to their Countrey in the North. So they left France as then for a time in quietneſſe; yet troubled afterward againe by the ſame wicked Nation, who miſerably forradged the Prouinces of Touraine and Poicton.

The reaſon why Prince Robert was called into France.

For aſſurance whereof in following times, and to repreſſe theſe Norman Pyrates, enemies (and riciprocally hated) of all Nations: our King Charles the Baulde, cauſed to come from Saxonie into France, this Prince Robert his Couſine, then eſteemed (ſo ſaith Paulus Æmilius) for the moſt valiant Gentleman, among all the other of his time. Hee came accompanied with his three Sonnes, Thierry, Eudes and Robert; beſide a good number of Gentlemen and Saxon Souldiours. The Baulde gaue him Anion, in title of an hereditarie Countie, to him and his deſcendants, and the name of Marqueſſe on the Coaſtes of Bretaigne. Fecit eum Præfectum littoris Armorici, ſay the Annaliſts of thoſe times. And concerning this Countie Countie of Anion, it is to be noated, that Anion had (in former times) bin deuided into two Gouernments, by title of Counties, to wit, the Countie of Anion beyond Maienne, whereof Angiers was the capitall Citie, and the ordenary dwelling of the Count; and the other on this ſide Maienne, the principall place whereof was Chaſteau-Neuf. The Annales of Anion (ſtuffed with Fables and old wiues tales, as well as ours) doe ſay, that to the Countie of Anion beyond Maienne, belonged Counts from all antiquitie. But that on this ſide Maienne, was held by the Kings of France, and giuen by our King Charles the Baulde to Robert: who afterward (ſo ſaith John de Bourdigne) for defence and tuition of the Kingdome, againſt the furie and infidelitie of the Normans, then Pagans likewiſe, was made Count of Paris.

Anion deuided in two Counties.

This Riuer of Maienne, which paſſeth by Laual, Chaſteau-Gontier and Angiers, and which it thwarteth in the midſt; is called by the Poet Lucane in his deſcription of the Gaules, Maduana, in theſe fiue Verſes, which are not found in the impreſſions of Paris and Lions, but in a Manuſcript, as wee haue ſaid in the former Booke.

Pictones immunes ſubigunt ſua rura: nec vltra,
Inſtabiles Turones circunſita caſtra coercent,
In ripis Maduana tuis marcere peroſus
Andus, iam placidâ Ligeris recreatur ab vndâ.
Inclita Cæſareis Genabos diſſoluitur alys.

In the yeare eight hundred ſeauentie fiue, the ſame Normans (being lickoriſhly longing after more French booties) made another new apparance on the Coaſtes of Bretaigne. For reſiſtance whereof, Marqueſſe Robert of Anion, hauing to aide and ſuccour him the Duke and Gouernour of Aquitaine Lord Ranulphe, gaue them Battaile: but the ſaid two Commanders were ſlaine, and maſſacred in the Field by the Normans, who well mannaging their Victorie, went and ſurprized the Citie of Angiers. There were they as ſuddenly inueſted by Odo, that is, Eudes, ſecond Sonne to the Marqueſſe Robert, and compelled to yeelde to the mercy of Charles the Baulde; who (in ouer-much abounding clemencie) permitted, that they ſhould returne againe into Dania.

The fortunes of Thierry following Lothair King of Italie.

Thierry, eldeſt Sonne to Robert, following the Court and fortune of Lothaire, King of Italie, eldeſt Sonne of the Debonnaire by his firſt wife Hildegard (by whoſe death he was Emperour, and after him ſo was Charles the Baulde.) This Lothaire eſtabliſhed Thierry his Couſine, Duke and Gouernour of Bourgongne: which then (with Prouence) made part of the Kingdome of Italie, by the vnhappy partition of the Debonnaire. The Riuer of Saone deuided the French Bourgongne from the Italian, which ſince then hath bin named and called The French Countie, euen to this preſent. This Thierry left two Sonnes, to wit, Richard, Duke of Bourgongne (who was Father to Raoull, or Radulph, Duke of Bourgongne, and King of France, after Eudes and Robert his Couſins by the Fathers ſide) and Richard alſo, Duke of Bourgongne, whoſe onely Daughter was married to Otho (Brother of Hugh Capet) to whom ſhe brought in marriage, the Duchie of French Bourgongne, Eudes, otherwiſe called Odo, ſecond Sonne to Robert of Anion, ſucceeded in the honours and titles of his Father, but with farre greater happineſſe. For his valiancie, he was intirely affected by Lewes, the Stammerer, ſecond of the name, King of France and Emperour; who gaue him the Citie and Countie of Paris, with the title of honour and preheminence of Duke of the French, and Seneſchall, that is, Great Maiſter of France. And becauſe Charles le Gras, Sonne to Lewes King of Bauaria, in a brauado, and to deſpight him, had procured himſelfe to be crowned Emperour: the Stammerer lying on his death-bed (by his laſt will and teſtament) ordained and inſtituted the ſaid Eudes, his Couſine by the Fathers-ſide, Regent of the Kingdome of France, and Tutour or Guardian to the fruite which ſhould iſſue from the wombe of his wife Adelaida (that is, Alice) of England, ſhe being conceiued with childe foure or fiue moneths, if ſhee ſhould be deliuered of a Soune.

Eudes made Regent of France.

Declaring

Declaring manifestly by this gift of Gardian and Regent, that he did not acknowledge any other Prince in his Kingdome, neerer to succeede in the Crowne of France, then the said Eudes of Anion.

The birth of Charles the Simple.

Adelaida was deliuered of a Sonne Posthumus, which was Charles, called the Simple, because he had slender endowments of minde. In regard of his minoritie in yeares; Lewes and Carloman, Bastards to the Stammerer (whom he begot of a meane Damosell, named Ansegarda, that had the fauours of his youth) entitled themselues Kings of France: Reigned for a time, and are denominated in the List and Catalogue of Kings.

The Stammerers Bastards.

Arnulph the Bastard son of Carloman.

By the death of these two, Charles le Gras, Emperour, was called to the Kingdome by some French Lords: but being excluded by want of Iudgement, Arnoull or Arnulph, Bastard to Carloman, Son to Lewes King of Bauaria, was elected Guardian for the person of the said Charles le Gras his Vnckle; in place of whom he tooke the title of Emperour. Arnoull seeing himselfe Emperour; pretended the Regencie and Tutelage of the Simple, and stiled himselfe King of France.

No stranger King of France although a Prince of the Blood.

Against this Arnoull, the Noblemen of France opposed themselues, who neuer would acknowledge a strange Prince for their King, although he were of the Blood of France. So that by common consent, the French ordered with one accord, that Eudes Count of Anion, should Reigne ouer them, during the minoritie of Charles his Pupile. According to this agreement, Eudes was Sacred King of France, by Gautier, Archbishop of Sens. Against this Sacring, young Baldwine, Count of Flanders, made opposition, who maintained his right of preferrence, as being descended in direct Ligne from Charles the Baulde, Father of Iudith his Mother, Sister to Lewes the Stammerer. Notwithstanding all his reasons, he was payed with the money of France; from the Crowne whereof all Daughters are excluded, although they be naturall and legitimate; according to the fundamentall Salique Law of the Kingdome.

The Text of the Salique Law.

Successor Imperij Francorum Masculus esto.

Vnder the first and second Lignes of our Kings, Bastards haue rather bin admitted to the Crowne, then Daughters, and their legitimate Sonnes. Eudes dying, left the Crowne to the Simple, to whom it appertained by right naturall and diuine.

Robert, second of the name, Count of Paris and Anion, brother to Eudes, maintained against the Simple, and his pertakers; that the Crowne appertained to him, by the death of his Brother, as a Prince of the Blood, legitimate and naturall Heire to his Brother. Nor did the last words of Eudes hurt or preiudice him, for acknowledging Charles the Simple, to be by (good right) excluded from the Crowne, as well for his imbecilitie, as by consent of the generall States of France, who had adiudged to the said Eudes, that there was no right or due, to deprive the hereditarie rights of Succession, by renouncing them for the profit of a person, who had formerly bin sentenced as vnworthy and vncapable. Vpon which words, Robert ioyning effects to them, was Sacred King of France by Herue, Archbishop of Rheimes, and made so strong a League with his kinred and friends, that death it selfe could not alter nor dissolue it. For those which proceeded of his Linage, remained (very speedily) peaceable possessors of the Crowne of France: Robert hauing (as it were) sealed it with his death, and signed it with his Blood, being slaine (to maintaine his title) in a foughten Battaile, neere to Soissons, in the yeare of Grace 922. Charles the Simple (alwayes keeping that Sir-name) deriued but small benefit from this Cadmean Victory, being hated and despised of his owne people, for his little care of gouernment, in aduancing to the height of Fortunes-wheele, his Minnion Aganon, of base and meane qualitie, preferring him with the greatest Lords of France. Who forsooke him in such sort, that keeping him prisoner at Peronne, he died within foure yeares after his surprizall; compelled by old Hebert, Count of Vermandois (that kept him prisoner) to resigne his Crowne to Raoull or Rodolphe, Duke of Bourgongne, his God-sonne and Kinseman, who reigned some time.

Robert Sacred King of France time. Robert the second espoused the Sister to old Hebert, of whom he left a Sonne, named

Hugh the great Abbot, otherwise called the white Abbot, for reasons noated in the precedent Tract. Hee tooke to wife Haunida (that is Auoya) yongest daughter to the Emperour Henry the Bird-Catcher, Sister to Otho, Emperour, first of the name, and of Gerberga, wife to Lewes of Beyond the Seas, sonne of the Simple: so that the King and his Subiect were Brothers in Law by alliance. Hugh (neuertheleese) did not forbeare to maintaine the right, which he pretended to the Crown of France. This Hugh, had by his first wife Auoya, three Sonnes; as namely, Hugh Capet; Odo Duke of Bourgongne, and Henry, who by the decease of his brother Odo, became Duke of Bourgongne. In second marriage he espoused a daughter to Edward, King of England, sister to Ogina, wife to the Simple: and by her hee had a daughter, married to the Duke of Normandie, Richard sans Paur, Sir-named Long-Legges.

The issue of Hugh the great Abbot.

Hugh, Sir-named Capet, or Capouche, because he was wilfull and obstinate (eldest Sonne of Hugh the white Abbot, because he delighted to weare a white Gonnelle, and white Cloake) was by consent of the generall States of France, declared, published and Sacred King of Rheimes, in the yeare of Grace 987. as we haue elsewhere said.

Of Hugh Capet or Caroucha and his arising to be King.

And so the Crowne of France passed from the Ligne of Charles the Great, descended of Ansegises, eldest Sonne to S. Arnulphe of Mentz; to that of Martine, Maire of the Pallace of Austrasia, descended from Clodulphe, yongest Sonne to the said S. Arnulphe, and was rendered peaceably to his Family (which reigned happily) in the person of the said Hugh Capet, who rendered it firme and stable to Robert the Deuout his Sonne, and to his descendants: God appearing well pleased with this translation to the Ligne of Hugh Capet, which hath already continued in it selfe longer time, then both the other together.

The passage of the Crown of France from the Ligne of Charlemagne.

And this is the reason why William de Nangis, stopping the mouthes of the new Writers of our times (badly informed in our Historie, or purposely desiring to disguise truth, and obscure it with the vaile of lying) discourseth effectually, speaking of Hugh Capet: That hee was no Vsurper of the Crowne of France, but a legitimate Lord, and possessour thereof. Sed nec iste Hugo Regni inuasor, aut vsurpator alequaliter est iudicandus, quem ad tantæ dignitatem Regni proceres elegerunt, & euexerunt.

I let passe (vnder silence) the testimonie of the same Authour, speaking of Pope Innocent, who In Decretali suo Ludouicum sextum (that is Lewes le Gros) qui descendit ab isto Hugone adstruit processisse de progenie Caroli Magni, quod fiare non posset, si iste Hugo de eadem progenie non descendisset.

The same Author writeth in his Chronicle of Hugh the great Abbot, Father of Hugh Capet, who hauing caused to be brought into France, the bodies of S. Riquier and of S. Valery, to the Townes called by their names, and who, also to auoide the furie of the Normans, had transported them to S. Omer, in the Abbey of S. Berthin; S. Valery appeared to this Prince, and told him, that for the remembrance he had acknowledged of them; His Sonnes and Descendants should reigne in France vnto the seuenth Generation, that is to say, to infinite Ages. Ipsi Hugoni magno post hoc factum fuit reuelationem à sancto Valerico dictum fuit, quod propter hoc quod fecerat, eius Generatio esset ipsum in Regno Francorum vsque in septimam Generationem, id est, in perpetuum regnaret.

The apparition of S. Valery to Hugh the great Abbot.

Very idlely then doe those Writers (enemies to the peace of France) vse their mercenarie tongues, and corrupted pennes, to lay a false imposition vpon truth against which no one can iustly write, so saith the great Tertullian) affirming by their writings in our time: That Capet the Stranger (the Florentine Poet Dante deserueth no answere) vsurped the Crowne of France against Charles of Lorraigne, legitimate and naturall heire thereof. And that this vsurpation made contrary to all reason, of a Subiect against his Soueraigne Prince, could not hold any auaileable title of prescription, or lawfull possession; whatsoeuer immemorable length of time may be alleadged for it. Impertinent Iurists, well chosen and tried, to sustaine so bad a cause.

Dante the Florentine Poet.

What

What better title can all the Princes of the world haue, whereby to maintaine the posseſſion of their Eſtates, then vniuerſall conſent of their Subiects? That is a valuable title, which maketh preſcription againſt all ſuch as can call it in queſtion: being ioyned and annexed to an immemorable poſſeſſion and enioying, which is another title of good fidelitie, yea, euen to a Stranger Prince, were he called from the remoteſt parts of China. Noneſt vſurpator & inuaſor, quem ad Regiam dignitatem Regni Proceres euexerunt.

He is no vſurper or inuador that is called lawfully to the Crowne.

Impertinent is it by writing, to call Capet and his deſcendants, ſtrangers, thereby to bring Strangers into France, and ſo to faſten the Crowne thereof vpon their heads. And much more ſhameleſſe impudence is it, to make him (contemptibly) deſcended of a Baſtard, Hugh, the Sonne of Lothaire the ſecond, who gaue him the Dukedome of Bourgongne the higher, that is, La France Counte; and that this Hugh came to dwell in France, where hee was married, leauing a Sonne, named Robert, ſent by the Emperour Arnulphe, to defend the Kingdome of France againſt Norman Pirats: by whom (ſay thoſe vnnaturall French Writers) he was ſlaine in a foughten Battaile. And that the ſaid Robert was Sonne to Eudes, Duke of Bourgongne, who vſurped the Kingdome againſt Charles the Simple, and his Sonnes. Theſe are the tearmes of a pretended Plea, made (ſay ſome) by Lewes, eleauenth of the name, on the pretences of Mary of Bourgongne, eldeſt daughter to Charles the laſt Duke, brought to light at the beginning of the troubles excited in this Realme (vnder name of the Holy League, mad and furious) by a Bourgongnon, named of S. Iulian. Which diſcourſe is without approbation, and nameleſſe of any Aduocate or Proctor Generall, belonging to the ſaid Lewes the eleauenth, but truely worthie, and capable of the name of a Paradoxe, which it beareth for a fronteſpice. Neither is there any matter of truth in it, but where he ſaith in two paſſages, that this Hugh, the Sonne of Lothaire the ſecond, was not reputed legitimate, and from thence ſhould enſue a conſequence, more then moſt dangerous, againſt the honor and perſon of our Kings, deſcending from Capet. But in thoſe times then, was the reigne of falſe Prophets, wherein the Prince of darkeneſſe exerciſed his power on thoſe ſale-able ſoules; to the end, to cut and deuide in pieces (by Strangers Coyes) the Crowne of France.

The troubles of the vnholy League.

Very true it is, that in the yeare of Grace, eight hundred and tenne, Godfrey, a Daniſh Prince, came and coaſted on Friezland, with a Fleete of two hundred Shippes, burning and deſtroying the Iſlands thereof; ſo ſaith Meier in his ſecond Booke of the Annales of Flanders. In the yeare Eight hundred thirtie ſeauen, the Normans, neighbours to the Danes, made the like deſcent into Zealand, and the adiacent Iſlands, where they put all to fire and ſword. So that the Emperour Charles the Baulde, for aſſurance of the Coaſts on the Sea, in the yeare 863. erected Holland to be a Countie; and the firſt Count thereof was Thierry, who was likewiſe Surnamed the Frizone.

Godfrey a Prince of Denmarke.

Another returne of the Normans into France.

Yet notwithſtanding all this, the Normans left not their former courſes, but returned againe into France, in the yeare Eight hundred eighty foure, after the death of the King and Emperour Lewes the Stammerer, at ſuch time as Lewes and Carloman his Baſtards, tooke the title of Kings of France. Theſe two (being well ſtipended with money) bought of the Normans a Truce for twelue yeares, ſo that leauing France at reſt for a time: the ſaid Normans ioyned themſelues with the Danes, conducted by their chiefe Commanders Godfreye and Sigefroye. Being thus accompanied, they entred on the Lands of the Emperour Charles le Gras, and after they had pilled Piccardie, Cambreſis, Therouenne, Artois, Cleues, Guelders and Brabant: they tooke (by force) the Cities of Liege, Vtrecht, Tongres, Treuris, with Aix la Chappelle, from whence they ſet towards Mentz, to doe the like there.

Charles le Gras foiled in Battaile by the Normans and Danes, and forced to ſeeke their friendſhip

To checke theſe inſolent courſes of theirs, Charles le Gras marched in perſon againſt them, and gaue them Battaile, wherein he was vanquiſhed. So that he was conſtrained and forced, not onely to deſire their friendſhip; but alſo to giue them certaine parcels of Land, to make firme their dwelling in. And for the better aſſurance of theſe his new Gueſts, he gaue as wife to Godfrey, a choiſe Lady, named named Giſla, the Baſtard daughter of his deceaſed Couſine Germaine, Lothaire the ſecond; and for her Dowrie, he gaue the Countie of Friezland, ſo ſpeaketh our Annales, and them of Flanders.

This Lothaire the ſecond had married Thiethberga, a wife and vertuous Princeſſe, iſſued from the Blood of Charlemaigne. But ſhe diſtaſting him, becauſe hee kept a Concubine, called Waldrada: he grew mallicious againſt her, tearming her barren and vnfruitfull. So that hauing won to his part Gautier, Archbiſhop of Maugunce, and Thietgauld, Archbiſhop of Treuers: they pronounced ſentence of ſeparation, betweene Lothaire and his wife Thiethberga, he being permitted to marrie againe, as (very ſoone after) he did, eſpouſing his Concubine Waldrada. But the Pope then ſitting, declared a Nullitie of that marriage, excommunicating Lothaire and his Concubine; depoſing alſo from their Archbiſhopricks Gautier and Thietgaulde, who had time and leiſure enough, for better performance of their penance, ſo are the words ſet downe in our Annales.

Lothaire married his Concubine Waldrada.

Lothaire had by this Waldrada, the ſame Giſla, which was married to Godfrey the Dane, made Count of Friezland; and Hugh, of whom our great Writers will haue to deſcend, Robert the Strong, Count of Anion, and our Hugh Capet.

Giſla married to Godfrey the Dane.

This Hugh poſſeſſed himſelfe of a part of Lorraine, in thoſe times of farre greater extendure, then it is at this preſent. And to maintaine himſelfe in this vſurpation, and (by little and little) to impeach the French, from forcing him to leaue his prize; he moued his brother in law * Godfrey, to ſend and demand of the Emperour Le Gras, farre greater matters, then (by his owne knowledge) was likely he euer would yeelde vnto. Which ſerued him as a new ſubiect, to forrage France and Germanie againe, and better meanes for himſelfe, in the conſeruation of his Conqueſt, whereof hee promiſed to beſtow a part vpon his Brother in Law.

Hugh vſurped a great part of Lorraine.

* The Huſband to his Siſter Giſla.

Le Gras diſcouering the mallice and perfidious dealing of the Baſtard; made anſwere to the deputies ſent from Godfrey; that he deſired to ſee their Prince, to the end, he might the more ſufficiently content him. Godfrey ſet forward on the way, and the Emperour hauing prouided an ambuſh for him, by a Saxon Lord, named Henry; by the principall of his Court, being fallen in among them, was ſlaine in the place. Which wicked deede was reuenged on the ſame Henry, for he being come to the ſuccour of the Citie of Paris, beſiedged then by the Normans; was taken by them in a charge, and there inſtantly ſlaine, as is more at large declared in the Booke of the ſame Siedge.

Godfrey ſlaine treacherouſly by the Emperors procurement.

And as for the Baſtard of Hugh, being forſaken of his owne followers; he was betrayed, and brought before Charles le Gras, who cauſed him to be ſhut vp in a Monaſtery, his eyes being firſt pluckt out of his head. The Annales of Germany, and Sigibertus Gemblacenſis, vnder the yeare Eight hundred eightie ſixe. *Hugo filius Lotharij Regis ex Waldrada pellice paternum Lotharingiæ Regnum rebellando aſſequi perans, Godefrido Normannorum Duci, cui Soror ſua Giſla nupſerat, medietate affectati Regni promiſſa perſuadet, vt ab Imperatore Imperiales fiſcos ad libitum ſuum ſibi addi exoraret. Of the Baſtard Son of Hugh.

Hugh Capet then was not iſſued of Witichind the Saxon Stranger, nor of this baſtered Baſtard, as ignorants ſay: But a Frenchman by extraction and originall, as alſo a Prince, of the Noble blood of France, issued from the Counts of Anion and Maine, who made their abiding at Chasteau-Neuf in Anion, whose Tombes and Sepulchres are yet to be seene, with their Armes and Banners De Gueulles au Raiz pommettè, & Fleuronne d'Or, de huit pieces, à la Bordure de France, as we haue already said elsewhere.

Now concerning the Crowne of France, it appertained to the said Capet by three meanes.

Of three seuerall meanes, whereby the Crowne of France belonged to Hugh Capet.

First, because he was descended of Eudes, brother to Robert, Count of Anion, Sacred and Crowned King of France; whereof he was Regent, and Guardian to King Charles the Simple, as well by the Testament of the late King Lewes the Stammerer, Father of the said Simple; as by the consent generall of all the States of the Kingdome, by reason of want of gouernment in the Simple.

Secondly, because he was Son to Hugh the Great, Brother to Robert, Sacred likewise King of France, in the Church of Rheimes.

And thirdly, because he was issued of the auncient Princes of the blood, Cousin (in many degrees, as well by Father as Mother) from Pepin and Charlemaigne, and their Sonnes and descendants, as we haue said. So that being the prime Prince of the Blood; Charles of Lorraigne (meerely became a Stranger) the Crowne appertained to him.

Adde we hereto, that he was the wisest, and most iudicious Prince of all them in his time. And, for his rare vertues, he was wished, desired and requested of all the French people, as a sacred blessing sent of God from Heauen, to calme the tempests, troubles and disorders, which ouer-whelmed all France: whereof, by consent of the whole world, he was proclaimed King.

The beginning of the French Monarchie.

The Kings of the first Ligne, had begunne the Monarchie of France by franchise and libertie, retained it (very long time after) on the tearmes of duetie and obedience. But these bounds and limits were out-stept and changed, into all impunitie of doing euill. This first Franchise was supported, made firme and enabled, by sincerities of Religion; which saw it selfe disformed by abuse and Simonie.

Charlemaigne the reformer of Religion.

Charlemaigne the true Sonne of the second Race, by holy Ordenances (reported in his Capitularies) reformed the franchise of Religion; seruing as a Glasse or Mirrour to all them of his descent, for imitation of his example. But when they began to contemne it; it fell to the ground, without hope or meanes of restoring. For, leading dissolute liues; they abused Religion, possessed themselues of the Churches goods, to bestow them on their Hagmons, Women and Minnions. Yet, God did so farre suffer it, that the greatest men in the Kingdome, had the very best and richest Benefices: and, on their Reuenewes, they payed Armies, to make warre with their Kings, and (in the end) to suppresse them.

The wise and worthy gouernment of Hugh Capet.

God raised miraculously Hugh Capet, who, to become wiser; made profit of the later Kings bad behauiour; so that from the very entrance of his Reigne, hee appeased all troubles and disorders in the Kingdome. Yet not by Fire or Canterizing, but by a fairre milder way, that is to say; by politicall Lawes, and, through the obseruation of them, hee brought all (at the first) to former obedience.

He made the Law of Reuersions, and yonger Brothers portions; and that also, against alienating the demeanes of the Crowne. And, being able to doe no otherwise, he confirmed the Dukes and Counts in their Gouernements, which (of themselues) were become hereditarie to them; but yet with charge of seruice, and of continuing Liedge-men; and by these meanes he contented the Lords of the Kingdome.

A truely Noble minde in a King.

Hee discharged the people of all new Subsidies, and expelled from his Court dissolutions, superfluitie of habites and Feastes, corruption and selling of Court Offices, Flatterers, Bawdes, and councell of yong heads without experience.

In his time, his Court, and chiefely in himselfe, shined most wise and modest carriage in all actions. Power was maintained in the King; Iustice ruled euery where, here, fastened with a knot and bond (more then Gardian) of Peace. Religion was carefully kept; and the State affaires were mannaged by iudgement, and aduise of the most aged and wisest Councellers, with speedie expedition, the onely noate of admirable experience.

Hee forgot all reuenge, and pardoned the offences committed against him and his Predecessours. From him grew the remarkeable Apothegme: That the Kings of France will not meddle, in reuenging the enmities of the Counts of Paris, and of Anion.

Hee caused his Sonnes to be educated among them of the Nobilitie of the Kingdome; to the end, that being inured to the good and happie ayre of the Court, as also the obedience and seruice which they owe to their King: by degrees they might be nourished vp in Religion, which shined principally in the Court. For, to shew an example, among others, hee restored to the Abbyes of Saint Denys in France, of Saint Germain des Prez, and Saint Martin of Tours, the fruites and reuennues, whereof, hee, his Father and Grandfathers had (against all right) vsurped. So that hee serued as a Lanthorne or guide to the great Lords of the Kingdome, for doing the like, to the great good of the Gallicane Church. Whereto hee also caused to be restored, the goods of the Pagans Idoles, giuen by Charlemaigne, and whereof euery Gentleman (in his place of dwelling) was made Maister by right of correspondencie. And here you may behold the very words of his Ordenance, published throughout all the Prouinces of France.

The Proclamation published by Hugh Capet.

IN Dei nomine, omnibus præsentibus & futuris. Hugo Dei Gratia Francorum Rex. Abuses committed by great Officers of the Crowne.

The great Officers of the Crowne had abused their charges, and made profit of them, to the preiudice of the Kings their Maisters: so that being become more powerfull then they, euen in an instant, not onely they possessed themselues of the Prouinces of France; but also of their Kings persons. As was put in practise on those Kings, Charles the Simple, prisoner at Saint Quentin, and Chasteau Therry, and his Sonne Lewes of Beyond the Seas. Hugh Capet therefore made distinction of the Officers of the Crowne, from them about the person of Kings. Hee suppressed the Maires and Counts of the Pallace, burying their Offices honorably in the Royaltie, and in place of the Officers of the Houshold, Pallace Royall, and person of the King, preceding all other dignities; he caused them to be preceded by the Officers of the Crowne, whom hee instituted, to the end, that such as possessed the Kings person, might not also possesse the State. So that by this meanes, he planted an opposition or contradiction in his Court, to maintain (as it were by a counterpoize) the said Officers seuerally in their duties. He made the Maister of the Horse, chiefe Commander in his warres, and of his Armies: the Chancellor was the prime Officer of Iustice, and Pollicie in the Kingdome, as if he were the Lord chiefe Iustice.

Offices doubled on euery man in his degree.

On behalfe of the Nobilitie, and men of warre, which swarmed thorow France, as daily it happened during, and at the returne of the inciuile Warres, hee ordained and established Marshals in all the Prouinces; to haue a vigilant eye ouer the peoples tranquilitie, and roughly to chastise Theeues and Robbers on the wayes, pursuing them from one iurisdiction to another, with any regard of the territories. Henry, first of the name, yongest Sonne of Ca gaue ranke and title to Officers of the Crowne, and Marshals of France, wh power to command in the Armies, as also to leade and conduct them to war

The Peoples tranquilitie especially respected.

This was the first of the Kings of France, that submitted himselfe, as well to Iustice of his Parlement, as of his subalternate Iudges; establishing an Attorn Generall, to exercise in his name, and vndergoe iudgement and condemnation, well in causes which concerned his State, as in those of the subiects agai him. By this meanes, great men, and the Nobilitie were (by little and little) mild ly disarmed, and made familiar with Iustice; whereas before, all their actions h no other gouernment, but by force and violence, like to wilde beasts, and voi of reason.

The birth and originall of Leagues and factions in France.

And in regard that these great Lords of France, had the principall cha and superintendencie, for assembling the Nobilitie vnder their Banners, at times, and as often as they should goe to the warres, and that from thence grew the originall and birth of Leagues, factions and partialities in the land: C pet wisely ordained, that Bayliffes and Stewards of Prouinces (to whom it appe tained, to giue and lend the strong hand of Iustice) should likewise haue th charge for assembling the Nobilitie, and people of the Ban and Arriere-ba of France, and conduct them to Gouernours or Lieutenants Generals of th Prouinces. So that by this meanes, the Noblemen, Barons and Lords could not leuie a Banner, without leaue of the said Bayliffes and Stewards, who vnder the shaddow of exercising Iustice, resided in the Prouinces of their Iurisdictions, and thereby contained the Nobilitie within compasse of duetie,

The meanes of preseruing power in the Kings hand.

cutting off the spurres of all their complottings, and causing power to remaine in the Kings owne hand, without whose command, the Bayliffes were not per mitted to make any Muster, or leuye of Armes. So that (in time) the Baron became subiected to the Stewards and Bayliffes, and so (consequently) to Iustice Royall.

France was in a wofull condition when Hugh Capet recouered it.

And thus Hugh Capet (by admirable wisedome) redressed the affaires o France, when all was in decadence and confusion, hauing the sadde counte nance of Warre, as in a Chaos and commixture of infinite Lords, without any rule or pollicie. Hee solemnized principally the Feast of the three Kings, and ordenarily hee wore a Starre of Gold in his Bonnet; in memorie of that Starre, which guided and conducted them from the Easterne Indies, so farre as to Bethlehem, there to take knowledge of, and to worship the most Sacred Iesus of Life.

Robert the Deuout, Sonne to Capet.

Robert, the onely man of that name, a wise and deuout Prince, succeeded after his said Father Capet, and following his steppes; hee serued as an ex ample and mirrour to all the Princes of Christendome. For hee addicted himselfe to Pietie, and to erect and builde Churches, one in emulation of another; so saith (very notably) Glaber Rodolphus, in the Life of the said Robert.

Ego regnante contigit in Vniuerso pene Terrarum Orbe, præcipue tamen in Italia
& in Gallijs innouari Ecclesiarum Basilicas, licet plerèque decenter luctæ mi

The great Saint Denys Areopagita arriuing at Paris, had his first dwelling neere the Port of Saint Iacques (then this place was nothing but Woods, from the tit Pont, so farre as to the Suburbs of Saint Iacques, at this present) at the place by him named, The Schoole of the Greekes, Schola Græcorum, but now Saint Stephens the Greeks; the whole Vniuersitie being then a fielden and wooddie Wildernesse fit for solitude. During the space of twentie yeares, the time of his abiding at Paris, hee prouided diuers places of deuotion; at Saint Benoist le bien tourné in the Chappell of Saint Nicholas, Dedicated by him in honour of the most Sacred Trinitie, the ineffable mistrie whereof hee had learned by heare of the Apostle Saint Peter; and of his Tutour or Scholemaister Saint Paul. In memorie of whom hee builded a small Oratorie, frequented soone after by Saint Geneuiefue, Tutelarie Patronesse of the Parisians, at whose request our first Christian King Clouis caused a Church to be erected; where hee chose a buriall place for him and his, neerely ioyning to his Pallace, and on the foundation where he built the Abbey, at this day called of Saint Geneuiefue du Mont de Paris. Whereof S. Denys had (before) dedicated to the first Martyre S. Stephen, the place of his abiding; wherein he enstructed the youths of Paris, to take knowledge of the Faith of Iesus Christ.

The Idole of Mercurie ouerthrowne.

The fourth Oratorie was built by Saint Denys, in the same place where stood the Temple of Mercurie, whose Idole he ouerthrew by the signe of the Crosse. It is at his present Nostre Dame des Champs.

Hic errorum cumulus, hic omnis spurcitia,
Hic infœlix Populus gaudet idolatriâ,
Adorabat idolum fallacis Mercurij,
Sed vicit Diabolum fides Dionysij.

The Temple of Mercurie the chiefest at Paris.

For this Temple of Mercurie was the principall of all them which were at Paris:
hauing his actions reported by the fictions of Poets, most proper and commendable to the Parisians, who (among all other Nations of the World) euen of their owne naturall mindes, were capable of the Arts Liberall, Mechanicall, and the best Sciences, ouer which (by opinion of our Auncients) Mercurie is said to haue predominance.

Conuersion of Mercuries prophane Temple to a Church.

The Temple of whom was by the great Saint Denys (being prophane before) conuerted and changed to a Church, and, for holy deuotion, dedicated in honor of the Virgin Mary, said to be the Queen of Angels, and Princesse of heauen and earth, and such was the happinesse of Saint Denys, to see her mount vp to Heauen on the day of her Assumption; and by conference with her before her passage, he learned those admirable secrets, which are reuealed in his rare and diuine Writings. Hereof himselfe beareth testimonie, in the Tract which he wrote De diuinis nominibus. Concerning the change of that prophane place to Sacred, the Prose of S. Denys speaketh thus by conuersion.

Hic constructo Christi templo
Verbo docet, & exemplo.
Coruscat miraculis;
Turba credit, error cedit
Fides crescit, & clarescit
Nomen tanti Præsulis.

Concerning the Picture of the Virgin Mary.

By the portraiture of the Virgin Mary, holding her Sonne vpon her knee as it had formerly bin figured in the Primitiue Church, and not standing vpright, as ignorant Painters and Caruers haue represented her) S. Denys caused another to be drawne, on a small Stone, about a foote square in Diameter (Peint d'vn esmail de di- verses couleurs d Or, & d'Azur) which was to be seene not aboue two yeares since, fastened without the Church of Nostre Dame des Champs, on the Northside of the lesser Churchyard. But since, by reading the Antiquities of Pa- ris, newly re-imprinted (by the dilligence of the deceased Brother Iacques du Brueil, Monke of Saint Germain des Prez; the light for Learning to the Monasteries of France) the Intendant or Ouer-seer of this Church, vnderstood the Antiquitie of this excellent piece, and passed it from one extremity to another, causing it to be brought from a prophane place, and enclosed in the Conuent of the Carmeline Sisters. And instead of fastning it to some Pillar of the Church; either by grosse ignorance, or malitious enuie, the knowledge of that rare piece is taken from the Publique. This Stone is castellated within another of farre greater compasse, on the Basis whereof are engrauen these Verses in the Latine.

Siste Viator iter, Mariam reuerenter honora,
Nam fuit hac saxo primum depicta minori,
Quod medium spectas. At sculptum primitus, ædes
Et basilica tenet tanto de nomine dicta.

The Bishops See of Dionysius Areopagita

Saint Denys hauing purified this Temple of Mercurie, dedicated and consecrated it (as we haue said) to the Queene of Angels; and there he established his Episcopall Seate, and made his dwelling there all the remainder of his life, which was an hundred and twelue yeares. For Fescennius Sisinnius, perceiuing the fruit which this great Apostle made by his Preaching; after infinite torments and inflictions, which he caused him to endure, hee commanded his Braine-panne to be cleft with a Coopers Addis (as hee did the like to his Deacons Eleutherius and Rusticus) before the Idole of Mars, to whom they would not sacrifice and offer Incense.

The Martyrdome of S Dionysius, Eleutherius and Rusticus.

This Martyrdome happened at Mont-martre at Paris, in the yeare of Grace One hundred twentie and one, in the Pontificalitie of Pope Alexander the first, and Empire of Adrian the second: Auiola and Pansa, being then Consuls, according to the calculation of Cassiodorus. Cuspinian in his Annotations vpon the said Cassiodorus, reporteth this out of an auncient Annales, which he affirmeth to haue read. Anno Domini Centesimo Vigesimo primo apud Parisios Dionysius Episcopus Martyrisatur.

Some while after this martyrdome, the Parisians obtained the point of their life of the Romaines, where they erected a Church, the chiefe or high Altar whereof they raised iustly on the same place, where S. Denys, their Apostle & first Bishop had bin roasted on a Gridiron, and where (at this present) is the little Church of S. Denys du Pas: so named by the vulgar ignorant, but it is truely called Sanctus Dionysius de Passione.

S. Denys roasted on a Gridiron.

The first Church was (the second time) rebuilded by King Childebert, first of the name (Son to great Clouis) by the name of The most holy Trinitie of Paradise. In the second building it was enriched with great Pillers of Marble:

Splendida marmoreis attollitur aula columnis,
Et quia pura manet, gratia maior inest.

So saith Fortunatus, Bishop of Poictiers, who describeth (in Verse) all the particularities of this Mother Church, which he preferreth (by good right) with the Temple built by Salomon.

Si Salomoniaci memoretur machina Templi,
Arte licet par sit, pulchrior ista fide.

Translation of the Bishops See to the Isle of Paris.

And speaking of the translation of the Bishoppes Seate, from Nostre Dame des Champs, into the Isle of Paris, and of the deuotion of the great Prince Childebert, who is the first of our eight and twentie Kings, to be seene on the front of the great Church (Clouis his Father is onely alone without the Church, on the North side) he saith

Hac pius egregio Rex Childebertus amore
Dona suo populo non moritura dedit.

The pictures of King Clouis and his Sonne Childebert.

It is held by tradition, that the Pictures of this King Childebert, and of Clouis his father, which yet are to be seene on the toppe of the Meridionall Portall (vnder which is the Image of S. Marcell) on both sides of the Virgin Mary, before whom Clouis standing vpright, presenteth his Sonne Childebert on his knees, the Virgin sitting, with her Sonne on her lap, after the auncient manner (as she is depicted at Nostre Dame des Champs) accosted with two Angels: It vrgeth beliefe, that Great Clouis had (in his life time) begun the building, and that it was ended by his Sonne Childebert.

The misterie of the Trinitie taught to the Parisians by S. Denys.

The first Church, hauing bin dedicated in honour of the most blessed Trinitie; the ineffable misterie whereof had bin enstructed to the Parisians by the great S. Denys. The second was (by Childebert) dedicated to the Sacred Virgin, S. Stephen, and S. Denys. And from that time, it had the name of Saint Maries Church, vulgarly called of our Lady; vnder whose protection and assured safeguard, the Parisians henceforward) committed their Citie, as it is obserued by Abbo, in his first Booke of the Siedge of Paris by the Normans.

Vrbs in honore micat celsæ sacratæ Mariæ.

And from thence it proceeded, that Our Lady day in August, is in the Citie of Paris, a solemne Festiuall day; when, on the morrow following, the Sheriffes & Prouost des Marchants (instituted by the great King Clouis) are elected in Scrutinie, by plurality of voyces among the Bourgesses of Paris.

The Church built by Childebert held firme footing, vntill the declining of Charlemaignes Children; but then it was long time without any repairing, by reason of the ciuile wars, and troubles in the Realme of France.

Robert the Deuout a famous reedifier of Churches in diuers places.

Deuout King Robert, keeping his Court and ordenary abiding at Paris, and at S. Martin des Champs; rebuilded most part of the Churches in Paris, and elsewhere: at Paris, the Churches of S. Nicholas des Champs, and Nostre Dame des Champs. At Orleans, the Churches of Nostre Dame de bonnes Nouuelles, and the Abbey of S. Aignan. At Poictiers, S. Hilarie: S. Legier in Yueline, that is to say, in the Forrest of Paris, called Aquilina Silua. S. Mary at Vitry, and the Castell of the said place. At Estampes, the Church of Nostre Dame, and the Castell. At Senlis, the Church of S. Rieull. At Poissy, the Church of Nostre Dame. At Autun, S. Cassin, and other Oratories in diuers places of the Kingdome.

The Church of Nostre Dame des Champs at Paris, was rebuilded by the said King Robert, in the same estate and manner, as at this present is to be seene, the foundation iudged to be intire and sound, when the Carmeline Sisters, or Nuns were there established. On the top and pinnacle before the said Church, is yet to be seene the Image of the Arch-Angell S. Michaell, the tutelarie Angell and Guardian of the most Christian Monarchie of France, ensculpted after the antique forme, holding a Balance in the one hand, and a Crosse in the other; on his Head, and toppe of his Wings, are fixed and cramponned strong Pikes of Iron, to keepe the Birds from searching thereon. The ignorant vulgar conceiued in their opinion, that this was a Crown of Eares of Corne, and thought it to be the Idole of the Goddesse Ceres, a matter wherein they are much deceiued: for Isis and Ceres being but one and the same thing, her Temple was at S. Ceour, and S. Germain des Prez. The Pagans couered the heads of their Idole Priapus, their Hermes or Mercurie (planted at the ends or quarters, as well of Fields, as in Townes & Bourroughes, as Guards of Gardens, and beautifying the wayes) with Roundels of Wood, or of white Latten, because Birds should not foyle their Visages. Hereof there are infinite passages in good Poets.

In me veniant mictum atque cacatum,
Quidquid Coruorum est.

And elsewhere.

Merdisque coinquiner albis.
Coruorum.

Thoſe Rondels were named by the Greekes, as we finde apud Iouem. Ariſtophanes in Auibus. Wherefore the Painters and Caruers doe fondly deceiue themſelues in placing thoſe Rondels (which in groſſe ignorance they tearme Diadems) on the heads of Saints, as well raiſed, as in flat painting; applying (very abſurdly) prophane things to ſacred.

As for the Mother Church of Paris, King Robert making his reſiding at Paris as his Predeceſſours had done, Eudes, Robert, Hugh the great Abbot, and Hugh Capet his Father, all infeoffed Counts of Paris: cauſed it to be wholly new builded, and his will was accompliſhed, as now you ſee it at this preſent.

In elder time, and when it was built by King Childebert; it was more aduanced towards the point of the Iſle, ſo that the Quire and high Altar thereof, was in the ſame place, where at this preſent is the Church of Saint Denys du Pas, and the entrance of the Church was then, where now is the great Gate of the Cloyſter, but yet further inward; and the Biſhoppes houſe was at S. Landry, and the Hoſtel des Vrſins.

The Counts of Paris ſucceeded the Romaine Prouoſts

Now, concerning the houſe belonging to the Counts of Paris (who ſucceeded after the Romaine Prouoſts, for gouernment of Iuſtice and Armes) it was, where at this inſtant is the Hoſpitall; the circuit contained from the old Biſhopricke, where at this preſent are the Biſhoprickes Stables, ioyning to the Veſtrie or Treaſurie, which is now the Biſhopricke; cutting through the body of the Church of Noſtre Dame, and returning along the North ſide thereof, from the Churches of S. Chriſtopher, and S. Geneuiſue des Ardents, ſo far as to the end of the leſſer Bridge, where is the Portall of the Hoſpitall, rebuilded by the Cardinall Du Prat, in the time of King Frances the firſt.

The gift of Archambauld Count of Paris

Archambauld, Count of Paris, and Maire of the Pallace of France, vnder the declining of the deſcendants of Clouis, ſlaine by Ebroin the cruell, Maire of the Pallace to Theerry; gaue the ſaid Counts houſe of Paris, with all the extendure thereof, and S. Chriſtophers Chappell, which he cauſed to be builded for the place of his buriall, with his Village De Chreſtell on Marne, about three Leagues from Paris, to the Chapter of the Church of Paris. The words of the ſaid donation by Archambauld, Count and Maire of the Pallace of Paris, vnder Clouis, ſecond of the name, are ſet downe thus. Ercembaldus dedit Eccleſiæ Sanctæ Mariæ domum ſuam, cum Cappella ſua de Sancto Chriſtophoro, & villam ſuam de Chriſtola ſuper Matronam, ita tamen vt in dicta ſua Cappella de ſancto Chriſtophoro nullus inhumaretur niſi ſit de linea, & Familia ſua.

By meanes of this donation, the Foundations of this Mother Church, Mater Eccleſiæ, were by the ſaid Robert laid further on this ſide, to the end, of being neerer to the great Bridge of Paris, where heretofore (according to the teſtimonie of S. Grigory of Tours, in his Hiſtorie of France, and namely, in the time of Saint Lewes (as ſaith the Lord of Ioinuille in his life) dwelt the Merchants of Silkes, or Mercers, Goldſmiths, Iewellers, and Money-Bankers of Paris.

The ſaid Foundations were continued by the deſcendants aed ſucceſſours of Robert: to wit, his eldeſt Sonne Henry, firſt of the name: Phillip the firſt: Lewes le Gras, ſixt of the name: Lewes the Pious, tearmed the yonger, ſeauenth of the name, and Phillip Auguſtus, called the Conquerour, and Gods gift, ſecond of the name, vnder whoſe Reigne it was finiſhed: the Hiſtories and figures (both within and without the worke) onely excepted. The Picture of the ſaid Auguſtus, vnder whom the Church was compleated, is the laſt of the twentie eight Kings his Predeceſſours, which are to be ſeene on the forefront of that admirable and ſumptuous building.

The figure of Phillip Auguſtus and 28. Kings.

The deſcendants of Clouis, reſiding at Paris, their partition; dwelt at the Pallace of S. Geneuiſue du Mont; afterward at the Louure, built on the banke of Seine by Childebert, firſt founder of S. Germaine des Prez (where he lyeth with his wife Vltrogotha) and of S. Germaine de l'Auxerrois, Churches founded vnder the name of the Martire Saint Vincent.

Landegiſilus

Landegiſilus, Sonne and Succeſſour to the honours of his Father Archambauld; Maire of the Pallace, and Count of Paris; cauſed the dwelling for the Counts of he Pallace to be erected, at the other point of the Iſle and Citie of Paris. A buildng whereof we haue ſeene the foundation, at the end of the Kings Garden; but ow the end of the Daulphines Pallace.

Archambauld ſonne and ſucceſſour to Landegiſilus.

The Counts that deſcended of Robert le Fort, made there their Hoſtell, and the eſcendants of King Robert enlarged or encreaſed it. But Lewes Hutin, tenth of he name, vnder the conduct of the Intendant Generall, for the Finances or Reueues of France, named Enguerran de Marigny, Count of Longue-Ville, cauſed it to be builded, as you ſee it at this preſent: except the holy Chapell, the Greene Chamer, where the Chauncerie is, and that of the Audience De la Tournelle, built by the ood King S. Lewes. And at all times, the Church of S. Bartholmew was the Oratoe for the Countes of Paris, and Pariſh Church of our Kings.

Enguerran de Marigny, Count of Longue-ville.

Robert the Deuout, in the ſame place where this admirable building of the holy Chappell is, cauſed an Oratorie to be builded (for the benefit of him and his Domeickes) called (at this preſent) the lower Chappell, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, nder the name of Noſtre Dame, or Saint Mary of the Starre: becauſe he called the irgine Mary, Stellam Regni ſui: hauing ordinarily in his mouth theſe two Verſes, his owne compoſition.

A feaſt day not inſtituted by Pope nocent the fourth, in the yeare of Grace 1250, as is ignorantly written by Platina, n the life of the ſame Pope: but celebrated from the beginning of the World (and amely by our wiſe Druides) as is learnedly obſerued by the Authour of Faſciculus Temporum. Gracious humilitie in a King.

This great Prince held it no vnworthie thing, or vnbeseeming Royall Maiestie: to sing Psalmes and Anthemes, among the Priests and Chaunters in his Chappell.

King Robert his besiedging the Towne of Analon.

We reade of the same King Robert, that marching in person against Landry, Count of Neuers, who had entred into the Dukedome of Bourgongne, to possesse himselfe thereof: the King laid his Siege before the Towne of Analon, reputed to be impregnable. He continued there three Monthes, without any likelyhood of taking it by force: but when the good King began to sing Psalmes in his Tent, according as he was wont to doe; the most part of the Wals of the besieged Towne fell down to the earth miraculously. In which manner it was taken, & al the Dukdome of Bourgongne; which the King gaue (as a portion) to his second Sonne Henry, who being crowned King in the Citie of Rhemes (by the death of Hugh the Great his elder Brother) he estated (as inheritance) the said Dukedome of Bourgogne, to his younger Brother Robert; with reseruation of Hommage, and right of Reuersion to the Crowne of France, through defect of masle children, issued and borne in lawfull marriage.

The Order of Knighthood instituted by King Robert, in Anno 1022

Robert putting all his hope in God, by assistance of the sacred Virgine, Starre of the Sea, the guide and Lanterne of his Kingdome: in honour of her, he erected and instituted a new Order of Knighthood, which he would haue to be stiled and named, The Order of our Lady of the Starre.

This Institution was in the Month of August, the yeare of Grace, One thousand twentie two; which was two yeares after the Institution and creation of the Peeres of France.

The Order was composed of thirtie Knights, comprehending therein the King of France, as chiefe and Soueraigne Master thereof.

The said Knights wore Cloakes of white Damaske, the Mantelet and lyning of light Carnation Damaske, and the Cassock or Gonnell of the same. Whereon, vpon the left side of the Brest, was embroidered a Starre, wrought in pure Gold, with fine rayes or pointed beames.

The great Coller was made of a round Chaine of Gold, with three linkes or chaines inter-wouen with enammeled Roses, inter-changeably white and red.

The Oath and daily duetie of the Knights.

The said Knights stood obliged by Oath, daily to say (in honour of the Virgine Mary) a Corona or Chaplet, composed of fiue Tennes of Aue Maries, and fiue Pater Nosters: as also the Anthemne before remembred, with the Answers, Sicut Spina Rosam, and so following to the end of the Anthemne.

Next, this Prayer composed by himselfe, according to his owne meaning, and for the Kings his Successours, Soueraignes of the said Order of the Starre.

A Prayer of the Kings own making.

Regum Princeps, atque Virtus, cuius nutu Cœlum gyrat, Terra perstat, disponuntur Secula, Regi Roberto nato stirpe nobilissima, sic domare des Superbos, & Subiectis parcere, vt hic regnans gloriosus, quondam viuat in Æthere. Amen.

The Ceremonies of the said Order, began on the day of the Natiuitie of the Virgine Mary, being the eight day of September, in the said yeare 1022, in the Chappell of his Pallace, called Our Lady of the Starre, which is the lower Chappell.

The first men that were honoured with this Order, next vnto himselfe, were his three Sonnes, as namely;

1. Hugh the Great.

2. Henry,

2. Henry, Kings in the life time of their Father.
3. And Robert, Duke of Bourgongne.
4. Richard, second of that name, Duke of Normandie, and of Britaine.
5. William, third of the name, called Stuft-headed, Duke of Aquitaine, Count of Auuerngne, and also of Poictu.
6. William the third, Count of Tolosa.
7. Baldwin with the goodly Beard, fourth of the name, Count of Flanders.
8. Hebert, the old Count of Troyes.
9. Odon, Count of Beauuais.
10. Geoffrey Grise Gonnelle, Count of Angiers.
11. Amaury, Count of Noyon.
12. And Baldwin of the Isle, Count of Henault, Sonne to Baldwin with the goodly Beard, Count of Flaunders. I haue seene an old Romant, made by a King of Armes, called Brabant, written in the time of Phillip de Valois, the Father of Chualrie, wherein the Knights of the said Order of the Starre, were set downe in order, as before hath beene related (together with their Blazons of Armes, and Collers, who according to the auouching of the said Brabant) were all Peeres of France, ordained and created by the said Robert. In number of which Peeres, there was neither Bishop nor Arch-bishop, which giueth vs sufficiently to vnderstand, that at the time of this Institution at the first, the number of Peeres was not then reduced to twelue, sixe of the Church, and sixe Layicks: as it was vnder Lewes the seuenth, called the Pious, and younger, at the Sacring of his Sonne Phillip Augustus, Gods Gift, as we haue already said.

Knights of the Starre all Peeres of France.

Phillip Augustus crowned King, and made Knight of the Starre.

The said Phillip Augustus, being Sacred King of France in the life time of his Father, and in the Church of Rheimes, on the day of All-Saints, 1179. was made Knight of the Starre by the King his Father, at his Coronation at S. Denys in France on Ascension day 1180, he being then aged foureteene yeares, or little more.

The same Phillip Augustus, in Anno 1200, being in the Citie of Gournay in Normandie, gaue the Order of the Starre, and made Knight Arthur, inuesting him in the Counties of Bretaigne, Aniou, and Poictu; and Regnauld, Count of Bologne, by meanes of his wife: As we are instructed by Rigordus, Monke of S. Denys in France, Phisition and Chronicler to the said Augustus.

King Lewes, eight of the name, termed of Mont-Pensier, was after his Sacring in the Church of Rheimes: made Knight also on our Lady day in August 1224.

His Sonne and Successour, the good King S. Lewes, was made Knight likewise of the same Order of the Starre, on the day of his Sacring in the Church of Rheimes, the first Sunday in Aduent, Anno 1226.

The same King S. Lewes, making Knight his Brother Monsieur Robert of France, on the day of Pentecost in Iune, Anno 1237, at Corbeill: ouer and aboue his Appennage, he gaue him for euery day of his life time, to grace his Order of Knighthood of the Starre, twentie pounds Parisian to dispend; A die Militiæ.

Other Lords honored with the same Order of the Starre. A most royall and lumptuous Feast.

In the yeare 1246, at Mid-August, in the Towne of Saumur, the same S. Lewes gaue the Order to Monsieur Alphons, his third Brother, Count of Maine and Poictu: to Peter, Count of Bretaigne: as also the Counts of Dreux, and of March. At which Solemnitie he held his great State pompe, that is to say, his Court and Table open to all commers, with such Royall magnificence, as neuer had beene seene the like, for the great plentie and aboundance of all things, and riches there present; which Feast continued eight daies together.

At the Kings owne Table fedde the Counts of Poictieres, Bretaigne, Dreux, and De la March, newly made Knights; in Cassocks, Mantellets and Collers of the Order of the Starre.

Thiebault first King of Nauarre.

At an other Table, on the side by the Count of Dreux, sate alone Thiebault, first of the name, King of Nauarre, and Count Palatine of Brie and Champaigne (fift of the name) who was very richly attired in Cloth of Gold, Coat, Cloake, Girdle, the Buckles and Studdes all of pure Gold. Before whom waited the Caruer or Squire for the mouth, Iohn, Lord de Ioinuille, Steward (that is to say) Grande Maistre de Hostel de Champaigne.

Before

Before the King S. Lewes, waited his two eldest Brethren, the Lords Robert Count of Artois, and Charles, Count of Anioy: And the Garuer was the good Count of Soissons.

As Guardes to the Kings Table, were appointed Messires Imbert de Beaulieu, afterward Constable of France: Honorat, Sire de Coucy, and Archambauld de Bourbon, called the Great, Father in Law to the King of Nauarre.

Behinde these three Noble Barons, attended aboue thirtie Knights, in Cassocks of Cloth of Gold, and to backe them, stood a great number of Vshers of Armes, and of the Hall: who were for the Count of Poictiers; Portant ses Armes batues de Sandail.

The King was most sumptuous in his garments, as it was a thing wonderfull to behold, and would require a tedious time to relate: For neuer had beene seene ((as saith the Lord of Ioinuille) so many Surcoates, Cloakes and other garnishments of Cloth of pure Gold, as he wore, during the time of this Feast.

Phillip le Bell Knight of the Starre.

King Phillip le Bell, King of France and Nauarre, was made Knight of the Starre, the day of Mid-August 1284. And on the morrow he espoused Madame Ioan, Queene of Nauarre, and Countesse Palatine of Champaigne and Brie. The Feast endured eight daies, the Streetes of Paris being richly hung with Tapistries, the Shops shut vp, and Tables prepared in euery Streete, readily furnished for all commers, the neighbours feasting their friends with all ioy and gladnesse.

In the yeare 1458, the Month of August, in the Citie of Vendosme, King Charles seuenth of the name, instituted Peere of France, Gaston, fift of the name, Infant of Nauarre, otherwise called Prince of Viana, Count of Foix, and Lord of Beame, being put in place for the Count of Tolosa, all the Peeres there assembled, only he of Bourgongne excepted.

Prince Gaston made Knight of the Starre.

From Vendosme the Court went to lodge at Tours; where the said Gaston de Nauarre was affianced to Madame Magdalene of France, the last daughter to King Charles the seuenth, termed the Victorious, and on the morrow following, was made Knight of the Starre, with great magnificence.

To solemnize this Feast of Knighthood, the Count of Foix lodged at S. Iulian of Tours, where he entertained the King, the Princes and chiefest Lords of his Court, to a most magnificent Feast: which we will describe, according as it is set downe in the manuscript Chronicle of Foix.

The famous and memorable Banquet made by the Prince Gaston de Foix.

Prince Gaston made the most triumphant Banquet, that euer had bin seene before. In the great Haule of Saint Iulian at Tours, were prepared twelue Tables; each of them containing seauen Elles in length, and two and an halfe in breadth.

At the first Table was seated the King, and the chiefe Princes of the Blood; as also the Queene, and daughters of France.

At other Tables were seated other Princes, as well of the Bloud, as of strange Prouinces, and the principall Lords of France, according to their ranke and dignitie; as also the Princesses and great Ladies in like manner.

The Maisters d' Hostell, were the Counts Gaston de Foix; De Dunois; De la Marche, and the great Seneschall or Steward of Normandie.

The Seruices as they come to the Tables.

1. The first Seruice was made with white Hypocras and Toasts.

2. The second Seruice consisted of boiled well fatted Capons, and Gammons of Bacon; accompanied with seuen kindes of Brothes or Pottages. All these Seruices were in dishes of Siluer, and each Seruice for the seuerall Tables, had an hundred and fortie Siluer Dishes.

3. The third Seruice was of meates Roasted; yet not any other, but Pheasants, Partridges, Conies, Peacocks, Bittors, Hearons, Bustardes, Greene-Geese, Woodcocks, Swannes, Teales, and all kindes of Foules of the Riuer, that could be thought on. Beside, in this Seruice was likewise Wilde Goats, Harts or Stagges, with all manner of Venisons, and the Seruice for each Table had an hundred and fortie goodly dishes of Siluer.

A goodly Castle framed in a Pie entercourse.

After which Seruice, twelue men brought in (as an entercourse) a Castle with foure goodly Towers at foure corners, erected vpon a Rocke. In the midst of the Castle Castell stood a great Tower, in forme of a Donion, which had foure Windowes, in each whereof was placed a beautifull Lady, richly apparelled. At other foure Windowes stood foure gallant yong Boyes, singing most sweetly before the Presence. And to speake truely, this entercourse seemed a terrestriall Paradise, for on the tops and pinacles of the Towers and Donion, where fixed the Escutchions and Banners of France, richly painted and emblazoned in colours; as also the deuises of King Charles the seauenth, and Order of the Starre in White and Carnation.

4. The fourth Seruice consisted of Foules, as well great, as small, the whole Seruice being sumptuously guilded: And on euery Table were placed an hundred and fortie Siluer Dishes, according as in all the other Seruices.

The second Entercourse a Tiger.

After this Seruice was brought in (for an enter-course) the shape of a Beast, called a Tiger, which (by cunning Art) disgorged Fire from his mouth and nostrils. About his necke was a rich Coller, whereat hung the Armes and deuises of the King, very costly and curiously formed. This enter-course was carried by sixe men, each of them hauing a Mandillion and Bonnet, made after the fashion of Bearne, and they danced before the Lords and Ladies, according to the manner of the Countrey; which moued much mirth and laughter, and this Entercourse was commended aboue all the rest, in regard of the new daunting.

5. The fift Seruice was of Pies, Tarts, dishes of Creame, Orange-adoes and Citrons confected; each Table being likewise serued with an hundred and fortie Siluer dishes.

The third Entercourse was a great Mountaine.

After the said Seruice, was carried another Entercourse, which was a great Hill, or Mountaine, borne by foure and twentie men. In the Mountaine stood two faire artificiall Fountaines: From the one flowed (abundantly) Rose-water; and from the other Muske-water, yeelding an admirable smell ouer all the Haule. From diuers quarters and parts of the Mountaine, issued forth yong liuing Conies and sundrie kindes of small Birds. And in hollow places of the said Hill, stood foure yong Laddes, and a Damosell, attired like Sauages, who came forth at a passage in the Rocke, dauncing (by good direction) an excellent Morisco, before the assembly.

This being thus done, Count Gaston caused to be giuen to the Heralds and Trompets, who waited and sounded all the Dinner time, two hundred Crownes of the Sunne: beside tenne elles of Veluet, to the King of Armes of the Order, to make him a Roabe.

6. The sixt Seruice was of red Ipocras, with Wafers of diuers sorts.

The fourth Entercourse a man on Horseback.

And then came carried (as an other Enter-course) a man mounted on Horseback, very artificially formed, and attired in Crimzon Veluet, but the whole consisting of Gold-Smiths worke. In the midst was a small Garden, and therein stood a Poet, gathering all kindes of Roses and other Floures, made of Waxe; which he deliuered to the Ladies, who made high esteeme of such presents.

7. The seuenth Seruice was of Spiceries and Confections, made in the forme of Lyons, Swannes, Harts, and such like: and on each of them were the Armes and deuises of the King.

The fift Entercourse a Peacock in a Ship

After which was carried a liuing Peacocke in a goodly great Ship. The Peacocke caried about his necke, the Armes belonging to the Queene of France, daughter to the King of Sicilie, Duke of Anioy, Lewes, second of the name, such as are to be seene in the Order of the Croissents, or Halfe Moones) round about the Shippe hung Banderols, containing the Armes of all the Princesses and Ladies of the Court; who were not meanely proud, that the Count had so highly honored them.

In the midst of the Haule was a Scaffold, whereon were Consorts of singuler voyces, with all kindes of Instruments.

After the Banquet, Count Gaston caused to be openly proclaimed, a Iouste for all commers, on the eighteenth day of Iune, then next following, with Articles and conditions, such as are vsed in Iousts and Tournaments.

This

This Order of the Starre (being intermitted in the time of Phillip de Valois, by reason of the Warres and losses of Battailes, against the enemies of the Crowne) was againe set on foote by his Sonne King Iohn, heire to the misfortunes of his Father. Yet notwithstanding, very valiant and couragious of his person; and one that assuredly maintained his word with all the Princes of Christendome, for so it is auouched by Froissard, after this manner. Albeit Faith were banished from the world; yet neuerthelesse, it ought to be kept inuiolably in the mouth of the Prince; although hee cannot be enforced to hold his Word, or had any iust occasion to breake it.

Establishing of the Order of the Starre by King Iohn.

King Iohn hauing obtained of Madame Mary of Spaine, Countesse of Alanson and D'Estampes, and of Charles Count of Alanson her Sonne, the eight day of Iune, Anno 1356. the House called S. Ouyn, were to S. Denys in France, sometimes called the Pallace of Clichy: He established in that House, the principall Seate for the Order of the Starre. And at a Chapter held in the Palace of Chichy, on our Lady day in September 1356. he haue the Order of the Starre to Knights created of the Star by the King.

1. Messieurs phillip of France, Duke of Orleans, his Brother
2. Charles of France, first Daulphine of Viennois, Duke of Normandie, the eldest Sonne to King Iohn.
3. Lewes Duke of Anion.
4. Iohn Duke of Berry.
5. Phillip Duke of Touraine, his other Sonnes.
6. Charles, King of Nauarre, Count of Eureux.
7. Peter, Duke of Bourbon.
8. Iames of Bourbon, Count de la March, these three being Brethren.
9. Charles of Spaine, Count of Alanson.
10. Arnoul d'Endreghan. } Marshals of France.
11. Iohn of Clermont. }
12. George, Count of Chargny, great Chamberlaine of France.
13. Charles, Count of Tancarville.
14. Gautier de Brenne, Duke of Athens.
15. Iohn d'Artois, Count d'Eu.
16. Charles d'Artois, Count of Longueuile, both Brethren.
17. Iohn, Vicount de Melun.

18. Knights of the Order of the Starre.

Being eighteene Knights, comprehending the King, Chiefe of the Order: the rest of the number were to be made perfect, at other Chapters of the said Order.

It is a popular errour, to say that this Order was instituted by King Iohn, or that he changed it to the title of the Virgin Mary, by calling it the bright and cleare Starre, which appeared to the three Kings of the East, for guiding them to the place, where was borne the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords. And that he tooke for his deuise Royall, a Starre Crowned, and for Soule thereof;

Monstrant Regibus Astra Viam.

Contradictions concerning the Order of the Star.

That hee transferred the Ceremonie of the said Order, from the eight day of September, to the sixt of Ianuarie, the Feast and solemnitie of the Kings. That Charles the fift abolished the Order; whereas others say, that it was Charles the seauenth, who vtterly abolished this Order. And not hauing any meanes, whereby to recompence those Captaines that had done him seruice, hauing spent his Reuennues: he gaue them the Coller of his Order of the Starre, which formerly had bin the noate of honour and excellencie, for all the Princes and great Lords of France. But now the communication of this Order, to such meane Gentlemen and Souldiours, became so distastefull; that they hated to weare the Order any longer, and so aduertised King Charles the seauenth. Who hauing assembled the last Chapter thereof at the Pallace of Chichy, in the yeare One thousand foure hundred fiftie fiue, in presence of the Knights of the said Order; hee tooke from his necke a Riband of blacke Silke, at the end whereof hung a Starre of Gold,

Gold, and put it about the necke of the Captaine, appointed for the night-watch in the Citie of Paris, called there Cheualier du Guet. Ordaining beside, that in following time, none but he should weare the Order of the Starre, and that the Cassockes or Mandilions of the Archers, attending on the Knight or Captaine of the Watch, as well on Horseback as Foot; should haue both on the brests and backes, a Starre of white embroderie, which hath so continued to this day. And according to the Kings example, the Princes and Lords left the said Order to the Captaine of the Watch. This is (I say) a popular errour, which I my selfe sometime beleeued for a truth: but reading hath instructed mee in the contrarie.

Knight of the Watch for the night time in Paris.

If Charles the fift had abrogated this Order; Monsieur Lewes of France, Duke of Orleans, his youngest Sonne, had neuer worne it. As is to be seene in his Picture (according to the life) at the Celestines of Paris: as we shall further relate, in the Tract concerning The Order of Orleans, called, Of the Porcupine.

If Charles the seuenth had abolished this Order of the Starre, in the yeare 1455. he had not giuen it to the Prince of Nauarre, Gaston de Foix, his Sonne in Law, in the yeare 1458. And Porte Bordelle, called at this present S. Marceau, newly builded in the yeare Foure hundred sixtie and one (where the said Charles the seuenth deceased) should neuer haue carried on the Frontispiece, the Image of the Virgine Mary, on the Pedestall whereof is yet at this present discerned, a Shield Azure, wherein is figured a Starre of Gold.

The death of King Charles the seuenth.

I haue seene some Letters of King Charles the fift, whereby he made Knights of his Order of the Starre, Viz. the Lords Iohn de Roche-Chouard, and Iohn de Beaumont, very famous houses in Poicton. This Iohn de Beaumont had in the said Prouince great Seigneuries, by meanes of his Wife Lucie de Bressuyre. And for Iohn de Roche-Chouard, otherwise called (by old titles) De Rupe Cauardi, he was Brother to the Vicount de Roche-Chouard, which House most nobly beareth for Armes D'Argent trois Viures de Gueules. Heere you may reade the Letters of the said King Charles the fift.

What Ceremonies were obserued in the times of the first Kings of the third Ligne, are liuely described by Ioannes Monachus Maioris Monasterij, in the life of Geoffrey, Duke of Normandie, Count of Anion, Touraine, and of Maine. This Monke of Maire-Monstier, liued vnder the Reignes of Lewes le Gros, and Lewes the younger, Father and Sonne of one name.

Foulques, King of Ierusalem, in right of his second wife, had by his first, a Sonne named Geoffrey, who maried with Madame Mahaulde, or Maulde of England, daughter to Henry, first of the name, King of England (youngest Sonne to William the Bastard, called the Conquerour, becaufe hee Conquered Maulde twice married, and to whom.

the Kingdome of England) and Madame Mahaulde (that is Mathildis in Latine) Daughter to Malcolme, King of Scotland. This Maulde of England was twice ioined in marriage. First, in the yeare of Grace, One thousand one hundred and nine, to the Emperour Henry, fift of the name: who being deceased in the yeare One thousand one hundred twentie fixe, Maulde returned into England, and then re-married in the yeare One thousand one hundred twentie seuen, with this Geoffrey (sir-named Planta-Geneist, because he tooke delight in planting that Shrub) but by his enemies hee was called the Red, in regard his haire was of that coullour.

A Planter of Broom shrubs.

This Duke of Normandie, and King of England, Henry, first of the name, hauing assured the marriage of his daughter Maulde (who during her lifetime, was sir-named the Empresse) would make Knight (according to the Ceremonies then obserued in France) his future Sonne in Law Geoffrey of Anion, who as yet was but a meane Gentleman, and whom the Monke of Maire-Monstier, by a Periphrasis of time, nameth ingenuously Nudum Militem. In super ex præcepto Regis Henrici exactum est à Comite Fulcone vt filium suum Nudum Militem ad ipsam imminentem Pentecostem Rotomagum honorificè mitteret, vt ibidem cum conquæstis suis Arma Susceperus Regalibus gaudijs interesset.

A matter worth the obseruation.

It was obserued for an auncient custome, that young Gentlemen, as namely, the Sonnes of Princes and great Lords, were neuer admitted to the Table of their Fathers, if they were not made Knights. As we learne by Iohn, the Deacon of Aquileia, in the Historie of the Lombardes. Apud Longobardos ea consuetudo est, vt filius Regis cum Pater non prandeat, nisi prius à Rege gentis extra Arma Suscipiat. Such a custome was generall to the Germaines and the French, as we haue noted in the first Booke, according to the testimonie of Cæsar and Tacitus. To this purpose is to be obserued, that Princes and great Lords, who were not made Knights; at solemne Feasts, when Kings held full and open Courts: had no honour of sitting with them at the Table, that were Knights. Returne we now againe to our Knights.

Geoffrey of Anion made Knight by King Henry of England, in Anno 1127.

On the day of Pentecoste, in the said yeare One thousand one hundred twentie seuen, when the King of England should giue the Order of Knighthood to his intended Sonne in Law: the said Geoffrey of Anion, appeared in person at Rouen, accompanied with fiue Gentlemen and Barons of his owne age, to be made Knights with the Sonne of Foulques their Lord: to wit, Iacquelin de Mailly, Robert de Sombreual, Arduin de Sainct Mard, Robert de Boloy, and Payen de Claire Vaux, attended on by fiue and twentie Esquires of their age (for each Knight in this Ceremonie, ought to haue two Esquires, at the least about his person, and especially to bee presented at the Altar) with many Sericants and Officers.

The auncient manner and curiosine of making Knights.

On the euen of the Feast, the Knights to be made were bathed and washed according to the Auncient custome. And the day being come, the King commanded, that Count Geoffrey and his Assotiates should be brought before him. At comming forth of the Bathes, Geoffrey by his Esquires and Chamber-Groomes, had a fine Shirt put on him, and ouer it a Wastecoat of Crimzen Silke, embrodered with Gold; whereon hee had a Surcoat or Cassock of fine Scarlet, all ouer embrodered with Gold. His Breeches were of the same Stuffe, his Stockings of Silke, and his Shooes curiously wrought with small golden Lyons. His Companions were likewise cloathed with fine Linnen and Scarlet, departing so from their Garderobe to come to the Pallace. To these young Gentlemen were brought gallant Coursers, and glittering Armes, especially to the Angeuin, a good Iennet of Spaine, so fleete and swift, that his pace equalled the flight of the ayrie Birdes. He was armed with a Hawbert, double mailled, and made of such a temper, as it could not be pierced with the steele of a Launce, nor any Darts or Arrowes. The Greaues for his legges were likewise of Maile, curiously gilded, and so were his Spurres: about his necke hung a Shield, charged with Lyons of Gold, and an Helmet on his head, enriched with many precious Stones, and of so found a temper per, that the stroakes of the best Sword could not enter it, and then was brought him a Launce of Ashe, the head whereof was fordged at Poictiers. To make vp the close of his Arming, they deliuered him a goodly Sword, brought forth of King Henries rich Armorie, Damasked and gilded, with diuers Histories engraued thereon, by the industrious cunning of the Master of Master-Engrauers, in that time, named Galan. The new Knight mounted vp brauely on Horse-backe, without putting any foote in the Stirrop, and the Solemnitie lasted seuen whole daies, in Feasts, Tourneis, and Mascaradoes. But on the eight day, were performed the Nuptials of the Royall Daughter, with the new-created Knight, in the Citie of Mans. Here follow the words of the Auncient Author:

Illucescente die altera, Balneorum vsus Vti Tyrocinij Suscipiendi Consuetudo Expostulat, paratus est. Comperto Rex à Cubicularijs quod Andegauenses, & qui cum eo venerant, ascendissent de Lauacro, *iussit eos ad se vocari. The Order of the Broome-Floure, in the Cod or Huske: Instituted by the Holy King Saint Lewes, Ninth of that name; In the yeare of Grace, One thousand two hundred thirtie foure.

CHAP. III.

The Order of the Broome-Floure in the Huske or Cod.

Two Orders of knighthood instituted by King Lewes.

THe good King Saint Lewes (the Mirror and Example of worthie Princes) Instituted two Orders of Knighthood. That of The Broome-Floure in the Cod or Huske, called by some the Broome Huske: And that of The Ship and Double Cuescents, or Halfe-Moones.

The birth of King Lewes.

This worthie King, Sonne to Lewes, eight of the name (tearmed of Mont Penſier) and to Blanche of Caſtille (a moſt wiſe and vertuous Lady, whoſe reigne may well be a patterne, not only to the Queenes of France, being Widdowes, but likewiſe to all Princeſſes of Chriſtendome) was borne on S. Markes day, being the fiue and twentieth day of the Month Aprill, in the yeare of Grace, One thouſand two hundred and fifteene.

His young comming to the Crowne.

By deceaſe of King Lewes, eight of the name his Father which happened on Sunday, in the Octaues of All-Saints, Anno, One thouſand two hundred twentie ſixe, he came to the Crowne of France, at the age of eleuen or twelue yeares: and was Sacred and Crowned King the firſt day of December, in the ſaid yeare, One thouſand two hundred twentie ſixe. All Regencies are perilous, and ſubiect to procure troubles and deuiſions in the State: but eſpecially that of Women, whoſe rule and command the French haue euermore deteſted. So Queene Blanche, being ordained Regent, by the laſt Will and Teſtament of the King her Husband; perceiued in a moment, that the great Lords of France banded themſelues againſt her, vnder the Standard and conduct of Monſieur Phillip of France, Count of Bologne, and prime Prince of the Bloud, who pretended right to the Regencie, during the minoritie of the King Saint Lewes his Nephew. But the wiſedome and holy life of Queene Blanche, calmed all thoſe commotions, wonne the malcontented Princes, as Thibault, King of Nauarre, Count Palatine of Brie and Champaigne, and the reſt by force of Armes.

The Regencie of Women alwaies hatefull to the French.

The worthie life and wiſedom of Queen Blanche.

Queen Blanch reſigned her Regencie to the King her ſonne.

In the eight yeare of his Reigne, of his Age nineteene, and of Grace, One thouſand two hundred thirtie foure, Queene Blanche deliuered vp the Gouernment of the Kingdome to her Sonne, who the ſame yeare ſent Gautier, Arch-Biſhop of Sens, and Iohn de Neelle, Knight of the Starre, as his Ambaſſadours, to the Count of Prouence Raymond Berengarius; to demand in mariage Margaret his eldeſt daughter, a beautifull and wiſe Princeſſe, who was brought into France to the King Saint Lewes, and he eſpouſed her in the Citie of Sens; where the Arch-Biſhop of the place Sacred and Crowned her, according to the accuſtomed manner.

The Inſtitution of this new Order of Knighthood.

AT this Sacring and Coronation, were performed many magnificent Triumphs, and for their further enlarging, the King ordained a new Order of Knighthood. For, ouer and beſide that of the Starre (which continued in honour to the Reigne of King Lewes the eleuenth, who vtterly abrogated it, by the Inſtitution of that of Saint Michael, and cauſed it to bee alwaies after worne by the Cap aine of the Watch;) he inſtituted the Order of the Broome Flower, which endured in France, vntill the death of King Charles, fifft of the name.

Geniſta Hiſpanica, Spaniſh broome. Humilis, wood waxen, Baſe broome. Spartum Sylueſtre Whinnes or Furres.

Euery one knoweth, that there are diuers kindes of Broome, called in Latine Geniſta, which is the name of the true kinde. There are two ſorts altogether full of thornie prickles; but in order next to the Hou, a Tree that hath the ſmoothеſt leaues in the World: there is a Broome which in France they tearme Geneſt porte-Raues; the Broome of Italie; the greater and the leſſer Broome, called by the Greekes Σπάρτον, and Σπάρτιον, according as the Latines. Alſo, two kinds of Herbes which carrie the ſame name: and laſtly the ſame Broome, called Geniſtella. This Shrub is very common, and is to be ſeene in all hilly and mountainous places and Forreſts, eſpecially in meager and barren lands. All the Plaines of Bourdeaux, from the Riuer of Andaye (ſo named of the laſt Village of France, ſeated on the banke of the ſaid Riuer, called by the Spaniards Goſthbar, and in Latin Vedaſus, which maketh the ſeperation of France from Nauarre, whereof Font-arabie is the firſt Towne, watered with this Riuer, which is all in the Kingdome of France) are full of Broomes, which the Hidalgos, Pilgrimes of S. Iames in Galicia, gather and bind vp in knots as they paſſe along the way, to obſerue the the turnings and windings of pathes, with heapes or piles of Mercurie, and where each Hidalgo caſteth his Stone or Flint, according to the Paganiſh Idolater, as quite bereft of iudgement and reaſon.

Broome beareth little greene leaues, of very ſmall extent, and the Floure is yellow, with long Cods or Huskes, which flouriſh in the Spring time, and in Autumne. This Shrub is much affected by the Gaſcoins, who haue made a Song thereof, beginning in their gibberiſh ſpeaking:

A la hou m'en ſon auade:

And at each couplet, a double bearing or reitterating.

La hlour dou Geneſt m'agrade,
La hlour dou Geneſt.

A deſcription of the Broom

The King Saint Lewes choſe this Shrubbe to be his Emblеme, and added thereunto theſe two words, Exaltat Humiles, as holding it for the marke and Symbole of Humilitie. Which was ſo great in the perſon of this holy and deuout King, that in going to Saint Denys in France; hee followed the Religious men, and the Abbot of that Arch-Monaſterie Royall, in their Chapter, and tooke his place laſt of the ſixe degrees, euen on the loweſt that aſcended to the Abbatiall Seate. Tam humiliter cum ipſis in Capitulo reſidebat, quod nec locum Pueri elegit ſunt ſedere, vt de loco Abbatis, & ceterorum Monachorum taceam, ſed gradum inferiorem, de ſex Gradibus, per quos ad Abbatis Sedem aſcenditur, ſibi elegerit.

The great and admirable humilitie of the holy and religious King.

Hee would not ſeate himſelfe in ranke among the ſillie Nouices, but a great deale lower, and beneath them. So ſaith William de Nangis, a Monke of the ſaid Abbey, in the Life of the ſame King Saint Lewes, the ſixtie ſixe Chapter.

It was likewiſe ſaid in his time, that God (in his vnſearchable prouidence) had exalted him to the Throne Royall of the French Empire, onely for his Humilitie; inſtead of his elder, Monſieur Phillip of France.

His exaltation to the Kingdome by his humilitie.

This great King was remarkeable, aboue all the Princes of his time, in regard of his ſtaule and goodly ſtature, as alſo his valiancie. The Seneſchall of Champaigne, Iohn Lord of Ioin-Ville, writing his life, and ſpeaking of the day at Maſſourre in Aegypt, with thus.

Le Roy s'arreſta ſur vn haut Chemin, & fit arreſter toute ſa Gent auſſi, & commenca de les enhorter, and prier de bien faire. Son Heaume eſtoit tout doré, & en ſa main tenoit une Eſpee d'Alemagne toute nuë, & vous promets que ie ne veis oncques ſi bel Homme comme il eſtoit, car il apparoiſſoit par deſſus tous les autres depuis les eſpaules.

The King made a ſtand vpon the High-way, and cauſed all his people to make a ſtand likewiſe, and beginning to exhort and encourage them; entreated them to performe their beſt behauiour. His Helmet was richly guilded, and in his hand he held a Sword of Allemaigne, maigne, wholly naked. And I protest vnto you, that I neuer beheld so goodly a man, as he was; for he appeared (in tauleneſſe) aboue all the reſt, euen from the ſhoulders.

Le meſme Hiſtorien en parlant de ladite Iournee: Soyez certains que celle Iournee le Roy fit de plus grands faicts d'Armes, que iamais i'aye veu faire en toutes les Batailles ou ie fus onques. Il diſoit on apres la Bataille, que ſi n'euſt eſté ſa perſonne, nous euſſions eſté tous perdus, & morts à celle Iournee: & ie croy qu'a l'heure ſa Vertu, & Force luy fuſt doublee par la grace de Dieu: car il ne ſe feignoit point de ſe mettre aux dangers, & perils de la Bataille: & la ou il voyoit ſes Gens en detreſſe, il ſe venoit frapper parmy pour les ſecourir, & tant donnoit de coups d'Eſpee, & de Maſſe, que les Turcs n'oſoient approcher de luy. Et me compterent vn Iour le Sire de Courtenay, & Meſsire Iean de Salonay, qu'ils auoient veu que Six Turcs s'eſtoient addreſſez au Roy celuy Iour, & l'auoient pris à force par le ſeruice de ſon Cheual, & l'emmenoient: mais le vertueux Prince voyant le danger ou il eſtoit ſe ſeruit de tout ſon pouuoir, & par grand courage frappa ſur les Turcs qui le tenoient, en maniere que luy ſeul ſe deliura de leurs mains.

The ſame Hiſtorian, ſpeaking on further, concerning the ſame day, ſaith. Believe it for certaine, that the ſame day, the King performed the very faireſt actions of Armes, that euer in my life time I beheld, in all the Battailes that I haue ſeene. And it was told me after the Battaile, by one of no meane credit, that if himſelfe (I meane the King) had not bin there in perſon, wee had bin all loſt, and ſlaine that day. I am perſuaded, that euen in the inſtant heure, his hie vertue and ſtrength became redubled, meerely by the grace of God. For he failed not to thruſt himſelfe into the greateſt dangers and perils of the Battaile, and where hee ſaw his men in any diſtreſſe, he laid about him luſtily, to ſuccour and relieue them, deliuering ſo many valiant ſtroakes, both with his Sword and Battle-Axe, that the Turkes durſt not aduenture to come neere him. And it was related to me the ſame day, by the Lord de Courtnay, and Meſſire Iohn de Salonay, that they ſaw ſixe Turkes, who addreſſed themſelues againſt the King that very day, and forcibly caught hold on the bridle of his Horſe, leading him ſo away with them. But the vertuous Prince, perceiuing in what perill he was; endeauoured to make knowne his Royall reſolution, and meerely by admirable courage, ſo laid vpon the Turkes which led him; that he deliuered himſelfe quite out of their hands.

Concerning the Coller of the Order, with the Emblazon.

The Coller appointed for this Order of the Broome-Floure, was compoſed of ſuch Huskes or Coddes, as naturally doe grow on the Broome, wrought and enammelled to the true ſhape by Art. Entrelaſſees de Fleurs de Lys d'Or, encloſes dedans des Lozanges Checkees (c'eſt a dire toutes ouuertes a iour) eſmaillees de blanc, enchainees enſemble, & dans vne Croix Florencee d'Or. According to that which is in the Kings Cuappell, and following the auncient cuſtome.

The King Saint Lewes, firſt of all receiued the ſaid Order, by the hand of Gautier Arch-Biſhop of Sens, on the Eeuen before the Coronation of Queene Margaret of Prouence his wife.

Concerning the Knights of this Order, they vſed to weare Coates or Caſſocks of white Damaske, with violet Chapperons. The number of them was not fixedly concluded on; but depended onely on the will of our Kings, who were heads and Soueraignes of this Order. William de Nangis, Monke of S. Denys in France, obſerueth in the life of Saint Lewes, noated vnder the yeare One thouſand two hundred thirtie eight, that he gaue the ſaid Order to Monſieur Robert of France, his brother (to whom hee gaue for Appanage the Countie of Artois) in the Abbatiall Church of S. Cornille de Compiegne, on the morrow after Marriage of the ſaid Count of Artois with Mahauld, daughter to the Duke of Brabant. At this Solemnitie aſſiſted all the Nobilitie of France, as well women as men, two thouſand Knights Bannerets, with their Seriants and Varlets on foote, in ſo great number, that the Emperour Fredericke, who had entreated a Parlee with King Lewes, and their meeting appointed at Vau-Couleurs, the Marches and Frontiers of France and Lorraine, failed of comming to the Parlee, for feare of the French.

Marriage of the Count of Artois to the Duke of Brabants daughter.

The ſame King Saint Lewes, aſſembled the generall States of the Kingdome at Paris, Paris, in the yeare One thouſand two hundred threeſcore and ſeauen, the Feaſt of Pentecoaſt, and in the Church of Paris; where he gaue the Order of the Broome-Floure, to Monſieur Phillip of France, being his eldeſt Sonne; to his Nephew Robert, Count of Artois, (Sonne to Monſieur Robert of France, his Brother, who dyed at Maſſourre in Agypt) and to many Barons and great Lords of France. The Solemnitie was great, and the Court moſt magnificent, and the Feaſt continued eight whole dayes. Moreouer, the Streetes of Paris were all hung with Tapiſtries, the Shoppes ſhut vp, and Tables readily prepared in the Streetes, to banquet all commers, according to the auncient cuſtome. Which is obſerued by the Monke of S. Denys in France, William de Nangis, in the Life of the ſaid King Saint Lewes, in theſe words.

An aſſembly of the Kingdomes generall Eſtates at Paris, for giuing the Order.

Anno Domini, M.CC.LXVII. in Pentecoſte, Prælatis, & Baronibus fere totius Regni Franciæ, Pariſius congregatis, Ludouicus Rex Franciæ videns filium ſuum primogenitum Philippum iuuenem fortem, & probiſſimum, atque Robertum Nepotem ſuum filium: oberti fratris ſui Attrebatenſis Comitis, quondam apud Maſſorram interfecti, eos, cum pluribus alijs, Milites nouos Geniſtellæ fecit: vbi tanta fuit Lætitiæ ſolemnitas, quod Populus Ciuitatis Pariſienſis ab omni opere vacans, ſolummodo Lætitiæ, & exultationi intentus, per Octo dies & amplius Ciuitate per totum cortinis pannorum varij coloris, & ornamentis pretioſis mirabiliter pallata, cibiſque publicis ſolemnitatem protenderent.

And thus doth the ignorance of Painters and Caruers make it ſelfe manifeſt, who taking the Image and repreſentation of the ſaid King Saint Lewes, as well high-raiſed or embоſſed, as in flat forme of painting, haue figurde him without any Order on the Cloake ouer his Royall Mantle. Whereas (indeede) hee had two Orders, as namely: that of the Starre, and (beneath it) that of the Broome-Floure, which two Orders held in full currencie, vntill the Reigne of King Lewes the eleauenth.

I haue ſeene and read the Letters, granted by King Charles the fift, Sir-named the Wiſe, concerning the Order of the Broome-Floure, and by him giuen to one of his Bed-Chamber, Meſsire Geoffrey de Belle-Ville, of a moſt auncient Houſe in Poictu: Qui portoit Gironne de Gueulles, & de Vaire. Behold here the tenure of thoſe Letters.

A Copie of the Kings Letters Patents.

CHARLES, by the grace of God, King of France. To all ſuch as ſhall ſee and read theſe our preſent Letters; Greeting. Wee make knowne, that in regard of the good relation, which hath bin made vnto vs, of Geffrey de Belle-Ville, a faithfull Gentleman of our Bed-Chamber, concerning his good and Noble generation: Wee haue (of our eſpeciall grace and fauour) giuen and granted to him, that he may, and hath free leaue and licence, at all Feaſts and Companies, to weare The Coller of the Broome-Floure, without any manner of checke or reprehenſion. Giuen at Tours vnder our Seale, the ſixt day of Iuly, in the yeare One thouſand three hundred and eighteene; and of our Reigne the foureteenth.

At the entrance of Queene Iſabell of Bauaria into Saint Denys in France, the yeare One thouſand three hundred foureſcore and nine; to the ſame place alſo came the Queene of Sicilie, Mary de Blois, Widdow to Monſieur Lewes of France, King of Sicile, firſt of the name. There ſhe preſented her two Sonnes, Lewes, ſecond of the name, King of Sicilie, and Charles, Prince of Tarentum, to King Charles the ſixt; who made them Knights of the Starre, and of the Broome-Floure, with great magnificence and ſolemnitie, in a moſt ample Aſſembly; becauſe they were Couſins to the King, and very goodly Princes, ſo ſaith the Chronicle of Monſieur Iohn of France, Duke of Berry.

William

Le Viel dit Montaigne a tyrannous king of the Arſacides and Beduins.

William de Nangis, obſerueth in the life of the ſame Saint Lewes, that one terming himſelfe Le Viel des Montaignes, King of the Arſacides and Beduins, abiding on the Confines and Frontiers of Antioch and Damas, in Caſtles which were impregnable, ſeated on the tops of Mountaines; ſent certaine of his Aſſaſſins or murderers into France, to maſſacre and kill the ſaid Saint Lewes. This Tyrant, who commanded ouer fortie thouſand men, made himſelfe greatly feared, both of Chriſtians and Sarrazens, becauſe he nouriſhed, and gaue education in ſtrong Caſtles and places, to Children of the Countrey vnder his obedience, who were inſtr. ded in moſt horrid and abhominable maximes (renewed in France within fortie or fifty yeares of theſe times, for the killing and murdering of our Kings) and that they merited the ioyes and glory of Paradiſe; if they ſhewed themſelues readily obedient, to a blind-folded dutie which this Prince commanded them, to murder ſuch Kings and Princes as he would haue them, and in the places where he appointed, be it in any Kingdome whatſoeuer.

Schollers trained vp in a moſt deuilish Doctrine.

Such as died in thoſe enterpriſes, were adored by the people of the Countrey, and reputed to be Angels: as a new kinde of Doctrine, authoriſed, maintained, and practiſed at this day, ſubborning Subiects, to murder Kings and Princes of the Land, and afterward, to Canonize thoſe murdering Aſſaſſins and Rauillacks, among the bleſſed numbrr of Martyres.

Quoſdam Pueros de terra ſua faciebat in Palatijs educare, et ibi addiſcebant Idiomata, & docebantur Dominum ſuum ſuper omnia timere, eique vſque ad Mortem obedire, vt ſic poſſent ad gaudia Paradiſi peruenire. Quiſquis in obedientia moriebatur, à gentibus terræ pro Angelo colebatur, ſo ſaith Nangis.

God the preſeruer of Kings and Monarches, altered the heart of this Viell dit Montaignes, who repenting, that he had proiected the death of the ſaid King Saint Lewes: ſent him new Arſacides in all diligence, to aduertiſe him for care of himſelfe, becauſe there were Gallants come to his Court, that verily purpoſed to murder him.

King Lewes his Guard of an hundred Gentlemen.

Saint Lewes amazed at theſe ſtrange tidings; according to the aduiſe of his Counſell, tooke for the Guarding of his perſon, an hundred Gentlemen, well qualified; and of Noble extraction, bearing the title of Eſcuyers des Corps, and in the language then vſed, called De Seriants Ly Roys.

Each of the ſaid Seriants wore a long Caſſocke, and white ſleeueleſſe Iacket, reaching downe ſo low as beneath his knees, embrodered and thickly ſpread with Butterflies of ſiluer embоſſed, and both before and behinde was likewiſe embrodered the ſhrubs of the Broome-Floure, with a Hand aboue, as deſcending out of Heauen, holding a Crowne, and for the expreſſion of the deuiſe, there were three Roules plaited, with theſe words, Deus Exaltat Humiles.

Originall of the Kings hundred Gentlemen.

They caried Battle-Axes of Copper, ſo ſaith Nangis. Rex ſalubri conſilio vſus, emptus ſuum Per Homines Nobiles Cupreas clauas aſſiduè deportantes, fecit diligentiſimè cuſtodiri. From thence, ſome haue deriued the ſourſe and firſt Originall, of the hundred Gentlemen of the Kings houſe; and others, that of the Scottiſh Guard.

The hundred Gentlemen of the Kings houſe, heretofore carried nothing but Battle-Axes, of ſuch ſhape and faſhion, as is ſeene engrauen on many Tombes, which are in the Church, and at the Cloyſter of Saint Katherine, du Val des Eſcoliers à Paris, and elſe-where. In following time, ouer and beſide the ſaid Battle-Axe; they carried Le Bec de Corbin. And heretofore, at their enterment, (with their other Armes) was carried before the body, the Battaile-Axe, and the Bec de Corbin: And on their Tombes, the ſame Armes were engrauen En Saultoir, beneath the Eſcutchions of their owne Armes.

Guardes to the Predeceſſours of S. Lewes.

Nor doth this ſo alter the caſe, but that our Kings, of the firſt, ſecond, and third Ligne, Predeceſſours of S. Lewes, had in like manner their ordinary Guardes. For S. Gregory of Tours, in diuers and ſundry places of his Hiſtorie of France, doth there auouch vnto vs the contrarie. And namely, ſpeaking of the King of Orleans, Saint Gonthran, in his Hiſtorie of France.

King Phillip Auguſtus, called the Conquerour, had ſome feares and affrights, as well as Saint Lewes his youngeſt ſonne. For the great Chronicle of S. Denys in France reporteth, that the ſaid Auguſtus being on a day at Pont-Oiſe; newes were brought him from parts beyond the Seas, beſide Letters ſent from ſome of his friends, containing, that Le Vieil de la Montaigne had ſent two Arſacides into France, at the requeſt, or rather command of King Richard of England. For hee had newly ſlaine the Marqueſſe, who was a Noble and puiſſant Knight in Armes, and gouerned both prouidently and vertuouſly his Land, before the comming of the two Kings. At theſe newes the King became much moued and troubled, ſo that preſently he departed from Point-Oiſe, and thence-forward was very curious and carefull, for ſafe-guarding of his body, becauſe his heart was greatly diſmaied at theſe tydings. And in regard his feare and doubt encreaſed daily more and more, he was councelled by his familiar friends, what he ſhould doe in this caſe. By their aduiſe, he ſent to Le Vieil de la Montaigne, who was King of the Arſacides, to haue more plaine and certaine information. And while the Meſſengers were gone about the buſineſſe: Hee eſtabliſhed Serients, who alwayes carried great Battle-Axes of Copper before him, as Guards to his Body; and in the night time they watched by him, ſome after other, and ſo diſtinguiſhed the ſeuerall houres of the night.

What enſued on the great feare and diſmay of King Lewes.

This is that which Rigordus hath obſerued, in the life of the ſaid King Phillip Auguſtus, vnder the yeare One thouſand one hundred foureſcore and twelue. Allatæ ſunt Philippo Regi apud Pontiſarum literæ de tranſ-marinis partibus, quod ad ſuggeſtionem, & mandatum Regis Richardi Angliæ mittebantur Arſacidæ ad Philippum Regem Interficiendum. Interfecerunt enim eo tempore Marchiſium Regis conſanguineum. (This is vnderſtood of Conrard, Marqueſſe of Montferrat, Prince of Tyre, and King of Ieruſalem, by meanes of his wife, murdered by two Arſicides, by conſpiracie of the Templers, enuious againſt the valiancie of this Prince, who was the ſcourge of the Sarrazins) in tranſ-marinis partibus Virum in armis ſtrenuum, qui viribus ſuis, & potentia Terram Sanctam, antequam Reges illi illuc venirent, mira, ſtrenuitate regebat. Rex vero Philippus auditis literis, ira inflammatus, ſtatim ab eodem caſtro receſſit, & plurimum ſollicitus multis diebus permanſit. Et quia animus ipſius Regis pro huiuſmodi rumoribus multum turbabatur, & ſollicitudo magis, ac magis creſcebat in dies, habito cum familiaribus, conſilio miſit Nuntios ſuos ad Vetulum Arſacidarum Regem, vt per ipſum rei veritatem diligentius, & plenius cognoſceret.

Concerning the firſt inuenter of Nauigation.

HEE that was the firſt among men, diſdaining the furie of the Windes, drying vp wholly the Deſert Lybia, euermore counterbanded, oppoſite and contrary to his Brethren the Windes of the North, North-North-Eaſt, and North-Eaſt; who without apprehending the Raynie ſweltie heates, and tempeſtuous Windes of the South, aduentured himſelfe on the inconſtant billowes of the raging Seas, chuſing a Barke or Veſſell of Wood,

Wood, containing the estimate of three or foure fingers in thickneſſe, to serue as Iudge and Arbitratour of his Life; Without all question to the contrary, was indued with an inuincible courage, and his heart so armed, as with a triple Breſt-plate of Braſſe. Be it, that he was thereto incited, to tame the furious Lyon the Ocean, thorow auarice and desire, to enrich himselfe with strange spoyles; or by ambition, to conquer new Prouinces, and command ouer them; or elſe by a desire truely generous, deseruing to haue a well seated soule, to know and vnderstand the wonders of the world.

Illi robur, & as triplex
Circa pectus erat, qui fragilem truci
Commisit Pelago ratem
Primus: nec timuit præcipitem Africum
Decertantem Aquilonibus:
Nec tristeis Hyadas, nec rabiem Noti.

Very excellently said the Lyrique Poet, in the first of his Verses.

The reason of King Lewes his two voyages into the East.

Ambition, for conquering new Prouinces, nor desire to enrich himselfe with Gold, and the precious Stones of Mexico and Peru, or the Spiceries in the Isles of Sonda; had any power to instigate the good King Saint Lewes, for making his passage into the East two seuerall times. But it was the onely desire of Gods glory, aduancement of the Catholique Faith; and the conuersion, or extirpation of people, that were Infidels and miscreants.

Of the Kings of the first and second Ligne in their voyages.

The Kings of the first and second Ligne, did make diuers voyages into Germanie, Italie and Spaine, as well to winne conquests there, as to fight against their enemies. But there was not one of them, that attempted to passe ouer the Seas, for to plant there the Faith õf Iesus Christ. Vnder the third Ligne, the Seas serued as Galleries and ordenary walkes, for the Princes and great Lords of France, euen into Palestine and Aegypt, to vn-nestle the Sarrazins; yea, and into Thrace, to chastise the Grecian Emperours for their perfidie and disloyaltie, on behalfe of the Christians that were Latines.

The third ligne exceeded both the other in length of reign

And like as our Kings of the third Ligne, did surpasse the two other in deuotion and Pietie, euen so did their Reignes continue much longer, then the first and second together. In regard, that long life is promised as a recompence to such, as honor our Mother the Catholique and Apostolique Church (out of which there is not any to be saued) defending and protecting her from her enemies.

Vnder the Reigne of Phillip, first of the name, was made that famous enterprise, for Conquest of the Holy-Land; whereto the Kingdome of France (alone) furnished and contributed more Princes, Noblemen, and worthy Warriours, then all the rest of Europe together. In like manner, it had the honour (farre aboue all Nations elſe, for giuing Kings to the holy Citie of Ierusalem; yea, Princes to the best Cities in the Lands of Idumea, Armenia and in Cyprus, and Emperours to Constantinople.

The Kings of France voyagers to the Holy-Land

The Kings, Lewes the seauenth, tearmed the yonger (in regard of the difference betweene him and Lewes le Gros his Father) otherwise called the Pittifull; Phillip Augustus his Sonne, tearmed the Conquerour, and Gods-Gift; and his yongest Son Saint Lewes (the subiect of this discourse) made the voyage in person ouer the Seas, with most part of the Princes of their Blood, and S. Lewes two seuerall times.

The first voyage of King Lewes to Aegypt and Palestine.

His first voyage into Aegypt, and into Palestine, was in the yeare of Grace, One thousand two hundred fortie and eight. After he had set downe his firme resolution to doe it; all the remainder of his life (which was two and twentie yeares) hee cloathed himselfe more meane and simply, then all the rest of his Court. For he would not weare any costly or sumptuous garments; neither would hee weare Furres of Minever or Gray, nor Scarlet cloath, or Stirroppes or Spurres guilded. His garments were of Cammels haire of Persia, being of Watchet or Blew-Celestiall-colour, and they were furred with the skinnes of Garintes, and the legges of Hares, so saith the Lord of Ioinuille in his Life. Hee made no more more vse of Greene, Red or fine Murrey or Violet, nor exquisite Furres, as the Ermine and Letice. His Spurs, the Bridles of his Horses, and his Stirrops were plaine white, or a water-colour, without any guilding or embrodery. Ab illo tempore quo iter transmarinum arripuit, nunquam indutus est, Squaleto, vel panno viridi, seu Brunetta; nec pellibus varys, sed veste nigri coloris, vel Camelini Persei. Similiter ex tunc nunquam uti voluit calcaribus vel frænis, nisi omnino albis & ferreis absque aliqua aurarura, nec cellis ad equitandum nisi albis, sine omni pictura: These are the words of William de Nangis, Monke of S. Denys in France, writing his Life.

The Kings of England Dukes of Guyenne & Normandie.

In those times the Kings of France had not any Port of the Sea belonging to them, where they might take Shipping for long Voyages, and the Hauens to remaine in their owne power: For the Kings of England (being Dukes of Guyenne and Normandie, vnder the hommage of France) possessed all the Ports of the Ocean Sea, from Boiome, so farre as into Piccardie, which the Counts of Vermandois held, and the Counts of Flanders the rest of the Sea. The Counts of Prouence and Tolosa, had in Languedocke and Prouence, the Ports of the Mediterranean Sea (which is the very shortest cut for passage into the Leuant Sea) vnder their subiection. So that Saint Lewes was constrained at his first voyage, to borrow of the Count of Prouence his Brother, the Port of Marseilles, from whence hee lanched forth his Armie (which consisted of two and thirtie thousand men) the fiue and twentieth day of August, in the yeare One thousand two hundred fortie and eight, shaping his course for Cyprus, where hee arriued in the Moneth of September following.

William of Nangis, in the life of the same Saint Lewes, more at large declareth, that he did set forth from the Port of Aigue-Mortes; Tandem Rex ad Portum Aquarum Mortuarum veniens die Martis in Crastino beati Bartholomæi Apostoli nauem cum suis intrauit. In which passage he hath failed. For I haue learned in the Towne of Aigues-Mortes, that the Port thereof was not finished, till the yeare One thousand two hundred fiftie two, a yeare after the death of the last Raymond, Count of Tolosa, who is said to decease in the yeare One thousand two hundred fortie nine. And Mathew Paris, who wrote his Historie of England at the same time, and dyed when the same S. Lewes did, obserueth notably; that the said King disanchored from Marseilles, and not from Aigues-Mortes. Rex igitur Francorum vale dicto Papæ (Innocent the fourth, who then held a generall Councill at Lyons, against the Emperour Fredericke) & accepta ab eo remissione peccatorum post factam cum morosa deliberatione confessionem, cum Papali benedictione recedens à Lugduno, versus Marsiliam Lora direxit, & Vexilla. And a little lower.

Progrediensque Christianissimus Rex Francorum multa maiora apud Marsiliam (his Armie had bin greatly iniuried in Auignion, and so was much more at Marseilles, saith this Authour, who noateth all the seuerall particularities, whereof Nangis speaketh nothing) tolerauit detrimenta, ita vt Francorum Primates prouocati, nisi discreti, ac sanctæ Regis modestia retardarentur, istam Ciuitatem cum magna instantia, & indignatione obsedissent.

The Iourney of King Lewes the seauenth to Ierusalem.

When Lewes the seauenth vndertooke the Voyage beyond the Seas, which proued fruitlesse and vnprofitable, by the disloyaltie of Emanuell Emperour of Greece, happening in the yeare of Grace One thousand one hundred fortie seauen, the second weeke after Pentecoast. He made the said Voyage by Land, trauersing with his Armie the Countries of Bauaria, the higher and lower Austria, Hungaria, Bulgaria, and both the Thraces, arriuing at Constantinople; from whence they passed the straite of Galipolis, otherwise called the Arme of Saint George, as also Bithinia, which is the first Prouince of Asia, pitching their Campe at Chalcedon, from whence at length they marched to Ierusalem, and thence to the Siedge at Damas, as we shall (by Gods assistance) declare in the ninth Booke.

The Kings returne by Sea.

The returne of the said King Lewes the seauenth, was by Sea; hauing hired Ships for passage of the Genewayes and Pisanes, and taken for his Guide George, Lieutenant to Roger, King of Sicilie.

Phillip Augustus, his onely Sonne, made his voyage of the Holy-Land, in the yeare of Grace One thousand one hundred foureſcore and ten, at the Feast of Saint

Iohn

Iohn Baptist: and from Vezelay in Bourgongne, he set on towards Italie, to take Shipping at Geneway. Naues, & ea quæ erant victui necessaria, cum armamentis diligentissime parari fecerat, Ianuam venit. All the Fleete was gouerned by the Genewayes, with whom he must of necessitie serue himselfe, because he dis-anchored from their Port. And as for the King of England, Richard, he had made his furnishments at Marseilles; in regard he had not any Port on the Mediterranean Sea, which was vnder his obedience, So saith Mathew Paris, the Monke of Saint Albanes in England. Duo Reges, Francorum videlicet, & Anglorum conuenerunt apud Vizeliacum, vbi corpus beatæ Mariæ Magdalenæ requieuit, in octauis Sancti Ioannis Baptistæ. Deinde Leges venerunt ad Lugdunum ad Rhodanum, postea diuisi sunt ab inuicem, Vnde Rex Francorum versus Genuensem Ciuitatem iter arripuit; & Rex Anglorum versus Massiliam. In this Voyage, our Augustus, as well as King Richard of England, was constrained to be at the mercie of the Genewayes and Prouencials, inured to sayling continually on the Adriatique Sea.

The returne of King Phillip Augustus backe againe.

At his returne, Phillip Augustus made vse of the Genewayes seruice, for landing in Apulia. Ventis, & Mari se commisit, cum tribus tantum Galeis, quas Rufus de Villa Iuuensis ei parauerat ad partem Apuliæ, Deo volente transuectus est. Vbi recuperatâ quantulacunque sanitate, quamuis debilis cum paucis iter arripuit, & transitum faciens per Romanam Ciuitatem, visitatis Apostolorum liminibus, & acceptâ benedictione à Romano Pontifice Cœlestino, in Franciam redyit, circa Natiuitatem Domini, quam apud Fontem Eblandi (Fontaine-Eblaud) celebrauit.

Concerning the Conquest of Constantinople by the French Barons

In that memorable enterprise of the Conquest of Constantinople, made in the time of Phillip Augustus, in the yeare of Grace One thousand two hundred and one, by the Barons of France; Baldwine Count of Flanders; Lewes, Count of Blois; Stephen, Count of Perche; the Marquesse of Montferrat, and other great Lords, named in the Historie of that voyage, described by Geoffrey de Ville Harduin, Marshall of Champaigne. The said Barons were constrained, to goe and Shippe themselues at Venice, and to pay the Venetians for their passage to Constantinople; which they conquered from the Greekes. It was not then knowne in France, what benefit redounded by Ports and Marine prouisions; because our Monarches, contenting themselues with their owne demeanes, and hauing no enemies of strangers to meddle withall had nothing to doe vpon the Seas.

Yet we learne by Rigordus, in the life of Phillip Augustus, that that great Prince hauing resolued to conquer England, from King Iohn without Land, his mortall enemie, in the yeare of Grace One thousand two hundred and thirteene, prepared a Fleete of a thousand and seauen hundred Shippes. But this Fleete was commanded and gouerned by the wadged Genewayes And that for Monsieur Lewes of France his Sonne, elected King of England; was ruled by an English Pyrate, Sir named the Monke, according as we haue declared in the former booke.

Enguerrand de Bailleul first Admirall of France.

And the first Admirall of France, or that euer had bin there by title of Office; was Enguerrand de Bailleul, whom Feron in the Catalogue of the Admirals of France, maketh Lord of Coucy, of Oizy, Montmirell, Marle, La Fere, and other Seignuries; which were falne to the Royall House of Bourbon, to the King of Nauarre Anthony, first of the name, Grand-Father to King Lewes the thirteenth. Hee was created by Phillip le Hardy, Sonne and Successour in the Kingdome of France to Saint Lewes, in the yeare One thousand two hundred fourescore and foure, to command the Fleete, prouided by the said King Phillip, for the Conquest of Cathalogne, Rousillon and Cerdaigna, from King Peter of Arragon; as we are enstructed by William de Nangis, who wrote the Life of the said Saint Lewes. Ibidem captus fuit à Arragonijs Classis Amiralius Ingerrannus de Baillolio Miles Egregius, & alius quidam in armis Arenuisimus Aubertus de Longua-valle interfectus, qui supra Arragones vlterius quam debuit pertransiuit. Istum Aubertum, vt tradunt aliqui, cum potuisset eidem in instanti succurrisse, occidere permisit Ioannes de Hardi-Curiâ Francia Marschallus. Returne we to Saint Lewes.

His first voyage beyond the Seas into Aegypt, was (as we haue said) in the yeare of Grace One thousand two hundred fortie and eight, and not hauing any Port or Hauen on the Adriaticke Sea in his power, that is to say, in the Prouinces of Languedocke, Languedocke or Prouence; he was compelled to borrow of the Count of Prouence, that of Marseilles. From whence he set forward with his Armie, which consisted of two and thirtie thousand men, the fiue and twentieth day of August, the yeare aforesaid.

The Hauen of Aigues-Mortes made by the King S. Lewes.

At his second Voyage, he would be no more be beholding to anothers courtesie, but the Prouince of Languedocke being reunited to the Crowne, by decease of Iane, the last Countesse of Tolosa: Saint Lewes caused to be builded the Towne of Aigues-Mortes, ingirting and entowring it with very strong Wals, with a goodly Port and large Hauen, for the receipt of Shipping, which (to this day) called by his name, La Grau Louis. And it was from this Port of Aigues-Mortes, that S. Lewes set to Sea, for sayling into Affrica, with an Armie of men, being fortie thousand in number, on Tuesday after the Feast of the Prince of the Apostles, in the yeare of Grace, One thousand two hundred threescore and nine.

A new Order of Knighthood instituted by King Lewes.

S. Lewes, for the greater animating and encouraging the Nobilitie of France, in attempting this voyage ouer the Seas with him: As a new recompence & prize of honor, beside the two Orders of France, then in full pride and request, Of the Starre, and Of the Broome-Floure) he instituted a Third, particularly for this last Voyage; the subiect and circumstances whereof, were represented by the Coller of this Order, called Of the Ship, & hanging at the lower end thereof. The Coller of this Order was interlaced with double Scallops, which figured the sandy Shore and Port of Aigues-Mortes; in like manner as the Ship & double Crescents, enterwouen and passed En Saultour, made manifest declaration; that this enterprize was to fight with Infidell Nations, which followed the false Law of Mahomet, who bare the Crescent.

It is not vnknown, that this false Prophet began to appeare, at the time of the Emperor Heraclius, in the yeare of Grace, sixe hundred twenty three. But when he published his detestable Law, intermixed with Christianity, Iudaisme and Paganisme, was in the yeare six hundred twentie & foure, some say one. And then he would haue his false and detestable doctrin to be receiued and embraced, by blood, murder and slaughter of such as refused to allow it.

Ordenances deuised & appointed by Mahomet.

He ordained, that the yeares of his Egire, that is to say, Of his comming forth, in Armes, should be gouerned and accounted by the courses of the Moone: That the Moneths of them also should be Lunarie: That his Armies, Squadrons & Battalions should br ordered, raunged and disposed in a Lunarie forme, and of a Crescent. And that his Successours should carrie for their Armes (as he had done) the Crescent and halfe Moone. Which Orders haue bin carefully kept by the Grand Seigneurs of the Turkes, the Othomans; who in their Standards and Banners beare the said Crescent.

How the Turkes do call Constantinople in their Language.

Nor was this the cause concerning the Citie of Constantinople (which the Turkes in their language call CZARIGRADE and STAMBOVL, that is to say, The Royall Citie, conquered from the last Constantine by Mahomet, second of the name, King of Turkes, on tuesday the seauen and twentieth day of May, in the yeare of Grace, One thousand foure hundred fiftie and three) that the Great Turke carried the said Crescent in Armes, as some haue written; and that the puissant Citie of Constantinople carried for her Armes the Crescent, or halfe Moone, because it was seated on a Port, made naturally in the forme of a Crescent. Like vnto the Citie of Bordeaux, the chiefest of Guienne: Qui porte d'Or au Lyon passant de Gueulles, soustenu ſouſtenu de la forme de leur Hoſtell de Ville d'Argent maſſonnee de Sable à la Tour de meſme, chargee d'vne Cloche d'Azur, porte d'vvn Pont baſty ſur vne Riuiere ondee d'Argent, & d'Azur, au Croiſant d'Argent en pointe, au Chef de France:

This opinion hath not any apparance of truth, for from the time that Conſtantine the Great eſtabliſhed his Imperiall Seate in this new Rome, which hee called by his owne name: Hee gaue for his Armes the Mettall and Colour of the Romaine Empire, as well for the Eaſt as Weſt. C'eſtoit de Gueulles à l'Aigle d'Or eſploie à deux Teſtes. Hee gaue (I ſay) for Armes to the ſaid Citie, L'Eſcu de Gueulles à la Croix d'Or, cantonnee de quatre B. Grecs, which ſome call Fuzils, adoſſez d'Or. This ſecond Letter of the Greeke Alphabet, ſhould repreſent the name of Biſantium, in remembrance and memory of her firſt Founder, Biſas, and Conſtantine the Great, hauing made it become Royall, by reaſon of his ordenary abiding there; was eſteemed as the ſecond Founder, according as the Poet Claudian hath obſerued.

Hoc Bizas, Conſtantinuſque videbunt.

Some there are, who haue interpreted Ces quatre Fuzils adoſſez d'Or, to be the proud titles of the Emperours of the Eaſt, Succeſſours to the ſaid Conſtantine the Great, for a Greeke Cipher or Monogramme. ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ. ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΝ. ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΤΩΝ. ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣΙ. Rex Regum, & Dominus Dominantium; King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, a title of loftineſſe, pride and arrogancie, vainely vſurped by the Kings of Aſſyria, and by Nabuchodonozor, in the Prophet Ezekiel, by Cyrus in Eſdras, and by Phraates, King of the Parthians, by the report of Dion. A Title of honor and preheminence, which appertaineth to none but God onely (in the Apocalips) vnto whom is giuen the power, to eſtabliſh and vnthrow Kings and Princes on the earth, according as it ſeemeth beſt to him.

The Emperors of the Eaſt their preſumptuous titles.

We will ſay of the Creſcent, that it hath bin (from all times) the Symbole and noate of Nobilitie, through all the Nations of the world, yea, euen in them furtheſt off from our knowledge.

The Creſcent the ſigne of the High-Prieſthood, and Royall Dignitie.

The high-Prieſt of the Iewes wore his Tyaras and Mitre, in the forme of a Creſcent, as the noate of his Prieſt-hood, and (by the ſame meanes) the marke of Royall dignitie. Regale Genus Sacerdotium. It was the figure of the Church, compared to the Moone, which receiued her light from the Sunne of Iuſtice or Righteouſnes; her vertue, her ornament, and all her power.

Apoc. 12. 1.

In the Apocalipſe, to demonſtrate the excellencie and Nobilitie of the Church; Saint Iohn exalteth her aboue the Moone. Mulier amicta Sole, Luna ſub pedibus eius, & in capite eius Corona Stellarum duodecim. A Woman cloathed with the Sunne, and the Moone vnder her feete, and vpon her head a Crowne of twelue Starres. Hee placed the Creſcent vnder her feete, becauſe the Iewes Children of the Synagogue, vſed to weare it on the inſtup of their Shooes, for a ſigne of Nobilitie, which they beleeued to be the chiefeſt in the world; as being deſcended from the Patriarches Noah, Abraham, Iſaac and Iaacob. In which reſpect, the Church hauing the Moone vnder her feete, and not on the inſtuppe of her Shooes: gaue it for publique notice and demonſtration, what was foretold of her by the Wiſedome Diuine. Ab initio, & ante ſecula fuiſſe creatam: That ſhe had bin created before the World itſelfe.

Eſay 3. 16. 17 18. 19. 20.

The Prophet Eſay, propheſing to the Iewes, that they ſhould be vſed like ſlaues and pezants, deſpoiled of all their honor, and titles of Nobilitie, be miſerably led into bondage and ſeruitude by Infidell Nations; telleth them. That in thoſe deplorable times, wholly conuerted into ſorrow and bitterneſſe: Their Creſcents ſhall be taken from them, their Chaines, Rings and other noates of Nobilitie. Dominus auferet ornamentum calcea mentorum, Lunulas, Torques, &c.

A Prophecie againſt the proud Iewiſh Women.

The night before that Guye of Bourgongne (Sonne to William, Count of Bourgongne) was elected or created Pope, vnder the name of Calixtus the ſecond; in his Dreame hee ſaw an Angell, who ſet a Creſcent on his knees, to aduertiſe him; that in a ſhort time, hee ſhould be the vniuerſall Head of the viſible Church of God, liuing on earth, and that all the Princes and Monarches of Chriſtendome, ſhould yeelde him ſubmiſſion, and render him all honour and obedience.

The people of Arcadia, a Prouince of Greece, eſteemed themſelues the very Nobleſt Nation of the world, as Ouid ſaith.

Orta prior Luna (de ſe ſi creditur ipſis)
A magno tellus Arcade nomen habet.

And they did weare Creſcents and halfe-Moones on their Shooes; like as the Athenians did weare Cigales on their Shooes, to ſhew thereby, that they were naturally Natiues of the Countrey, and not come from any other place. Becauſe the Cigales do liue and dye in thoſe parts, where they firſt receiued life. Whereupon, by way of mockerie, the Athenians were called by the other Grecians their neighbours, Porte Cigales, Cigale-wearers τεττιγοφοροι. The great Doctor Tertullian, in the Treatiſe which he wrote De Velandis Virginibus, mocking the curioſitie of men in his time, to ſing their Nobilitie, ſaith. Debebant & ipſi aliqua inſignia ſibi defendere, aut Pennas Garamantum, aut Cicadas Athenienſium, aut Cyrros Germanorum. That they did either decke themſelues with Cigales or Graſhoppers, after the Antique manner of the Athenians, who did weare them on their Shooes: Or couered their heads with great Tufts, or Perriwigs of Horſes-haire, like the Germaines; Or elſe ſhadowed themſelues, as with an Helmet of Armes, hauing Plumes and Pennaches ſpreading abroade at the top, in imitation and example of the Garamantes, a People farre enouge off from any commerce with men.

Graſhoppers

b People of Lybia, adioyning to the Eaſt.

The Romaines likewiſe (as well as others) vſed for a noate of Nobilitie, Creſcents vpon their Shooes and feete: And vpon this occaſion they were tearmed Lunati calcei, ſaith Martiall.

Lunata niſquam pellis, & nuſquam toga.

Statius in his Boſcages, ſaith.

Primaque Patritia clauſit veſtigia Luna.

And hereupon it was, that Iuuenall mocked a Minnion of Couchette, Caruer to a Gentleman, who ware Shooes of blacke Leather (Shooes beſeeming a Villaine, and men of baſe condition) yet faſtened at the inſtup with tyes of Silke, and Creſcents of Siluer.

Fœlix, & ſapiens, & Nobilis, & Generoſus
Appoſitum nigræ Lunam ſubduxit Alutæ.

It is held for certaine, that our firſt Chriſtian King Clouis, carried three Creſcents for his deuiſe, and by this meanes, the opinion of Du Tillet ſhould be warrantable, ſpeaking of a Fief or Knights Fee, aſſeſſed in the Citie of Antwerpe, by Philip le Bel, King of France and Nauarre, and granted to one named Adam de Villeſonde; with dutie at change of the Lord; of two Arſons for a Horſes Saddle, the one with the Armes of France, and the other with them of King Clouis.

The figure or repreſentation of King Clothaire, firſt of the name, and buried at S. Marcl de Soiſſons, by him builded, is yet to be ſeene; hauing his Dalmatique garnient couered with Creſcents.

Concerning the houſe of Angoleſme.

The houſe of Angoleſme, iſſued from that of Orleans, beareth D'Orleans au Lambeau d'Argent, charge de trois Croiſſants, de Gueulles: As is to be ſeene in the Glaſſe-windowes of the Chappell of Orleans, at the Celeſtins in Paris, and in many other places. And King Henry the ſecond, Sonne to King Frances the firſt, Duke of Angoleſme, bare for deuiſe, Trois Croiſſants d'Argent entrelaſſez enſemble, to make an intire Round, and for the Legend or ſpeaking part thereof; Donec totum impleat orbem.

Kings & great Lords of the Caniballs.

Nations furtheſt off from vs, and which we Baptiſe with the name of Sauages; do acknowledge the Creſcent for the Symbole of Nobility. Kings & great Lords of the Canibals, vpon their Iouiall and ſolemne dayes, doe decke and circle their neckes with Collers, compoſed and made with Creſcents of boanes, well poliſhed and ſhining, as white as Alablaſter. In their language they call Creſcents Yaci, by the name of the Moone, which they entitle ſo: As Ville-Caignon writeth in his voyage of America, as alſo of Brazile.

The industrious people of China, representing the principall God which they adore: holdeth in one hand a Cressent, and a Pony and in the other: as appeareth by relation of the Hollanders, in the yeare One thousand fiue hundred foure-score and fifteene.

The Armes of the Turkes.

Likewise the Turkes, in imitation of their Prophet Mahomet, haue taken the Cressent for their Armes: as saying themselues to be descended of Abraham, For his Children had the assured promise, to encrease and multiple into innumerable people, exceeding the sands of the Sea.

This Mahomet hauing ordained for soueraigne happinesse, to all such as embraced his damnable Doctrine, the voluptuous desires of the flesh, seruing himselfe as the guide and module, marching vnder the Standard of Venus: tooke the Esmaile and Colour of that wanton Goddesse (according to the Theogonia of the Pagans) and her very Liuery, that is to say, Greene, which Martiall describing, by the posture of an amorous Gallant, calleth the Colour of Hearbes.

Herbarum fucatus indutus, Basse, colores.

The Loue-token of Husbands to their Wiues,

The Colour and Liuerie, which Husbands (louing their Wiues) sent them for New-yeares-gifts, on the first day of March, the beginning of the yeare in their Ombelle and Parasoll. In remembrance of that which the Romaine Ladies obserued, betweene the Romans and Sabines, fighting against each other, and falling to agreement. Which Iuuenall hath well noated.

En cui Viridem Vmbellam, cui Succina mittas
Grandia, Natalis quoties redit, aut medium Ver,
Incipit, & strata posita longâque cathedrâ
Munera Fœminei tractas secreta Kalendis.

Which he tooke from Plautus in Milite:

Da mihi quod Kalendis mittam, Martia cum venerint.

And those Iewels or Gifts, sent by Husbands to their Wiues, were not set down in the Inuentarie, after the Husbands decease, according to the modicitie of the price, or small value of the things then giuen. So saith the Lawyer Pomponius, in the Law Sed si vir, at the eight Paragraphe. D. de don. int. vir. & vxor.

Mahomet vsed alwayes to weare Greene colour.

Now, according to the Histories of the Turkes, the false Prophet Mahomet was daily cloathed in Greene, a Colour so highly esteemed among the people, subiected vnder the Turkish Empire, as no man had the sufferance or permission, be he whatsoeuer (except the Grand Signeur, and such as were issued and descended of the Ligne of the false Prophet Mahomet) that durst weare an Emeralde, Sotane, or any other greene thing. Such was the Colonelle and Liuerie of the Turkish Empire, with the Cressent d'Argent. And the very greatest honour that the Turkes could hope to receiue from their Prince, was onely permission to weare Greene. The greatest noate of fauour, which he could afford to his Grand Vizer, and to the Pachats, was to send them a Greene Banner, with a Golden Staffe: which are markes of absolute power, in actions of Iustice, and managing Armes.

The Turkes greatest fauor to his best friends.

The loue of King Lewes to his followers in his last voyage.

Saint Lewes, for leauing a memoriall of his passage into Affrica to posterity; gaue permission to his Lords and Gentlemen, which followed him in his last voyage, to qualifie themselues with the name of Knights of the Shippe, and of the Double Cressents, and to beare about their Armes the Coller of the said Order, composed (as we haue already said) of double Cressents of Siluer, and double Scallops of Gold, fastened together with double Chaines of Gold. The Coller finished Ouale-wise, wherein was presented an Armed Shippe, Frette d'Argent en Champ de Gueulles, à la pointe ondoyee d'Argent, & de Synople.

Hee gaue permission likewise to such as would; to take the Shippe for Armes or Crest, crest, & the enquirie thereof was as a title of honour & prerogatiue, D'Or au Nauire Argent aux Banderolles de Gueules. We let passe vnder silence, the names & qualities of the Princes, Lords and Gentlemen, which accompanied the said King S. Lewes in his two Voyages beyond the Seas: because they are particularly discoursed in the Gests of those Voyages.

The death of King Lewes Before Carthage in Affrica.

This good Prince being dead of a Dissenterie, at the Campe of Carthage in Affrica, the first day of August, One thousand two hundred three score and tenne; his body was boyled in Wine and Water, vntill that the flesh was neately diuided from the bones. His flesh and entrailes were giuen to the King of Sicilie, Monsieur Charles of France, brother to the King, who caused them to be interred in the Monasterie of Mont-reall, of the Order of Saint Benedict, neere to the Citie of Palermo in Sicilie. But the bones, wrapped vp worthily in Soare-cloath and Silkes, excellently embalmed with most precious perfumes; were carried to S. Denys in France. And with them, those of his Sonne Monsieur Iohn of France, Count of Neuers, dying in the Campe, and of the same disease; As we learne by William of Nangis, in the liues of the said S. Lewes, the threescore and fifteenth Chapter, and of Philip the Hardie, the first Chapter.

The decaying of this Order in France.

Concerning this Order of the Shippe and Double Cressents, it continued not long in France, after the death and buriall of the good King S. Lewes; there being none left but the Nob'emen, that bare him companie in this his last voyage, who kept the memorie thereof on their Armes and Collers.

The continuance of this Order in Naples & Sicilie.

But it held full power in the Kingdome of Naples and Sicilie; because Monsieur Charles of France, brother to the said King Saint Lewes, Count of Anion, Maine, &c. King of Ierusalem, Naples, and Sicilie, first of the name, and Count of Prouence, tooke the same Order for himselfe, and his Successours the Kings of Sicilie, it began retained by the first Ligne of the said Kings: And vntill such time as the Kings of Arragon vsurped the same Kingdome, against the second Ligne of Anion. It was reuiued againe, vnder name of the Order of the Cressents, by the good King Rene of Sicilie, Duke of Anion, and Count of Prouence, according as we shall declare elsewhere.

Of the Ceremonies obserued in this Order.

We learne the Ceremonies obserued in the time of S. Lewes (and how the Kings conferring and giuing the Order of Knighthood, were then in their chiefest and most pompous State:) by Mathew Paris a Monke, in his Historie of England, in the time of King Henry the third, who liued in the reigne of the said King S. Lewes, the yeare of Grace One thousand two hundred fortie seauen: when the said Henry newly made Knight the Count of Valence, a Poictouin, William of Lazignan, his Brother by the Mothers side.

Dum tanto solemnitate in Ecclesia West-Monasterij magnifice continuaretur, Dominus Rex veste deaurata, facta de preciosissimo Baldekino, & Coronula Aurea, quæ vulgariter Garlanda dicitur, redimitus sedens gloriose in solio Regio iussit aduocari fratrem suum vterinum Willelmum de Valentia, cum suis sodalibus quampluribus, qui cum eo statim suscepturi arma, prout decuit, sastigiose susceperunt. Ipsumque Dominus Rex, cum alijs Comitibus Baltheo Militari Gaudenter Insigniuit. That which this Author calleth Baldequin, or Baldakin, should be vnderstood of a piece of Curled Cloath of Gold, whereof the Kings Roabe or Garment was made, crowned with a Garland, and a like Wreath, or Circle of Pearles and precious Stones; which then Kings, Princes and Princesses ware at solemne Festiuals, and on dayes of delight.

William Cosit of Holland chosen King of the Romans, and created Knight.

In the Chronicles of Flanders, vnder the yeare One thousand two hundred fortie seauen, William, Count of Holland, was elected King of the Romaines, being but a yong Gentleman, made Knight before he was crowned at Aix la Chapelle in Germanie. After the Gospell, the King of Bohemia, one of the Electors of the Empire, presented the Knight (which should be made) to Pedro Capuccio, Cardinall of Saint George Au Voile d'Or, vttering to him these words. Vestra Reuerendissima Pater Almistue, præsentamus hunc electum Armigerum; deuotissime supplicantes, quatenus vestra Paternitas votiuam eius professionem suscipiat, vt militari nostro Collegio inscribi valeat.

Vpon this demand, the Cardinall represented what qualities a Knight ought to be endued withall: That he must be generous and magnanimious, honest and ... uile in conuersation, and of singuler integritie and vprightnesse.

Afterward, he gaue him to vnderstand, what the Ordenances and Statutes ... Knighthood were, and how practised from all times.

Ordenances belonging to the Order of Knighthood.

First of all, to heare daily the Office of the Passion of our Sauiour.

To expose his person couragiously, for defence of the Catholique Faith.

To deliuer the Holy Church and her Ministers, from all such as would ... them.

To defend and protect Widdowes, Orphanes, and miserable or distressed ... sons:

The auncient Order & manner of making Knights.

At the end whereof, the Cardinall hauing made his demand to the Gentleman there present; If he would be a Knight; Receiuing his answere and consent, as ... his Oathe: then he said after the Cardinall as followeth. Ego Willelmus ... sis militiæ Princeps, iureiurando profiteor regulæ militaris obseruantium; ... Domini mei Petri ad velum aureum Diaconi Cardinalis, & Apostolicæ Sedis Legati, per hoc sacrosanctum Euangelium, quod manu tango. Whereto the Cardinall ... this answere;

Hæc deuota professio sit peccatorum tuorum vera remissio. Amen.

And after he had giuen him a blow on the cheeke, and caused him to guird on his Sword; then he proceeded in this manner:

Ad honorem Dei omnipotentis te Militem Ordino, ac in nostro Collegio te gratanter accipeo. Et memento quoniam Saluator Mundi coram Annâ Pontifice prolatus, & illusus est; coram Pilato præside flagellis cæsus, ac spinis coronatus; coram Herode chlamyde vestitus, & derisus est, & coram omni Populo nudus, ac vulneratus in Cruce suspensus est. Cuius approbria memorari te suadeo, cuius Crucem acceptare te cunctis, & mortem Christi vleisci te monco.

The Kings of France made Knights by Prelates.

It was the custome in auncient times, to receiue the Order of Knighthood at the Prelates hands. And so it was long time kept and maintained among the French, as holding it no meane principle of Christian Religion, to fight for the Church, and such as were the holy and reuerend Fathers thereof. Yea, Kings themselues were euer thereto deuoutly affected, as neuer disallowing their graue aduise and counsell, in the most serious affaires concerning their Kingdomes, and for propugnation of their Common-weales.

Examples are numberlesse in this case, and would be ouer-teadious to the Reader, if they should be set downe, according to the testimonie of many learned and ... cious Authors. It shall therefore serue as a sufficient and warrantable proofe, ... our most-Christian Monarches, after they were Sacred and Crowned; receiue the Order of Knighthood at the Prelates hands, which had Sacred and Crowned them. As (in our time) King Henry the Great, by Messire Nicolas de Thou, Bishop of Chartres; and King Lewes the thirteenth, now reigning, at the hands of the most Illustrious Cardinall, Deane of the Cardinals, Frances, Duke of Ioyeuse, Peere of Fraunce, Archbishop of Rouen, and Primate of Normandie.

The Order of Saint Michaell, Instituted in the Citie of Amboise, in the yeare of Grace, One Thousand foure hundred threescore and Nine.

CHAP. V.

The Order of Saint Michaell.

LEWES King of France, Eleuenth of the name, following the designes and will of his Father Charles the seauenth, reuiued the Glorious, after the Order of the Starre was abolished, instituted the most famous Order of Knights, called Of Saint Michaell.

Kingdomes, Prouinces, Cities and Townes, yea, and men perticulerly, haue each one their Tutelarie Angell and Guardian. Varios custodes Vrbibus tunctis Mens Diuina distribuit: Vt Animæ Nascentibus, ita Populis fatales Genij diuiduntur. So saith Simmachius.

It is the Doctrine of Mercurius Trismegistus, and of Iamblichus, de Mysteriis Ægyptiorum; conformable to the sacred Scriptures.

In Daniell the tenth and twelfth Chapters, the Arch-Angell Saint Michaell fought against the Angell-Guardian of the Persians Empire. Princeps Regni persarum resistit mihi vno, & viginti diebus: & ecce Michael vnus de Principibus primis venit in adiutorium meum. The Princes of the Kingdome of Persia withstood me one and twentie dayes: but loe, Michaell one of the chiefe Princes came to helpe me. That which the Prophet spake there, concerning the Princes of the Persians and Grecians; is vnderstood of the Angels-Guardians and Tutelaries of the two Monarchies.

Dan. 10. 13. Dan. 12. 2.

We reade in Iosephus, Agesippus, and other Ecclesiasticall Writers, that (some indifferent while) before the Emperours Vespasian and Titus, Father and Sonne, besiedged and tooke the holy Citie of Ierusalem; there were heard in the Temple thereof, the plaine and articulate voyces of Angels-Guardians thereof, saying, Let us depart from hence.

Voyces in the Temple of Ierusalem.

The Romaines were of the selfe same beliefe. So that with solemne Sacrifices, they celebrated daily the memory of the Tutelarie God of their Citie of Rome, whom they stiled by the name of Romanessus. Which name they accounted to be so sacred, as it was prohibited to pronounce or discouer it, vnder paine of death. In this respect was it, that a Romaine Knight had death inflicted on him; because (by mischance, or some other light meanes) he had vttered the name of this their Tutelarie God, as it is obserued by Alexander ab Alexandro, in his Geniall Dayes. And the Romaines prohibited this the more rigorously, as fearing least the name of their Genius, being made knowne to such Nations as were their enemies; he might be called away, and drawne to their Citie, which would haue bin the losse and vtter ruine of their State. For, in besiedging a Citie of their enemy, the Romaines (by certaine Sacrifices and Enchantments) called to the Genius or Demon-Guardian thereof, entreating and coniuring him, that if he would come thence to Rome; he should there haue a much more stately and magnificent Temple, and be a thousand times much more honored, then he could be in that poore besiedged Citie. As verily beleeuing, that by such Ceremonies, those Penates and Dij Patrij, would forsake their former abiding Cities, and goe with them to Rome.

Romanessus the Tutelarie God of Rome

The reason why the Romans feared to haue the name of their Tutelary God knowne.

Excessere omnes adytis, aris{que} relictis
Dij quibus imperium hoc steterat.

So effectually speaketh the Latine Poet.

The

The Tyrians being beſiedged, would needes enchaine Hercules (their Tutelarie God) with Chaines of Gold, for feare leaſt he ſhould leaue them, ſo obſerueth Plutarch. And vpon this Subiect Nations of the Gentiles Pagans, adorned (in their Temples, thoſe Idols which were their pretended Guardian-Gods: to whom, (on a certaine day yearely) they performed diuers Sacrifices, with humble and deuout prayers; to the end, that they would continue firme and immouable in their Cities and Townes. Others inuoked (in generall) all the Tutelarie Gods, and would not haue any in particular: becauſe they would not be at the pe- rill, either to make them faſt, or looſe them, by being called thence, and coniured to ſome other place.

Nations moſt barbarous, and furtheſt off from our knowledge, haue done the ſame. For the Yngas of Peru, in their Royall Citie of Cuſco, had a goodly and magnificent Temple, built after the faſhion of the Romaines Pantheon: in this Temple did the Weſt Indian Kings, place the Gods of ſuch Nations and Pro- uinces, as were by them Conquered and ſubdued: being thereby confirmed perſwaded, that they ſhould keepe thoſe Prouinces vnder tearmes of duetie and obedience; becauſe they held (as Hoſtages) their Tutelarie Gods, and Protectors. As is written by Ioſephus Acoſta, in his naturall Hiſtorie of the Indies.

S. Michael the Tutelarie Angell of France.

Saint Michael, the moſt excellent of the Order of Angels, hath beene honoured by the French, as being the Tutelarie Angell and Guardian of all France, the moſt noble Monarchie of the World, and therefore he is called Princeps Imperij Francorum. A title which this Angell tooke, when (vnder the Reigne of Childebert, King of France, called the Iuſt, and third of the name) he appeared in the yeare Seuen hundred and nine) to Aubert, Biſhop of Auranches; commanding him to prepare and build a Church, vpon a Rocke in his Dioceſſe, called the Tombe, otherwiſe named Tombe-Helene, and The Perill of the Sea, as Sigibert writeth in his Chronicles Childeberto Monarchium Regni Francorum tenente, Archangelus Michael apparens Auberto Abrincatenſi Epiſcopo, monuit eum ſemel, & iterum, vt in loco Maris, qui propter eminentiam ſui Tumba vocatur, fundaret Eccleſiam in ſui memoriam. And ſince that time the Mount Saint Michael hath beene frequented with Pilgrimages, which are yearely made thither, from all the parts and quarters of France.

The Feaſt day of S. Michael in France.

Alſo ſince that time, the French haue honoured yearely (with a ſolemne Feaſt and reſt from all labour) this Apparition on the ſame day as it was done, namely the nine and twentie of September: a day dedicated to the Arch-Angell Saint Michael, in remembrance of his Apparition on the Rocke Tombelaine. Commanded to be kept moſt ſtrictly, with thoſe which are ſpecified by our King and Emperour Charlemaigne, in the ſecond Booke of his Capitularies, at the three and thirtieth Title, De Feſtiuitatibus Anni.

Feſtos dies in Anno celebrare ſancimus, hoc eſt, Diem Dominicum Paſcha, cum omni honore, & ſobrietate venerari: ſimili modo totam hebdomadam illam obſeruare decreuimus. Diem Aſcenſionis Domini pleniter celebrare. Pentecoſten ſimiliter vt die Paſche. In natali Apoſtolorum Petri, & Pauli diem vnum. Natiuitatem Sancti Ioannis Baptiſtæ. Aſſumptionem Sanctæ Mariæ. Dedicationem Sancti Michaelis. Natalem Sancti Iohannis, Sancti Martini, Sancti Andreæ. In Natali Domini dies quatuor. Octabas Natalis Domini. Epiphaniam Domini. Purificationem Sanctæ Mariæ. Et illas feſtiuitates Martyrum, vel Confeſſorum obſeruare decreuimus, quorum in vnaquaque Parrochia Sanctæ Corpora requieſcunt. We vnderſtand by this Capitularie and Ordinance, that the yeares of the Auncient French, began at the Feaſt of Easter, the Feaſt whereof continued the whole weeke; and the like at Pentecoſte. For Chriſtmas had foure Feaſt daies only: which we haue obſerued to this day.

The yeares beginning with the Auncient French.

Now although the Celeſtiall Hierarchie, diuided into nine Orders, containe an innumerable number of Angels, as is written by the great S. Denys Areopagita, firſt Biſhop of our Citie of Paris: yet notwithſtanding, the Church being alwaies illuminated by the Holy-Ghoſt, receiueth no more but three names of thoſe moſt bleſſed Spirits: Michaell, Gabriell, and Raphaell. All thoſe whereof an addition is made, are the ſuppoſed names of Deuils, and not of Angels: which was determined in the the Romaine Councell, held vnder Pope Zacharie, in the cauſe of Adebert and Clement, accuſed of Witchcraft. Cumque per ordinem legeretur, peruenit ad locum, vbi dicit. Precor vos, & coniuro vos, & ſupplico me ad vos Angele Vriel, Angele Raguel, Angele Tubuel, Angele Michael, Angele Adimis, Angele Tubuas, Angele Sabaoth, Angele Simiel. Dum verò hæc oratio ſacrilega vſque ad finem perlecta fuiſſet, Quid aliud agendum eſt, niſi vt omnia quæ coram nobis lecta ſunt igne concrementur? Octo enim nomina Angelorum quæ in ſua oratione Adebertus inuocauit, non Angelorum, Præter Michaelis, ſed magis Dæmonum nomina ſunt. Nos autem, vt à veſtro Sancto Apoſtolatu edocemur, & Diuina tradit auctoritas, non plus quam trium Angelorum nomina agnoſcimus, id eſt, Michael, Gabriel, Raphael.

The decree determined in the Romaine Councell.

Wherefore our King and Emperour Charlemaigne, conformably to this, which had (long time before) beene determined in the Councell of Laodicea, prohibited by his Ordinance, the introducing into the Churches of France, any other inuocation and names of Angels, but the three aboue named: In the firſt Booke of his Capitularies, at the ſixteenth Title, De ignotis Angelorum nominibus.

In eodem Conſilio præcipitur, vt ignota Angelorum nomina nec fingantur, nec nuncupentur, niſi illorum quos habemus in auctoritate; hi ſunt Michael, Gabriel, Raphael.

Among thoſe moſt bleſſed Spirits, Saint Michael is numbred the firſt and chiefe, honoured from all times (as we haue ſaid) for the Tutelarie Angell and Guardian of France: in the protection whereof, he hath alwaies ſhewne himſelfe ſuccourable, euen in the very greateſt ſtormes and torments, that could be threatned againſt it. Wee will only make obſeruation of two memorable examples, happening in two the moſt miſerable Ages, when this flouriſhing Monarchie was (almoſt) within two fingers bredth of her vtter ruine.

Of the two ſeuerall deliuerances of France.

The firſt example concerning the Engliſh in France.

While the Engliſhmen marched thorow all the quarters of France, euen as chaſing out which way they pleaſed to take, by the daungerous and diſmall faction of the houſe of Bourgongne: they beſiedged (with all their power) the auncient Citie of Orleans, then thought moſt dreadfull to the French, in the Month of October, One thouſand foure hundred twentie and eight. The Engliſhmen being perſwaded in their owne conceit, that they (by a generall aſſault) ſhould ſurprize it, and ſo become Maſters thereof: the Arch-Angell Saint Michael, appeared viſibly vpon the Bridge of the Citie, fighting againſt the Engliſhmen, and ouerthrowing their Standards, Banners, and Penons, looking Red with Leopards and Dragonned Lions, according as is ſaid by Monſtrelet. So that the French (thus holpen by Diuine aſſiſtance) beat backe the Engliſh, foiled and conſtrained them to raiſe their Siedge, with a notable loſſe of their men. A moſt worthie victorie, whereof was then ſaid (by way of thankſgiuing) as in the twelfth of the Apocalypſe. Factum eſt prælium magnum in Cœlo; Michael, & Angeli eius, præliabantur cum Draconе: & Draco pugnabat, & Angeli eius, & non valuerunt, neque locus eorum inuentus eſt amplius. And there was warre in Heauen, Michael, and his Angels fought againſt the Dragon, and the Dragon fought and his Angels, And preuailed not, neither was their place found any more in Heauen. For to ſpeake truly, this ouerthrow was the beginning of the ruine of the Engliſh in France, and, that King Charles the ſeuenth wonne to himſelfe the title of Victorious.

The Engliſh driuen from their beſieging Orleans.

Our other memorie is that happy day, Teuſday, the two and twentieth of March, in the yeare One thouſand foure hundred foure ſcore and foureteene, when that furious and bloudie monſter of the League, was beaten downe to the earth by our Gauliſh Hercules, in reducing the Citie of Paris, to the acknowledgement and ſeruice of her Monarche, the valiant and wiſe Pilot of his Ship, Henry the Great, fourth of that name, of eternall memorie. On the day of his entrance thereinto, this great Prince, rendering thankes to God for this reduction, peaceably vpon his knees, in the Quire of our Lady Church: there was viſibly ſeene by all then preſent (being an vnſpeakable number) neere vnto his Maieſtie, S. Michael the Archangel Guardian of his France (in the ſhape and forme of a young childe, aged about ſixe or ſeuen yeares, moſt gracious for excellencie in beautie; and cloathed all in white, according as Painters doe ordinarily figure Angels) who during all the time of Ceremonie, ſtood on the right ſide of the King, and it being finiſhed, he vaniſhed shed immediatly, before any could perceiue how, or which way he went. The King who had fixedly noted all the Masse time this strange apparition; had such a rapture of ioy and gladnesse in his soule, with further hope of subduing the rest of his enemies: that with a loud voice (so audibly as all the assistants might heare him) he said: Our enemies must needes be foiled, when God sends his Angels to assist vs.

The ſecond example, the vtter ouerthrow of the bloudy League and recouerie of Paris.

The ioyfull words of King Henry the fourth.

After the Apparition of the Arch-Angell Saint Michael, on the Bridge of Orleans; King Charles, seuenth of the name, and in whose Reigne this miracle happened, tooke for his Ori-flambe, the Image of the Arch-Angell Saint Michael, with these two deuises, deriued from the Prophecies of Daniel. Ecce Michael vnus de Principibus venit in adiutorium meum.

And the other:

Nemo est adiutor meus in omnibus, nisi Michael Princeps noster.

The Vow made by King Charles the seuenth in honor of S. Michael.

And euen then he made a vow, that being at peace and quiet in his Kingdome, he would create a new Order of Militarie Discipline and Knighthood, in honour of the said Angell-Guardian of the Kingdome of France, whose Image he would beare alwaies in his Great Standard: ouer and beside the Banner of France, Parsemee de Fleurs de Lys sans nombre; euermore caried before our Kings, when in Person they marched to any Warre.

Berry, King of Armes, describing the entrance of the said King Charles the seuenth into his Citie of Paris, reduced vnder his obedience on Fryday after Easter, in the yeare One thousand foure hundred thirtie and sixe (in memorie whereof on the like day yearely, the Court of Parlement, Chamber of Accounts, Court of Aydes, and Towne House, or Guilde-Haule of the Citie of Paris, goe to heare Masse in the Cathedrall Church) informeth vs; that this entrance was made on the Monday, being the day of S. Martin, the twelfth of Nouember, One thousand foure hundred thirtie seuen. And that before the King marched eight hundred Archers, well appointed and Armed, conducted by the Count of Engoulesme, a Prince of the Bloud, and descended of the House of Orleans.

The Royall entrance of King Charles the seuenth into the Citie of Paris.

The King went alone, wholy Armed with gilt Armour, the Helmet excepted; in stead whereof he wore a pointed Cappe or Bonnet of white Beauer, doubled and lined with Carnation Veluet, the Band of rich precious Stones, and on the knot of the Band, a massie tuft of Gold. Vpon his Cuirasse he wore a rich Coat of Armes, of Carnation Veluet, crossed with Gold and Siluer, and thickly embrodered with Pearles and precious Stones. His Horse was couered with a Foot-cloth of Veluet, of blew Celestiall coullour, dangling downe to the ground, all curiously ouer-spread with great Floures de Luces of Gold. The Chanfraine or Front-stall of fine Steele, and aloft on the Horses head a rich Plume of Austridge Feathers.

Before him, and next to his Person, went Pothon de Saintré Treille, who vpon a Truncheon, (painted with Azure, and thickly powdered with Golden Floures de Luces, aduanced on his right thigh) carried the Kings Helmet, Crowned with a rich Crowne, made close with a double Floure de Luce. The Horse of the said Pothon (led by Iohn d'Olon Gentleman, going on foot) was couered with fine white Cloth, charged with Goldsmiths worke of flying Hearts. Before him rode the King of Armes Mon-Ioye, attired in his Coat of Violet Veluet, hauing thereon three Floures de Luces of Gold, and embrodered with great goodly Pearles.

After his Maiestie rode Monsieur le Daulphine, Armed with Armes (in all respects) like vnto the King his Father.

After him followed the Pages of the Kings Chamber, as also those belonging to his Sonne the Daulphine: the said Pages and their Horses cloathed in the Liueries of their Masters, richly embrodered with Gold-Smiths worke.

Before Pothon rode the Constable of France, and the Countes of Vendosme and Tancarville.

After

After the Daulphine, rode the Lord Charles of Anion, his Vncle, on the right hand, with the Countes De la Marche, and de Perdiac on the left.

And after followed the Bastard of Orleans, himselfe Armed at all points, and his Horse courred with Gold-Smithes worke, and a ribh Chaine of Gold, trailing long the Horses backe, made like great Oaken leaues, each weighing fiftie Marcks. Then man conducted the Kings Batalion, consisting of a thousand Launces, Armed all points, and their Horses barbed.

The Standard of Saint Michael the Arch-Angell.

Behinde him rode a Querrie of the Stable, who carried a Vermillion coloured launce in his hand, painted with Stars of fine Gold: and on the top thereof a Standard, of Crimosine Silke, thickly powdred with Starres of Gold, and in the midst, the Image of my Lord Saint Michael the Arch-Angell.

King Charles his entrance into Rouen.

The same King Charles the seuenth, after he had conquered Normandie, and driuen the English-men thence; he made his entrance into the Citie of Roucn (at large described by Enguerran de Monstrelet, Continuer of the Historie of M. Iohn Froissard) on Monday, being the Vigile of Saint Martin, the tenth of Nouember, in the yeare One thousand foure hundred fortie and nine.

Behinde and after the Victorious King (saith Monstrelet) rode the Lord De Culant, Maister of the King his Household, and with him Rogerin Blosset, chiefe Querrie of the Kings Stable: Who caried the Standard Royall of Crimosine Sattine, with an Image of S. Michael in the midst of the Standard, thickly flourished all along with Flowers of fine Gold. And after followed Iohn de Scamuille, called Hauard, Bayliffe of Dreux, in Scarlet Caruer to the King: who carried the Penon, which was of Azured Veluet (that is Celestiall Blew) with three Floures de Luces of Gold, embrodered with Gold, and the same Floures de Luces, likewise embrodered with great Pearles.

The Kings perticuler deuotion to S. Michael.

King Charles the seuenth had a perticular deuotion to this Arch-Angell Saint Michael, so that we reade in the Historie of his Reigne, and in the yeare One thousand three hundred fourescore and foureteene, the twelfth day of Ianuarie; Queene Isabell of Bauaria, his Wife (sirnamed Le Grand Gorre, for her pride and pompe) lying in Child-bed, and deliuered of a goodly Daughter, he caused her to be named Michaelle. And the King also commanded, that the Gate of Paris, whereby we passe to the Charter-House Monkes, to Vannes, and many other Villages, formerly called the Gate of Hell; should be named, Saint Michaels Gate, causing it to be enlarged, and made a great deale wider then it was before.

The Kings daughter named Michaele.

The Streete and Gate of Hell, the name of them altered by the King.

This Street of Hell became so named, in regard that none durst passe thorow it, by reason of wicked Spirits, which were conioyned in the Palace of Vauuerd, a place of pleasure, built in the time of King Robert, as well as Nostre Dame des Champs, and giuen to the Charter-House Monkes by the King S. Lewes, to chase the Deuill out of Vauuerd. A Prouerbe which (to this day) is attributed by the Parisians, to wicked vnthrifts, not hauing the feare of God before their eyes, nor any discipline whatsoeuer. By order also giuen from the same King Charles the seuenth, the Image of S. Michael was placed on the Pinacle, of the Church of Nostre Dame des Champs: as yet it is there to be seene at this day.

Whatsoeuer King Charles the seuenth could not effect, and bring to passe; King Lewes the eleuenth, being his Sonne, brought to perfection, conformably to the will of his Father, executing his designes, and instituting The Order of Saint Michael the Arch-Angell, of which Order, we haue thought good to set downe the Statutes, thus following.

And if the defamer perseuere still in the publication of those words; then, by the Oath which he hath taken concerning the said Order, he is bound to reueale them to his Breth en and Fellowes, what soeuer was heard spoken against their honour and benefit. And after the said Remonstrance, if the euill speaker persist still in the same, they must signifie those speeches to the Knight,against whom the scandalous words were so openly published.

Against iniurious offending Militarie attempts vpon honorable occasions.

7 Moreouer, if any practise to offend, hinder or endamage vs, or our Successours Soueraignes and Heads of the Order, or our Kingdome, vassailes and Subiects; when we,and our Successiue Heads and Soueraignes of the Order, attempt some enterprise in Armes, for defence of the Christian Faith, Reestablishment, or libertie of the Church of God, maintenance of the Crowne of France, the publique good of our Kingdome, and against our auncient enemies, or any other iust quarrell: In such cases, the said Knights of the Order shall be bound to serue personally, if they be able to doe it. And such as are impuissant or vnable, shall send reasonable and competent wages;except a lawfull excuse,& euident impeachment, doe pleade on their behalfe to the Soueraigne of the Order.

Prouided and excepted neuertheless, all hastie matters, and such as require celeritie, the reueiling whereof may be preiudiciall to the said enterprises. And the Knights and Brethren of the Order shall promise and sweare, not to disclose the enterprises of their Soueraigne, nor any thing which shall be deliuered in counsell before them: in acknowledgement of the obligation and faithfulnesse, for the grace and fauour done them by the Soueraign,in not vndertaking,or presuming on any occasion of weight and consequence, without their counsell.

10 In like manner, the Knights our faithfull Subiects and seruants, shall not include themselues into any wars, or long voyages, without our leaue and licence, or of our Successours Soueraignes of the Order. Not that we will, or intend to hinder or restraine our Knights; but that in Lands which they hold of others,they may enter into warre and seruice, in like manner as they had done, before the erection of this Order. And likewise,such as are not our Subiects,nor to our Successers,Soueraignes of the Order; may serue in Armes,and make voyages at their owne pleasure, without making it knowne to vs before; if possibly they may doe so, without the preiudice of our seruice and affaires.

For mouing warr against any Knight of the Order.

13 If either at this present, or in time to come, there happen to be Brethren of the Order, not Subiects to vs, or to our Successours, Soueraignes, and it may so come to passe, that we, or our Successours shall be moued to raise or make warre, against a naturall Lord and Brother of the Order, or against their or his Country: In this case wee openly declare, that such a Knight or such Knights, being no Subiects to the Soueraigne; may lawfully defend their naturall Lord and Countrey, without incurring blame, taxation of their honour, or any misprision against their chiefe Soueraigne. But if their naturall Soueraigne, shall raise warre against the Soueraigne of the Order, his Kingdome and Subiects, during the time of Constitution and Brotherhood of the Order; they may excuse themselues from seruice. But if their Lord will constraine them; they may doe it, without any forfeit of their Honour: prouided that the Lord himselfe goe to the warre in person, but not otherwise, and they make the same (before) knowen to the Soueraigne of the Order, vnder their Hand and Seale.

If he take him with his owne hand, he must frankly quit him on his faith, and so deliuer him: except the Knight be a chiefe Leader in the warre, by him taken Prisoner. And if his Lord will not consent thereto: the Knight cannot (with his honour) take Armes for him, but may forsake his seruice.

If likewise he doe commit any foule, enormous or disgracefull act; he is to be proceeded against by the Soueraigne and Bretheren of the Order, who shall iudge as before is said; but in any other case, he is not to be deprined or degraded. But if the Soueraigne doe offer wrong or preiudice, to any of the Knights of the Order, for which the partie offended doth admonish the Soueraigne and Bretheren of the Order, to award him reason and iustice in his due attendance, and yet his right is denied him: In this case, and not before (the other Knights, hauing made declaration of the wrong) the offended Knight may surrender his Coller, and depart from the Order, without any blemish or scandall to his honour; and yet notwithstanding, with raison his leaue in as honourable manner, as he can best deuise to doe. And on the morrow after the Feast, Masse for the dead, attired in the same manner: At the Offering whereof, the Soueraigne and Knights there present (as also the deputies for the absent) shall offer a great Waxe-Candle, containing a pound of Waxe in weight, adorned with the Armes belonging to the Offerer. And during the time of this Offertorie, shall be read by the Register, a Roule of the names and Sir-names, as also the titles of the Soueraignes and Knights deceased of the said Order: for the soules of whom, and for others likewise departed, he which celebrateth the Masse, shall say at the ending of the Offering, De Profundis, and Prayers for the dead.

The Offering of great Waxe Candles.

What is to be done on the morrow after the Feast day.

35. On the next day after the Feast, the Soueraigne and Knights of the Order, attired in such garments as best pleaseth themselues, shall goe to the Church, to heare the Masse celebrated of our Lady; and the same day, the Soueraigne and Brethren of the Order, may begin their Chapter, in such place as shall be by their Soueraigne appointed. But the Elections and Collections, are to be done at the Chapter-house in the Church, where the Seruice hath bin performed, if there shall be such a conuenient Assembly or Chapter. If not, in such place as shall be liking to the Soueraigne, and where the Knights must haue their white Cloakes or Mantles; and where it shall be enioyned (by the Chancellour of the Ordenance) to all the Knights present, and Atturnies or Deputies for the absent, as also the Officers of the Order; to keepe the Councels of the Chapter secret, especially, the corrections imposed on the Brethren of the Order, without disclosing or reuealing any thing; but what the Deputies of the absent may report and deliuer to their Masters, which onely may touch or appertaine vnto them.

The Office of the Chancellour at the Chapter.

36. In the said Chapter, the Chancellour may relate in generall, what he thinketh fitting should be made knowne; and he is also to perswade, either for correction, or extirpation of vices, and perseuerance for the encreasing of vertues, in all them that are of the Order: to the end, that they may labour, and giue example of good and commendable life, to all other Knights and Noble-men, which shall attaine to the knowledge of them. By the same Chancellour is to be enioyned (in name of the Order) to the last man seated, that he is to depart from the Chapter, and giue attendance without the roome, vntill such time as he shall be called for entrance. In the meane while, the Soueraigne, or his Deputie, or else the Chancellour (in name of the Soueraigne) shall demand (by way of Faith and Oath solemnely) of all the Brethren, and namely of the Soueraigne himselfe, and then of euery one perticularly, beginning at the last to the first: whether they doe know, or haue heard reported by any person worthy of beliefe, that their said Brother and Companion, dismissed from the Chapter, hath done, spoken, or committed any thing, which may be censured contrary to the Statutes, Points, Perticulers and Ordenances of the Order, by meanes whereof, the said Order might be defamed, or any way mispriſed and reproued.

For any such as shall offend against the Rules of the Order.

37. And if it doe appeare, by report of the Bretheren of the Order, that the said partie hath committed any vicious act or offence, contrary to the honour, deuoire and estate of Nobilitie and Knighthood, or some other case, that may import and challenge depriuation; the same shall be related to him by the Soueraigne or his Deputie, or by the Chancellour, from point to point effectually, admonishing a due correction of such imperfections, and such manner of life; that those blames blames, imputations. and defamatorie language, ill agreeing and suting with a man of so great and Noble condition, may for euer cease, and that thence forward, the Companions of the Order may heare better report of him. As concerning the punishments and inflictions; the Soueraigne and Brethren are to iudge of them, according as they shall deeme necessary and conuenient: whereunto the said partie must be obedient, and endure those paines and punishments appointed for him: As (in like manner) is to be exercised and inflicted on any of the Knights present, or Deputies for the absent, being offenders, euen so farre forth, as to the Chiefe and Soueraigne of the said Order.

For auoiding partialitie or fauourable respect either in Prince or Peers

38. Ouer and beside, for diuers reasons before specified, and to the end, that the said louing Companie and Fraternitie, may be the better kept and maintained in equalitie, because reason requireth, that from them which are greatest, should proceede the best example: It is our will, that the issue and examen may as well be made of the Soueraigne, as any of the other, and that paine and punishment may likewise follow, by aduise of the Brethren of the Order, if it doe so come to passe.

Encouragement to the yonger Brother of the Order.

39. And if the Knight which stood dismissed from the rest, be found (by testimonie of the Brethren) to be of good and commendable life, bending his care and endeauour, to high actions of Chiualrie and Nobilitie; recitall must be made thereof (according to the Soueraignes aduise, assisted with the Companions) by the Chancellour, for the more honour of his vertue, with further exhortation, and encouragement, for his continuall perseuerance therein, the more worthily to attaine the due recompence of his praise-full paines. Because it may serue as a good example to other, for their well doing in like manner: the same hauing bin formerly done by the other Knights, of whom remaineth the like good and commendable report.

Concerning complaint of some crime committed, reuealed in the Chapter-time

40. If in the Chapter time, the Soueraigne shall be enformed, that any of the Brethren hath committed some such crime, as may deserue priuation, according to the Statutes of the Order: If the Knight be there present, the Soueraigne shall cause the case to be propounded, with relation of the crime in question; to heare the parties defences, and what he can say for himselfe, for his excuse and discharge, whereupon, right is to be done him by the Soueraigne and Brethren, or else by the greater part of them. And if there be no Chapter kept for sitting, then the Soueraigne is to be aduertised, that he may make it knowne by Letters fast closed, or Patents sealed with the Seale of the Order, which he is to send by the Herald Mont S. Michael (or some other) to the Knight meriting blame, and charged with the case. Enioyning him, to appeare in person at the next Chapter, to be proceeded withall in the matter according to reason. And if the time, for the said Chapter be short in regard of the distance of place, and the dwelling of the Knight thus charged, the assignation must be deferred till the Chapter following; and then (whether the Knight come or no) he is to be proceeded against, notwithstanding his absence.

For auoiding of scandale to the Order, after deprivation.

41 And if it be found, that the Knight hath committed an ignominious offence, and worthy depriuation of the Order: By the Soueraigne & Brethren of the Order, or by the greater part of them; he shall be taken, depriued and expelled, as before hath bin said. And to auoide all scandale, blame and obloquie to the Order, by reason of his transgression: He shall be prohibited, neuer more to weare the Coller of the said Order, nor any other like thereto. Moreouer, he shall be enioyned, vpon the Oathes by him taken; to deliuer the said Coller into the hands of the Soueraign, or else to the Treasurer of the Order. And if (vpon the sentence) the Knight were not present; Letters Patents shall be sent vnto him, sealed with the Seale of the Order: Containing the priuation, sentence, condemnation, interdiction, inhibitions, commandments, and matters aboue named. And if the Knight being so sufficiently summoned, shall refuse to render, or send back the Coller; the Soueraign (if the party be his Subiect) may compell him thereto by the course of Iustice. And being not his Subiect; yet he may proceede according to reason, & as he shall think it most conuenient, by the aduise & counsel of his Brethren, who are Cõpanions of the said Order.

For sending back the Coller of a deceased Knight.

42 When any one of the Brethren of the Order, shall decease & depart out of this life; his Heires shall stand obliged (within three moneths at the furthest) to send the Coller Coller of the deceased Knight to the Treasurer of the Order. Which Heires receiuing the Scedule and acquittance of the said Treasurer; shall thereby be acquitted and discharged, but not otherwise.

Losse of the Coller in any honorable action, and in the contrary.

43 And if any of the Companions, either in war, or such a like honorable action, or in pursuite of some noble occasion, shall be taken prisoner, & (by that meanes) the Coller be taken from him: The Soueraigne of the Order (in such a case) stands obliged to bestow another on him. But if otherwise the Knight shall chance to loose it; he must be bound, to cause another to be made at his owne cost and charge, and so weare it within three Months after, or sooner, if possibly it can be done.

For choice of a new Brother when a place is vacant.

44. When a place is vacant, by decease of any Brother of the Order, or otherwise; election is to be made of another Knight (endued with those conditions before remembred) by the greater number of voices, both of the Soueraigne and Brethren of the Order. Who must giue in their Scedules fast closed, and which are to be receiued by the Chancellour at the Chapter, in a Basin of Siluer. In which Election and all other things, conclusions, and deliberations concerning the said Order) the voyce of the Soueraigne must haue place, and shall stand accounted for two, but no more. Except there are two to be elected, who must haue so many voyces the one as the other. In which case, the Chancellour, hauing collected the voyces by Billets or Tickets, from the Electours in equall number; shall declare to the Soueraigne that equalitie of Suffrages. And then the Soueraigne (out of his owne absolute authoritie) may pronounce and giue his third voice, to which of the two him seemeth best. Or if this way like him not, he may renounce the Election, and then must be giuen in new Scedules as before, to the end, that the Election may be the more iust, and least scrupulous, the Scedules of the absent being (neuertheless) in full force. Whereupon, and in this respect, the Soueraigne and Brethren of the Order, for their more iust proceeding in the businesse, shall sweare, entring into the Chapter; to make this Election, without any regard to loue, hatred, fauour, friendship, kinred, or any other occasion, that may remoue the iudgement of men, from loyall and true aduise or counsell, and to be free from suspition in the Election. Which Oath shall be made on the Soueraignes hand, by all the Knights one after another, beginning at the lowest to the highest.

For proceeding in the act of new Election.

45 And for proceeding in the act of Election, after that the Herauld of Mont S. Michael shall haue signified to the Soueraigne, the decease of any of the Knights of the Order, according as by his Office he standeth bounden to doe: the Soueraigne to signifie the same to all his Companions. Aduising them, that they must all appeare at the next Chapter, with full disposition and preparation, for election of another Knight, in place of him that is deceased. And if the time shall seeme too short, in the iudgement and opinion of the Soueraigne; the said Election may be deferred and respited to another following. And if by accident, or reasonable excuse, some of the Knights sent for, cannot be there present; they may (for that time) haue entertainment and acceptation by their deputies, bringing their elective Scedules, closed and sealed with their Seales.

Another seruice before performance of the Election

46 Be it knowne likewise, that before proceeding to the Election (which is to be done in due time, and place of the ordenary Chapter, and not otherwise) by the Clearke or Register of the Order, must be publiquely read, such matter as he formerly reported by the Herauld, concerning the high deedes & deseruings of the Knight deceased, according to his true commendation and praise.

The order obserued in the Election.

47 All the Scedules and voices receiued, and comparison made of them by the Chancellor; he is then to pronounce the number of them. Then the Soueraign or his Deputie or Committee, shall take the most voices, and name him of whom they haue made choice, saying. Thus, by greater part of voices of the Electours, being now present in this Chapter, and by the Scedules of such as are absent: Our Brother and Companion N. is elected into this Order. Which Election so made, shall be Registred and set downe by the Register, in a Booke seruing expresly for that purpose.

48. If the Knight made choice of by this Election be not then and there present: the Soueraigne writes his Letters to him, sealed with the Seale of the Order; sending them by the Herauld King of Armes, or else some other, signifying to him this this his Election. Requiring him louingly, to accept and receiue graciously, his calling and entrance into the Order: the Statutes and Ordinances whereof, together with the said Letters, shall be sent him double, that thereon he may take aduise, for making it better knowne to him, whether the said Election and association in the Order, may be acceptable to him, or no. Which prouing so, he is to come to the Soueraigne, at the day contained and assigned in the said Letters, to take his Oathes, and receiue the Order and Coller, with other things thereto appertaining. Moreouer, the said Knight thus elected, must hereupon make knowne his meaning and intent to the bringer, and make certificate also accordingly, to the Soueraigne by his Letters.

What is done, if the Knight made coyce of is absent at the Election.

Concerning the qualitie of the person elected, and his vocations.

49. If it shall so happen, that the Knight thus made choice of, be a Potent Lord, or such a person in degree, as may haue, or hath great businesses, affaires, or farre-off voyages, which may be his hinderance and impeachment, for appearing in person before the Soueraigne, at such limited time as he is required and appointed to doe. In such a case, if it seeme expedient to the Soueraigne, he may giue to the Herauld, or him that carrieth the Letters of the Orders-Ordinances; a Coller of the same Order, that, after such time as the Knight elected, shall haue accepted the Election (and not before) he may deliuer it as from the Soueraigne, that the Knight may returne his Letters of acceptation of the Coller, to the bringer thereof, who is to deliuer them to the Soueraigne. In, and by which Letters, the Knight must make promise, to come (if possibly he may) to the next Chapter, or some other subsequent, to the Soueraigne, to sweare the points and constitutions of the Order, and performe all such duties as he standeth bound to doe, according as his other Brethren and Companions of the said Order haue done.

50 This Knight elected, being come before the Soueraigne; at his comming and presentation, he shall deliuer these, or the like speeches.

The words to be vsed by the Knight at his apparance before the Soueraigne.

Sir, or, My most gracious Lord (if he be of the Blood) I haue obserued by these Letters, that of Royall Grace in you, and Loue in the most honorable Brethren and Companions, of the worthy and Noble Order of my Lord Saint Michael; I haue bin, and am elected into that Order and Companie, whereby I hold my selfe to be very highly honored. I haue receiued, and made acceptation thereof, and doe most hartily thanke you, yea, so much as in me possibly remaineth for so great Grace and fauour: tendering mine obedience, and seruice-able duetie in the said Order, so much as in me lyeth to doe.

The forme of the Soueraigns answere.

Whereto shall be answered by the Soueraigne; that the renowne of his vertues, incited both him, and the Brethren of the Order, to receiue and embrace him as their Companion: not doubting, but that he will perseuere in his vertues, and augment the honor of God, to the praise and commendation of the Order; taking the Oath as followeth.

The forme of the Oath giuen to the Knight.

YOu shall sweare, that to your loyall power, you shall assist, guard, maintaine and defend the eminencie, rights and greatnesse of the Crowne of France; of the Maiestie Royall and authoritie of the Soueraigne, and of his successiue Soueraignes, so long as you liue, and shall be of the said Order, you shall imploy your selfe to your vttermost power, to maintaine the said Order, and Honour thereof; taking what paines you can, to augment it without suffering it to decay or diminish, so long as your strength may remedie and support it.

Articles within compasse of the Oath.

51. And if it shall so come to passe (which God forefend) that in you there shall be found some such fault, whereby (according to the Statues of the Order) you are to be deprined, summoned and required, to redeliuer backe the Coller: in such case, you must send it to the Soueraigne, or the Treasurer of the Order, without euer-more (after the said Summoning) wearing the said Coller. And all penalties, paines and corrections, which (in meaner matters may be censured and appointed to you: you are to vndergoe and beare patiently, without rancour, spleene or hatred (for, or in that respect) in you, either against the Soueraigne, Brethren, or any Officers of the said Order.

52 You must, ouer and beside all this, duely appeare at the Chapters and Assemblies of the Order: Or else you must send thither (according to the Statutes and Ordenances thereof) your sufficient Deputie or Atturney. As testifying thereby, your obedience to the Soueraigne, and to his Deputies or Committees, in all things reasonable, concerning the dutie and affaires of the Order; and your owne loyall power, for accomplishing all the Statutes, Points, Articles and Ordenances, which you haue seene and read in writing, and shall hereafter heare read vnto you. To them you shall promise and sweare, as well generally, as perticularly, and to each Point you are to take an especiall Oath. All these things, as you are a Knight of the Order, you must sweare and promise on the Soueraignes hand: by your Faith, Oath and Honor, and on the Crosse and holy Gospels of our Lord.

53 This being done, the elected Knight shall kneele reuerently before the Soueraigne, who shall take the Coller of the Order, and put it about his necke, vttering these or the like words, or causing them to be spoken by some other.

The words of the King, to the Knight.

The Order receiueth you as a louing Companion, and in signe thereof, giueth you this Coller. God grant that you may long weare it, to his praise and seruice, and exaltation of his holy Church, encrease and honour of the Order, and your owne well deseruings and good fame: In the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghost. Whereto the Knight shall answere: So be it, Amen; And God giue me his Grace to doe it.

Afterward, the Knight of the first Seate, he being then present; shall leade or conduct the new made Knight to the Soueraigne, sitting in his Seate. Who shall kisse him in token of perpetuall loue; and so doe all the Knights there present, euery one following another in place and order.

Of refusing the Election.

54 But if the Knight shall excuse himselfe from accepting the Election: the Soueraigne is to make it knowne to the Brethren of the Order: sending them command and order, to make themselues ready in due preparation, for the election of another, at such time, and in such manner as thereto belongeth.

55 The Knights heretofore named, and all other entring into the Order; shall take their Oathes in the forme and manner formerly set downe.

56 And when the Office of the Chancellor of the Order shal happen to be vacant; Election is to be made by the Soueraigne and Brethren of the Order, in manner before related, concerning a noate-worthie man, and of such condition and qualitie as hath bin obserued. And if the new-chosen Chancellour (after Election) shall excuse himselfe from it; it is to be committed to another, vntill such time, as the Soueraigne and Brethren shall be otherwise prouided, according to reason, and by the wayes before remembred.

57 The Chancellour elected, who hath made acceptation of the Office; shall on the Soueraignes hand, or his Deputie or Committee, take his Oath, part whereof followeth.

And those conclusions agreed in the Chapter, concerning penalties and corrections of the Knights, or otherwise, he shall deliuer as thereto appertaineth, and as it is ordained for him, in the Chapter of the Order euery yeare. He appointed also, that the Chancellour of the Order, should weare his Cloake of White Veluet, and the Chapperon of Crimosine Veluet. The Prouost and Maister of the Ceremonies; the Treasurer, Register and Vsher, or King of Armes belonging to the said Order: are to haue their Cloakes of White Sattin, and their Chapperons of Crimosine Sattin, and thereon a chaine of Gold, at the end whereof, vpon the breast, hangeth a Scallop of Gold onely. And in this manner, was the solemnitie performed of the Order, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Iohn in Lyons, on the Eeuen and day of Saint Michael at Eeuensong, and at high Masse. The King of Armes, Herauld or Vsher of this Order, is called by the name of Mont-Saint-Michael.

I haue seene many of those great Cloakes of Cloth of Siluer, appertaining to that Order. And namely two, in the Chappell of the Dukes of Bourgongne, at Dijon, which those Gentlemen of the Noble House of Vienna in Bourgongne, gaue therefrely, to serue for Coapes in the Church, & whereon are the Armes of the said House, De Gueulles a l'Aigle d'Or, ou d'Argent.

To make relation here, of the Chapters, Names, Sirnames, Armes and qualities of the Knights of the said Order; would require the containdure of an whole Volume; from the yeare of the Institution vnto this present, it being yet still on foote. Wherefore, as in the first Chapter, is fully and largely contained the maine maximes, by the Statutes of the Order: So will wee finish this our discourse with the last Chapter, solemnely held and celebrated by King Charles ninth of the name, in the Church of Paris, on the Eeuen and day of Saint Michael, in September. Anno One thousand fiue hundred threescore and twelue.

The solemne holding of the Order, in the Church of Paris, by King Charles, ninth of the name. Anno 1572.

The forme of their sitting.

ALL the preparations being fully effected, the King being come into the Quire of the Church; tooke his place on the right hand, vnder a goodly State of Cloath of Gold Frized. Two paces beneath, and on the same side, were seated Monsieur Henry Alexander of France, Duke of Anion, Brother to the King and his Successour for the Crowne. The Duke of Montpensier, The Duke of Nemours, The Duke of Guize, The Marshall de Tauanes, The Prince Daulphine, La Chapelle aux Vrsins, Rubempre, And Villequier the yonger.

A second State

At the other side of the Quire, and on the left hand, was another Canopie of State of Cloath of Gold, vnder which sate not any person, but onely were placed Tables of Armes.

Of Kings of Spaine, Of Denmarke, And Of Sweden.

And beneath the Chaires reserued for them, as Knights and fellow Brethren of the Order, were seated, The King of Nauarre, afterward King of France, Henry the fourth fourth of the name. Monsieur Frances Hercules de France, brother to the King, Duke of Brabant and of Alencon, The Duke of d'Vsez. The Prince of Conde. De Sanfac. De Losses. De Chauigny. De Rets. And De Villequier the elder.

Their Habits.

The King, Princes and Lords of the said Order, were cloathed in white Sattin, the great Cloakes of Siluer, with long traines drailing on the ground; their Chapperons of Crimosine Veluet, vpon which hung the great Collers.

Before the Kings Seate was a long Forme or Bench, couered with Cloth of Gold, whereon were seated in one ranke, The Chancellour, Treasurer, Register, Maister of the Ceremonies.

And before them, on two Stooles, couered with Cloath of Gold, sate Mont Saint Michael, King of Armes; And Vsher of the Order:

All cloathed with long Mantles of white Sattin, and Chapperons of Crimosine Sattin; as had bin ordained by King Henry the second.

Funerall memorie.

At Celebration of the Vigile, and Masse for the Knights deceased; the King did then weare a great Cloake and Chapperon of Violet colour cloath: And the other wore great Cloakes and Chapperons of blacke Serge, yet had the great Order vpon their seuerall Chapperons.

The Offering.

To the Offering, the King went foremost, preceded by the Officers of the Order, according to their ranke. His Maiestie held in his hand a Candle of white Waxe, containing a pound in weight: being followed by Monsieur the Duke of Anion, his brother, who presented his Offering.

The King being conducted backe to his Seate, Monsieur d'Anion, preceded likewise by the Officers of the Order, was guided to the Offering.

Next to him, the King of Nauarre.

Followed by the other Princes and Lords, according to their Order, from the right side to the left.

There is yet (to this present) to be seene, the most of the Tables, with the Escutcheons of the Knights of the said Order, called or present at this solemne Chapter, in the Quire of the Church at Paris: in which regard I omit their Blazons, and because the more part of them may be obserued, in the Great Order of the Holy-Ghost.

This of S. Michael hath bin continued, and the memorie thereof remaineth to this day: because it is worne by the Princes and Lords, retained and named from Chapter to Chapter, for receiuing that of the Holy-Ghost. And this is the reason, why we behold it rounded with the Armes of the Princes of the house of Lorraine, of Nevers and of Nemours.

And our Kings do yet honor therewith Princes Strangers. I saw it giuen by King Henry the great (of endlesse memorie) to the Duke of Moldauia, and to the Prince his Sonne, depriued of their dignities by the Turkes forces, & withdrawne thence to Paris, where the King gaue them entertainement. The Prince deceasing there in the life time of his Father, his seruice was performed at Saint Nicholas des Champs; the Funerall Girdle of the Church being charged with his Armes, which were thus blazoned.

De Gueulles a vne Teste de Taureau d'Or, somme d'vne Estoile de mesme, Coronne d'vn Bonnet Ducal d'Or releue pour Cimier d'vne Aigrette, & facon de Houppe d'Argent, entour de l'Ordre Sainct Michel.

The moſt excellent and famous Order of the HOLY-GHOST, inſtituted at Paris in the yeare of Grace, One thouſand fiue hundred threeſcore and nineteene: By the Moſt-Chriſtian King of France, and of Poland, HENRY, Third of that name.

CHAP. VII.

The moſt excellent and famous Order of the Holy-Ghoſt.

The worth and dignity of the Order.

OF all the Orders of France, yea, euen of all Chriſtendome, there is not any one more Illuſtrious or of greater Excellencie (as well in regard of the ſubiects dignitie, as magnificence and Ceremonies) then that of the Holy-Ghoſt. Inſtituted, ordained and eſtabliſhed in the Church and Monaſtery of the Auguſtine Friers Heremites at Paris: In the yeare of Grace, One thouſand fiue hundred threeſcore and nineteene, by the moſt Chriſtian King of France and Polonia, Henry, Third of that name, of eternall and ſacred memorie.

The reaſon of the Orders Inſtitution.

This good King, the honour and mirrour to all Princes of his time, in meere deuotion towards God, loue and liberalitie to men, and in remembrance of the day of his Birth, happening on the Feſtiuall day of Pentecoaſt, or Whit-Sunday, in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred and fiftie; and his election to the Kingdome of Poland, as on the ſame day of Solemnitie of Pentecoaſt, One thouſand fiue hundred threeſcore and thirteene. Alſo on the very ſame day (the yeare following) he came to the Crowne of France. In dutifull acknowledgement, of ſo many fauours and perticuler great graces, receiued from God, by aſſiſtance of the Holy-Ghoſt, he inſtituted and ordained this new Order of Knighthood, by the name, and in honour of the Holy-Ghoſt. Whereof he declared himſelfe to be the chiefe and Soueraigne great Maiſter, he and his ſucceſſours the Kings of France. This is eſpecially remarked and carractred, in the firſt Glaſſe-window of the Quire, at the Grey Friers Church, and behinde the high Altar, vnder the deſcent of the Holy-Ghoſt, vpon the bleſſed Virgin and the Diſciples, contained in theſe ſixe Verſes.

Hocce die, quo almus Cœlo deſcendit ab alto
Spiritus, inflammans pectora Apoſtolica,
Erricus Franco ter maximus ortus in orbe eſt;
Electus Populi Rex quoque Sarmatici:
Et Rex Francorum Carlo ſucceſsit amori,
Ipſe amor, & Franci Delicia Populi.

The firſt Seſſion and Ceremonie of the Order.

The firſt ſitting and Ceremonie whereof, was held at Paris, on the Eeuen and firſt day of the yeare, One thouſand fiue hundred threeſcore and nineteene, in the Church of the Auguſtines. In memorie whereof, behinde the high Altar, betweene the two great Glaſſe-windowes, in the Quire of the ſaid Church, was placed a large Table, whereon his Maieſtie was figured to the life; deliuering his Order to Princes and Lords of his Court, all kneeling before him. In like manner was (naturally) there repreſented at the Pedeſtale of this Table, theſe words written in Letters of Gold.

Fortiſſimis & prudentiſſimis vtriuſque militiæ Equitibus, priſcæ nobilitatis, bello & pace de Republicâ optimè meritis, Henricus Tertius Galliæ & Poloniæ Rex Auguſtus, Diuini Spiritus apud Chriſtianos Symbolum pro Equeſtri ſtemmate eſſe voluit, iuſſit, decreuit, plaudente, laudante, acclamante, venerante populo, & vota pro Salute Principis nuncupante, ob ſingularem ipſius pietatem. Lutetiæ Pariſiorum Kal. Ianua. Anno Domini CIↃ.ICLXXIX.

This Table was taken thence in the Feaſt time of Chriſtmas, foureſcore & eight, by harking Souldiours of the bloudie League, madde and enraged with furie of their zeale, and termed the Zealous men of Paris. Of whoſe naturall diſpoſition, and Tragicall actions, a true deſcription is made (in their liuely coullers) by the Hebrew Hiſtorian Ioſephus, in his Fourth Booke of the Iewiſh Warres, the nineteene, twenſie, and two and twentie Chapters, and ſo onward, ſpeaking of the Zealous, meernly imitated in their pilferies and robberies, by theſe Zealateurs of Paris. Thoſe men, to take away the memorie of this good Prince, and the noates or markes of his Royall power, to the end that an Anarchie might be brought in, inſtead thereof; did euery where deface his Figures, and carried away that royall Table; in place whereof they left a memoriall of our Lords Supper, as is there to be ſeene at this preſent.

The mercileſſe trouble cauſed by the League in Paris.

A Deſcription of the great Coller of the Order.

The great Coller of this Order, is compoſed of Floures de Luces of Gold, Cannonned or cornered with flames of Fire, tearmed Flammes de Or Eſmaillees de Rouge, enter-wouen with three Ciphers, and diuers Monogrammes of Gold likewiſe, Eſmaillez de Blanck. The firſt Cipher or Figure is the Letter H. and a Lamba Λ. and both double, which might be read aboue and beneath. They are the firſt Letters, belonging to the names, of the ſaid King, Founder and Inſtitutour of the Order; and of the Queene his wife, Madam Louiſa de Lorraine. The other two were reſerued in the Kings owne minde, of ſome perſons his fauourites. Now followeth the Kings Letters Patents, for confirmation of the Order.

The Kings Letters Patents.

HENRY, by the Grace of God, King of France and of Poland: To all preſent, and to come, Greeting. As in all things created, the omnipotent power of God doth acknowledge and manifeſt it ſelfe: euen ſo is it in the diſpoſition, courſe and conduct of them, which at full auoucheth his holy and eternall prouidence, whereon entirely dependeth all our felicitie. And there is not any thing in this lower world, that doth not thence receiue all happineſſe, and true meanes of well ordering and gouerning it ſelfe. So that if the meaneſt Creatures, cannot withdraw themſelues from his Prouidence: the very greateſt, and ſuch as are conſtituted to higheſt authoritie, cannot ſo well proſper and order themſelues, without his eſpeciall grace and prouidence.

In this regard, from our yongeſt yeares, hauing alwayes thus knowne and beleeued: We haue addreſſed our vowes, and affixed our principall and intire confidence, onely in his diuine goodneſſe. And acknowledging, that thence We haue and hold the beſt felicitie of our life; it is no more then reaſon requireth, that (hauing theſe things euer in our memorie) We ſhould ſtriue to our vttermoſt, in rendring him moſt hartie and eternall thankes, and teſtifie to our poſteritie, his great benefits beſtowed on vs. Eſpecially in this, becauſe it hath pleaſed him (among ſo many diuers and contrary opinions, which haue exerciſed their very greateſt powers in our times) to preſerue vs in the confeſſion of his holy Name, and in vnion of the onely Catholique and Apoſtolique Church, wherein we purpoſe (by his gracious aſſiſtance) both to liue and dye.

His Election to be King of Poland, and returne to France.

Moreouer, becauſe it hath pleaſed him, by the inſpiration of his bleſſed Spirit, on the day and feaſt of Pentecoaſt; to vnite all the hearts and wils of the Noble Polanders, ranking likewiſe therewith all the Eſtates of this potent and renowned Kingdome, and great Dukedome of Lituania; to elect vs as their King and Soueraigne. Afterward, vpon the ſame Feſtiuall day; to call vs to the rule and gouernment of this Moſt-Chriſtian Crowne, onely by his will, and right of our Succeſſion.

Care and regard of Knighthoods honor and ſupport.

In regard whereof, as well for a Commemoration of theſe things before rehearſed, as for continuall fortefying and maintaining (to the full) our Faith and Catholique Religion: Alſo, to decorate and honor (more and more) the Order and degree gree of Nobilitie in this our Kingdome, and reduce it into her auncient dignitie and ſplendour, as that whereto we haue (by naturall inclination and reaſon of kinde euermore borne moſt intimate loue and affection, as well, becauſe therein conſiſteth our chiefeſt ſtrength and Royall authoritie, as hauing heretofore, and ſince our comming to the Crowne, made proofe in many great, hazardous and memorable victories, of our auncient and ſinguler loyaltie, generoſitie and valour, which hath made it ſelfe famous and commendable among ſtrange Nations:) We hauing also owe (next vnder God) our principall and intire band of dutie; the Princes of our Blood, and other Princes and Officers of our Crowne, and Lords of our Councell neere vnto vs, to performe as followeth.

Erection of the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt.

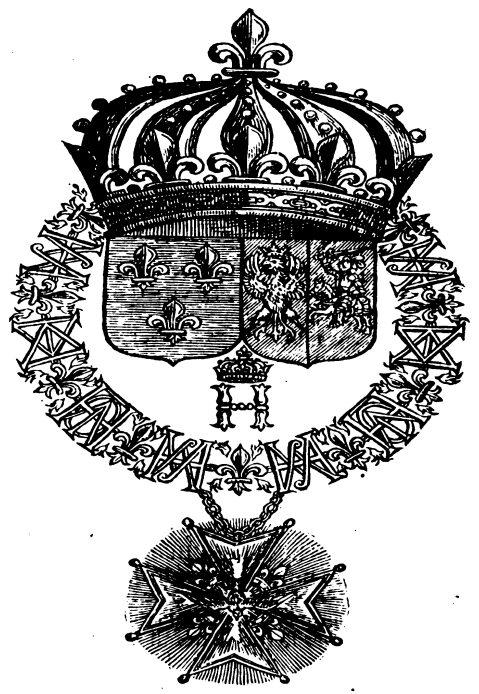
To erect a Military Order in this our Kingdome (ouer and beſide that of my Lord Saint Michael, which our will and meaning is, ſhall remaine in full force and vigour, and be obſerued, euen as alwayes it hath bin from firſt Inſtitution thereof, to this preſent.) Which Order we create and inſtitute, in honor, and vnder the name and title of the Holy-Ghoſt, by inſpiration whereof, as it hath pleaſed God (heretofore) to direct our beſt and happieſt actions: So we moſt humbly beſeech him to grant vs grace, that we may ſee our Subiects reunited in Faith and Catholique Religion, and alwayes hereafter to liue in loue and agreement together; vnder due obſeruation of our Lawes, and obedience to vs and our Succeſſours Kings, to his honour and glory, commendation of the good, and confuſion of the bad: which is the maine end, whereto all our thoughts and actions bend their aime, as to the height of our greateſt happineſſe and felicitie.

This being generally publiſhed and made knowne, his Maieſtie (afterward) diſpoſed himſelfe, to haue the Statutes and Ordenances of the Order ſet downe, and to be as amply expreſſed and ſignified.

Here followeth the Statutes and Ordenances concerned in the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt.

The Soueraign or great Maiſter of the Order.

FIrſt, that in this Order, there ſhall be a Soueraigne, chiefe and great Maiſter of the Order: who ſhall haue full (and abſolute authoritie, ouer all the Brethren, Commanders and Officers thereto belonging. To him onely (and to no other) ſhall appertaine the reception of them that are to be embraced into the Order: all direction and power of making Statutes, and to diſpence with them, which ſhall (for certaine diſpenceable caſes) take exception againſt ſome Articles hereafter ſpecified. Otherwiſe, for what cauſe or occaſion ſoeuer, that may offer it ſelfe; he ſhall neuer grant any diſpenſation. Which to doe, he is to take his Oath, and make ſolemne vowe at his entrance, when he ſhall be receiued as great Maiſter of the Order; with all ſuch faculties and powers, as ſhall be found appertaining thereto by right or priuiledge; euen as if they were ſet downe in more ample manner, and at large ſpecified.



The great Maiſters title vnited to the Crowne of France.

2 That we ſhall (for euer) be the Chiefe and Soeeraigne great Maiſter of the ſaid Order, held and named to be the firſt Founder thereof. Which great and Soueraigne Maiſterſhip, we haue, and doe (from this preſent) vnite and incorporate to the Crowne of France: without any power or meanes of ſeperating it from it, either by vs, or any of our Succeſſors, for what cauſes or conſiderations ſoeuer which may be offered, or any way pretended.

No power before Coronation.

3 That the ſaid Kings our Succeſſours, are not to diſpoſe of the Order (in any manner whatſoeuer) or the Monies thereunto appertaining, neither to conferre any Commander, although a place be voide: vntill he haue firſt bin Sacred, and receiued his Coronation.

4 Vpon which day, they are to be required by the Archbiſhop of Rheimes (or he that ſhall repreſent his place and Office at the ſaid Sacring) in the aſſembly and preſence of the twelue Peeres, and Officers of the Crowne therein to be imployed: to ſweare the obſeruation and keeping of the Statutes of the Order, according to to the forme hereafter following. Which they ſhall ſtand obliged to doe, without any power of diſpenſing withall, for any cauſe whatſoeuer. And on the morrow after the ſaid Sacring, the King ſhall receiue the Habit and Collar of the Order, from the hands of him that gaue him Conſecration: he being aſſiſted therein by the Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the ſaid Order, who are for that purpoſe to be ſummoned thither, and bound to be there preſent.

5 To this end We haue and doe ordaine, that the forme of the ſaid Oath, ſhall be tranſcribed and inſerted in a Booke of the Sacring: with the other Oathes, which the Kings muſt be bound to take, before they are to be Crowned; without at any time afterward, the Act and Oath to be omitted.

6 And foraſmuch as (alreadie) We haue, by the grace of God, receiued the ſaid Sacring and Crowning: yet We intend and purpoſe to take the ſame Oath againe, by the hands of the Arch-Biſhop of Rheimes, or ſome ſuch other Biſhop, as We ſhall pleaſe to appoint in his ſted, at the firſt meeting or Aſſembly, which We ſhall hold of the Order: in the preſence of the Princes and Officers of Our Crowne, with ſuch Lords alſo as ſhall be called thereto, in the Church where the Celebration thereof is to be performed, laying Our hands on the true holy Croſſe, and the ſacred Euangeliſts. Which ſolemne Oath being by vs ſo taken: an Act ſhall be made and paſſed thereof, which ſhall be regiſtred in the ſaid Booke, to ſerue as a Teſtimonie in times hereafter, that We did truly take ſuch an Oath.

The Oath and Vowe made by the King.

The Arch-biſhop or his deputie holdeth the Booke for receiuing the Oach.

7. Wee Henry, by the Grace of God, King of France and of Poland, doe ſolemnely ſweare and vowe on this Booke in our hands, to God the Creator, to liue and dye in the Holy, Catholique and Apoſtolique Faith and Religion, as to euery good and Moſt-Chriſtian King it belongeth, and rather to die then faile at any time-thereon. Wee ſweare alſo, to maintaine for euer, The Order of the Holy Ghoſt, founded and inſtituted by Vs: without ſuffering it to ſhrinke, fall or diminiſh, ſo long as it remaineth in Our power to helpe it. To obſerue the Statutes and Ordenances of the ſaid Order, truely and intirely, according to their tenure and forme. And to cauſe them be kept exactly, by all ſuch as are, and ſhall be receiued into the ſaid Order hereafter. Moreouer, neuer to contradict, nor diſpence, or attempt to alter and change the irreuocable Statutes thereof: perticulerly theſe which are herementioned.

8 Namely, in the firſt place, the Statute, ſpeaking, of vniting the Great Maiſterſhip to the Crowne of France.

Secondly,

Secondly, that containing the number of Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers.

Thirdly, that for not transferring the prouiſion of Commands, either in whole, or any part, to any other vnder coullour of inheritance, Appennage or conceſſion whatſoeuer.

Fourthly, that whereby We Our Selfe ſtand bound (ſo much as in Vs lieth) that We ſhall not (at any time) diſpenſe with the Commanders and Officers receiued into the Order: From Communicating and receiuing the precious Body of Our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, at ſuch daies as are appointed; which are the firſt day of the yeare, and that of Pentecoſte.

Fiftly, that wherein is expreſſed, that We and all Our Commanders and Officers, muſt be Catholiques, and Gentlemen of three paternall races, as euery one muſt and ought to be.

Sixtly, that whereby all power is taken from Vs, of imploying about any other occaſions whatſoeuer, may be vrged or pretended; the monies due and belonging to the reuenewes and maintaining the ſaid Commanders and Officers: Nor to admit any Strangers into the Order, except they be naturalized, and inhabitants of Our owne Kingdome.

Seuenthly and laſtly, that wherein is contained the forme of the Vowes, and the bounden dutie, for daily wearing the Croſſe (with ordenarie garments) and that of God hanging about the necke, faſtened to a Ribband of Blew Silke: And the other habit, on the daies thereto appointed.

All theſe doe we ſweare, vow, and promiſe to performe, vpon the Holy Croſſe, and laying our hand vpon the Sacred Euangeliſts.

What Cleargy men were conſtituted to be of the Order, and what belonged to their charge and office.

9 Hauing principally made and created this Order, in the honour of God: We doe ordaine and appoint, that there ſhall be (as Bretheren thereof) foure Cardinals, and foure Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops or Prelates, who are to be choſen among the very greateſt, and moſt vertuous men of the Cleargie, throughout all our Kingdome. Who are to be Commanders in the ſaid Order, to make proofe of the eaſe of Nobilitie, in ſuch forme as hereafter is ordained. They ſhall haue entrance, ſeates, and deliberatiue voices in the generall Chapters, Aſſemblies, and meetings, which are to be held for affaires of the Order; in the ſame manner as the other Commanders haue. Moreouer, they ſhall haue charge, to informe of the Religion, life, manners and ages of Princes, Lords, Gentlemen, and Officers, that ſhall enter into the Order. And to giue Vs knowledge (with ample remonſtrance) in the ſaid Chapters, of ſuch faults and abuſes, as ſhall be committed by any of the Order, or in the caſe concerning Religion.

The Great Almoner a chiefe Commaunder.

10 Moreouer, beſide thoſe foure Cardinals, and foure Prelates: We haue, and doe at this preſent incorporate, and vnite (for all times hereafter) in the Order, vnder title of a Commander: Our Great Almoner, and his Succeſſours in the ſame degree, who notwithſtanding, ſhall not ſtand obliged, to make proofe of his Nobilitie.

For election of the Cardinals, Arch-biſhops, &c.

11 The ſaid Cardinals, Arch-Biſhops, Biſhops or Prelates, ſhall be by Vs elected and choſen, at the Chapters and Aſſemblies of the Order: and ſhall receiue (ſigned with our owne hand) the Croſſe of the Order, in the Church appointed for thoſe daies, and to that effect; but not otherwiſe: As our Great Almoner is to doe, the like. Which Croſſe the ſaid Cardinals muſt be bound to weare daily hanging about their neckes, with a faire Silke Riband of Blew coullor. And the fiue Prelates, beſides that which they weare about their neckes, as the Cardinals doe; muſt be bound to weare another, ſowed or made faſt vpon their Roabes or Cloakes: wholly in the ſame forme and manner, as the other Commaunders doe.

Neceſſarie duties to be performed by the Cleargie men.

They ſhall ſtand obliged, to aſſiſt at the Feaſts and Ceremonies, which are to be celebrated for the Order. For their better vnderſtanding, the Cardinals are to weare their great rich Coapes; and the Biſhops or Prelates their long looſe Caſſocks of Violet coullor, and a Mantelet of the ſame coullor, whereon the Croſſe of the Order is to be ſowne, or embrodered, with their Rochets and Hoodes. And on the daies, when Seruice is to be celebrated for the dead; the Cardinals are to weare their Violet Coapes, and the Prelates cloathed in Blacke, after the ſame forme and fashion. Which Prelates (each after other) ſhall ſay Maſſe, and celebrate Diuine Seruice on the daies of Ceremonie. Obſeruing and keeping among them (as well for celebration of the Diuine Seruice, as in all things elſe, which ſhall depend vpon their ſitting in the Church and Aſſembly of the Order only) the rancke which hath beene accuſtomed to be obſerued, among the Eccleſiaſticall perſons of our Kingdome. But if the ſaid Ceremonie ſhall be celebrated in the Dioceſſe belonging to any one among them: then he in whoſe Dioceſſe it ſhall happen to be, is to precede and goe before the other.

Concerning the Great Almoner.

Now, concerning our Great Almoner; he is to remaine in the Church neere about Our Perſon, according as his eſtate and dignitie requireth: except when he is to performe and celebrate Diuine Seruice, which then he is to celebrate in his rancke, as the other. The Cardinals and Prelates, at their receiuing into the Orders by the hand of the Soueraigne, are to take this Oath following.

The Oath to be taken by the Cardinals and Prelates; at their reception and admittance into the Order.

11 I ſweare in the preſence of God, and promiſe to you Sir, that I will be loyall and faithfull to you all my life time: I will acknowledge, honour, and ſerue you as my Soueraigne of the Order of the Commanders of the Holy-Ghoſt, wherewith it is your high pleaſure at this preſent to honour me. I will keepe and obſerue the Lawes, Statutes and Ordenances of the ſaid Order, without contradicting them in any thing. I will weare the Croſſes or markes thereof: And I will daily ſay the Seruice thereto belonging, as an Eccleſiaſticall perſon, and one of my qualitie ought to doe. I will make my perſonall appearance on the daies of Solemnities, if there be not any lawfull occaſion that may be my hinderance, whereof I will giue aduertiſement to your Maieſtie. And I will neuer reueale diſcloſe any thing, which ſhall be treated or concluded in the Chapters thereof. I will procure, councell and procure, whatſoeuer ſhall ſeeme in my conſcience, appertaining to the maintenance, greatneſſe, and augmentation of the Order. I will daily pray to God for the health, as well of your Maieſtie, as alſo the Commanders and Supporters thereof, liuing and dying. So God be my helpe, and by his holy Euangeliſts.

The intent of the Orders inſtitution.

12 And as we inſtitute this preſent Order in the honour of God, and more and more to excite and vnite our Subiects, to perſeuer in the Holy Catholique and Apoſtolique Religion: Alſo particularly to illuſtrate the eſtate of Nobilitie in our Kingdome; We haue ſaid, enacted and ordained, doe ſay, enact and ordaine.

Care of ſincerite in Religion.

13 Firſt, that no man ſhall be made a Commander, and receiue the habit of the Order: if he haue not publiquely made profeſſion, of the ſaid Catholique and Apoſtolique Religion, and haue not proteſted to liue and die therein.

Gentilitie of three deſcents.

14 Secondly, that he muſt be a Gentleman of name, and of Armes, by three deſcents at the leaſt: without being taxed with any reproachfull accuſation, or proued before a Bench of Iuſtice. And being Princes, to haue compleated fiue and twentie yeares of age: And fiue and thirtie, if he be otherwiſe.

The Kings only prerogatiue.

15 We only, and after Vs, the Kings our Succeſſours, Great Maiſters of the Order, ſhall propoſe and make choice of ſuch as We thinke meete to enter into the ſaid Order. And it ſhall not be lawfull for any perſon whatſoeuer, to make purſuit or requeſt thereof, either for himſelfe, or any other. Declaring ſuch at the ſame inſtant, vnworthie for euer to attaine it, by deſiring it, or cauſing it to be requeſted for him. Only to this end, that this degree of Honour, which We intend to be beſtowne and diſtributed by Grace and merit; may neuer be made ſubiect to monopolizing and briberie.

17 And in regard We hope, that God will ſo aſſiſt Vs with his Grace, and Our Succeſſours after Vs, by the inſpiration of his bleſſed Spirit, whoſe helpe We implore (to that end) in Our preſent intention, that We may not propoſe, or make choice of any one to be our aſſociate in the Order who ſhall not be adorned with the forenamed qualities: Yet notwithſtanding, becauſe We would auoide all ſurpriſes,

A Royall prouidence for ejecting Brethren in the Order.

priſes, and render our choice free from all reproach, ſo much as poſſibly we may. It is our will, that yearely there ſhall be held a Chapter, on the laſt day of December in the morning, and after dinner, if neede ſhall ſo require, wherein ſhall all the Cardinals, Prelates and Commanders, with the Officers of the Order, them we will propound and name the men, whom we are aduiſed to make choice for the Order. And we entreate our ſaid Aſſiſtants, to make enquiry what language or report paſſeth of them: to the end that they may giue vs faithfull informa at the Chapter (which for that purpoſe) ſhall bee held on the firſt day of the ye before Euenſong.

Information to be giuen to the King.

18. At which Chapter the Cardinalls, Prelates and Commanders, that gaue th aſſiſtance at our propoſition; ſhall be bound to bee there perſonally preſent. Whe they ſhall declare to vs (vpon their conſciences) their full and intire aduice, for w ceiuing them, by vs propounded. In which caſe at their entring into the ſaid Ch ter, they ſhall ſweare by the liuing God and vpon their honour (the Oath being uen by the Chancellor of the Order) to tell vs the truth, and nothing but the truth.

Commiſsions for firme intelligence of the Parties nominated.

19. 57 In like manner, there shall be an Officer of the Order, called The Register of the Order: who must make vowe of his Religion, and shall receiue fiue hundr... the Register of the Order, at the Chapters and Conuentions, as they are seuerally and yearely made; to haue his recourse to them for his own helpe and seruice, whensoeuer neede shall require.

Duties of seruice belonging to the Registers charge.

58 The said Register shall receiue, set downe in writing, and keepe a perfect Register well and faithfully, of all the Prouisions, Appointments, Conclusions and Ordenances, which shall be made at the Chapters. Hee shall make and signe all Commissions, Letters, Commands and Expeditions, which shall be needefull touching and concerning the said Order: declaring a Nullitie, and to be of no effect or value, all those which shall hereafter be signed by any other then himselfe. He is also to inhibite and forbid, the signing or expediting of any other, for what cause, or vpon what occasion soeuer they may be pretended: as being neuer purposed, concluded and appointed by the Soueraigne, sitting in the generall Chapter of the Order; whereof he is bound to keepe a certaine Register, which he must bring and present at euery Chapter.

Another Register Book for Informations, &c.

59 He shall keepe another Register also, apart by it selfe, for Informations, verball Answeres and Scedules, which are to be reported at the Chapters, of them that haue bin receiued into the Order: for rendering true testimonie of the prooues they haue made, of their Religion and Nobilitie, as also of the day of their entertainment. Hee is to Register likewise, such memories as shall be deliuered to him by the Prouost of the Order, as well of errors and delicts committed by the Commanders and Officers, to be read and reported to vs at the Chapters: As also of the decease of them, when any one shall happen. And hee shall promise and sweare at his entrance, to execute, keepe and performe all these seuerall things, without failing in any one of them.

The four chief Officers.

60 All these foure Officers, shall be Commanders; weare the Crosse vpon their vppermost Garments, and another of Gold about their neckes, as the other Commanders doe.

The Herauld or King of Armes of the Order.

61 Moreouer, there shall be in the Order another Officer, called an Herauld, King of Armes, Of the Order of the Holy-Ghost; who shall be chosen (hauing made proofe of his Catholique Religion) to be a man of good fame, and expert in such a charge as he is to vndergoe. He shall haue foure hundred Crownes of the Sunne for his ordenary stipend. Portera vne croix d'Or de l'Ordre pendue au Col à deux petites Chainettes d'Or auec son Esmail. He shall stand bound to keepe a Booke, wherein must be depicted to the life, the Armes, Crests and Supporters of all the Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers, which shall be receiued into the Order. And vnder euery one of those Armes, shall be set downe in writing, their Names, Sirnames, Seigneuries and Qualities. And for the doing hereof, each of the said Cardinals, Prelates and Commanders, shall be obliged to giue him a Marke of money, at his reception.

62 When neede shall require, to make any Signification, Command or Denomination, to any one of the Commanders and Officers: the said Herauld must haue the charge thereof, and shall report to the Soueraigne (in full Chapter) the Answere which hath bin made vnto him; or whatsoeuer hee hath learned or vnderstood in his iourney, concerning the good, honor and seruice, of the Order of the Holy-Ghost.

The Gentleman Vsher of the Order.

63 Wee ordaine and appoint also, that there shall be an Vsher of the Order, who is to assist in the Ceremonie of the Order, and to beare a Mace vpon his shoulder, which is to be expressely made for seruice of the Order. Hee shall haue three hundred and twelue Crownes of the Sunne for his ordenarie wages; which shall be paid vnto him (in manner as to all the other Officers) by the high Treasurer. The said Vsher shall be chosen, making proofe of his Catholique Religion: and shall stand bound, to be present at all the Chapters to be held, for keeping the doore, and performance of whatsoeuer else shall depend vpon his Charge.

Election of Officers by the Soueraigne.

64 When the death of any of the said Officers shall happen, the Election of him that is to succeede, must be made by the Soueraigne. In whose presence he shall make his Vowes, and at his hand receiue the Habits and Crosse, according as the other Commanders. Except the Herauld and Vsher, who are to take their Oaths, and and receiue their Chaines and Crosses, at the hand of the Chancellour, but in presence of the Soueraigne.

Of Pensions and Wages.

65 The pensions of the Cardinals, Prelates and Commanders, and Wages of the forenamed Officers, may not be pawned or morgaged, or seisure made on them for any occasion whatsoeuer: except it be to buy Armes and Horses. Moreouer, it must be done by permission, signed vnder the hand of the great Maister, and Sealed with the Seale of the Order.

66 It is our will and meaning, that the said Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order, shall hereafter stand exempted, from contributing to the Ban, and Arriereban of our Kingdome; and from paying to vs any Redemptions, Lots, Alienations, Quints and Requints, as well of Lands which they shall sell, as those which they shall buye and purchase, relying vpon vs. Except by occasion of Customes of our Kingdome, importing, that the buyer is bound to pay the fift Pennie in the price of selling the Fiefe, where something may be quarrelled or demanded, of the said Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order, and likewise of them that haue made the same acquisitions.

The Court of Requestsin the Pallace at Paris.

67 Moreouer we will, that the said Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order, hauing their causes committed to the Court of Requests, of our Pallace at Paris; may there haue and enioy all and semblable Priueledges, as doe our domesticke Officers and Seruants in ordenarie. Of which Priuiledges, we will cause our Letters and Declarations to be dispatched, for being made publique and Registred, as well in our Courts of Parliament, Chamber of Accounts, and Court of our Aydes; as euery where else, where it may appertaine, in regard of their seruice and esteeme.

68 Each one of the said Cardinals, Prelates & Commanders, as also the Officers, shall stand bound, to take Letters of prouision, sealed with the great Seale of the Order, and Signed by the Register thereof: to serue him as a testimonie, concerning the day of when he was associated into the Order.

Allowance of Acts made in the Chapters.

69 All Deliberations, Commands and Ordenances, which shall be made in the generall Chapters of the Order; can no way be auaileable, except they be made and approued, by aduise of two third parts of the Commanders, which shall be there assembled, accounting the Soueraignes voyce for two. And the said Chapters are not to be held; except there be eighteene Commanders present, beside the Officers.

Genealogies or Pedegrees for proofe of their Nobility.

70 And because in times to come, euery one may take knowledge truely, concerning the Nobilitie, Vertues and Merits, of all such as we shall call and associate into the said Order. We will, that euery one of the Commanders, after his admission into the Order; shall cause to be made in Parchment, a Tree of his Genealogie or descent, which he shall cause to be signed and verified, by them that shall be appointed as Committees, to testifie and report his prooues. Which certificate must containe the day, when they make their report in the Chapter, and how they haue seene and iustified the same, very exactly by their prooues. Commanding further, that the said Genealogie or Pedegree, shall be written and enrouled by the Register of the Order. And the Register likewise must certifie, how the Commanders and Commissaries haue made their report in our presence: that recourse may be made thereto (when occasion requireth) that it is a true Act, and whereto faith may be vndoubtedly giuen, for euer.

The certaine day of celebrating the Order in the Church.

71 Euery yeare, the Feast of the Order shall be celebrated the first day of Ianuarie, in the Church of the Augustines, in our good Citie of Paris; which is the place chosen and destenied by vs for the same effect. And if some publique affaires of our Kingdome, will not permit vs to be in our Citie of Paris on the same day: that the Feast is to be celebrated where soeuer we are, and in the most spacious Church neere adioyning. Where our will and pleasure is, that all the Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers shall be present with their assistance; if they haue not other Command from vs to the contrary. Hereupon, and for this purpose, they are to come themselues in person (where soeuer we shall chance to be) two dayes before the Euen of the first day of the yeare, to giue their assistance in the Ceremonie Which

Which is to begin the Eeue of the said day, at Euensong; where the Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers are to accompanie the Soueraigne of the Order, from his Pallace to the Church, in such manner as is here set downe.

In what manner the Soueraigne or great Maister, and his Knights of the Order of the Holy-Ghost, goe on the Day of Solemnitie to the Church.

72 FIrst, the Gentleman-Vsher goeth foremost.

The Herauld followeth next.

The Prouost, High Treasurer and Register goe together: but the Prouost in the midst betweene them.

After followeth the Chancellour alone.

Then come the Commanders, walking two and two together, according to their ranke, as shall be hereafter related.

After them followeth the Soueraigne or Great Maister.

Next to him follow the Cardinals and Prelates that are of the Order.

The Great Maister and Commanders are cloathed in long Cloakes, made of the same fashion that are worne on the day of Saint Michael; being of blacke Veluet, embrodered round about with Gold and Siluer. The embroderie consisteth of Floures de Luces, and Knots of Gold, betweene three sundry Ciphers of Siluer. And aboue the Floures de Luces, Knots and Floures of Gold; are thickly semed or powdered Flames of Fire, but made of Gold.

The great Cloake is garnished with a Mantelet of Cloath of Siluer, couered with embroderie, made after the same fashion as is the Great Cloake; reserued onely, that in stead of the Ciphers, are wrought faire Doues of Siluer.

The Cloakes and Mantles are double-lined with Sattin of Orange-tawnie color.

And they weare the Cloakes turnd vp on the left shoulder, the opening being on the right side; according to the patterne which we haue caused to be made.

They weare Doublets and Hose of White or Orange-colour; the fashion according to the discretion of the Commander: A blacke Hat, a white Plume.

Vpon the said Cloakes, are openly worne the great Collers of the Order, which were giuen to them at their first admission.

Concerning the Officers.

The Chancellour is habited in all respects like to the Commanders: yet he hath not the great Coller, but a Crosse onely embrodered before on his Cloake; and that of Gold hanging about his necke.

The Prouost, High Treasurer and Register, haue likewise Cloakes of blacke Veluet, and the Mantelet of Greene cloath of Siluer; but they are embrodered about with some Golden flames onely, wearing also the Crosse of Gold of the Order, and that of Gold about their neckes.

The Herauld and Prouost weare cloakes of blacke Sattin, and their Mantelets of Greene Veluet; embrodered with flames, like to the other Officers. Onely the Herauld weareth his Esmail hanging about his necke, and the Vsher a Crosse of the Order; but much lesse then the other Officers.

After returne from Euen-song, the Commanders and Officers may not faile to goe to Confession.

73 On the morrow in the morning, the Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers, shall accompanie the Soueraigne againe, in the same Order and Garments as before, to the Church to heare Masse. At the Offering, We our selfe will offer as many Crownes of the Sunne, as We are yeares old. And each of the Commanders is to offer a Crowne of the Sunne; which at the instant we haue ordered, to be giuen for the nourishing and maintaining the Religious Nouices of the said Augustines. The Commanders shall goe together to the Offering, yet notwithstanding, one after another, according to their ranke and place. Masse being ended, the Commanders and Officers shall (in our presence) receiue the blessed Sacrament of our Lords body: exhorting the Cardinals, Bishops and Prelates, to communicate cate alſo the ſame day, either before comming to the Ceremonie, or after, according as themſelues doe thinke fitteſt.

The Kings royall dinner to his Knights, &c.

74 After Maſſe, they are to reconduct the Great Maiſter home to his Pallace; where the Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Chancellour of the Order, are to ſit downe, and dine at the Table, at the coſt and charge of the great Maiſter, in token of loue and amitie. At which Pallace, and in a place a part, ſhall be prepared a Table; where muſt dine the Prouoſt, High Treaſurer, Regiſter, Herauld and Vſher.

Their manner of going to Euen-ſong.

75 At the houre of Eeuening Prayer, the Soueraigne, Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers, in order as hath bin ſaid, wearing Cloakes and Mantelets of Blacke cloath (except the habite of the Soueraigne, which may be darke Scarlet, or ſad Murrie) vpon which Cloakes ſhall be alwayes the Croſſe of the Order wrought, as on the other. In this Church they are then to heare Euening Seruice for the deceaſed, and the next day in the morning, to heare Maſſe and Seruice: At the Offering in which Maſſe, the Soueraigne and Commanders ſhall offer (each of them) a Waxe Candle, weighing a pound of Waxe. And being at the Offering, the Regiſter ſhall report the names of ſuch Soueraignes, Cardinals, Prelates and Commanders, as are deceaſed of the Order, and ſince performance of the laſt Ceremonie: For whoſe ſoules, he that celebrateth the Maſſe, is to ſay (ouer and beſide the reſt) at the Offerings concluſion, a De Profundis, and a Prayer for the dead. At departing home from the Maſſe, they are all to dine at the Soueraignes charge againe, as the day before.

Mourning Seruice for them of the Order deceaſed.

76 Vpon theſe dayes, and in the ſaid Church, muſt be prepared Garlands or Chaplets of Floures, thickly ſet about with Waxe-lights; and in the middeſt of them, the Eſcutchons of Armes belonging to the deceaſed parties. Beneath, or rather ſomewhat behinde thoſe Garlands, ſhall be placed a Bench or Seate, couered with blacke cloath, whereon muſt be laid the Collers of the deceaſed Commanders. And behinde that Bench muſt be placed another, whereon are to ſit the Heires of the deceaſed, or thoſe that make repreſentation of them, cloathed in mourning, during the time of Seruice for the Deceaſed. Which being ended, the Collers are to be brought and preſented to vs; and (in our preſence) deliuered and receiued by the high Treaſurer.

A generall Chapter to be held after Dinner.

77 After Dinner, a generall Councell and Chapter is to be held of the Order, wherein we are to be aſſiſted by all the Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers; but not any other, of what qualitie or degree ſoeuer they be. And before any thing ſhall be ſpoken, or called in queſtion; ſolemne Oath is to be giuen by Vs, and the Aſſiſtance, for not diſcouering or reueaſing to any perſon liuing, whatſoeuer ſhall be ſaid, treated and concluded in the ſaid Aſſembly; vpon paine to be depriued of the Order, and proclaimed for Traitours and infamous perſons. The Oath being made, which is preſently to be ſet downe by the Regiſter: then is to be propounded from the mouth of the Chancellour, all that he knoweth and thinketh meete to be deliuered, neceſſary for the honor, benefit, encreaſe and conſeruation of the ſaid Order.

For errors and offences committed by Commanders.

78 And if it be knowne, that any of the Commanders haue failed or forfeited in their Honor, or committed any Act vnworthy of their profeſſion, and contrary to their dutie: As, if he be attainted and conuinced of the crime of Hereſie, Treaſon, flight from Battaile in the Field, Sacriledge, Robberie, detention of goods Eccleſiaſticall, and other actions, vnfitting for Gentlemen, that make profeſſion of Honour and Vertue; and theſe to be auouched by good and ſufficient prooues. In this caſe we will, that he, or they ſhall be depriued and degraded of the Order, and aduiſe giuen in the Chapter, for correction and puniſhment of ſuch offences, according as the caſe ſhall require.

79 And to the end, that memorie may alwayes remaine, concerning the Election we haue made of the Church belonging to the Couent of the Auguſtines, in our good Citie of Paris, for celebrating there the Feaſts of the Ceremonie of the Order: We haue ordained and doe ordaine to the ſaid Religious Conuent, the ſum of three hundred thirtie three Crownes, a third part of yearely rent, whereof ſhall be diſpatched and paſſed the contracts, for ſuch neceſſaries as are to be vſed. With charge alſo, that they ſhall be bound to ſay euery day in the yeare, two Maſſes; the one aloude, for the proſperitie and health of the Soueraigne, Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order; and the other ſtill and ſoft, for the dead. Whereof we will our great Almoner to haue eſpeciall care: to the end, that our intent may be fulfilled, and the Seruice performed as it ought to be.

For auoiding contention & querrel in their publique going.

80 Now, in regard that this Order of ours, is inſtituted to the honor of God, and of his bleſſed Spirit the Holy-Ghoſt, who euermore liketh and alloweth the humbleſt hearts: We ordaine, that in the Orders walking or going to Church, or otherwiſe, as alſo in their Seates; there ſhall not be any diſpute, or contention for ranke or place; but euery one to goe according to the Antiquitie of his receiuing into the Order, thus.

First our Sonnes and Brethren, and the Princes of our Blood.

Then, the Princes iſſued of our Soueraigne Houſe, which be Dukes.

Next, the Princes which are not Dukes.

And after them the Dukes, who are but Gentlemen, in keeping the Order and rancke: yet this attribution is granted to them, by creation of their Duchies or Dukedomes.

After them, the Commanders, according to their Antiquitie of receiuing into the Order.

Onely exception is made on behalfe of them, that haue bin choſen and elected by vs, for entring into this preſent Order, and from the firſt Inſtitution thereof: who ſhall keepe the Ranke of their receiuing into the Order of S. Michael, although they receiued the habite of this Order after the other.

Concerning ſuch Knights are of both the Orders.

81 It is our will and meaning, that the Commanders haue and hold (afterward) all places, ſuch Ranke, Seate, Authorities and Prerogatiues; as the Knights of the Order of Saint Michael ſhould haue. Declaring furthermore, that ſuch as are and ſhall be Knights of the Order of Saint Michael, and Commanders in that of the Holy-Ghoſt; ſhall precede them that haue but the Order of Saint Michael onely, becauſe they be honored with both together. Neuertheleſſe, this Article hath no further meaning, but for Lords and Gentlemen onely; who haue no other Ranke or ſedence, then that which they haue won by the Order.

Colour of the Croſſes to be worne.

82 All the Prelates, Commanders and Officers, ſhall alwayes weare their Croſſes of Yellow, or Orange coloured Veluet, wrought on the left ſide of their Cloakes, Robes and other Garments vp on high. We onely and our Succeſſors, ſhall weare it beneath on our garments, on the middeſt of the breſt, when it ſeemeth good to vs, and that aloft on the left ſide, of the ſame bigneſſe as the Commanders are. Thoſe Croſſes which are wrought on the Garments and Cloakes, becauſe they are Prelates, Commanders and Officers, ſhall alwayes be of Yellow, or Orenge-coloured Veluet: except in actions of Armes, where our permiſſion is, that ſuch Commanders and Officers as ſhall be preſent there; may weare them of Cloath of Siluer, or white Veluet, made in the forme of a Croſſe of Malta, in the midſt whereof ſhall be a Doue figured, in embroderie of Siluer, and at the corners, Beames and Flours de Luces of Siluer, of ſuch bigneſſe, and according to the portraict, which we haue cauſed to be made.

Croſſes formed according to them of Malta.

83 The Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers, ſhall likewiſe weare a Croſſe of the Order, faſtened about their neckes with a faire blew ſilke Riband: the Croſſe being made according to the forme of that of Malta, wholly of Gold, enammelled with White about the ſides; but the midſt without any enammelling. Within the angles or corners ſhall be a Floure de Luce, and in the midſt, ſuch as the Knights of the Order of Saint Michael; ſhall beare the noate of that Order on the one ſide, and on the other the figure of a Doue; which ſhall be worne on both ſides, by Cardinals, Prelates and them that be of the Order of Saint Michael.

84 For a marke or cogniſance of the Order, and the Commanders thereto belonging: We will giue to each Commander, a Coller of Gold, made with Floures de Luces, and three ſundry Ciphers, interlaced like knots, in the faſhion of the Cloakes Cloakes embroderie. Which Coller ſhall alwayes containe the weight of three hundred Crownes of Gold, without enriching with Stones, or any other things. And the Commanders may not ſell, engage or alienate them, for any cauſe or neceſſitie, or in any manner whatſoeuer: but they muſt continue and appertaine to the ſaid Order. And the Heires of ſuch Commanders as ſhall deceaſe, muſt ſtand bound, to bring in, and deliuer them to the hands of the high Treaſurer of the Order, three moneths after the parties death, or later; in which caſe, the Treaſurer is to giue them a Receipt, for their diſcharge.

The Habites of the Order to remaine in the High Treaſurers keeping.

85 The Roabes and Garments of the Order, are to remaine in the cuſtodie of the high Treaſurer, for beſt and ſafeſt conſeruation of them. And if any of the Commanders ſhall happen to dye; the heires of him or them, may not pretend any right to the Garments: which are to remaine to the Order, for ſeruice of him that ſhall next ſucceede in the place. Who muſt ſtand bound, to pay to the Heires of the defunct, the monies appertaining to the firſt yeare of his Command, with the value of the great Cloake and Mantelet, if he be ſo pleaſed, the eſtimation being made by the Chancellour, calling to him the aſſiſtance and aduiſe of the Officers of the Order.

A due to the Treaſurer for the Auguſtines.

86 All the Cardinals, Prelates, and Commanders of the Order, muſt be engaged, at their entertainment into the Aſſociation; to pay and deliuer to the hands of the high Treaſurer, the ſumme of ten Crownes of Gold of the Sunne. Which ten Crownes we haue granted (inſtantly) as an Almes, belonging to the Conuent of the Auguſtines.

The Kings care for his Knights daily holy exerciſes.

86 And becauſe it is no more then reaſonable, that ſuch as principally doe dedicate themſelues to God, and couet to make it knowne by extriour ſignes; are more tyed to deuout prayers and ſpirituall exerciſes, then others: We exhort and entreate (ſo much as in vs lieth) that all them of the Order, ſhould giue their daily attendance in deuotion, at the holy Sacrifice of the Maſſe, if they haue the meanes and leiſure, and on the Feaſt dayes, at the Celebration of diuine Seruice. Albeit we know, that they are bound to ſay daily, their Roſarie Garland or Beades of Tennes, which ordenarily they carrie about them; and the Houres of the Holy-Ghoſt; with the Hymnes and Prayers contained in a Booke which we will giue them at their entertainement: Or elſe the ſeauen Penitentiall Pſalmes, with Prayers made vpon each of the Pſalmes, and the Letanie following the ordenarie Prayers, being all contained together in the ſame Booke. And which any one ſhall be found to faile in any of the forenamed duties; he ſhall be bound to giue a liberall Almes to the Poore.

Moreouer, we enioyne them, not to faile (twiſe euery yeare) to be confeſſed, by ſuch Fathers of the Church as are thereto authoriſed, and to receiue the bleſſed Body of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt; namely, on the firſt day of Ianuarie, and the Feaſt day of Pentecoaſt. Ordaining alſo, that on thoſe dayes, and all other, when (in deuotion) they ſhall communicate, at any place where themſelues thinke beſt: that during the time of Maſſe, and that of the Communion, they ſhall weare the Coller of the Order; vpon paine and penaltie, that ſuch as doe faile to Communicate on thoſe appointed dayes in the ſaid yeare, and ſo adorned, ſhall forfeit and looſe the reuennue of their Command, for that whole yeare.

For wilfull obſtinacie from the Cõmunion.

87 And if it ſhall ſo happen, that any of the ſaid Commanders & Officers, do perſeuere, and continue three yeares each after other, and not Communicate on the appointed dayes: In this caſe, the Croſſe and Habits of the Order ſhall be taken from them, and for ſuch wilfull obſtinacie, they ſhall likewiſe be depriued of the Order. But if any one doe faile but one of thoſe two appointed dayes in the yeare, diſtreſſe and reſtraint ſhall be made in the fruits of his Command, euen the fift part of his Annuall reuennue, which we giue and grant, as an immediate Almes to the ſaid Auguſtines. And therefore the Cardinals and Prelates are to be ſworne yearely at the Chapter, vpon their holy Orders, and the Commanders and Officers vpon the holy Euangeliſts; to receiue the Communion on thoſe two Feſtiuall dayes.

88 We, and the Cardinals ſhall vſe to weare the great Coller of the Order on the foure Feſtiuall dayes, in the yeare, when we goe to heare Maſſe, in generall Proceſſions, and at other publique Acts, which are to be done in the Churches, and our entring into Cities of our Kingdome, wherein we hold a Court of Parliament: And likewiſe at all other times, when it ſhall be commanded by the Soueraigne of the Order. For wearing the Great Coller of the Order.

89 This Order being Inſtituted, for the defence of our Faith and Religion, as alſo of our perſon and Eſtate: All the Commanders ſhall ſtand obliged, to come and aſſiſte vs, at all times when they ſhall there to be commanded: accompanied and attended, according to their degrees and qualities; paying for all things in their paſſage willingly, and liberally, without iniuring or abuſing our people, on paine of being degraded and depriued of the Order. For attendance on the Soueraigne.

90 And this being a Companie or Societie, inſtituted for the honor of God; we command and enioyne you all, to vſe and exerciſe all Brotherly dilection and kindneſſe one towards another. We doe ordaine and enioyne our Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order, to treade vnderfoote (from hence forward) all enuie, hatred and rancour, which may be pretended one againſt another, either now, or at any time hereafter: liuing together alwayes in true, perfect amitie, concord and vnitie. Euen as we ſhall and will declare Our ſelfe, and on Our owne behalfe, louing to you all, in ſuſtaining, defending, honoring and gratifying your kindneſſes towards Vs: according as your qualities and vertues ſhall iuſtly merit, and anſwerable to the bond of Brotherhood, wherewith Wee haue honored you all.

Auoiding of contentions and quarrels.

91 And if any debate or contention, ſhall happen hereafter among our Commanders or Officers of the Order, whereof true appearance may ariſe, to doubt what thereof will enſue: We proteſt and promiſe, that the matter comming to our knowledge, we will immediately (by our Letters) prohibite all meanes and matter of fact, and the ſaid cauſe or quarrell ſhall be (by vs) heard and determined, with aduiſe of the fellow Brethren and Commanders neereſt about vs, ſo ſoone as poſſibly it may be done; where the parties ſhal be indifferently heard, what they can ſay each againſt the other. And they ſhall be bound (for the ſame purpoſe) to appeare, or Atturneyes for them, to obey ſuch end and order, as by vs & the ſaid Commanders ſhall be concluded. Euermore excepted, the right, and high Iuſtice of Ours, and the Authoritie and Prerogatiue Royall, of Vs, and of Our Succeſſors.

Intelligence of contentions.

92 We ordaine and appoint alſo to the Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders & Officers: that if there happen to their knowledge, any quarrell, debate or contention, betweene two, or more Brethren of the Order; to aduertiſe Vs thereof with all diligence, to the end, that We may prouide for the euaſion.

93 Now, hauing thus eſtated and eſtabliſhed this Order, in thoſe things which we ſuppoſed moſt important & neceſſary: We hold it a matter hard and vneaſie for Vs, to facilitate all executions and expediences thereto appertaining, and which day by day (God enabling vs) experience will further tutour and enſtruct vs, what interpretion and addition ſhall be elſe required. In regard whereof, we reſerue to our Selfe, and to our Succeſſors, full power, of making and eſtabliſhing all Lawes, Statutes and Ordenances, which ſhall be thought facred and reaſonable, for their incorporating to the Booke of our Order. Prouided neuertheleſſe, that the ſaid Ordenances doe not alter, change or diminiſh in any thing, thoſe Articles by Vs already eſtabliſhed and ordained, and that they ſhall be read, publiſhed and Regiſtred in the generall Aſſemblies of the Order, as they are yearely made, and approued by two third parts of the Commanders, which ſhall be there preſent.

The Kings ſolemne proteſtation.

Signed, By the King. Chiefe and Soueraigne Great Maister, sitting in the generall Assembly with the Commanders of the Order of the Holy-Ghost. De l'Aubespine.

And sealed by the Great Seale of the said Order, with whitewaxe upon the plaine Label.

Enstructions for the Knight nominated, to be receiued into the Order and Militarie Discipline of the Holy-Ghost.

IT behoueth the Knight nominated, for receipt into the Order and Militarie discipline of the Holy-Ghost, to procure from Monsieur de Verderonne, Register of the said Order, two Commissions: both of them Signed by him, and afterward to be Sealed with the Seale of the Order.

Two Commissions from the Register.

One of those Commissions, must be directed to the Lord Bishop of the place, where the Knight was borne, or to the Bishop of the Prouince, where he maketh his abiding principally. The contents whereof must extend; that he is to haue Information, concerning the life, Manners and Catholique Religion of the said Lord Knight; or else from the Lord Great Almoner, who is Bishop of the Court: causing ten witnesses to be produced at the least, most of them Gentlemen, and the other, persons of qualitie, for making proofe of his receiuing the Communion.

Contents of the first.

The other Commission, is to be directed to two Knights of the Order of the Holy-Ghost, whereby they are commanded; to see the titles of the Lord Knight nominated, whereby he is to make proofe of his Name, and of his Armes, & of what Father he is the Son: who were his Grandfather, and Great-grandfather; what Armes they did beare, & whether they be answerable to those which the said Knight beareth or no; of what Lands they were possessed, and what titles they caried.

The second Commission.

Concerning those Titles; they are Contracts of Mariages, Partages, Testaments, Donations, Transactions with his Brethren, or other Heires; Auouchments, Catalogue of Names, Hommages, Reliefe of Fiefes, Foundations, and other titles of his Ancestors.

Import of the Titles.

And by those Titles, the Knight is to make proofe of his Nobilitie, and who were his Father, Grandfather and Great-grandfather, to hold by three Generations & Paternall Races; all these being most expedient and necessarie proues.

Proof of Nobilitie by three descents.

Whatsoeuer he can shew more, so much the more it is for his honor, but the foresaid proues of three Generations, are most requisite for him, and make all the rest the more honorable.

Likewise he is to procure Copies of Epitaphes, from the Graue-stones, Tombes and Monuments of his Ancestors, concerning their Coates of Armes; which are be had in Churches, Glasse windowes, Belts, Bauldricks, and other things: As also Castles, Mansions and Houses, which haue appertained to the parties Predecessours in times past, or at the present.

Epitaphes and Monuments.

He is also to make an Information, and Enquest of Office, concerning all the forenamed matters; before the Iudges, Bayliffes and Officers in the places of his Birth, and Houses whence he is descended.

Enquest of Office.

He must deliuer all those Informations, Titles and Enquests, into the hands of them or him; who hath the Office and charge of making Genealogies and Pedegrees, and who is also to make the said Knights.

The Office of Armes.

Moreouer, the Knight is to produce a Memoriall, concerning the places where he hath bin imployed in the Kings seruices, what charge he hath there borne, no man can better performe then himself. Which memorial is to be deliuered to them, or him that er draweth the said Pedegree or Genealogie; for further addition thereto, as shall e thought necessary.

The Certificate from the Commissaries, deputed and Authorized, for verifying the Nobilitie of the Knight nominated.

WEE, And Commissaries Deputed by Letters Patents from his Maiestie, Sealed with the Great Seale of the Order, for auouching and verifying the Titles of Nobilitie of c Lord doe certifie to all them to whom may appertaine: That by vertue of the said Commission, we haue seene, read, examined, and verified the Titles of Nobilitie of the said eing exhibited to vs, some in their Originals, and others in their true Copies, due- and authentically questioned and cleared, and coated on the Tree of Genealoie, which by them was ordered and prepared, and likewise to vs formally presend. And we haue found the Titles very auncient and warrantable, of the said Lord that he is a Gentleman of Name, and of rmes, by many Generations, and beareth the same Armes of his Auncestors. In ithfulwitnesse whereof, we haue directed this present Certificate, in forme of a eiball Answere: Which we haue signed with our hands, and thereunto affixed the eales of our Armes, the day and yeare aboue written.

Enstructions for those Knights, that are to receiue the Order of the Holy-Ghost.

THE Knight nominated, to receiue the Order of the Holy-Ghost, must make proofe: That he is a Gentleman of Name, and of Armes, by three Paternall Races at the least. And that the Sirname, and Armes which he beareth; as borne by his Father, Grand-father and Great-Grand-father. Also, of the Lands nd Seigneuries which he and they enioyed, & how they bore the titles of them.

The proofes of his Nobilitie, must be made by Contracts of Marriage, Partages r deuisions, Donations, Testaments, Transactions, Catalogue of names, Hommages, nd other Titles, which may proue the Affiliation or Adoption, & Prouidence of the ather, Grand-father and Great-grandfather, and by extracts of their Foundations, also the titles and qualities which they enioyed.

He must stand obliged, to exhibite the Originals of those Titles, to the hands of e Commissaries, which shal be deputed for the verifying of those prooues, six Moeths after he hath receiued aduertisement of his Election: or whether he can exibite the Originals, or examined Copies of them, according to the XXXV. rticle in the Statutes of the said Order, and answerable to the tenure of the Comission directed to the Commissaries. Also hee is to procure Extracts from the raue-stones, Tombes and Monnuments of his Ancestours: And cause to be made Information of the Blazon of Armes belonging to his Father, Grand-father and reat-Grandfather, as they bare them, to shew, whether he beareth the same, or o. Those Extractions he may haue from their Tombs, Glass-windows in Churches, Paintings within them and without them, and their Houses, together with other rmes of theirs, in Wood, Stone, or Painted places.

Which Information must be made by Iudges of those places, by request from e Chancellour, or his Attorney; and thereto must be called many witnesses, who e to certifie, how those Armes were carried by the Auncestors of the said Knight: nd he must likewise extract the Copie of the Inscriptions, on the Monuments of his Auncestours.

And because his entertainment may be the more honorable; he must cause a sumarie discourse to be made, concerning the charges and degrees wherewith hath bin honored, and those places where hee hath serued the Kings in their Camps and Armies. Then to deliuer them to the hands of the Lord Chancellour of the Order, to make report thereof at the Chapter for the Order, which shall be held by the King, the day before the Ceremonie for receiuing the said Knight.

Concerning the Seale belonging to the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt.

OVt of Edicts, Statutes and Commiſſions, appertaining to the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt, it is to be ſeene, that the Seale of the Order was, and is of white Waxe; and not Yellow, Redde or Greene. In the Chanceries of France Yellow Waxe is vſed for all kindes of Letters: except, Charters, Priuiledges and Pardons, which are expedited and Sealed with Greene Waxe, on Strings of Silke Red and Greene. But on Good-Friday, after Noone, there is no Sealing in the Great or high Chancerie, except with Greene Waxe, for caſes held to be vnpardonable, and are tearmed Pardons of Mercy, which our Monarches on the ſaid day, haue vſed, and doe vſe, to prefer to rigour. Deriuing their Example from the King of Kings, & Lord of Lords, who (as on that day) was exalted vpon the Tree of the Croſſe, to redeeme vs from that death eternall, which we had moſt iuſtly deſerued.

How the Kings of the firſt and ſecond Ligne ſealed.

We haue heretofore declared, that our Kings of the firſt and ſecond Ligne, Sealed with White Waxe, hauing their Image engrauen on the Stampe in true proportion, ſitting on the Bench or Throane of Iuſtice. A Cuſtome put in practiſe by the Kings of the third Ligne; and perticulerly for Letters of importance, and ſuch as principally concerned their Honor and Sacred Maieſtie; and vſually Expeditions, Mandates and Commiſſions, for Orders of Knighthood, inſtituted by themſelues, as we haue already ſaid.

Sealing with white Waxe by priuiledges granted.

So that it was not permitted to a Prince, although he was of the Sacred Kingdome of France; to ſeale with white waxe, except he had Letters of Grant and Permiſſion from the King, and by an eſpeciall Priuiledge of honour. The Lords of Albret (into whoſe houſe the Crowne of France fell by lawfull ſucceſſion) by the Priuiledge which King Charles, ſixth of the name, granted them, of quartering Armes with France: had (by the ſame meanes) that of ſealing with white waxe. Priuiledges likewiſe granted to the Duke of Millaine, and Count de Vertus, by the ſame King Charles, dated the third day of Ianuary, Anno, one thouſand three hundred foureſcore and fourteene; and to Nicholas de Ferrara, by King Charles, ſeaueneth of the name, by his Letters bearing date the tenth of May, one thouſand, foure hundred, thirty two, and to Pedro de Medicis of Florence, by King Lewis the eleuenth, by his Letters dated in the Moneth of May, one thouſand, foure hundred, threeſcore and fiue.

None but the King and his eldeſt Sonne ſealed with white Waxe.

All theſe Princes, I ſay, hauing had the honour, to diaper their Armes with the ſacred Lillies of France; had Commiſſion alſo thereby, to ſeale with white waxe, which otherwiſe was not permitted but to the King, and to his eldeſt Son, apparant Succeſſor vnto the Crowne of France. For the other Princes of the Bloud, they had not any power to ſeale with white waxe; although they carried naturally the Flower-deluces, in their Armes. For example, we are inſtructed by the Regiſters of the Court, that King Lewis the eleuenth, (a Prince as troubleſome & hard to be indured, as euer was any) as an vnſpeakable fauour, permitted Rene King of Sicilie, and Duke of Anion, and his Heyres in the direct Line, to ſeale with white waxe, for the Kingdoms of Ieruſalem and Sicilie, and for the Dukedomes of Aniou, and other Siegneuries, as well in France, as elſewhere: by his Letters Patents, bearing date the eight and twentieth day of the Moneth of Ianuary, one thouſand, foure hundred, threeſcore and eight; and other Letters of expreſſe command at the Parliament of Paris, (which had refuſed to auouch and admit the former) dated in the Moneth of May, one thouſand, foure hundred, threeſcore and nine.

The deſcription of the Great Seale of the Order.

The Great Seale belonging to the Order of the Holy-Ghoſt, is of the ſame greatneſſe as that appertaining to the High Chancerie of France; but of a different impreſſion and figure. For that of the Order, inſtituted by the late King Henry (of bleſſed memory) memorie) his Maieſtie is thereon preſented in perſon, ſitting in his Chaire of ate, hauing on his right hand the Chancellour of the Order, Meſſire Philippe ault, Counte de Cheuerny, holding the Booke of the Holy Euangeliſts: On his ft hand the Regiſter of the ſaid Order, Meſſire Claude de l'Aubeſpine, ſtanding bright likewiſe, and reading the Oath which the Commanders ought to take. n his knees, and before his Maieſtie, kneeleth Frances de Bourbon, Prince of Contey, Prince of the Blood, receiued as firſt Commander of the Order, holding his hand the holy Euangeliſts. All theſe Portraitures are there figured to the life, and e Perſonages cloathed with their Cloakes, Mantelets and Collers of the Order, reſcribed by the Statutes thereto belonging. Aloft, and on the toppe of the eale, out of a luminous and bright ſhining Heauen, appeareth the repreſentati- n of the Holy-Ghoſt, in the forme of a Doue or white Pidgeon, deſcending on the King. All the vpper part elſe of the Seale, is cirkled with radiant ames of the Sunne, thickely powdred with Tongues of flames of Fire. And ound about the Circkle of the Seale, theſe words are engrauen as the Le- end.

Henry, third of that name, by the grace of God, King of France, and of Poland: Authour, Chiefe and Soueraigne of the Order of the Knights of the Holy-Ghoſt.

The contrary ſide of the Seale.

Now, as concerning the Counter-Seale, it is an Eſcutcheon or Shield, charged ith three Floures de Luces, Cantonned with foure Flames, as is on the Great Col- r of the Order. The Eſcutcheon is held and ſupported by two Angels, after the onted manner. Aboue on the Shield, inſtead of a Crowne, is a Doue deſcen- ing, circkled (as all the reſt of the Shield is) with golden Sun-beames, intermingled ith Flames of Fire. And becauſe the great Table, which hung in the Auguſtines f Paris (taken thence by the Authors of the mad and furious League, to deface the emorie of good King Henry the third) had the ſame repreſentation, as is contained n the great Seale of the Order: Here you may behold the true figure thereof.

The Order of Christian Charitie.

L'Ordre de la Charité Chrestienne.

THE same King Henry, of happie memorie, was the Institutour of another Order, tearmed of Christian Charitie; for the maintenance of poore Captaines and Souldiours, maimed of their Limbes in Warre. To whom hee assigned Rents and Reuennues, for their Diet and Garments, from the Spittle-Houses and Hospitales of France. And for their lodging, a House very sufficient, scituated in La Rue des Cordeliers Sainct Marcel lez Paris, called The House of Christian Charitie.

The Habite appointed for the Order.

He ordained, that such as were to be receiued into this Charitable Order, should weare vpon the left side of their Cloaks, an Anchored Crosse, embrodered on white Sattin or Taffata, with an Orle and Bordure of blew Silke. Au mitan de ladite Croix y ha l'Escusson de Satin Bleu Celeste chargee d'vne Fleur de Lys d'Or en broderie. This Crosse was cinkled, to expresse the kinde of the Order, with a Legend containing these words, embrodered with Letters of Gold; For hauing serued faithfully. But King

Pour auoir bien deseruy.

King Henry the third, could not perfect his intent according to his desire, being hindered by the bloudy factions of the disordered League: Wherefore King Henry the Great (of eternall memory) fourth of the name, and his Successor in the Kingdome, in singular loue to the deceased, and pietie to the world, endeuoured to bring it to the point of perfection. And performed it in such sort, that, in times to come, men of martiall Profession, shall haue meanes for their contentment, and to finish the remainder of their liues in quietnes. Hauing by an Edict set downe to the Kings his Successors, for establishment of a Chamber of Iustice, at the Monastery of Saint Iean de la Bretonnerie a Paris. This Chamber is composed of the Constable, Marshals and Colonels of France, with the number of ancient Knights of the Order, Maisters of Requests, and Substitutes to the Attourney Generall, to iudge without any further appeale.

Establishment of the Order.

Returne wee now againe to the Order of the Holy-Ghost.

In the Statutes of the Order of the Holy-Ghost, the seauentie and ninth Article, it is set downe, that to preserue alwaies the memory, for electing the Conuent of the Augustines, in the good Citie of Paris, there to celebrate the Festiuals of the Ceremonie of the Order; the King appointed to the said religious Brethren, the summe of three hundred thirty three Crownes, a third part of Rent euery yeare. Whereupon, Contracts should bee dispatched for the necessaries, with charge, that they must be bound to say euery day in the yeare two Masses; one aloud, for the prosperity and health of the Soueraigne, Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order; and the other softly and stilly, for the deceased. Hereof the great Almoner to take charge, to the end, that the intention of the Founder may be followed, and the said Seruice performed and celebrated as it ought to be.

A remembrance of the 79. Article.

In the execution of this Article, the Reuered Father in God, Messire Iacques Amiot, Bishop of Auxerre, Great Almoner of France, (to whose learned labours we are to giue due honour, for conuerting the workes of Plutarth (so sprightly) into our actiue French Language, and as exactly to be read as in Plutarch himselfe. And before made another Maister-piece of Art, which neuer will perish, mounting so high a flight, as the traduction of that admirable Romant, composed in Greeke by a Bishop named Heliodorus, reporting the chaste and modest Loues of Theagines and Cariclea) made a Contract with the Religious men, the Prior and Conuent of the Augustines of Paris. And the Lord Amiot, by vertue of the Procuration or Letter of Attourney passed to him (before two Notaries Du Chastelet de Paris) by the late deceased King Henry, third of that name, as also the Augustines assembled in their Chapter and Dispetorie, for the two Masses appointed to be said each day in the yeare; to bee payd the summe of three hundred thirty three Crownes, and one third part of a Crowne of the Sunne euery yeare; without comprehending the Rights, for entrance of the Knights of the said Order, Offerings and waxe-Lights, as well for the Knights deceased, as the sollemne Feast-dayes of the Order. This Contract was in the Moneth of December, Anno, one thousand, fiue hundred, threescore and eighteene.

Hee that traduced Plutarch out of Greeke into French, and Heliodorus.

According to which Contract, the Augustines haue since the third day of Ianuary, the thousand, fiue hundred, threescore and nineteene; continued to this day, saying and celebrating dayly, an high Masse of the Holy-Ghost, called, The Kings Masse, at the high Altar; and at the ninth houre in the morning: And the lower Masse, for the Kings, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order, at the tenth houre precisely.

In elder dayes, the low Masse was said at the Altar of Saint Augustine, in the body of the Church, as wee behold written in a small Table fastened to the place where the Gospell was read in the said Chappell, containing these words.

In this Chappell is said and celebrated euery day in the yeare a low Masse, at ten of the clocke in the morning: founded to perpetuity, in honour of the Order and Military discipline of the Holy-Ghost; created and instituted by the most Christian King of France, and of Poland, Henry third of that name, Chiefe Soueraigne, Great Maister, and first Founder of the said Order: To pray for the Soules of the deceased Kings, Cardinals, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order.

ſixe goodly Angels of Braſſe: the Table hanging thereon, containeth the adoration of the three Kings. This high Altar is adorned on the day of Pentecoſte, and ſolemne Feſtiuals of the Order, with a Cloth of State, Coapes, Chaſubles & Tuniques of Cloth of Siluer, the ground greene, powdered with flames of Gold in embroyderie, hardly any place wanting or voyd, with diuers Figures, expreſſing the miſteries of our Redemption, and the Armes of the King that was the Founder, in moſt excellent imbroderie, not to be equalled. The ſaid Ornaments, Coapes, Chaſubles and Tuniques are lined with Orange colour Taffata; And the Chappell beautified with veſſels of Gold and Siluer, of moſt ineſtimable value, and truely worth the Greatneſſe of a King of France, eſpecially King Henry, Third of the name, Great in all his actions, and the moſt bountifull Prince of his time.

The Kings intent for inſtituting another new Order of Knighthood. This Great Prince was once minded, to inſtitute a new Order of Knight-hood, farre beyond all them that had carried renowne, through all the Kingdomes on the Earth. His Fauorites counſelled him, that as he was the Phœnix of all Kings in the world: euen ſo he ſhould take that Bird, (the onely creature of his kinde, and without any Paragon) for the ſubiect of his new Order. But this Prince, reiecting ſuch director and guide in all his actions.*

The generall opinion of the Phœnix. All our Ancients tooke knowledge thereof, Poets, Hiſtorians and Naturaliſts of

There is one Bird that euermore, doth new it ſelfe beget,
By the Aſſyrians to this Foule, the Phœnix name is ſet.
Like other Birds, not Corne or Herbes, this Phœnix liueth by;
But the ſweet iuyce of Frankinſence, and Gum of Amony.
When of his liefe fiue hundred yeares, are well neere ſpent and gone,
The Holme-tree or the Palme-tree then he gladly mounteth on.
Where with his Tallants and his Beake, he builds himſelfe a Neſt, Beſtrewing it with Caſſia ſweet, and Nardus of the beſt,
Myrrhe, Gummes and Cinamon, with other Odours elſe,
As if it were a Bridall Bed, compos'd of pureſt ſmelles.
Then ſits he downe vpon his Neſt, and in thoſe ſpices dies,
And of his Fathers Corps (men ſay) doth very ſoone ariſe
A faire young Phœnix, which muſt liue as many yeares againe
As did his Sire. But when he doth both age and ſtrength obtaine, Fit for the loade, the heauy Neſt he beareth from the Tree,
(His Fathers Graue, his Cradle-Nurſe, Labours of Pietie)
And ſo he flieth through the Ayre to bright Hyperions Towne,
And fore Hyperions Temple Gate, he ſets his burthen downe.

Hyperiad, the Greeke name of the Sunne. Poets doe vnderſtand the Sunne, by the Greeke name Hyperion, to whom they crificed the ſwifteſt-running Horſes, as wee haue heretofore declared. And that hich they termed the Towne or City of the Sunne, is the very ſame which anci-nt Geographers vſually called Peluſium, where Nilus empt ieth it ſelfe into the Mediterranean Sea. It hath beene ſince then (as now at this day it is) called Damieta in Egypt, on the bankes of Nile, anciently called Heliopolis, Ciuitas Solis. And it is the more remarkable, by the ſurprizall which our King S. Lewes made of it, at his firſt Voyage ouer the Seas: moſt exactly deſcribed by Iohn, Lord of Ioinuille, Steward of Champaigne, in his learned Hiſtory.

rius* (vnder whoſe Raigne, the Phœnix of the world, our Sauiour and Redeemer ſuffered death and Paſſion, to bring vs to the hauen of eternall Life) In the yeare of the Foundation of Rome, ſeauen hundred foureſcore and ſeauen, as it is obſerued by the noble Hiſtorian of Rome, Cornelius Tacitus, in the ſixt Booke of his Annals, and his Text, well worthy to be regarded.

At such time as Paulus Fabius, and Lucius Vitellius were Consuls, after the passage of diuers Ages, the Bird named the Phoenix came into Egypt, and gaue occasion of much matter to the most learned men of that Countrey, as also to the Grecians, for discussing many things concerning this miracle. Whereof I finde it not much amisse, that I should set downe some particularities of their agreement, with others questionably doubtfull, yet (neuertheless) deseruing to bee all knowne. That the Bird is consecrated to the Sunne, and varieth in the forme of his Beake, being different also in his Feathers from other Fowles; all they doe consent, that haue made description of his forme and proportion: but concerning the multiplicity and number of his yeares, they are variable in their reports. The vulgar coniecture affirmeth, that hee liueth fiue hundred yeares, whereas some other doe hold, that hee liueth one thousand, foure hundred, threescore and one yeare. The first of these Birdes flew to the Citie, called Heliopolis, and a great number of other Fowles with him, as admiring or wondring at his new-kinde of shape, in the time of Sesostris. After that in the Raigne of Amasis and Ptolomie, who was the third King of the Macedonians, gouerning Egypt. But Antiquity is obscure and darke, for betweene the Raignes of Ptolomie and Tiberius, were scarcely two hundred and fifty yeares. In which regard, some haue imagined, that this was no true Phoenix, neither euer came from the Countrey of Arabia, or had any part of that which Antiquity hath attributed, yea, and confirmed to remaine in that kinde. For hauing well neere perfitted the number of his yeares, and his end neere approching, he buildeth a Nest in his Countrey, & throweth therein the seed of generation, out of which a young one doth spring or arise. Whose first care and prouidence is (being growne to ripenes) to bury the old. Yet not rash or vnaduisedly, but taking vp a quantity in weight of the stone Murha, & making tryall of carrying it in a long iourney: when he findeth himselfe able to holde out, & beare so heauie a burthen, fit for accomplishing the iourney; he taketh vp his Fathers Body, and beareth it to the Altar of the Sunne, where hee doth burne and sacrifice it. These things may be vncertaine, and fabulously enlarged. But concerning that which is sometimes seene in Egypt, it is not to be doubted.

Last Hee is in furnishing his Procreators Funerals, conueighing his whole Nest neere to the Citie of the Sunne in Panchaya: And there he leaueth it vpon the Altar.*

Petrus Belonius of Mans, in the end of his tenth Booke of the Nature of Birds, speaketh wonders of the Phoenix.

Our French Lucretius Du Bartas, hath exactly well translated into our Language, all which the fore-alleadged Authors haue written in theirs. In the fift Day of his first Weeke.

Le Coeleste Phœnix commença son ouurage
Parle Phœnix Terrestre, ornant d'vn tel plumage
Ses membres reuiuants, que l'annuel flambeau
De Cairan, iusques en Fez ne void rien de plus beau.
Il fit briller ses yeux, il luy planta pour creste
Vn astre flamboyant au sommet de sa teste:
Il couurit son col d'Or, d'Escarlate son dos,
Et sa queue d'Azur, puis voulut qu'Atropos
Luy seruist de Venus, & qu'vne Mort feconde
Rendist son aage égal au long aage du Monde.
Car ayant veu glisser dessous vn Ciel diuers
Et cent fois dix Estez, & cent fois dix Hyuers
Des Siecles abatu, il luy prend vne enuie
De laisser en depost à la flamme sa Vie,
De mourir pour renaistre, & d'entrer au Tombeau,
Pour apres en sortir cent mille fois plus beau.
Lors perché sur les bras d'vne Palme il entasse
Le Baume sur le Nard dessus la Casse:
Et sur le poinct du iour de leurs branches, bastit
Son Vrne, son Berceau, son Sepulcre, son Nid,
Cependant qu'il attend qu'vne flammeche esprise
A l'odorant buscher ses os sacrez reduise
En genitale poudre, & que ces bois ardans
Finissent non sa Vie, ains ses caduques Ans.
L'Eschanson Phrygien d'vne prodigue aiguiere
Ne verse sur les Champs Riuiere apres Riuiere
Les froidureux Trions ne couurent de verglas
Les Bois Phœniciens, l'Autan ne daigne pas
Passer le bord Lybique, & l'Antre Hyperboree
Retient dans ses prisons captif le froid Boree
Car adonc la Nature encontre tout effort,
Soigneuse tient la main à sa viuante Mort,
Ses funebres apprests, sa Naissance, ses Couches.
Mesmes le clair Soleil sur son lict doux-flairant
Iette vn de ses Cheueux, qui tout soudain s'esprend
Aux rameaux de Sabee, & peu à peu consume De l'Immortel Phœnix & la Chair, & la Plume.

Presqu'en mesme moment de ce cendreux, monceau
Naist vn Ver, puis vn Oeuf, & puis vn autre Oyseau:
Ainçois le mesme Oyseau, qui nay de sa semence
Deux cents Lustres nouue aux trespassant recommence,
Au milieu du brasier sa belle Ame reprend,
Infiny par sa fin dans la tombe se rend,
De soy-mesme se fait par vne Mort prospere, Nourrice, Nourrisson, Hoir, Fils, & Pere, & Mere:
Nous monstrant qu'il nous faut, & de Corps, & d'Esprit
Mourir tous en Adam, puis pour renaistre en Christ.

And for his Bride-Bed fits him with a Tombe.
Yet fruitfull is his death, and makes his Age
Equall in length to the worlds Pilgrimage.
For, hauing wandred thorow diuers Climes,
A thousand Winters, and as many Primes;
O'respent with yeares, and earneſt in deſire,
To end his life in sparkling flames of fire,
(Yet to reuiue againe) enters his Graue,
A fairer State an hundred times to haue.
Pearcht on the Palme, his Pile is there prepar'd
Of Balme, Myrrhe, Caſſia, precious Nard.
By Day-breake builds he on the branches high;
His Vrne, Neſt, Cradle and his Tombe to dye.
There he awaites some little sparkling Spriſe
To fire this perfumde Pile, and Sacrifice.
His holy bones into such seeding Cenders;

Thus is the Concluſion of that Author, very properly deriued from the naturall ſpoſition of this Celeſtiall Bird. Whereof, that bright ſplendour of the Church int Hierome maketh vſe, to infer from him a Paralell of Virginitie, for the Queene Heauen, deliuering theſe remarkeable words, vpon the Expoſition of the Creede. Quid mirum videtur ſi Virgo conceperit, cum Orientis Auem quem Phœnicem vocat, tantum ſine coniuge naſci, vel renaſci conſtet? vt ſemper vna ſit, & ſemper ſibi ipſa ſuccendo, vel renaſcendo ſucedat? what wonder is it to ſee, if a Virgin ſhall conceiue; en the Bird of the Eaſt, which is called the Phœnix, is ſuch, as to be borne without a ke-fellow or mate, and afterward to be borne againe? That alwayes it is one, and euer-re is borne to and of it ſelfe, or ſucceedeth it ſelfe by reuiuing?

The ſame Doctor of Doctors, writing Ad Præſidiam, delighteth himſelfe, in ſcribing this admirable birth. *Phœnix Auis eſt in India, & per Quingentos Annos, de huno implet ſe Aromatibus, & ſic nidificat, & indicat Sacerdoti Heliopolitano in Menſe ymenoth, ſiue Farmuth. Hereupon was it, that the Pope Saint Clement, firſt of that name, in his Apoſtoli-ll Conſtitutions: Saint Cyprian in his Creede: and the learned Antiquarie Tertul-n, in the Treatiſe which he wrote De Reſurrectione Mortuorum, deriued example on the Phœnix, to proue the Reſurrection of the Dead.

CHAP. 9.

THE First Chapter for the Order of the Holy-Ghost, so much famed & renowned through all parts of the World: was held at the Augustines in Paris, the last day of the yeare, One thousand, fiue hundred, threescore and eighteene; and the first and second dayes of the yeare following, in regard that the Ceremonies of the said Order, continued three whole dayes together.

The most Christian King of France, and of Poland, Henry, Third of the name, of blessed memorie: receiued the Cloake and Great Coller, likewise the lesser Cloake and paire of Beads; at the hands of the Lord Cardinall of Bourbon.

Here is to be obserued once for all) that the Crosse of the said Order, it hath on the one side, and in the midst thereof, Vne Colombe Esmaillee de Blanc, comme l'Orle de ladict Croix; and on the other side is the Image of Saint Michael. So that the Commanders beare their Armes, circled or entoured with both the Orders: Of Saint Michael, and of the Holy-Ghost.

King Henry carried for his Armes two Escutcheons Collared or Banded, yet sundred & diuided each from other at the point. The first was of France, and the other of Poland, which was De Gueles à vne Aigle d'Argent, Couronnée, & Membre d'Or. Parti de Lituania, qui est de Gueulles, au Caualier arme d'Argent, au Bouclier d'Azur, à vne Croix Patriarchale d'Or. About the two Escutcheons, were both the Great Collars belonging to the two Orders formerly named, & the Imperiall Crowne of France: within the Bases whereof was the Deuice of the deuout and holy King, Author of the Order, which was three Crownes. The Soule and Legend speaking: Manet Vltima Coelo.

The Tenants & Supporters for the Armes of France, were two Angels.

The representation and true figure (according to the life) of this Great Prince, is to be seene at the Augustines of Paris, in the Chappell appointed for the Order: At the Grey Friers, in the second Glasse-window of the Quire: And in the Cloyster of the Iacobins, as you see it figured on the great Seale.

The Twelfth Chapter, was held in the Citie of Chartres, Monday being the eight and twentieth Day of February, in the yeare One thousand fiue hundred fourescore and foureteene.

THe first Sunday in Lent, being the seauen and twentieth day of February, in the said yeare; King Henry the Great (of glorious memory) was Sacred and Crowned in the Cathedrall Church of our Lady at Chartres, by the Bishop of the said place, Mesire Nicholas de Thou.

And on the Morrow, his Maiestie being willing to receiue the Order of the Holy-Ghost, departed from the Bishops Pallace, about three houres after Mid-day, and came to the Church of our Lady. There he heard the Euen-song of the Holy-Ghost (Sung by them of the Kings Chappell, and Musicall Voices ioyned with Instruments) and assisted by the Associates, Prelates, Commanders and Officers of the Order, attired in their great Cloaks and Collers of the Order.

At Magnificat, the Bishop of Chartres, Officiant in Pontificalibus (after he had Encensed the high-Altar) presented the Encense to his Maiestie, sitting vnder his Cloath of State in the first Chaire of the Quire, entring on the right hand.

After the Prayer of Sanctus Spiritus, said at the end of the Magnificat, and the Episcopall Benediction; his Maiestie went to the Altar, where presenting himselfe on his knees, hee tooke and signed the Oath, as Head and Soueraigne of the Order, vpon the true Crosse (as they say) lying on a square Cushion of Cloath of Gold, fairely fringed with Red, held by two Priests, and on the Booke of the Holy Euangelists, then held by Phillip Hurault Count de Chiuerny, and de Limoux, Chancellour of France, and of the two Orders of the King. Behold here the tenure of the Oath.

CHAP. XI.

L'Ordre du Saint Lazare.

HE Knights of the Order of Saint Lazarus (euen as the reſt were) being expelled and driuen out of the holy City of Ieruſalem, and likewiſe from the ſtrong City of Acres: were enforced to ſeeke for their ſafety in Europe. Whereupon, the good King S. Lewes, returning from his Voyage into thoſe parts, beyond the Seas, which was in the Yeare, One Thouſand, Fiue Hundred Fifty and Foure, in the Moneth of March: he brought with him along from thence a troope of thoſe Knights. To whom he gaue great benefits throughout all the Prouinces of his Kingdome, eſpecially in Townes, Borroughes, & Villages. And ſo much the rather, becauſe they addicted themſelues, to the curing of diſeaſed perſons, namely ſuch as were infected with Leaproſie, Meazelrie, and the like, whereby they were ſegregated from the ſociety & companying with any body.

The cruelty of the Turkes & Sarazens to Chriſtians in the Holy-Land.

The bounty of King Lewes to the Knights of S. Lazarus.

He gaue vnto them Borigny, neere to Orleans, which place thoſe Knights of Saint Lazarus, eſtabliſhed the Seate and abiding for their Great Maiſter on whom depended all the Commanders of the ſaid Order, which remained then in Italy, Germany and England. For, by the ſurprizall of Acres, which happened in the Yeare One Thouſand, Two Hundred, Foure Score and Seauen; they were enforced to leaue the Eaſt Parts, to ſeeke their fortune elſewhere. They held their Generall Chapter euery ſeauenth yeare, which was obſerued ſollemnly among them, enioying very great Reuennues: in regard they poſſeſſed all the houſes of diſeaſed perſons, as Spittles, Lazar-Hoſpitals, and the like, throughout all the Prouinces that were in Europe.

The cauſe of this Orders ſubuerſion.

In proceſſe of time, theſe Knights of Saint Lazarus became married men, & addicting their whole care for the maintenance of their Wiues & Children: began to miſuſe & neglect their wonted charitable prouidence, for the curing and recouery of ſuch impotent people. Wherupon, thoſe Princes and Great Lords vnder whom they liued, perceiuing their courſes to be more popular and licentious, then either their profeſſion allowed, or humane reaſon permitted: they tooke into their own power, and ſeized on their Commands, Hoſpitals, and Spittles, reſeruing the moſt part to themſelues, and giuing the remainder to the Knights of S. Iohn of Ieruſalem, now named of Malta, but in thoſe dayes of Rhodes.

Hugh Goodfellow, Pope of Rome.

In the Pontificality of Pope Gregory, the Thirteenth of that Name, (called before Hugo Bon-Compagnio, Qui Portoit de Gueules au Dragon naiſſant d'Or) Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Sauoy, was choſen chiefe and Great Maiſter of the ſaid Order of S. Lazarus, by Buls directed from the ſame Pope. Who cutting large thongs out of other mens Leather; gaue them all the Commanderies, and Spittles for Leaperous people in France, Germanie, Italy and Spaine.

Oppoſition made by the K. of France.

Now concerning France, oppoſition was made againſt this Grant, by the King of France & Poland, Henry Third of the Name, of bleſſed memory: becauſe the chiefe of the ſaid Order remaining in his Kingdome, the great Maiſters Office therof in meere right & equity appertained to him, rather then to any other Prince of Chriſtendome.

the Great Maisters Office thereof, in meere right and equity appertained, to rather then to any other Prince in Christendome.

The Knights of Malta enioyed all of S. Lazarus.

The Knights of Malta, an inuincible band of Souldiers for Iesus Christe and Bu'warke of Christendome, enioyed and possessed the greater part of the Hospi and Lazar-houses, belonging to them of Saint Lazarus. Beside an infinite numbe notable Priuiledges, with full and free exemption, from all Tenths and Contri tions; yea, and vniting to their Mansion the Great Maistership of the said Order Saint Lazarus. Vntill in our time, when Fryer Aymar of Chates, Knight of Mal and Gouernour of Diepe in Normandy (renowned for his House, and for his ma singular Seruices, which he performed to our lateſt Kings) forsooke the Title Great Maister of the Order of Saint Lazarus.

Concerning the Order of the Virgin Mary of Mount-Carmel.

A new Order of Knighthood, of an Hundred French Gentlemen.

KIng Henry the Great, Fourth of the Name, of eternall Memory, by the exam of the Dukes of Bourbon, and of Vendosme, his most famous Grand-fathers, uing in his life time alwayes particular trust and confidence, in the succour prayers of the Sacred Virgin: instituted a new Order, in honour of the Virgin ry of Mount-Carmell. And composed it of an hundred Gentlemen, all Frenchme of remarkable Houses, to wait and attend about his Person in following times, occasion should call him to any warre: as a small Battalion of choyce men, and wo deseruing to be trusted. To this Order hee destenied and appointed all Comma deries, & Hospitals: to the end that these Knights of our Lady and of Saint Lazar might haue the better meanes to giue their attendance in all necessities.

Pope Paul the Fifth, sitting at that time in the Sacred Seate, confirmed this Institu tion, by his Bulle giuen at Rome in the Lateran Pallace, the Fourteenth of the Ca lends of March, One Thousand, Sixe Hundred and Seauen. And therein, after he hath extolled the deuotion and Pietie of the most Christian King: by good rig he calleth him the Eldest Sonne of the Church, and prescribeth (conformably to th intention of his most Christian Maiesty) the Statutes and the Forme which th Knights of the Order should hold afterward.

The Statutes and Ordinances appointed by the King, to be obserued by the Order.

1. THat they shall establish the Chiefe Residencie of their Order, in any City o Towne either by Land or Sea, where it shall please the Maiestie of the mo Christian King.

2. That no one shall be receiued into the Order, if he be not a French Gentlema Noble by foure R ces, as well by the Fathers as Mothers side.

3. That the Knights of the said Order shall haue for their Patron, the Sacre Virgin, called of Mount Carmell, whose Feast they are to celebrate yearely, the Six teenth day of the Moneth Iuly.

4. That they shall abstaine from eating Flesh on Wednesday in euery weeke: an dayly say the Office of the Virgin Mary, or (at least) their Chaplet of Beades.

5. They shall weare on their Cloakes, and on the left side, a Crosse of Tawn Veluet or Sattin, Anchree à l' Orle a' Argent. In the middest whereof, and in a rou dell, shall bee the Image of the Virgin Mary, entoured with Beames of Gold, wrought by embroyderie. About their neckes they shall weare an Ancred Crosse
Gold, and in the middest thereof (both on the one side and other) the Image of th Virgin Mary, enamelled, hanging at a Riband of Tawny Silke.

The Husband of three wiues.

6. They may be married twice in their life time, but no more, and one of the must be to a woman that is a widdow onely, and not to be a Trigamus: They sha keep coniugall chastitie, and make a vow to doe it.

7. They are not to be admitted into the said Order, except they be borne in and loyall Wedlock, and whereof they are to make good proofe. And they may no be admitted into the Profession, vntill they haue fully compleated Eighteene year of Age. And before their entrance, they are to receiue deuoutly the Sacrament the Body and Bloud of our Lord Iesus Christ.

8. Ne

8 Neuertheleſſe, the Great Maister of the Order, may giue and conferre it vpon y young Gentlemen, being aboue seauen yeares old, to bee as Pages to the said Maister.

9. The said Knights are to fight for maintenance of the Catholique and Apoolique Faith: & at all times, and as often as they shall bee commanded by the Pope, e Sacred Apostolicall Seare; the most Christian King, and their Great Maister;
ider whose charge they are to march in Armes, but not otherwise.

10. The said Great Maister shall stand obliged, three Monethes after his noination by the most Christian King, to procure his confirmation from the holy eate, before hee meddle in the Gouernment of the said Great Maistership.

11. The nomination of the Great Maisters, as well for the present, as in times to ome: shall appertaine to the most Christian Kings, Soueraignes, and Founders of e said Order.

In fauour of whom, the said Pope Paulus Quintus, at the instance and suite of the ost Christian King, hath permitted to the Great Maisters of the Order, to haue ne Thousand Fiue Hundred Duckats from the Chamber, (that is to say, Sixe housand Pounds) and to the Knights and Commanders, Fiue Hundred Duckats, which are Two Thousand Pounds) in Pensions one or more, which are to be deri-ed and leuyed on all the Benefices in France, as well Reguler as Seculer, Arch-ishopricks, Bishopricks, Abbeyes, as Deaneries, Priories, and Cures.

Reckoning of the pounds after the French Rates.

Moreouer, hee granted plenary Remission of their sinnes, both a poena & culpa, on e day of their entring into the Profession; & in the Article of death, being confesd, and repentant for their sins, expressing the same as well with the heart as mouth.

This Order thus instituted and approued by the Pope, his Maiesty named for the rst Great Maister of the Order of Our Lady, of Mount-Carmel, and of Saint Laza- s in Ierusalem, Messire Phillibert de Nereſtamg, a worthy Lord, and famous by his ruices performed to the Crowne.

The first Great Maister of both the Orders.

And this nomination happened in the Moneth of Aprill, One Thousand, Sixe undred and Eight. And the Thirtieth day of October, in the said yeare, the same ord of Nereſtamg, at Fountaine-Bleaud, before his Maiesty in the presence of my ord the Prince de Conty, the Duke of Aquillon, and other great Lords present in the Court; tooke the Oath as Great Maister of the said Order, swore Fidelity, Obedince and Seruice to the King, and his Successors Kings of France, towards all, and a-inst all, without any exception, to keepe and obserue inuiolably the Statutes of e Order, and to seeke the aduancing and conseruation thereof.

The manner of his creation by the King.

Which being done, the King did put about his Necke the Crosse of Gold fastend to a Riband of Tawney Silke, and then cloathed him with the Cloake & Crosse f the Order: granting him full power & authority to raise the number of an hun-red Knights, without any further augmenting or increasing the number, at any me after. According to which Concession, the said Great Maister gaue the Order diuers Gentlemen and Pages, in the Church and Monastery of Saint Lazarus, sea-ed in the Skirts and Suburbs of Paris.

The Great Seal of the Order.

Now concerning the Great Seale of the said Order, for sealing all Letters and desions for the Knights and Officers (it being made of Tinne and Lead) on the re-erse side, is to be seene a Knight Armed at all points, and his Horse Barded, a shield fore him, and a naked drawne Sword in his hand. Round about it as the Legend, Carmeli, & S. Lazari in Hierusalem.*

And on the other side, the Armes of the Lord of Nereſtamg, Qui sont Quatre ou ing Bandes à Trois Eſtoilles sur l'vne d'icelles. The Armes are engirt with the Order Saint Michaell, and for the deuise or Legend, twice about is: Philibertus de Neſtamg, Magnus Magister Ordinis, & Militiæ Beatæ Mariæ Virginis de Monte Carmeli, Sancti Lazari in Hierusalem, with the Date, One Thousand, Sixe Hundred nd Eight.

The Order of Orleans, called, Of the Porcupine: Instituted by Monsieur Lewes of France Duke of Orleans: In the Yeare, One Thousand Three Hundred, Foure Score and Thirteene.

CHAP. II.

L'Ordre d'Orleans, dit du Porc. Espic.

HE Originall of the House of Orleans, tooke beginning in the person of Mounsieur Philip of France, Fourth Sonne of Philip de Valois, Sixt of that Name, the Line of whom had direct continuance, vntill King Charles Eight of the name, King of France, Ierusalem, Naples, and Sicily; who deceasing without Heyres, the Crowne of France (by that meanes) fell to the House of Orleans, in the person of Lewes the Twelfth. The foresaid Philip of France, married Madam Blanch, the Posthumus-Daughter to King Charles le Bel, and Queene Iane or Ioane of France, the Daughter to Lewes of France; Count D'Eureux. The said Duke of Orleans, had no Issue, and Portoit de France sans nombre au Lambeau de Gueulles.

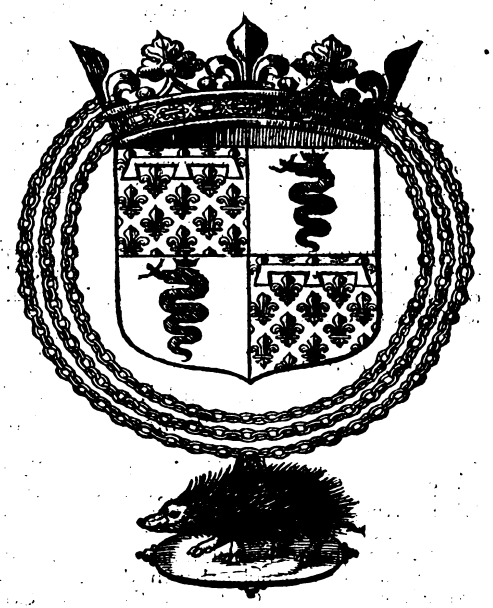
How the Crowne of France came to the House of Orleans.

The Second (and Subiect of this Discourse) had Originall in the person of Mounsieur Lewes of France, the Second Sonne to King Charles the Fifth, named the Wise, borne the Thirteenth Day of March, in the Yeare, One Thousand, Three Hundred, Threescore and Eleuen: His Godfather was Lewes, Count d'Estampes.

The Title of Lewes of France, his Armes and Descendants.

He had for his Appennage or Portion, the Dukedome of Touraine, which became changed afterward for that of Orleans: Il Porte seme de France au Lambeau d'Argent, but not of Gueulles, as his Predecessor did. Hee had likewise the County of Valois, but hee tooke not the Sir-name thereof, neither the Armes, which were Seme de France, a la Bordure de Gueulles, and here you may behold the Titles which he tooke: Lewes, Sonne to the King of France, Duke of Orleans, Count of Valois, of Blois, and of Beaumont, Lord of Coucy, Chasteau-Thierry, &c. Hee had for his Creast the double Fleur de Lys, as a Prince of the Bloud, and (in that respect) his Supporter was an Angell. He had for his Descendants also such as were Dukes of Valois, vnto King Lewes, Twelfth of the Name, who being come to the Crowne, gaue away liberally, and as a Royall Gift, the Countie of Valois to his Cousin Frances of Angoulesme, and afterward his Sonne in Law.

An errour in Annalists, about the name of Valois.



And this hath lien as a stumbling-blocke, in the way of many Annalists of France, who haue giuen the Sir-name of Valois to King Frances the First, and to the Kings his Successors, euen to Henry, Third of the Name, King of France and of Poland of sacred memory; For it is a popular errour, and cannot passe for currant, in regard that the said King Frances the First, was descended of Mounsieur Lewes of France Duke of Orleans, and so (by consequent) his Sonnes and Descendants bare the Sir-name and Armes, vntill King Frances the First: who carried the Sir-name of Angoulesme, his Partage, and the Armes of Orleans; yet with Brisure, the points pendents of the Labell were charged with Trois Croissants de Gueules.

Kings comming to their Crownes, lose their Sir-names.

Moreouer it is another popular errour, to giue the Sir-name of Valois to the Descendants of King Philip de Valois: because when Kings come to the Crowne, they doe lose the Sir-name and Armes of their Portion, Appennage and Patrimony: their Descendants (not being Kings) take that of the Patrimony which their Father giueth them: for Kings haue no Sir-names, & therfore it is no good language, to say Lewes of Bourbon, Thirteenth of the name King of France, & of Nauarre; Don Philippe Austria, Philip, third of the name, King of Spaine, or Iames Stewart, first of the name, King of Great Brettaigne, and the like of other Kings and Princes on the Earth. The same also is to be vnderstood of their daughters, who ought to beare name of the place of their Extraction; as Mary of Florence, Anne of Spaine, &c. and not Mary de Medicis, Anne of Austria, Queenes of France. This is spoken (in this passe) but by way of aduise.

Lewes of France his wife and issue.

1. His Sonnes were Charles of Orleans (Sonnes issuing of Sonnes of France, doe not carrie the Title of Monsieur, nor the Sir-name of France, but onely that of their Fathers allowance) Father of King Lewes, called the Twelfth.

2. Phillip of Orleans, Count of Vertus, who tooke to wife Katherine of Bourgongne, daughter to John, Duke of Bourgongne, tearmed le Baddé, and this Man had not any issue.

3. John of Orleans, Count of Engoulesme, and of Perigueux.

Of Charles Duke of Orleans, eldest Son to Lewes of France.

Charles, Duke of Orleans, eldest Sonne to Monsieur Lewes of France, had three Wiues, but the two first had not any issue. At his returne out of England (where he had remained euer since the Battaile of Azincourt) he had in his third Marriage (as we shall shew hereafter) Marie of Cleues, Niece to Duke Phillip of Bourgongne, second of the name, daughter to Adolph, second of the name, first Duke of Cleues, and to his honorable Lady and wife Mary, daughter to John of Bourgongne Count d'Estampes, but afterward of Neuers, and of Rhetheil, Brother to the said Duke of Bourgongne. In which marriage was borne the good King Lewes, twelfth of the name, called The Father of his People, and two daughters: Mary of Orleans, wife to John de Foix, Vicount of Narbonna, and of this marriage issued the valiant and generous Prince, Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, slaine at the Battaile of Ravenna; and Germania de Foix, second wife to King Ferdinand of Arragon, Vsurper of the Kingdome of Nauarre. The other Daughter was Anne of Orleans, Lady Abbesse of Font-Euraud.

Valentina of Millaine seeketh reuenge for the murder of her husband.

John of Orleans Count of Engoulesme, third Sonne of the said Monsieur Lewes of France; was famous for his Sanctitie of life, and whom we will speake of, albeit briefely. His Father being vnfortunately murdred by John, Duke of Bourgongne, surnamed the Bad or Wicked (as we shall hereafter relate more at large) Valentina of Millaine, to be reuenged on this Assassinate: made her recourse to the King of England, who sent her an Armie, conducted by the Count of Clarence. He made shew, as if he would worke wonders, and got assurance for the charges of his voyage,

age, which amounted to the summe of two hundred thousand Crownes, for the repaiment whereof, Madame Valentina gaue in hostage the said Iohn of Engoulesme her Sonne, then aged no more then nine yeares. Conueyed hee was into England, Anno foure hundred and thirteene, and there he remained two and thirtie yeares, euen vntill One thousand foure hundred fortie fiue, when hee returned home into France, after hee had paied the summe for which he stood engaged: as well by the sale of his moueables, as by the Countie of Perigort, bought by the Vicount of Li-moges, Iohn of Bretaigne.

The Distichs passing vnder Cates name written by Iohn of Orleans here in England.

During the time of his Adolescencie in England, he wrote (with his owne hand) the Distickes of Morall life, acknowledged vnder the name of Cato. Although some other doe auouch, that they were reduced into some better forme, by that great Light of the Church Saint Hierome, yea, and thought to be made by him in his tender youth, writing Commentaries vpon them, drawne out of diuers Authors of his owne reading. At his returne into France, he put them into the Sacristie or Vestrie of Saint Peter at Angoulesme, at the surprizall whereof by the enemies, they were consumed to ashes.

The ordenarie residing of this Prince, was at the said place of Angoulesme, vpon the top of an high Mountaine, the foote whereof is laued by the Riuer of Charente, which doth as much at Coignacke (in the Dioceese of Xaintes) the place of the birth of King Frances the first; and from thence trauersing thorow Xaintonge, goeth, and looseth it selfe in the Ocean Sea.

A few memorable Obseruations, concerning the Holy and Deuout Life and Death of this worthy Prince Iohn of Orleance.

A good direction to Seruants.

THe first Rule enioyned by him to the Officers of his Court, was to abstaine from Swearing, and blaspheming the Sacred name of God; nor once to name the Diuell in their mouthes. If any happened to faile herein; their wages being paid, they were banished from his Court, and caused afterward to be punished by Iustice, according to the qualitie of their blasphemie: yea, oftentimes, himselfe would sit on the Iudgement Bench; that the distribution might be with all equitie, according to the Lawes, and the Customes vsed in that Countrey.

His daily charitie to the Poore.

Daily he repaired to the Church, wearing a long gowne, and, for examples sake, to his Subiects; on the solemne Feast dayes of the yeare, he receiued by his Curate his Creator, in presence of the people, hearing two or three Masses euery day:
And at the ending of them, himselfe distributed to the Poore, such moneyes as he kept expresly (for the purpose) in his Almes Purses, and neuer went abroad without them.

His Fasting.

On Wednesday he abstained from eating of flesh, and on Fridayes would feede on nothing but Fruites, Hearbes or Pulses: Fasting alwayes on the Eeue of the Purification of our Lady, called Candlemasse, with Bread and Water; as also in Lent, and the foure especiall times of the yeare. He would exhort and preach to his Houshold people; to Fast three dayes in the Weeke, during the holy time of Lent.

His Musicall delight.

He much delighted in the discourses of the Bishop of Angoulesme, Maister bert de Montbrun, and of an Augustine Fryer, named George, Learned and skil-men in Diuinitie, hauing alwayes their company about his person. After his dai repasts, he caused one to play vpon the Harpe before him, hauing taken a feeling therein while he liued in England, where that Instrument is much more common and familiar, then it is in France.

His apparell and admired to his subiects.

He went very meanely garmented, of plaine common Cloath, and of Ashes co lour: except on good and solemne Feast dayes, when (for honour and decencie) he wore them of Cassocke fashion, composed of Sattin, and other long Roabes of Silke. Nor would he suffer his Subiects and followers, to be excessiue in costlines on their habits, with Laces of Siluer or Gold: except such as were renowned for valiancie,

Valiancie, or honoured with the Order of Knighthood. At his Table, he was not superfluous in Viandes: hee did eate but little, and tempered his Wine very much.

The making of his Will and Death.

In the Moneth of May, One thousand foure hundred threescore and seauen, iudging in his owne Soule, that his ending approached neere: He made his Testament, giuing good Legacies to Churches, and to his Houshold Seruants, leauing to his Sonnes the care of discharging them, and to his Wife, his Lands and purchases. He dyed in the yeare following, Threescore and eight, the last day of Aprill (the Feast day of Saint Eutropius, the Apostle of Xaintonge) at the Castell of Cognack. He dyed in his Garments, and vpon the Couerlet of his Bed, for hee would not depart the World betweene Sheetes. Fryer George alwayes thus sung in his eare: Iohn, you must dye, and therefore remember, that Iesus Christ dyed for you.
His Soule tooke her flight to the Celestiall Kingdome, saying his ordenary Prayer of the houres of the Crosse. Domine Iesu Christe Fili Dei viui, pone Passionem, & mortem tuam inter iudicium, &c.

His Buriall in Saint Peters Church of Angoulesme.

His Buriall was in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Peter of Angoulesme, where his Widdow and Sonnes erected a Marble Tombe for him; which was hewne downe in pieces, when the enemies tooke the Citie, in Anno One thousand fiue hundred threescore and two, and threescore and eight. But thirtie yearesafter, the Canons causing Stones to be taken forth of the Vaults in the Quire, which were beaten downe by the enemies: found in the same Caue part of the Princes Body, without any iniurie done thereto, or any putrifaction whatsoeuer. An hundred yeares after it had bin buried, it was put into a Chest of Lead, and is there kept (to this day) among the monuments of the Church; whereto (in elder times) were many Pilgrimages performed from all parts of France, and an infinite number of people receiued there helpe, as well for Feauers as other diseases, at the Tombe or Sepulcher of this deuout Prince, as is reported.

Information giuen by the Bishop of Angoulesme.

In the yeare One thousand fiue hundred and eighteene, at the request of King Frances, his yongest Sonne, during the time of Pope Eugenius, fourth of that name, Messire Anthony d'Estain, Bishop of Angoulesme, made information of the Life and death of this holy Prince, as also of his famous Miracles, by the depositions of an hundred and twentie eight Witnesses, aged threescore and eight yeares at the least. And by whom it appeared, that from the time of his being in England, the renowne of his deuotion and singuler pietie was so great; that at the Counsell of Basile, it was propounded to haue him chosen Pope.

Concerning his marriage and issue.

But God reseruing him, to be the Original and fourse of so many Kings of France; to wit, Frances the first, Henry the second, and his Children: At his returne from England, he tooke to wife Margaret de Rohan, in the yeare foure hundred fortie and nine, by whom he had two Sonnes and a Daughter; Iane of Orleans, wife to Charles de Cottiuy, Lord of Talleborg, who had but one onely Daughter, wife to the Prince of Taillemont, eldest Sonne to the Lord of Trimouille.

Charles, Sonne and Successor to Iohn the Religious, and the issue descending of him.

His Sonnes were Leures (held at the Font of Baptisme, by King Charles the sea-enth) who dyed yong, and was enterred at Bote-Ville in Angoulmois. And Charles, who was his Successour in the Countie of Angoulesme, and had to wife Louisa de Sauoye, daughter to Philibert, Duke of Sauoye: by whom he had a Sonne and a daughter, Margaret of Angoulesme, wife (in first Marriage) to Charles, the last Duke of Alanson, and last Prince of the branch of Valois, because he had no linage.
And in second Marriage, she espoused Henry, second of the name, King of Nauarre, Sonne to King Iohn d'Albert, and Queene Katherine of Nauarre, from whom the King of Arragon, Ferdinand, vniustly vsurped the Kingdome of Nauarre, in the Moneth of Iuly, One thousand fiue hundred and thirteene. Of this marriage was borne their onely daughter, Madame Iane or Ioane of Nauarre, ioyned at the age of nine yeares (by King Francis the first, his Vncle) with the Duke of Cleues and Gulich, William, onely masle childe to Iohn, first of the name, and married to Monsieur the Prince, Anthony of Bourbon, Duke of Vendosme, fift Prince of the Blood. Of which marriage issued a Sonne and a daughter, Madame Katherine of Bourbon, Princesse of Nauarre, Wife to Monsieur Henry of Lorraine, Marquesse du Pont, afterward Duke
of

of Lorraine, and of Bar, who dyed without any iſſue: And Henry of Bourbon, fourth of the name, King of France, and of Nauarre the third called the Great, of eternall memorie: Let vs now take againe the Branch of Orleans.

Iohn the Baſtard of Orleans.

Monſieur Lewes of France, Duke of Orleans, beſide his legitimate Children formerly named, had by the Lady of Canny, wife to Meſsire Aubert de Canny, a Knight of Picardie, a Sonne named Iohn, tearmed the Baſtard of Orleans, who was Count of Dunois, and of Lougue-Ville. Porta d'Orleans au Filet de Gueulles, brochant ſur le tout, tirant de la droitte à la gauche, which ſignifieth Baſtardiſe. His deſcent hath continued the ſaid Armes of Orleans, Au Filet d'Argent, de la gauche à la droitte, for a ſignale of legittimate birth. This Count of Dunois was ſo hardie and courageous in Warre, that his Militarie exploits hath made his memorie honorable for euer. For, next to Ioane d'Arc de Dompremy, Sir named The Pucelle of Orleans: He was the principall inſtrument, for expelling the Engliſh forth of France, and deſerued the name of Cheualier Sans Reproche, & de L'Eſcu des Francois. So that, to make acknowledgement of the worthy Seruices by him performed, King Charles the ſeauenth, made him Great Chamberlaine, a dignitie continuing to his Poſteritie, the Dukes of Longue Ville, with the Sir-name and Armes of Orleans, vntill the Reigne of yong King Francis, who was the ſecond of that name.

The Knight without blame and ſhield of the French.

Great Chamberlaine of France.

At the Sacring of the ſaid King, the Duke of Longue-Ville that then was, being vnwilling to ſtand taxed with nouell matters of Religion (ſo ſpeaketh the Preſident of the Place in his memories) the Office of Great Chamberlaine of France, came to the Houſe of Guiſe, with the Sir-name and Armes of Lorraine: in the perſon of Francis de Lorraine, Duke of Guiſe, vnto whoſe deſcendants, this Office of the Crowne is yet remaining to this day.

The ranke or place of this Great Chamberlaine, is to lye couched at the Kings feete, when he ſitteth on his Throane of Iuſtice, and at his Sacring: but at his entring into Townes and Cities, he followeth the very neereſt perſon behinde his Maieſtie.

Lewes of Bourbon, ſecond of the name (called the Good) Duke of Bourbonnois and of Auuergne, held it a great honour, to be the Great Chamberlaine of France, ſo it is ſaid to vs in his Chronicle. King Charles, fift of the name, departing out of this life, to another much better, the yeare of Grace One thouſand three hundred fourſcore and eight, the Princes of the Blood Royall, the Dukes of Berry, of Bourgongne, and of Bourbon, conducted the yong King, Charles the ſixt, to be Sacred and Crowned at Rheimes. To honor the King there, there wanted no Chiualrie, nor Royall Feaſting, fit for the time.

Out of the Records of France a noate to be obſerued.

After the Sacred Vnction, the King was ſeated at an high Table of Honour, and the Duke of Bourbon, who was Peere and Chamberlaine of France, gaue him Three of his Knights; one whereof ſtood at his right ſide, and the other on his left, and the third behinde at his backe, beſide an Eſquire at his feete (Obſerue I pray you the auncient Ceremonie) The three Knights were Meſsire Guichard Dauphin; Meſsire Guy le Veneux, and Meſsire Iohn de Laye. And the Squire that was vnder the Table, where the King did ſet his feete, was Iohn de Caſtelmorant; in this manner was the King ſeated. Her by wee may remember, what hath bin noated by our illuminated Romaines, that our Kings being at the Table, or ſeated on their Throane: an Eſquire lyeth couched at the Kings feete, vpon whoſe hands or breaſt, are the Kings feete placed.

At the entrance of King Charles the ſeauenth into his Citie of Paris, the morrow after Saint Martins day in Winter, One thouſand foure hundred thirty ſeauen, the Equipage of this Count of Dunois, is thus deſcribed by Alanus Chartierus.

The furniſhment of the Baſtard of Orleans.

Behinde followed the Baſtard of Orleans, Armed at all points, he and his Horſe couered with Goldſmiths worke, and a rich Chaine of Gold, trailing behinde on the backe of his Horſe, made like great Oaken Leaues, each Leafe weighing fiftie Marks. This was the man, that conducted the Kings Battalion, conſiſting of a thouſand Lances, Armed at all points, and their Horſes barded.

King Charles gaue him this dignitie, not ſo much for acknowledgement of Seruices done by him to the Crowne; as to take away iealoſie in the Princes of the Blood, who who then were a great number (which was the ſtrength of the Kingdome) of making him march as a Peere with them. Hereafter we will ſet downe the Genealogie of this Count of Dunois, which continueth yet to this day. Hereupon this place was giuen him, by meanes whereof, and without enuie, he might appeare with the chiefeſt and neereſt about the King: being compelled by his place, to lye at his feete when he ſate on his Throane, and to come behinde his Horſe, when he road abroad in Royall manner.

The cruell murder of Lewes Duke of Orleans.

The ſaid Monſieur Lewes Duke of Orleans, was (thorow enuie of gouernement) cruelly murdered at Paris, in the Streete Barbette, with Axes, by eighteene murderers, the conducters whereof was a Norman, named Rollet d'Auctouille, William and Scaz de Courte-heuze, Brethren (Scaz being a Groome of the Chamber to the ſaid Duke of Orleans, Natiues of the Countie of Guienne) and Iohn de la Mothe, houſhold ſeruant to Iohn, Duke of Bourgongne, Author and procurer of this execrable murder, committed on the perſon of the onely Brother to the King, and of his Couſine Germaine, on Wedneſday, being Saint Clements day, the two and twentieth of Nouember, in the yeare One thouſand foure hundred and ſeauen, about the houre of eight in the night time. This poore Prince with the firſt ſtroake of an Axe, had his right hand cut off, and his head quartered in ſuch manner, as his braines were ſcattered on the pauement, he dying preſently in the place. With him was ſlaine a Germaine Squire, who had bin his Page, and ſeeing his Maiſter ſmitten downe, fell vpon him to ſaue his life, and receiued the blowes meant to his Maiſter.

An auncient Order of Begging Friers in Paris.

About halfe an houre after the murder committed, the people belonging to the Duke of Orleans, tooke vp his Body, and carried it to the Houſe of Meſsire Peter de Rieux, of Bretaigne, Marſhall of France, neere to the place of the murder, and hauing wrapped it in a faire white Sheete, they bare it thence to the Blancs-Manteaux, then called Guillemins, neighbouring to the Hoſtel de Rieux. The Body was afterward laid in a Coffin of Lead, and on Thurſday in the morning after the murder: his right hand was found by his followers, and with ſuch part of the braines as were left, put likewiſe into the Leaden Coffin. Soone after, all the Princes being then in Paris (except the King and Meſsieurs his Sonnes) went to the Blancs-Manteaux, as namely; King Lewes of Sicilie, the Dukes of Berry, Bourgongne, and Bourbon; the Marqueſſe du Pont, the Counts of Neuers of Clermont, of Vendoſme, of Saint Paul, and of Dampmartin; Charles d'Albert, Count of Dreux, Lord of Craon, and of Silly. Conſtable of France, with all the Lords and Gentlemen of the Court.

The Order of bearing the dead Body to the Celeſtines.

Thither likewiſe came all the Cleargie, of the Pariſhes and Monaſteries in Paris, and in manner of Proceſſion, filled with griefe and lamentations, brought the Body from the Church of the Guillemins, and carried it to the Church of the Celeſtines, the Eſquires of the deceaſed Duke carrying lighted Torches all the way before the Body. The foure corners of the Pall being borne vp by the King of Sicilie, and the Dukes of Berry, of Bourgongne, and of Bourbon, Princes of the Blood, Vnckles and Couſines Germaine to the dead Duke. After that Seruice was ſolemnely performed at the Celeſtines, the Body was enterred in the Chappell of Orleans, which hee had cauſed to be builded, and appointed for the place of his buriall, and his kinſmen to ſaue his.

Princes of the Houſe of Orleans.

Beneath on the Windowes in this Chappell, are repreſented (according to the life) the Pictures of the Princes of the Houſe of Orleans: beginning at King Charles firſt of the name, Father to Charles the ſixt, and to the ſaid Duke of Orleans; vntill the Duke of Alanſon, Monſieur Frances of France, the laſt Sonne to King Henry the ſecond.

At what age the Duke was murdered.

The Portraiture of the ſaid Duke Lewes, beſide that in the Windowes, and on his Tombe of Alablaſter, is ſeene depicted in Oyle (after the life) on a doore of Wood, on the right ſide of the Altar in the ſame Chappell. He is figured of the ſame Age, when he was murdered (ſixe and thirtie yeares old or thereabout) Antiquely habited, according as the times then were. A long Red Caſſocke or Gowne, furred with with Ermines, as worne ouer his Hose and Doublet, the sleeues of the Gowne being wide and large, as our Roabes are at the Pallace, not hauing any opening at the necke, to passe the head out at, which opening about the necke aloft, is garnished with adornings of Ermines. and thereupon a Coller of Stones. Before, vpon the right shoulder, is painted a Starre in Gold, to shew, that hee was Knight of the Starre, it being then the Order in France, and his Cassocke guirded with a Girdle fastened with a Buckle and Tongue. Before him is the figure of Death, very stearne and dreadfully made, holding in his hand a Dart or Iauelin, wherewith hee endeuoureth to strike the Duke, who to guard and defend himselfe, offereth his hand in resistance. Betweene them standeth a faire Fruite Tree, well laden with Apples, some whereof appeare to be ripe, but others not, the true Symbole of humaine life, and about it is his Deuise: Iuuenes, & Senes Rapio. On the Dukes head is written, Lewes Duc D'Orleans Ayeul du Roy Louis Douxiesme du Nom. Lewes Duke of Orleans, Grand Father to King Lewes, Twelfth of the name.

Yong and old I snatch away

This disastrous death of the Duke of Orleans, affrighted all the Princes and Lords of France. Queene Isabell of Bauaria (who was then tearmed La Grand Gorre, for her brauery in habits after the Germaine fashion, instead of attyring her selfe according as the French Ladies did) lying then in Childe-bed, was speedily transported to the Hostel Sanct Pol, and lodged close to the Chamber of King Charles the first her Husband, who was so terrified with this vntimely death, that hee fell into his wonted distraction of minde. All the Bourgesses and Cittizens of Paris Armed themselues, guarding the Streetes night and day, for the space of fifteene dayes and nights. Likewise suddenly entred into Armes the Counts of Sainct Paul, of Dampmartin, and others beside, watching and warding the Hostel of Saint Paul, as fearing least worser accidents shall happen.

What terrour ensued on the murder of the Duke.

Iohn, Duke of Berry, already stept farre into yeares (for he was aboue threescore and twelue) was so affrighted with the death of his Nephew Lewes, thus happening in the floure of his time; that he had death daily before his eyes, as he said himselfe beholding him on his one side, and his Nephew on the other. And yet he liued ten yeares after, dying in the yeare foure hundred and seauenteene, aged then fourscore and fiue yeares.

The perplexitie and death of Iohn Duke of Berry.

In memorie of this his Nephewes vntimely death, he caused to be figured on the Meridionall Gate of Saint Innocents Church (where is the great Churchyard belonging to the Citie of Paris) the Historie of three Deathes, that appeared to three liuing Gallants hunting in a Forrest. The three Deaths were pictured in their hideous deformitie of bare Skellitons, and the three Iouiall youths standing gastly amazed, with the sight and apprehension of three such gastly shapes: that they forsooke their pleasures and braueries of the Court, yea, and the delights of this miserable world, onely to prepare themselues for death. Which is nothing else but a sweet slumber, to such as liue after the will of God: but to the wicked, the gate and entrance into endlesse torments.

A Looking-Glasse for vaine Gallants

The Latine Verses made vpon this Meditation, are these following: Those of the Gallants, are to be obserued by themselues.

Aspice florentes humano in corpore vultus,
Aspice Fortunæ prospera fata Deæ:
Delicias (dum fata sinunt) ludosque, iocosque
Suminus, & toto gaudia mille sinu.

But vpon this conference, the three Deaths presenting themselues vnexpected answered them.

Viximus, sed multo quondam resplenduit ætas
Ornatu, sed nunc nil nisi puluis adest:
Aspice quam fragilis viuas in putre cadamer,
Tempore sic fies vermibus esca breui.
